Drought lowers level of Tuttle

By Brad Camp
Collegian Reporter

Summer drought and this winter's minimal precipitation has contributed to the water level at Tuttle Creek Reservoir reaching its lowest level since the early 1980's, acccording to officals at the Army Corps of Engineers.

The low levels of precipitation have dropped the pool elevation from its normal 1,075 feet of mean sea level to about 1,069 feet, officials said.

"The main purpose of the lake is flood control, but we have other obligations," said Greg Wurst, park manager for the Corps. "We are running 500 cubic feet per second because we have an obligation to keep some water going down the river to Topeka and Lawrence for their municipalities."

Wurst said the Corps is expecting to continue the discharge of water as part of its regulatory function.

"Our outflow rate is governed by the hydrologists in our district office in Kansas City," he said.

Tuttle Creek is the second largest-lake in Kansas. Like most lakes, it offers recreation for fishing, boating and camping. Wurst said if the drought continues into the summer, recreational opportunities at the lake will change.

"The changes for Tuttle Creek are all not for the worst," he said. "We're taking advantage of this low water by getting rid of some submerged rocks and stumps that have been problems in the past."

At normal pool level, Tuttle Creek has numerous underwater hazards such as submerged stumps, logs and rocks.

Property owners and residents at Tuttle Creek are taking advantage of the low water to dredge mud from the coves and to remove stumps, Wurst said.

"Sometimes there is a conflict between the people who want to cut tree stumps and the fishermen. We are a multi-purpose lake and we try to keep everybody happy," he said. "Right now (the pool level) is more of an opportunity than a problem."

The low water level may also change campgrounds in the park areas.

"If you want to camp by the waterline you may have to camp on the mudflats," Wurst said. "What used to be the waterline at the bank is now dried up."

The low water does create some problems for boaters and skiers, he said. Some of the areas used for launching boats are becoming inaccessible.

"We're going to run out of boat ramps pretty soon. We have two that are usable right now at Tuttle Cove and one at the top of the lake," Wurst said.

Weidhaas said the two functional ramps will be accessible at the 1,061-foot level.

"Some people believe this is the best year that they have had here as far as fishing is concerned, because there haven't been any drastic fluctuations," Wurst said. "Before the lake froze we had some excellent fishing."

Student Senate to decide future of proposed fee

By Kendra Gensemer
Government Editor

If Student Senate approves the athletic fee proposal bill adopted Monday by the Senate Executive Committee, a simple majority of those students who vote in the possible referendum would decide whether more than 18,000 K-State students would pay the athletic fee.

However, prior to the referendum, the legislation must be approved by a two-thirds vote of Student Senate.

The KSU Athletic Department has requested a $15 per semester fee for full-time undergraduate students and $7.50 per semester for graduate students.

Since 1970, the average number of students who voted in both Student Governing Association elections and referendums is about 3,100.

The average number of students who only voted in referendums, such as those concerning construction of the recreation complex and coliseum, was about 4,600. Were this trend to continue, 2,301 students would determine whether the student body would pay the fee.

The bill written in committee Monday requires that the fee go into effect upon simple majority vote by the student body and a two-thirds vote by the Student Senate.

However, a problem arose in that the legislative processes of referendum approval and fee increase approval were included under the bill adopted by the Executive Committee Monday, said Mary Jo Lampe, executive adviser to the student body president.

Student Affairs and Social Services Committee Chairman Chris Kern said the committee will restructure the bill before Student Senate meets Thursday. He said the restructuring would not change the concept of the bill, only better organize the procedural steps within the legislation.

Lampe said the committee's structural changes will include rewriting the bill to require that:

- Student Senate approves the athletic fee by the required two-thirds vote,
- Student Senate approves sending the proposal to referendum by a two-thirds vote and
- the approved fee be sent to referendum for approval by a simple

Commission rejects Greenbriar project

By Robert Short
Staff Writer

The Manhattan City Commission, after hearing nearly two hours of discussion concerning the Greenbriar planned urban development project, voted to reject the developer's request for rezoning.

The developer was requesting for the zoning to be changed from residential to planned urban development.

The proposed 5.7-acre housing project would have been located at the corner of College and Kimball avenues. The Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board recommended at an earlier meeting that the request for rezoning be denied. At that meeting the commission returned the item to the board for reconsideration.

Joe Knopp, a Manhattan attorney representing residents opposed to the project, said the project contained too many living units and was too dense for its proposed location, despite alterations made by the developer to appease concerns of local residents.

Bo Newsome, developer for the Greenbriar project, said three concerns about the project had been brought to him by the public: building scale, area density and lack of a comprehensive land-use policy for the area.

The project had been altered to allow for 120 living units instead of the original 144. Other changes in

'Satanic Verses' causes international furor

Nations wage diplomatic battle over novel

By The Associated Press

Iran recalled all its ambassadors from European Common Market nations Tuesday and Britain expelled an Iranian envoy as the diplomatic battle grew over Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini's death threats against author Salman Rushdie.

In Washington, President Bush said he supported the retaliatory moves by the European countries.

However offensive Rushdie's book, "The Satanic Verses," may be to Moslems, "inciting murder and offering rewards for its perpetration are deeply offensive to the norms of civilized behavior," Bush said.

The United States does not have diplomatic relations with Iran. Bush noted existing economic sanctions against Iran and said: "I don't know where we'll go from there."

Iran's official Islamic Republic News Agency said Iran's diplomatic recall was in response to Monday's decision by the 12 nations of the European Economic Community to withdraw their envoys from Tehran for consultations.

"The EEC decision ... is a clear sign which proves claims that the issue of this blasphemous book ... is a plot designed by Western imperialism to fight true Islam," IRNA quoted him as saying.

"We do not fear such threats. ... We are prepared to follow our own path at a cost," said Rafsanjani.

The confrontation over Rushdie appeared to be eroding efforts by some Iranian officials, including Rafsanjani, to strengthen ties with more nations despite opposition by fundamentalist hard-liners.

Although Rafsanjani was not quoted as endorsing the death sentence, his comments indicated Iranian leaders were closing ranks in the face of retaliation for Khomeini's death call.

President Ali Khamenei, a Rafsanjani ally, said Friday that Rushdie might be pardoned if he repented and apologized. Rushdie, a Moslem himself, apologized the next day, but Khomeini ignored the overture and renewed the death threat.

The 41-year-old Indian-born author has been in hiding with his wife in Britain, where he lives.

The Common Market nations stopped short of breaking relations with Iran but said that in addition to recalling top diplomats, they would suspend high-level visits to and from Iran.

Britain, a market member, went a step further by recalling its entire embassy staff. On Tuesday, it announced it was expelling the Iranian charge d'affaires and his aide.

Sweden and Norway followed the Common Market and recalled their ambassadors, and Sweden threatened to cancel a trade mission to Tehran next month unless the death warrant were rescinded.

Local book stores deal with controversy

By Alan Wilds
Staff Writer

As controversy continues to grow about Salman Rushdie's book, "The Satanic Verses," some Manhattan bookstores have either taken the book out of stock or sold all their copies.

A company statement was issued to all Waldenbooks stores, said Jane Huenneke, manager of the store in the Manhattan Town Center.

Huenneke quoted the statement as saying, "Waldenbooks has fought long and hard against censorship, but when it comes to safety, we must act responsibly."

She said after receiving threats to employees the Waldenbooks management has decided to remove displays of the book from their shelves solely to protect its 8,500 employees and its many U.S. customers.

Huenneke would not comment on customer reaction to the book's removal, or how long her store had the book in stock.

Varney's Book Store in Aggieville has decided not to stock the book with its regular selections, but can order it for people who request it, said Dan Walter, book department manager.

"There are so many books that are non-offensive, and we provide a broad spectrum of those books to do business with," Walter said.

Mary Littrell, manager of the Town Crier, said her store did have the book in stock selling for $19.95 a copy, but is sold out. It will be reordered when it is reprinted by the publisher.

"We have had people ask about it and order it," Littrell said.

They had three books ordered, she said, but they sold them and at no time did they plan to pull the book off the shelves.

"We got the book before all this (controversy) came out," Littrell said.

She said she cannot decide how many books will be ordered until she hears from distributors and customers.

The K-State Union bookstore also had the book in stock but is sold out, said Kay Farley, manager.

Farley would not comment on the issue but she did say that there have been no problems surrounding the book so far.

Farley, Littrell and Walter all said that there have been no threats against their stores or employees.

Walter said he believes the action that has been taken against the book does not belong in civilized society.

"There are other ways in America to apply consumer pressure," he said.

Walter said this should be considered an extremist's issue, and in some ways the controversy is ridiculous.

David Hula, adviser of the Iranian Moslem Organization, said it would be difficult for the organization to comment since many of the Iranian students would be against voicing an opinion for or against Khomeini's threats to Rushdie and the United States.

Soviet musicians to visit U.S.

MOSCOW, Idaho — Pianist Leonid Vintskevich and saxophonist Lembit Saarsalu, two of the top Soviet jazz musicians, will give their first North American performances this week at the Lionel Hampton Jazz Festival.

Festival director Lynn Skinner said it has taken two years to obtain the Soviet government's permission and clear all the diplomatic hurdles for the two to come to the event sponsored by the University of Idaho's School of Music.

The 22nd annual festival begins its three-day run Thursday and will feature performances by the Soviet jazzmen at each night's featured concert.

"They don't speak any English, but they speak the language of jazz," Skinner said. "The recordings they've sent us have been the very finest you could imagine in terms of performance skills."

Although Saarsalu lives in Estonia and Vintskevich several hundred miles away in Kursch, they have played a number of concerts together in the Soviet Union and have teamed up at European jazz festivals, Skinner said.

They'll get a chance to play at the festival with Hampton and his New York Big Band, along with other American jazz greats such as trumpeter Wynton Marsalis, saxophonist Stan Getz, vocalist Carmen McRae and guitarist Kenny Burrell.

Man killed by falling sign

FARIBAULT, Minn. — A garbage truck backed into a liquor store sign, killing a man who was giving the driver directions, authorities said Tuesday.

"Apparently he was just being a good neighbor and got in the way," said Dorothy Stevens, a records clerk at the Sheriff's Department.

Harold Penman, 32, saw the truck backing up and got out of his car to help Monday, Stevens said. As the truck approached a 17-foot sign, Penman sensed danger and ran, and was hit in the head by a support pole, she said.

He died at Faribault District 1 Hospital.

High school gets bomb threat

CHANUTE — A telephoned bomb threat prompted evacuation of about 385 students from Chanute High School Tuesday morning, but authorities who checked the building found nothing.

Students, faculty members and construction workers on a renovation project at the school were allowed to return about an hour later.

An office secretary received a call from a man who said a "bomb was in the high school and would go off" about one hour later. School administrators described the voice as older and more mature than a student's voice.

Baby found dead in trash

ATCHISON — A 19-year-old woman was under police guard at an Atchison hospital Tuesday after the body of a newborn girl was found in a trash dumpster behind the woman's dormitory at Benedictine College.

Jean A. Franks, a freshman from Mooseheart, Ill., was arrested at the dormitory Monday evening and was charged Tuesday afternoon with first-degree murder in the slaying of her baby girl, said Atchison County Attorney Gunnar Sundby. Bond was set at $100,000.

A preliminary autopsy report indicated the baby, which appeared to be full-term and alive at birth, was strangled. The autopsy report said a knotted nylon cord was found around the baby's neck.

Police Chief Ron Pickman said police were called Monday after a man looking for aluminum cans found the baby's body. He said it was wrapped in a sweatshirt and placed in a small cardboard box enclosed by a plastic trash bag.

Pickman said preliminary investigation indicated the body had been in the dumpster between four and 12 hours.

The woman was taken to the hospital and given a medical examination immediately after she was taken into custody. The hospital declined to release details of the examination or her condition, but police said she was expected to be held in the hospital at least for another night.

Police search for girl's killers

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — Police in several Midwestern states were hunting for two men Tuesday after an Oklahoma state trooper let them go before he realized they were wanted for slashing a Kansas girl's throat and stabbing her repeatedly.

Conrad Joseph Hernandez, 24, and Archie E. Owens Jr., 20, who were believed to have been living in Kansas City, Kan., were charged in absentia Tuesday with killing Syndi S. Bierman, 17, a popular honor student and athlete from Piper High School.

Bierman's beaten and stabbed body was found Sunday in the bedroom of her home in Piper, an unincorporated Wyandotte County community of about 2,500 residents located 20 miles northwest of Kansas City, Mo.

Murderer professes innocence

JUNCTION CITY — A man convicted of murder based in part on evidence of genetic typing professed his innocence Tuesday as he was sentenced to life in prison.

Oliver J. Smith Jr., 25, of Newton, was convicted last month in the 1986 slaying of Shelly Prine, 22, of rural Goessel.

Geary County District Judge George Scott ordered a life term for first-degree murder and a consecutive term of 15 years to life for rape. Steve Opat, the former Geary County prosecutor who was a special prosecutor in the case, said Smith would be eligible for parole in about 23 years.

Smith, who had not testified at the trial, made a number of religious references in his comments before sentencing, at one point saying, "My reason for being here is a lot of lost souls here. I am here to do His will, not my will."

"My God is able to deliver me and I believe he will deliver me," Smith said.

Students to benefit if funding approved

By Robert Short
Staff Writer

K-State will be eligible for a Youth Education Service program to help at-risk students in local school districts if the Kansas Legislature approves a bill calling for $50,000 in support funding.

The Senate Ways and Means Committee recommended the full Senate approve the $50,000 to continue expansion of the YES program to other universities in Kansas, said Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan.

At-risk students are those who experience problems in school due to social or economic problems.

If the funds are approved, K-State will have the opportunity to apply to the Kansas Board of Regents for a portion of the funds, said John McIntyre, president of the K-State chapter of Associated Students of Kansas.

The program would be the latest addition to K-State's five student community service programs, said Carol Peak, director of community service. The programs already in place are the summer community service teams, community SAVE effort, the clearing-house and the mini-grant program.

"Students would go into schools and work with at-risk students," Peak said. "They would work to improve success in education — a one-on-one kind of activity."

McIntyre said K-State may be asked to match the funding offered by the regents if Manhattan is selected for a YES program.

A YES program at K-State would effect at-risk students in surrounding rural school districts. Other YES programs were set up in urban districts, but a program at K-State would focus on rural areas, she said.

"We would be working with some of the rural districts near Manhattan," she said. "They do not have the resources to do this kind of thing. This is badly needed in some of these smaller school districts."

The YES program originated through efforts of ASK, said Mark Tallman, state legislative director for ASK.

"Our organization basically developed the (YES program) idea," Tallman said.

If funding were approved during this session of the Legislature, a program could be set up at K-State in time for the fall semester, Peak said.

The YES project was initiated in 1988 after the Legislature approved $30,000 in funding for the program, Tallman said. The governor's 1989 budget proposals did not include funding for the YES program.

Three pilot operations were started at the University of Kansas, Emporia State University and Wichita State University and are operated mainly by students, Tallman said. There are also programs in Topeka and Kansas City.

"The program is very flexible," he said. "The YES program is still in the developing stages. We are still trying to find out what works and what doesn't work."

Each university has its own mission, McIntyre said. The YES program can adjust to different universities, according to its mission.

Candidate list narrowed to 6

Applicant addresses issues

Global, national and local issues are all influenced by the College of Architecture and Design, said Herbert Gottfried, professor of architecture at Iowa State University.

Gottfried is one of six candidates being considered for dean of K-State's College of Architecture and Design. The new dean will replace Mark Lapping.

"We need to encourage integration and collaboration. We need to learn as much about each other as we can."
—Herbert Gottfried dean candidate

Gottfried spoke to a group of about 90 students and faculty Tuesday in an open meeting.

"I think a pressing issue that we need to face is that global, national and local issues are all influenced by what we as a college do," he said. "Design is the focal point where society and relevence collide.

"I feel that we need to come to a meeting of minds as to the present and future needs of the College of Architecture and Design. I am interested in understanding the college and University."

Gottfried stressed the importance of the bilingual society.

"We need to require foreign language and encourage foreign travel," he said. "We need to encourage integration and collaboration. We need to learn as much about each other as we can.

"I believe that the College of Architecture needs to become good at doing a few things. Excellence comes from focus."

He said the function of a dean is to help people get together what they need and then get out of the way to let them do their job.

"I'm a liberal arts type of educator," Gottfried said. "I'm more concerned with the questions than the answers to those questions."

The college needs to encourage students to become educated, he said.

"I feel that we need to take people from where they are and encourage them to go a little farther," Gottfried said. "Students have a point of view that has merit and needs to be heard, but that point of view is different from faculty. Not that we know something students don't, we just know more from experience."

Gottfried earned his undergraduate degree at Colby College, his masters of arts at the University of Montana and his Ph.D at Ohio University.

Bill Miller, professor of architecture and a member of the search committee, said Gottfried is the one candidate who is truly interdisciplinary.

Gottfried's areas of expertise are in history and theory of 19th and 20th century architecture and design; preservation and development of cultural resources; and planning and design of sustainable communities, Miller said.

"We are looking for candidates who can answer questions on the primary issues facing design education," he said. "We are looking for people who can answer these questions with depth and quality."

Interaction highlights Greek Week

Providing opportunities for interaction between fraternity and sorority houses, promoting greek life and choosing greek ambassadors are the purposes of Greek Week, said Barb Robel, Greek Affairs adviser.

Greek Week begins today and continues through Saturday. Activities will include a faculty breakfast, a donkey basketball game, and a lip-synch competition. Eleven sororities and 23 fraternities are divided into 10 teams for the events.

All money raised by Greek Week will be donated to the United Way charity, Robel said.

A faculty breakfast will be at 7:15 a.m. today in the Union Ballroom for people instrumental in the production of Greek Week, said Perry Palmer, Greek Week coordinator. These people include President Jon Wefald; Pat Bosco, associate vice president for institutional advancement and dean of student life; fraternity and sorority house moms and presidents; and a faculty or alumnus or alumna nominee from each house.

One person from each house will participate in a donkey basketball game at 7 p.m. Thursday in Weber Arena. The 10 groups will be formed into four teams to play a total of three games.

From 4 to 6 p.m. Friday at Kite's Bar and Grill, banners with houses' Greek letters will be hung for the members to sign. Points will be awarded based on the highest percentage of house participants signing the banner.

The lip-synch competition will be at 7:30 p.m. Saturday in McCain Auditorium with a slide show afterward, Palmer said. The competition will be judged similar to the TV show "Putting on the Hits," with points for originality, appearance and lip-synch ability. The slide show will consist of eight slides from each house.

One fraternity member and one sorority member will be chosen as greek ambassadors to promote the greek system and work with Greek Affairs, Palmer said. Voting for ambassadors will take place today through Friday in the Union and the winners will be announced Saturday at the lip-synch competition.

Greek Affairs will also sell annual Greek Week books, which contain Greek Week history, composites of each house and promotional advertisements.

Palmer said that because of redundancy, boredom and low participation, a Greek Week task force was organized to change the activities from that of last year. The eight-member committee was selected by the Interfraternity Council and Panhellenic Council.

Besides new activities, the committee reduced the number of houses in each group and increased the number of groups participating in the week's events.

Prosecutor says North put self 'above the law'

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Oliver North's criminal trial opened Tuesday with the prosecutor calling him a liar who "places himself above the law" but with North's lawyer defending him as a patriotic Marine who obeyed the orders of the nation's highest officials.

North listened intently as the prosecutor told the jury he had lied time and again to his president and to Congress about the Iran-Contra affair.

His chief defense lawyer countered that North, a former top National Security Council aide, worked in a secret world where "he always acted with the approval of his superiors; he acted always with the best interests of his country."

Thus the two sides squared off for the oft-delayed first trial to come out of the Iran-Contra affair, a trial that may take as much as five months to complete.

The courtroom was filled to its 120-seat capacity, with reporters taking 60. The public got only 15 and the rest went to assorted lawyers, prosecutors and government security experts.

Attitudes, traditions foster hazing problem

In the past five years, hazing by fraternities and sororities has become a serious issue in the public eye. Here at K-State, it has become a big issue in the past few weeks, since a fraternity and a sorority were punished for hazing.

As usual, this has produced a desire in many people to do something about hazing. Recommendations on what to do range from ideas as simple as doing away with the pledge system to ideas as drastic as doing away with all Greek houses.

I can't honestly condone the latter suggestion because, just as there is a potential for abuse in a Greek house, there is also the potential for personal growth. Learning to live in close quarters with a group of diverse people is part of the challenge of Greek life, a challenging part of life in general.

Greek houses also provide good places to learn and practice leadership skills.

Unfortunately for many Greeks, in the last several years, personal growth and leadership seem to have taken a back seat to partying and destruction.

Greeks are now perceived as being alcohol-soaked, sex-driven beasts who exist only to raise hell. While this is true in some cases, it does not apply to all Greeks.

A small minority of Greeks who actually believe that the movie "Animal House" shows Greek life as it actually is have made life difficult for all Greek houses.

Part of the answer is to have each fraternity's and sorority's national organization find these people and get them out of the Greek system.

Many national organizations have begun to crack down on hazing. They also have advocated the elimination of the traditional pledge program that a majority of fraternities and sororities use, in favor of an associate program.

In an associate program, all members, new and old, share all housework and kitchen work equally and are only separated by the fact that the new members have not yet been initiated. The hope is that older members, by working side by side with new members, will learn to see them as their friends and not just as "the plebes."

The associate program, however, while it can be very useful in the elimination of hazing by getting rid of the environment in which hazing normally develops, only addresses part of the hazing problem. Two more difficult obstacles must be overcome in order for hazing to be eliminated: tradition and attitude.

The worst types of hazing tend to be ingrained into a chapter's traditions. In these cases, a specific act of hazing has been committed every year for so long it has taken on a ritual-like status to the members of the chapter. This ritualistic hazing is not unique to the associate program or the pledge program. It can easily exist in both.

Commentary

Dwayne Lively

Collegian Columnist

The attitude of those who have been subjected to this hazing ritual is along the lines of "now it's my turn." They carry out their revenge for what happened to them on the new members who in turn take it out on those who join after them.

The worst example of ritualistic hazing I have ever heard of occurred in a chapter of my own fraternity. This chapter subjected its pledges to a brutal ritual of torture each year by making them "ride the Gyrack."

Gyrack, or Uncle Gyrack as it was also called, was basically the box spring of a mattress stripped of all its cloth and padding and hooked up to an electric current. Each pledge was thrown onto the Gyrack and forced to "ride" it for an extended length of time. Chapter members who were willing to talk about their experiences were amazed no one was ever killed on the Gyrack.

Pledges of this chapter had been riding the Gyrack since the chapter was founded in 1921. This torture was finally stopped in 1986 when the chapter was caught and stripped of its charter.

Interestingly enough, it was not a pledge who ultimately turned in the chapter. It was an area counselor who had caught wind of what was going on.

The pledges themselves didn't, after all this, understand what the big deal was. They didn't think the chapter deserved to be shut down.

Herein lies the heart of the hazing problem and herein lies the biggest obstacle to ending it. Attitude.

Actives carry on ritualistic hazing because they don't know what to do without it. During the years a series of justifications for the punishment has been formulated. These justifications make perfectly good sense to the actives because they have nothing else to measure them against.

They must be shown that, while nothing is wrong with house traditions, certain acts should never become tradition at all. If these acts do become tradition, someone must have the guts to stand up and fight to have them stopped.

Actives must also remember that all fraternities work to instill in their members a desire to be a part of what they have established. Actives must realize the extremes that this desire can be taken to and be careful not to abuse it.

The pledges who rode the Gyrack did so because they wanted to be a part of that particular fraternity, whatever the cost. Someone who really wants to be a part of your house will probably not tell you when he's had enough. More than likely he will simply be caught up in a situation where he is afraid to continue on, but afraid to speak up and say he's had enough.

Unfortunately, as long as there are new members in any organization, the potential for hazing will exist. It will also exist as long as there is alcohol around. Most hazing incidents occur while one or more members are under the influence of alcohol and without the knowledge of the rest of the chapter.

However, this should not prevent us from working to eliminate the ritualistic hazing passed down from member to member as a part of twisted traditions. Only when this form of hazing is eliminated, can we begin to do away with any other forms of hazing.

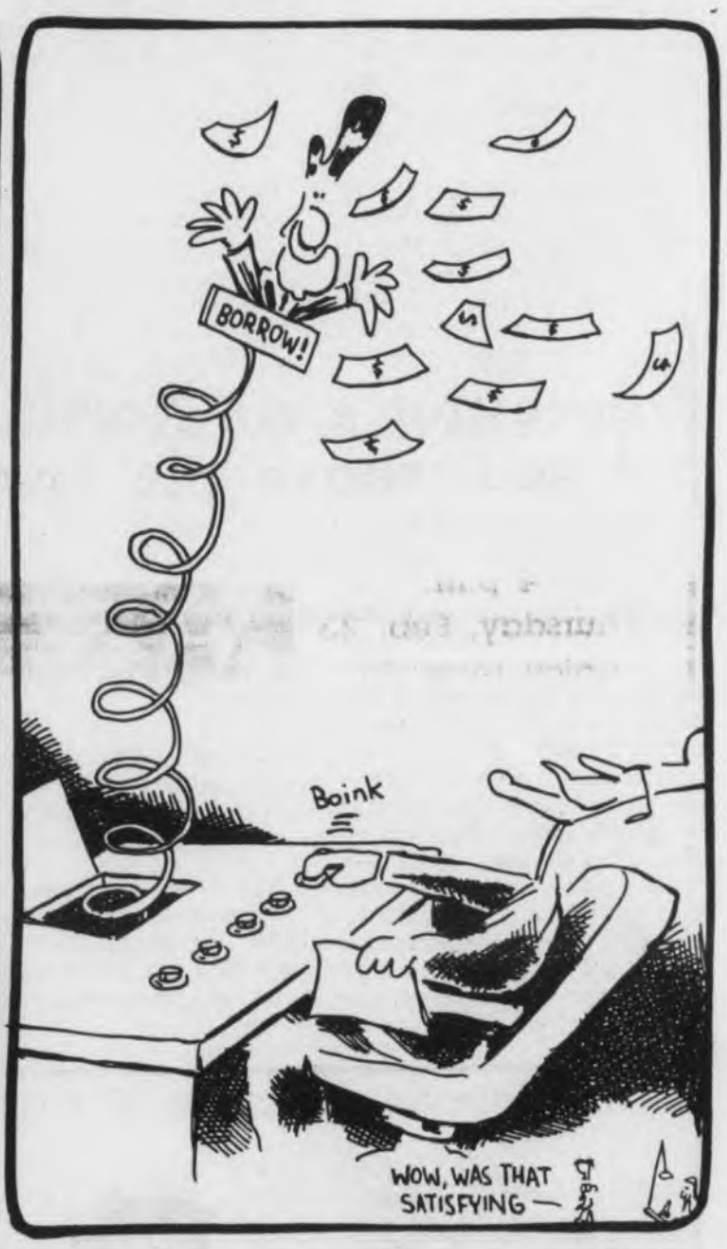
Advice on rebuilding hypocritical from U.S.

Last week, as the Soviet army ended its intervention in the Afghan civil war, Secretary of State James Baker III called upon the Soviet Union to aid Afghanistan in rebuilding from the devastation the war had caused.

Certainly the Soviet Union bears great responsibility for the damage and suffering which has been inflicted upon Afghanistan and its people, and should offer reparations. For the United States to call upon the Soviet Union to help rebuild Afghanistan is the height of hypocrisy.

Aghanistan has been called the Soviet Vietnam. This is an apt analogy, for like the United States in the '60s, the Soviet Union in the '80s experienced a leadership change and several years of bloodshed and gradual disillusionment. Then the Soviet Union also realized that its power, though great, is limited and cannot easily force a Third World nation to bow to a superpower's wishes.

And like the United States in Vietnam, any offer of reparations from the Soviet Union to Afghanistan will probably depend on the nature of the government which rules after the end of the civil war.



When the United States withdrew its troops from Vietnam in 1973, President Nixon hinted to the North Vietnamese government that the United States might offer billions of dollars in aid to rebuild that country. Nixon's offer was an inducement to get the North Vietnamese to leave the government of South Vietnam intact.

But realizing the weakness of the South Vietnamese government in the absence of direct U.S. military support, North Vietnam achieved its 19-year-old goal of defeating South Vietnam.

Nixon's veiled promise was never honored. Nor has it been. Nor will it be. Communist Vietnam's failure to account for those Americans listed as missing in action may be traced to the unwillingness of the United States to honor Nixon's promise.

Now, when the shoe is on the other foot, the U.S. government is offering advice to superpowers which have been defeated by Third World nations. It might do well to follow its own advice.

Hot new fee plan sure to sell

Outtasight!

After a three-year hiatus, the masters of design in Student Senate and their technical consultants in the K-State athletic department will finally be ready Thursday evening for the unveiling of their long-awaited, much-talked-about athletic fee proposal. This is the one we've all been waiting for, folks.

Hot with anticipation, I got a sneak peek at the new model earlier this week, and I can only say that it is definitely a beaut. It's enough to usher in a whole new era in consensus manufacturing.

Any of you antique buffs remember the '86 model? Well, you can forget about it because this brand new model is literally hell on wheels.

Sure, students were never quite sold on the old model, but this time the masters of design set out to ensure that everything would be different. And different it is!

The Senate Student Affairs and Social Services Committee, which helped author this piece of technical wizardry, has overhauled the traditional look and opted for a whole new revolutionary design.

According to Chris Kern, chairman of the SASS committee, this little beaut has all the "benefits." The neat thing about it is that all the "benefits" will be available to all the people. You wanted free admission to all non-revenue sports? You got it!

You wanted 6,000 reserved seats for those barn-burners in the house that Fred built? You got it!

In fact, even if you didn't want any of that, you might still get it. (But of course, you do want it, don't you? C'mon, quit kiddin', you know you want it.)

After the '86 model missed its target market, the masters of design scratched their heads, rolled up their sleeves, and went back to the drawing board to come up with a design that would be the hit of the decade. When you see this gem, I think you'll agree that all their hard work and research were not for naught.

Commentary

Scott Miller

Collegian Columnist

One of the reasons the '86 model never took hold was its one-size-fits-all philosophy. Apparently, it just couldn't cut it with the graduate and veterinary medicine sets who are known for their pragmatic approach when it comes to shopping for fee increases.

But this sleek new model solves that problem because it will be available in two, (that's right, folks, not one, but two) different designs: A sporty, souped-up one for undergraduates and a more scaled-down, sophisticated one for the graduate and veterinary medicine crowds. (Actually, these two models look incredibly similar, but if the technical wizards say there's a choice, then, by golly, there must be one.)

But what's that you say? No cash on hand? Hey, no problem! Listen, partner. For you, Senate has got an extra special deal. If you act now, all you need is just $15 down ($7.50 if you're a part-time student) and you can continue to pay for your very own little pack o' dynamite for the next three years at the low, low rate of $15 a semester ($7.50 for part-time students).

Now, folks, these rates are so low, they're practically subterranean. They're so low you gotta watch your step. They're so low you'll need a shovel to get a good gander at 'em. Why, they're so low that ... well, just take my word for it, folks, they redefine the word.

And, after your three-year test drive, you're entitled to a one-year grace period during which your credit will be reviewed by Senate's own friendly finance review experts. They're sure to work you a sweet little deal you won't be able to pass up.

They might decide for you whether to continue your payments, or maybe even whether a brand new '91 model is just what you're hankerin' after.

When this new model bursts into the public eye, it is sure to win critical acclaim by meeting the standards that we have come to expect from the premier designers of consensus manufacturing. In fact, this time the consumer masses should be a little easier to please because of a new set of marketing techniques employed by the design masters.

Last time the designers needed a two-thirds majority of consumer opinion in favor of the model before it could be driven out of the showroom. This time, however, only a simple majority would be required, which the manufacturers figure is sure to stimulate demand. In fact, stimulate is probably too mild a word for the reaction this puppy ought to generate.

When I first saw this bundle of sweetness, somehow I just knew the reaction was going to be astonishment and disbelief. This little babe really does need to be seen to be believed. But don't take my word for it, friends, call your student senators and ask them for yourselves.

Dreams, goals dissolve in 1920's 'The Moderns'

By Mark Schreiner
Collegian Reviewer

To the spoils belongs the victor. — F. Scott Fitzgerald.

"The Moderns" is the story of the Lost Generation's disillusionment with life and subsequent dissolution into alcohol. It is also about how two people return to Hollywood to glue the pieces of their lives back together.

Nick Hart, portrayed by Keith Carradine, is a starving painter in 1926 Paris. Rachel Stone, played by Linda Florentino, is a flapper complete with bobbed hair and sparkly cap. She and Nick get married in Chicago when they are young and giddy, still faithful to their dreams and aspirations.

But Nick's artwork comes between the two, and Rachel, without divorcing him, chucks her ideals and marries New Yorker Bertram Stone (John Lone) for his money. Bertram is a self-made millionaire described, like the Great Gatsby, as "looking like he killed a man." He is the classic villain, loving money more than anything except himself.

Bertram collects art because it's fashionable. "All the critics and art snobs will be at my salon," he says before an exhibition. "I want to make an impression, not a reputation."

The three meet in a Paris cafe, although Rachel and Nick's marriage is still unknown to Bertram, and the plot begins to thicken after Nick forges some Cezannes. Bertram's growing suspicion of Rachel and Nick culminates in a modern duel in a boxing ring.

The film is full of allusions to Gertrude Stein and F. Scott Fitzgerald and other members of the literary American ex-patriots attracted to Paris because of its lack of artistic inhibition and Prohibition.

While Nick, Rachel and Hemingway are out living, fighting and drinking, Stein and her cadre of literati say useless things like, "I dislike the abnormal. The normal is more simply complicated and interesting."

"The Moderns" gets corny in spots, including a dreamy, slow-motion drowning sequence reminiscent of "Escape From Witch Mountain" and a surrealistic shot of a ghost breaking the surly bonds of earth. It effectively mocks the pretensions of the rich of that time period who aspire to art but don't want to perspire.

The film mocks the artsy-poser type personalities. As one character puts it, "Paris has been taken over by imitators of people who are imitators themselves."

"The Moderns" digs at the attempt to buy artistic props that imply artistic knowledge. Everyone wants to hang around with Hemingway, but none is his friend.

The film's complaining works because the love story between Nick and Rachel overshadows the complaints. The ending, with a surprising number of plot twists, suggests that love and art can be saved in modern times.

McCain series receives $15,300

By Carol Knorr
Collegian Reporter

The McCain Performance Series has received an endowment in honor of a previous board member that will help ease the cost of bringing performances to Manhattan.

The Jeanne Wells Durkee Memorial Fund for McCain Performance Series, held by the KSU Foundation, is estimated at $15,300 and was established through gifts from her family and friends, said Mary Lee Graham, president of the McCain Development Board.

The decision was made to place memorials into this fund before Jeanne Durkee died of cancer in June 1988, said her husband, William Durkee, Manhattan resident.

"The decision was made by both of us during the last month of her life," Durkee said. "She was a part of this decision."

Although Jeanne Durkee was not a performer herself, she was interested in all the performing arts, said Durkee, a local physican.

"She was always interested in musicals, plays and ballets — especially ballets," he said.

Jeanne Durkee became involved with the McCain Development Board in 1985 and served on and was chairwoman of the opera committee during her time with McCain and was in charge of the Opera Gala in 1988, Graham said. She also served on the board of the Manhattan Arts Council.

"(Durkee) dedicated endless hours in the area of hospitality to see that the functions of McCain would be well received by the community," Graham said. "You knew when she took charge of a project it would be a job well-done. She was one of those rare people who tie everything into a bow, not a knot."

The memorial fund is being used to help underwrite the cost of bringing performances to McCain, she said.

"Given the fact that it is so expensive to get performances here, the fund will only supplement the cost," Graham said. "This memorial is giving us the opportunity to maintain the quality of performances and keep ticket prices down."

The memorial funds will help sponsor one performance per year, which is determined by the McCain director.

This year the memorial will cosponsor the Harlem Blues and Jazz Band on Friday.

"We are trying to put the funds into performances that (Durkee) would have enjoyed," said Richard Martin, director of McCain. "She would have really enjoyed a jazz performance."

"Jeanne was a lovely lady," Graham said. "We need more Jeanne Durkee's in this world."

Bush denies allegations against Tower

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Bush on Tuesday denounced as "vicious rumor" allegations against Defense Secretary-designate John Tower and declared they had been "gunned down" by a thorough FBI report. A committee vote on the embattled nominee was scheduled for Thursday.

Urging the Senate to move "forthrightly" on the nomination, Bush said at a news conference that the report produced nothing to substantiate allegations of excessive drinking, philandering and financial improprieties.

Members of the Senate Armed Services Committee, meanwhile, scrutinized the report, which the White House forwarded to committee chairman Sen. Sam Nunn, D-Ga., and ranking Republican John Warner of Virginia late Monday.

Meanwhile, Rep. Mickey Edwards, R-Okla., a prominent conservative, said Tower should withdraw his nomination because he has lost the credibility needed to promote Bush's defense agenda.

"I think John Tower has a substantial problem," Edwards told reporters. "I don't think that has anything to do with who he's sleeping with or whether he has one glass of wine before he goes to bed or two."

Edwards said the question is whether Tower, a former Republican senator who once chaired the Armed Services Committee, can be credible in dealing with defense contractors after accepting nearly $1 million from major weapons manufacturers as a consultant since he left the Senate in 1985.

Parking fee income pays for expenses

By Mike Rouse
Collegian Reporter

Some people might wonder where their money goes after paying to park in the Bramlage Coliseum lot for an entertainment event.

"The income from the parking charge goes into a central fund and then takes care of the expenses such as paying the people who help park cars," said George Miller, vice president for administration and finance.

K-State purchased a $450,000 bond from the Kansas Development Finance Authority last year to help with the parking lot. About $70,000 to $100,000 will be paid each year.

"People who park in regular stalls pay $2 and reserved stalls cost $3 for basketball games," said Lt. Robert Mellgren of the K-State Police. "Everyone pays $3 for the football games."

Mellgren said a parking fee is charged for any money-making event in Bramlage, such as concerts. The cost of parking for such an event is the same as for a basketball game.

"For any money-making entertainment, there is a parking charge," he said. "But, for things like commencement and Lady Cats basketball, there is no charge.

Miller said this is the first year the parking lot has been in existence. This is also the first time the campus police have been in charge of parking.

The University collects about $5,000 for each basketball game, Mellgren said. The money collected from football games varies.

"For instance, in the Nebraska game we made around $13,000 and for the last game of the season, against Colorado, we barely made enough to cover expenses," he said.

Some students have saved the $2 or $3 by parking along the streets close to the coliseum.

"I always park along the streets because I don't want to pay the money, and I hate to wait in line to get out after the game," said Steve Lohmeier, senior in electrical engineering.

"It balances out not parking in the lot, because the money I save by parking in the streets I use to buy a Coke at the game," said David Mitchell, sophomore in business administration.

Winter radon testing encouraged

By Alan Wilds
Staff Writer

With the arrival of winter, the Environmental Protection Agency is encouraging Manhattan area residents to test their homes for traces of radon gas.

Radon, a natural gas of the soil, can enter through cracks in the foundation, cinder blocks, and sump pump pits, said Judy Willingham, environmental health supervisor.

She said houses that don't have basements are also at risk due to toilets and bathtubs being set into the slab.

"We are encouraging testing during the winter because the house must be closed during the test and furnaces can create negative pressure that could suck in gas," Willingham said.

The EPA has given no exact definition of what an unsafe level of radon is. Willingham said a lot of variables are involved, but they are encouraging anyone whose home tests above 5 1/2 units of radiation for every 1 liter of air to investigate their homes to find the problem areas.

Gale Simons, professor of nuclear engineering, said the basic health problem associated with radon is lung cancer, but there have never been any reported lung cancer cases with the cause being attributed to radon.

"It is speculated that if a person lives in a house with an excessive level of radon for 70 years and spends 75% of their time in that house then they may be at risk," Simons said.

This speculation was based on data obtained from uranium miners who are exposed to the same kind of radiation, he said.

"Children and smokers would be at the greatest risk." Simons said.

Willingham said radon test kits are available at the health department for $10 or at Wal-Mart. Lab analysis and results are included in the price of the health department's kit, she said.

"If they are used properly, they provide a fairly accurate reading," Willingham said.

The test kit contains one charcoal canister that must be exposed in the lowest living level of the house, four feet from the floor, Willingham said. The area must not be high in moisture or heat and have no continual ventilation. Within three to seven days the canister can be sent back to the lab.

"We notify people of their results if they purchased their test kit from the health department," Willingham said.

"As far as area test results go, Manhattan is not in an area where radon levels are high," she said.

Simons said radon has always been there and there is no reason for people to become worried.

"At this point, we do not want to overplay it," he said.

Alcoholic support group helps students cope

By The Collegian Staff

Monday night was the first meeting of Alcoholic Students Helping Alcoholic Students, a group of students who discuss the hardships and experiences of alcoholism.

The support group is for alcoholics who want to quit drinking or for students who are friends of alcoholics, said Roger Drake, founder of ASHAS and senior in marketing.

"Alcoholics can share their problem with others and try talking about it to people over and over, but no one except other alcoholics will really understand," Drake said.

The group is for sharing, not for counseling or directing, he said.

"No one is going to say this is what you should or shouldn't do," Drake said. "It's more of getting things off your chest and sharing ideas."

Bill Arck, director of alcohol and other drug education services, said ASHAS provides a service which in the past has not been offered to students.

"It's a group started by a student, for students," Arck said. "I think it's an asset to the community to have a group such as ASHAS at K-State which helps maintain sobriety."

Drake said ASHAS is not intended to replace other support groups.

"The worst thing we could do is try to replace Alcoholics Anonymous," he said. "ASHAS is like a supplement of AA with people more of the same age.

"I am an alcoholic and three years ago I quit drinking," Drake said. "I went to some AA meetings and found that a lot of people were older than me. I thought that maybe I was the only (college student) with the disease. I always wondered why there wasn't a student group on campus.

"In my opinion it doesn't matter who's (forming support groups), for an alcoholic — every little bit helps," he said.

Former football assistant faces theft charges

By The Collegian Staff

A former graduate assistant to the K-State football program will appear today in a Maryland court to face a charge of theft.

Timothy W. Lewis, 24, was arrested Nov. 9 on two warrants containing seven criminal charges issued by the sheriff's office of Montgomery County, Md. Charges against Lewis included forgery of endorsement, theft of more than $300 and theft of more than $300/conspiracy, and storehouse breaking with intent to commit a felony.

Richard Crane, a spokesman for the Maryland state attorney's office in Rockville, Md., said all charges against Lewis have been dropped except theft of more than $300 and storehouse breaking.

"Theft and breaking and entering were the major charges, so he won't be tried for the others," Crane said.

The maximum sentence for storehouse breaking with intent to commit a felony is 10 years in jail, and the maximum sentence for the theft charge is $500 or 18 months in jail or both, he said.

Lewis has reached a plea bargain with the state attorney's office concerning the theft charge, Crane said, but the agreement can't be disclosed until the judge has accepted the terms.

"With a plea arrangement, the court generally accepts the attorney's decision," he said. "The attorney's office usually suggests what sentence should be imposed also, but the final decision is up to the judge."

Lewis will face the storehouse breaking charge at a later date and a plea bargain agreement will be sought for that charge also.

Lewis joined the football program in July and worked with the receiver's unit, Stan Parrish, former K-State head football coach, said in November.

Dogs' Days

Working for a living

It's a dog's life.

To some people this phrase evokes visions of a happy-go-lucky mutt spending its day sleeping, eating, scratching, chewing shoes and romping in the yard with its owner.

But not all dogs fit the stereotype. Some Manhattan dogs live a life of work and variety, whether they be local public celebrities or unknown trainees.

Some of the more well-known working dogs in Manhattan are the Dalmations in residence at Mayer Retail Liquor and Southern Sun tanning salon.

What began with one dog, Dillon, later became two when a female, Maddie, was added, and then 12 when Maddie gave birth to 10 pups four weeks ago.

"It started when Greg (Mayer) used to bring (Dillon) to work," said Tracie Mayer, owner of the dogs. "They come to work with us everyday. They're wherever I am.

"They don't like to stay home by themselves. Every morning they're out in the (Jeep) Cherokee ready to go."

Although some people may question a dog's ability to adapt to a store environment, the dogs have adjusted — despite the store being located on a busy corner in Aggieville.

"Dillon went out in the street twice and both times he was thrown physically back, and that was the end of it," Mayer said, adjusting the red bandanna around Maddie's neck which matches the red polish on the dog's nails.

What began as simply a way for the dogs to spend more time with their owners evolved into an advertising and public relations bonus, she said.

"They're a great marketing tool, but that wasn't what they started out to be," Mayer said. "Right now the pups are the biggest thing. They've brought in more and more people. There is a lot of traffic to see the pups."

While dogs are an unusual addition to a business, they are usually welcome.

"Ninety-nine point nine percent of the customers love them, but there is the .1 percent that is scared of dogs maybe because one bit them at some time or something," Mayer said.

Local reaction to the dogs has generally been favorable.

"I think it's neat," said Cheri Casey, senior in life sciences. "I've seen them when the owners have them in the fire truck and in the paper and just walking around outside the store."

Mayer said, "They're easy dogs to like. They know as many people as I do.

"They're just my kids. They've been raised as kids, not dogs."

The attraction between kids and dogs may be strong, as shown by another local dog that works each morning, Pup of Claflin Books.

"Kids love him," said Carol Chelz, owner of Pup and employee at Clafin Books & Magazines.

"The kids that come in when he's not here miss him a lot," she said.

Pup makes regular appearances at the bookstore. The 6-year-old animal shelter adoptee, or pound reject as she jokingly calls him, has become well-adapted to customers and the store.

Customers, especially children and women, enjoy Pup's presence in the store; however, some foreign students are afraid of Pup, Chelz said.

"(Foreign students') perception of dogs are probably different than ours," she said.

Unlike the Dalmations at Mayer's, Pup is selective in whom he chooses to greet.

"He goes to the girls right away; he knows he'll get petted," she said. "But he is a little shy of guys with beards."

"He's a good little dog," said Shanon Haraughty, junior in preveterinary medicine and bookstore employee.

These working-class dogs aren't the only ones working in the area, though. Other dogs put in a hard day's work for a living, but they don't work publicly.

Narcissus, or Narc as owner Lori Michaels, a freshman at Manhattan High School, calls him, is a 5-month-old golden retriever beginning his basic obedience training.

Narc is a puppy from the Canine Companions for Independents program, based in Santa Rosa, Calif.

The program places puppies which the company breeds in homes with 4-H members.

The guardian teaches the dog to respond to obedience commands and to adjust to different people and situations. After 18 months, the puppies are returned to CCI to enter more advanced training, Michaels said.

"The dogs are trained in four different categories," she said. "There are service dogs which help people in wheelchairs, signal dogs for people with hearing impairments, social dogs that work in hospitals and schools, and specialty dogs for other situations — such as working with senior citizens."

CCI has not decided in which category to train Narc, Michaels said.

"He'll be a really big dog, though, and they use the big dogs for pulling wheelchairs," she said.

After the advanced training, the dogs are paired with prospective owners and are evaluated and trained with the dogs before the dogs graduate.

Although Michaels has trained three other dogs as part of her 4-H activities in the Be-Busy 4-H club, Narc is her first CCI dog.

"I've never done this before, but I heard about it through the state 4-H dog conference," Michaels said.

"I'm really sure I'm going to miss him when he goes back," she said. "I'm already attached; he's a really sweet dog."

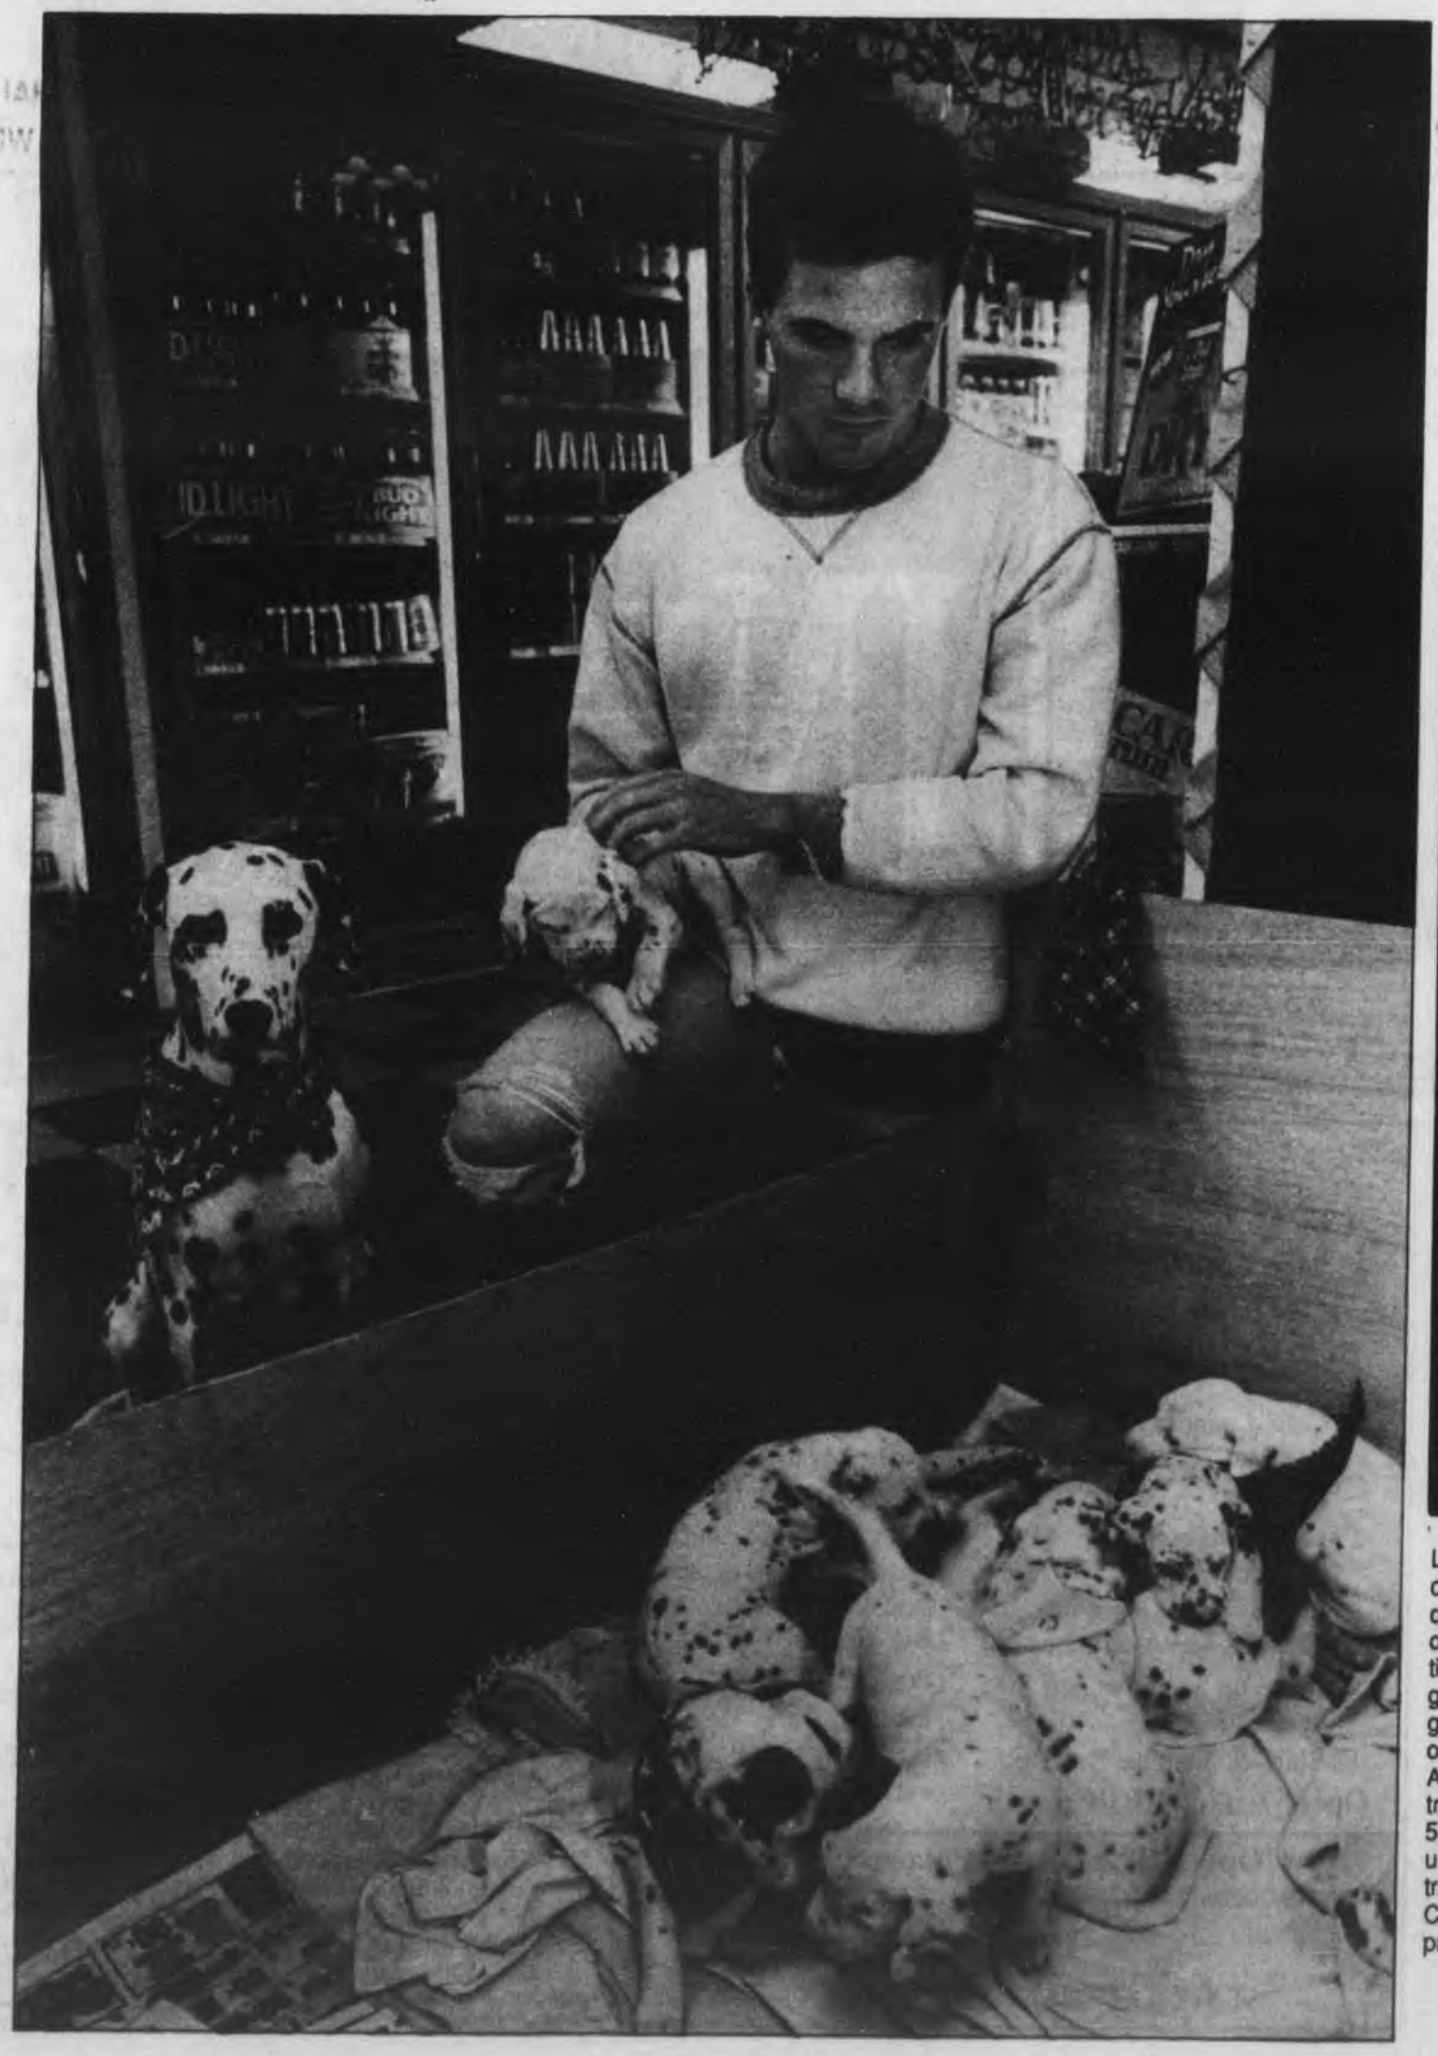
Some people opt to show their dogs in competition, requiring special daily training and grooming, as well as many stressful weekends on the road.

"The guide dog's basic training is very similar to what a show dog goes through in the beginning stages," said Phil Bentz, junior in animal science and industry.

Bentz, a dog showman, has also been a 4-H dog show judge for more than four years.



"One thing that makes a show dog different from other dogs is the communication between the pet and owner," he said. "You modify the communication, make it very specific when it's a show dog."

Bentz's dog, Missey, a 12-year-old border collie, has been entered in competitions for more than eight years.

"She really likes to show," he said. "Early on it was not her most favorite thing, but as she matured she enjoyed it. She likes to show herself off a little."

Bentz said a dog can advance one or two show level classifications per year.

"(Showing) can be stressful," he said. "It depends how much showing you do. There are some people who go from (show to show) every weekend, and that is stressful on the dog and the owner."

Stephanie Pujol, graduate student in business management, spent part of the fall semester trekking in the Nepalese Himalayas. Interested in seeing other cultures, Pujol decided to go to Nepal two years ago.

Student visits Nepal

Trip involves trekking through Himalayas

By Mary Ubel
Collegian Reporter

While most students were making their way to and from classes during the fall semester, Stephanie Pujol was trekking in the Nepalese Himalayas.

"Trekking in the Nepal Himalayas is like hiking, only a lot longer," said Pujol, graduate student in business management.

Pujol and Harriett Rohrbaugh, a friend and business associate from Tennessee, decided two years ago to go to Nepal.

Pujol was interested in seeing other cultures, including the differences between the Hindu and Buddhist religions.

They planned for their 75 day trip and purchased the plane tickets, visas and medication — in case they contracted an illness which the people in Nepal could not treat.

"There are no roads or means of transportation so we had to take precautions," Pujol said.

They carried their own food and first-aid kits. They never needed the first-aid kits for personal use, but allowed the village people to use them, she said, adding that the village people thought Westerners have a world of knowledge of medicine.

"An elderly woman approached me and kept pointing at her feet," Pujol said. "She was speaking (the native) language and I couldn't understand. She had sores on her feet — staph infections. She wanted me to heal her."

During the first of two treks, Pujol became sick, so they deviated from their path to find someone who could direct them to the nearest village, she said.

By evening, they found a family who provided food, a place to sleep and directions to Katmandu, the capital of Nepal, for the next morning, Pujol said.

"Most families go to bed around 7:30 p.m., but we stayed up until 10:30 p.m. watching them watch us," she said.

In Katmandu, Pujol determined she was sick from drinking contaminated water.

"Before Westeners drink the water, it must be purified by iodine tablets," she said, adding that the water turns red as the tablet dissolves.

Pujol said she added red Kool-Aid to the water to cover the taste of the iodine tablets, without realizing the Kool-Aid prevented the purification of the water.

In Nepal, the lifestyle is not capitalistic as it is in the United States, she said. The average life span of a person is 45 years due to poor living conditions.

—Stephanie Pujol graduate student in business management

Laundry is done by hand and hung in the streets, which are filled with sewage, Pujol said.

Food is sold in open markets. Individuals can buy pieces of freshly-killed meat, but flies swarm over the meat so most tourists do not buy it.

Farmers grow a variety of grains, including rice, and raise water buffalo for meat, milk and work animals to cultivate the fields, Pujol said.

Monkeys, which are considered thieves, can be seen throughout Nepal, she said. Besides the monkeys' activities, stealing is not a problem. An individual caught stealing never gets out of jail. A person can be sentenced to a 14-year jail term for hitting a cow, a sacred animal in Hindu religion.

Nepal is a melting pot of languages and dialects, Pujol said. No two languages are alike and communication between people with different dialects is lost.

Large masses of people worship and participate in festivals for the gods in the temples, she said.

Followers of Hinduism and Buddhism believe in reincarnation. Bodies are cremated next to a sacred river, Pujol said.

Due to a lack of medical knowledge, villagers sometimes begin cremation before the individual is dead, she said.

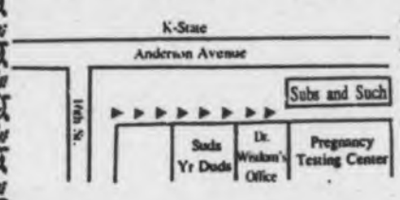
"They begin the cremation and sometimes the person awakes on their fire-bed," Pujol said. "However, they believe it's an evil spirit coming out of the person and they will knock them out and let them burn."

Living in or visiting Nepal is extremely cheap for Americans, she said. Nepal's currency is the rupee — an American dollar is worth 30 rupees.

"My most memorable time was on Poon Hill. Poon Hill is between the Annapurna mountains. The highest point is 12,000 feet," Pujol said.

A small lodge on Poon Hill offered a hot shower — a bucket of hot water which was poured over Pujol's head.

"We had met other Westeners at the lodge, and that night we sat around singing songs," she said. "A bald eagle soared over our heads ... it was the most beautiful sight I've ever seen."



During their return trip to the United States, the women were delayed in Katmandu, which not only caused a late arrival in Pakistan but also caused them to miss the flight to New York.

"Pakistan is unsettled," she said. "There were guns all around us as we got off the plane. (Officials) took our tickets and visas and put us in a hotel that night to wait for our next flight."

Lady Cats now in must-win situation

By Chris Hays
Sports Editor

Starting with tonight's matchup with the Big Eight Conference's seventh-place team, Oklahoma, the K-State women's basketball team will be in a must-win situation for the rest of the season, Coach Matilda Mossman said.

The Lady Cats are mired in a four-game losing streak which has all but squandered any hopes they might have had for an at-large berth in the NCAA post-season tournament.

"I don't think we can lose any more games," Mossman said. "I'm not really sure we have a chance at an at-large bid, in fact, I'm not really counting on it.

"To have any kind of a chance though, we will at least have to make it to the finals of the Big Eight Tournament and then it will depend on how many other teams around the country have nine or 10 losses."

K-State is 16-9 and the major blemish on its record occurred Saturday at the hands of then 11-12 Kansas at Bramlage Coliseum, 58-57. K-State's losing to a sub-.500 ball team at home probably will not sit too well with the committee which hands out at-large bids. So it could be that the only way for the Lady Cats to get a berth in the NCAA Tournament is to win the Big Eight Tournament and receive an automatic bid.

"I think that if you look at our loss at home to a team that's below .500, we pretty much threw our chance at an at-large bid right out the window," Mossman said.

There are, however, some reasons the committee might lean in favor of K-State when the selections are made. The Lady Cats have posted victories over some quality teams this year, including Montana, which has been receiving Top Twenty votes all year long.

Two losses to conference champion Colorado, which is ranked 10th and is 22-3 overall, will probably not hurt the Lady Cats' chances. The same goes for losses to Radford, Texas A&M and Florida International, all of which are closing in on 20-win seasons.

"We haven't really lost to anyone we weren't supposed to lose to outside the conference and that may help us," Mossman said. "But I've heard that Montana's schedule is not being considered a very tough one, so our win against them may not be a factor."

The Lady Cats cannot change the past and they are the only ones in control of their destination, which could wind up as spring break at home should they lose either of the final two regular-season games.

Tonight at 7:30 Oklahoma visits Bramlage Coliseum and will undoubtedly be looking to avenge an earlier loss to the Lady Cats in Norman. K-State's Mary Jo Miller hit a shot with eight seconds left to give the Lady Cats an 84-83 victory.

"The first game there were a lot of points scored, but neither team played very well," Mossman said. "Neither team played a lick of defense and neither shot extremely well, there were just a lot of points scored. I hope it's not the same type of ballgame this time."

Oklahoma enters the contest with an overall mark of 11-13 and a conference record of 4-8. Jo Mosley leads the Lady Sooners in scoring at 17.1 points a game.

K-State closes out the season with a rare Sunday game at Stillwater to face Oklahoma State at 2 p.m. in Gallagher-Iba Arena.

K-State tennis player Marijke Nel practices Tuesday afternoon in Ahearn Field House. The native of Muden, South Africa, has enjoyed success at K-State, including a fourth-place win in No. 2 doubles with Valerie Rive at the Big Eight Championships last year.

Nel adapts well to United States

South African starring for tennis team

By Carolyn Holcroft
Sports Writer

K-State tennis player Marijke Nel once had the preconception Kansas was a "big dairy on the prairie" before coming to the United States from Muden, South Africa.

A couple of years and multiple road trips later, Nel can say her attitudes have changed. The opportunity for travel is just one of many reasons she enjoys playing tennis for the Wildcats. Among others, she lists winning, the spirit and atmosphere that goes hand in hand with competition, and the chance to receive an education.

The decision to play tennis at the college level was a tough one, as she could have continued with her equally strong abilities in field hockey. She played on the National South African Tennis and Hockey Circuit for a year after finishing high school, and never attended a University there. The situation became even more confusing when she considered pursuing her other love — equestrian sports.

"At the time of my decision, I was also doing a lot of horse riding," Nel said. "It was really a three-way decision, though it sounds really funny."

An initial offer for a scholarship at Arkansas State began to give tennis an edge over the other sports. Although she had taken a trip to the United States once before, Nel had not yet had a chance to compare colleges.

"When I was in the eighth grade, I came over for about seven or eight months and stayed with relatives. I wasn't an exchange student, it was purely private interest," Nel said.

During that time she attended school, skied some and went to summer camp. "It was mainly just an introduction to life in the United States. I was thinking of coming here someday," she said.

After being offered the scholarship to Arkansas State, Nel took a three-week trip to the United States and ended up with a scholarship to the University of Texas-El Paso. She attended classes there for one semester during the spring of '87, but the program was relatively new, and she didn't think it was right for her.

"I'm sure it was improving, but I didn't feel like I fit into (the program) well," Nel said. "I wanted to find something more challenging of my abilities, where I wouldn't play in one of the top three spots immediately. Something I could work for."

For this reason, Nel was anxious to accept the scholarship offered by K-State coach Steve Bietau.

"When the Kansas State coach offered me a scholarship here, I felt very fortunate and I jumped to the opportunity," she said.

Since arriving, Nel has had much success, including winning fourth place in No. 2 doubles with Valerie Rive last year at the Big Eight Conference Championships. Nel and Rive are undefeated so far this season.

This year, Nel wants to stay in one of the top three singles spots and break into one of the top four singles positions at the Big Eight Tournament. She also entertains thoughts of tennis after K-State.

"People often ask 'are you going to turn pro,' but the only way to find that out is to pick up a racquet and go out there and find out just how good you are," Nel said. "It depends on what goals you set in your own mind. I guess if you aim for the stars, you won't come up with a handful of mud."

Among her strengths, Nel lists her serve first. Bietau said she does many things well on the court, while not fitting into any particular style.

"Number one, you have to list her athletic ability. She's very quick and she can make a seemingly impossible shot look easy," he said. "When there's a ball that you'd wonder if most players would make it to or not, she always gets there."

On the other side of the coin, Bietau said Nel sometimes has difficulty attacking and maintaining continual pressure on her opponents without making some mental errors. Nel agreed.

"I've always looked to a more aggressive game and to making people feel more endangered when I'm at the net," she said. "Sometimes I get so desperate or too keen. I just want to hit the cover off the ball and hit a big winning shot when I should just be patient and play the point out, or maybe approach it in a different way."

Throughout the many games she's played, Nel said two will always stick in her mind.

"You'll always remember your biggest win and your saddest loss, as much as I'd like to forget my saddest loss," she laughed. "I'll always remember when this big left-handed chick kicked my butt. But the sweetest victory is always over someone who has beaten you before."

A junior, Nel intends to major in

No. 1 Oklahoma up next for 'Cats

By Chris Wilhelm
Sports Writer

The Oklahoma Sooners will put their No. 1 ranking and their 27-game home winning streak on the line when they face K-State in a 9:10 matchup at Lloyd Noble Arena in Norman tonight.

It's only fitting the Wildcats will get a chance to finish what they started. K-State was the last team to beat Oklahoma in the friendly confines of Noble Arena, downing the Sooners, 90-89, Feb. 27, 1987.

"I think our players look forward to playing Oklahoma," Wildcat coach Lon Kruger said. "They realize how tough it is to play the No. 1 team at their place. We played (Oklahoma) tough (in Bramlage) and lost, and they are so tough at home. They haven't been beaten there in almost two years."

Entering the contest, K-State and Oklahoma have the same look as they did before the first meeting — a 90-82 OU victory. Oklahoma leads the Big Eight Conference in scoring, averaging 124.4 points in league tilts, and the Wildcats lead the conference in defense, allowing their opponents 78.3 points per Big Eight contest.

The Sooners, 23-3 overall and 9-1 in Big Eight play, are led by Stacey King and Mookie Blaylock, who are first and second respectively in conference scoring. King averages 26.2 points a game for Oklahoma, while Blaylock chips in 21.3.

Both also lead the conference in other statistics. King is the Big Eight leader in rebounding with 10.8 a game, and Blaylock leads the conference in assists and steals, averaging 6.9 and 4.1 respectively.

For the 'Cats, Steve Henson is averaging 17.9 points a game, and Fred McCoy is scoring 15.9 per contest. Henson also leads the 'Cats in assists with 4.9 a game, while McCoy is K-State's big man on the boards, averaging 7.3 rebounds.

"The team is doing a good job," Kruger said. "They feel good about where they're at, but they realize that they can keep working to improve.

"The challenge for us will be not to get caught up in a 120-100 point ball game. I think in that type of game they are unbeatable."

"I think we're getting mentally better and that's big for us," Henson said. "We have a lot of people realizing that they can help out. We recognize that we can't have just one or two people scoring."

The Wildcats are coming off what has to be a big confidence booster going into the Big Eight stretch. K-State overcame a tough Wichita State club to prevail in overtime at the Shockers' Henry Levitt Arena, 73-71. The road victory may have been just what K-State needed to propel itself into the NCAA post-season tournament.

K-State, 16-7 and 6-4, has three conference games left, two of which are at home, before heading to Kansas City and the Big Eight tournament March 10-12.

Royals sign Seitzer to one-year contract

By The Associated Press

HAINES CITY, Fla. — Kansas City third baseman Kevin Seitzer, a .300-hitter in each of his first two seasons, signed a one-year contract Tuesday for $340,000.

The Royals also agreed to terms with minor league reliever Rick Luecken, the last player that had not signed.

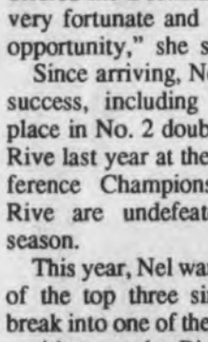
Seitzer made $175,000 last year when he batted .304 and drove in 60 runs. He hit .323 as a rookie in 1987.

"I'm very happy," he said as he reported with other Royals position players. "Last year I drove myself into the ground worrying about this stuff. This year I just let my agent handle things and it worked out great."

General Manager John Schuerholz said Seitzer's salary was consistent with what second-year players like Wally Joyner, Jose Canseco and Danny Tartabull signed for last year.

"I wasn't looking for top dollar or trying to bust anybody's back," Seitzer said. "I just wanted to get in the ballpark."

Luecken, who is on the 40-man roster for the first-time, was 4-1 at Class AA Memphis and 5-0 at Class AAA Omaha last season. He had a 2.43 earned run average and nine saves at Omaha.



The Royals have three left-handed, free-agent pitchers in camp in Ed Olwine, Stan Clarke and Bob Buchanan. The three have signed minor league contracts, but are among five non-roster pitchers in the big league camp.

Olwine appeared in 16 games last year with the Atlanta Braves and had one save and no decisions.

Clarke has pitched with Toronto and Seattle, compiling a 3-4 record in 46 games. He was 12-13 with a 3.48 earned run average at Toledo last year.

Are 'neutral' tourney sites solution to complaints?

Mid-Week Commentary

TOM MORRIS
Sports Columnist

"Losing is a disease as contagious as polio.

"Losing is a disease as contagious as syphilis.

"Losing is a disease as contagious as the Bubonic Plague. Inflicting one, but affecting all. Odd, but curable."

— A sports psychologist from "The Natural"

The NCAA made a move Tuesday to help at least 48 potential victims of the sport's pyschologist "disease" into this year's postseason basketball tournament.

Revising an earlier decision, the tournament committee has decreed that beginning this year, no team will be assigned to play first- or second-round games on its home floor. The new policy, originally to take effect in 1991, takes aim at what many critics believed was a major tournament shortcoming — being "homered."

"After the tremendous favorable response the committee received last year when no team played on its home floor in the first or second rounds, we went back to the host sites to see whether they would consider us moving the policy from 1991 to 1989, and they all complied," tournament chairman Cedric Dempsey told The Associated Press.

The committee also took steps to ensure fans where early-round games are played will be able to watch their local teams play elsewhere on television. Dempsey, athletic director at the University of Arizona, cited his own school as an example.

The second-ranked Wildcats are the official host of a West Regional first- and second-round site March 17-19 at Tuscon, Ariz., but are certain to play elsewhere.

"If a host institution is playing elsewhere, they will play on opposite days of bracketing," Dempsey said. "In other words, if the University of Arizona is hosting on Friday (through) Sunday, then (the Arizona team) would play in the Thursday (through) Saturday sequence."

The plan sounds fine, but is it such a good idea? The first factor to consider is attendance. Will fans flock from Tuscon in droves, for example, to catch their Wildcats on the road?

"The only place that begins to create a problem is in the West, where we have long distances between institutions. But we do feel the neutrality will enhance the tournament and not affect crowds," he said. "I am confident we will do well (at Tuscon), probably not quite as well as we would have done if the University of Arizona had been bracketed there."

Another consideration is what constitutes a neutral court. Indiana played at the Hoosier Dome in Indianapolis in the early rounds before going on to win the 1986 championship. Georgia Tech has played at the Omni in Atlanta. Kansas won the national championship last season at Kemper Arena in Kansas City, Mo.

"We feel we made a good move to the neutrality of home floors," Dempsey said. "But we don't see an answer to developing any policy relating to home crowds. We feel it would reduce the number of sites to where it would be impractical at this time."

So now the NCAA is practically right back where it started. It was bad enough when the tournament was expanded to 64 teams, now collegiate athletic's ruling body is penalizing teams fortunate enough to be awarded home-court bids.

But this isn't the time or the place to start dogging the NCAA. Space limits make that impractical. Besides, it's hard enough to determine what the NCAA is actually doing, let alone trying to convince it of what should be done.

Manhattan schools provide experience for education majors

By Ginger Miller
Collegian Reporter

Education graduates are required to have on-the-job training, thus Manhattan area schools are host to many of K-State's student teachers.

Julie Woods, senior in elementary education, teaches fifth grade at Northview Elementary School. Woods teaches half a day, but as of March 6, she will begin teaching the entire day.

"I think I was really prepared and excited," Woods said. "But I've been so busy, and I can see myself getting even busier."

She submits her lesson plans for the following week on Friday. Both her teacher and K-State supervisor review them. During her evenings, Woods said she prepares for the next day's class.

"I have a really good teacher and a super class," Woods said. "Illness has been more a problem than discipline. The makeup work has kept me busy."

During the fall semester, many of the 200 students were teaching in Manhattan, said Michael Perl, dean of the College of Education. Thirty student teachers were placed in Kansas City and 15 in Topeka.

"The rest (of the students) were mostly around here, in the eastern half of the state," Perl said.

Connie Wiles, a K-State graduate, completed her student teaching at Clay Center's Lincoln Elementary School.

"I had a great semester," Wiles said. "I had wanted to teach since I was in the second grade."

Although Wiles thought she was prepared for teaching, she said her classes hadn't prepared her for every situation.

"There was a little boy whose mom died while I was there," she said. "I wasn't prepared as far as what to say to him or to the other students.

"(The classroom teacher) was really helpful and a big support. If I had to do it over again, I would hope to have her."

One little girl did not read when Wiles started student teaching. Wiles said the child's problem was a challenge, and the girl's reading progressed throughout the semester.

Student teaching allows the student to become familiar with the working relationships among the principal, counselors and teachers, she said.

Perl said students gain experience and benefits.

Student teaching gives the students an opportunity to do what they've wanted to do for many years — "to try it and see how competent (they) are," he said.

The state of Kansas requires a student to complete a minimum of eight weeks' student teaching, Perl said. However, some of the University programs require as many as 16 weeks of experience.

K-State gives $50 to the school district for each student teacher placed in a classroom, Perl said.

Student teachers are not paid, but credit is received on a credit/no credit basis. The classroom teacher evaluates the student teacher. The evaluation serves as a reference and is recorded in the student's placement file, he said.

Students must complete the requirements before they are permitted to student teach. They must complete 90 credit hours, and have a 2.5 grade point average. Students must score a minimum score of 172 on each of the three Pre-Professional Skills Tests.

"TWO THUMBS UP. 'THE MODERNS' HAS WIT AND INTELLIGENCE AND STYLE." —Roger Ebert, SISKEL & EBERT & THE MOVIES
This is director Alan Rudolph's dazzling portrait of the Lost Generation- the legendary group of American expatriates who flocked to Paris in the 1920's. It was an art-crazy, hedonistic world of cafe crawlers, snobs, artists, and con artists. The story centers on a stormy love triangle involving an unsuccessful painter(Keith Carradine), a ruthless millionare(John Lone), and the beautiful, self-destructive woman(Linda Fiorintino) to whom they both happen to be married. 'Entrepreneur' to lecture today

By Mindy Robert
Collegian Reporter

T. Boone Pickens Jr., general partner of Mesa Limited Partnership, will speak as part of the College of Business Administration Distinguished Lecturer Series at 4 p.m. today in the K-State Union Forum Hall.

Pickens' lecture is on "Surviving and Succeeding in Today's Business."

"There is a lot of activity about leveraged buyouts and shareholder rights," said Randolph Pohlman, dean of the College of Business Administration. "Whether we agree (with Pickens) or not, it is important to hear what he has to say."

Pickens has been described a lot of different ways over the years, said Ali Fatemi, head of the Department of Finance and a coordinator of the series.

"Pickens started from scratch and built a major oil company so he has been called an entrepreneur," Fatemi said.

He has also been described as a corporate raider for his role in corporate takeovers, Fatemi said.

"(Pickens has had) a less spectacular performance recently," he said. "I have a feeling he will come back in the future with a major surprise."

Also today, Pickens will speak at Wichita State University and at the Salina Chamber of Commerce, Fatemi said.

The College of Business Administration Distinguished Lecturer Series formally began last semester, said Stan Elsea, assistant professor of management and a coordinator of the series.

"In the past we had outstanding speakers but (last semester) was the first we formally had the lecture series," Pohlman said.

The series has two main purposes, Elsea said.

"One, we want to expose our students to some of the big-name people that they hear about in their course work, both from the business side and the academic side," he said.

The second reason is to provide a service to the community, Elsea said.

"We are hoping to someday build (the series) up to the equivalent of the Lou Douglas Lecture Series and maybe even as recognized as the Landon Lecture Series," Elsea said.

The series will lend credibility to the business program at K-State, he said. People will see the college is doing more than just offering three-hour courses.

"(People will see) it is more than just an educational effort," Elsea said.

The Oak Ridge Boys to be at Bramlage

By The Collegian Staff

Those yearning to hear live country music won't have long to wait. The Oak Ridge Boys will perform at Bramlage Coliseum March 18 with the group T. Graham Brown as the opening act.

Charlie Thomas, director of Bramlage Coliseum, said Wichita was the only other location in the state where the group would appear.

As of Friday, The Oak Ridge Boys' latest album "Monogahela," was ranked 16th by Billboard Magazine after 22 weeks on the charts. "Bridges and Walls," The Oak Ridge Boys' newest single, has been climbing the charts and after 12 weeks on Billboard's charts comes in at 11.

The group was started in 1945 in Knoxville, Tenn. and began performing in nearby Oak Ridge, Tenn. where the atomic bomb was being developed. Since 1945 the group has gone through more than 40 members. The group's name was changed from The Oak Ridge Quartet to The Oak Ridge Boys in 1964 for a more youthful image.

Tickets are $12.50 and $14.50 plus a service charge, Thomas said, and will go on sale today. Tickets are available at the coliseum box office; Middle Earth Records, Junction City; Mother Earth Records, Topeka; and the ITR office, Fort Riley.

Thomas said he didn't think ticket sales would be affected by the spring break date because he expects the majority of the audience to be comprised of people other than students.

Tickets for the April 2 Chicago concert went on sale Monday.

"Ticket sales are going pretty well," Thomas said.

Student Senate has the power to establish requirements for sending issues to referendum and the percent of student vote required for approval, said Todd Johnson, Student Senate chairman.

The Student Government Constitution states that a referendum may be called in two ways: by simple majority of Student Senate or by petition of 10 percent of the student body.

Johnson said the Executive Committee bill places a "double check" on the issue by requiring passage by both two-thirds of Senate to go to referendum and a majority of the voting student body.

"Normally it just has to go through one (body)," he said. "This way we're combining (approval) together."

The Executive Committee's bill also requires that undergraduate students and graduate students vote separately on the referendum.

Kern said each group of students would have to approve its own fee. If one group approved the fee and the other group didn't, the group that did not approve the fee would not be assessed the fee, but would also not receive the benefits.

If passed, the proposed fee would raise about $420,000 per year for the athletic department and would guarantee students four benefits.

- Students would be given free admission to all non-revenue sports home games.
- Student season ticket prices to football and men's basketball games would be capped at the current price for a three-year period.
- Football and basketball tickets would not be sold in combined packages for at least three years.
- Students will be guaranteed a minimum of 6,000 seats in Bramlage Coliseum for a three-year period.

landscaping were also made, Newsome said.

Any more changes in the proposed construction plans would be detrimental to the profit potential of the project, he said.

"You must have enough units to justify (care) and maintenance of the project," Newsome said.

The Peace Lutheran Church filed a protest petition against approval of the project. Dennis Kuhlman, president of the church council, said the design of the project was the council's main concern.

"The church council has gone on record as having legitimate concerns with the density of this project," Kuhlman said.

Three public hearings were conducted by the commission to consider or take action on the following items.

- The commissioners unanimously approved the submission of an application to the federal Housing and Urban Development program for $1.3 million. The application is requesting funds to back the construction and moving of Sears, Roebuck and Co. to the Manhattan Town Center and adding additional parking spaces.

Total cost of the project is expected to be more than $6 million.

- A public hearing was conducted, but no official action taken, on recommendations for application for community development block grants from the state. The hearing was conducted to provide the community improvement staff with direction for the application due by mid-April.

The Riley County Senior Center was mentioned as a possible applicant for the grant.

- The commissioners authorized the construction of a public parking lot at the Sunset Zoological Park. The parking lot would be funded by monies received from the Sunset Zoo's admission fee.

journalism and mass communications, specializing in public relations. With such a long and intense tennis season, she occasionally finds it difficult to keep momentum in her studies.

"We go on the road a lot and when we get back we're not very motivated to study," Nel said. "But I think I'm very fortunate that in journalism they don't give you these big fat text books and say 'sit down and study your brains out.'"

At this point, Nel isn't sure how far tennis will carry into her future.

"If I do quit tennis, I'd like to pursue equestrian sports," Nel said. "But I'd just like to go out there and find the best player I have in me."

T. Boone Pickens Jr., general partner of Mesa Petroleum Exploration, Inc. and corporate raider, tells an overflow audience Wednesday in Forum Hall how to make the most of business opportunities.

Pickens: Business world needs young professionals

By Mindy Robert
Collegian Reporter

Leaders in the business world need to be phased out and replaced by younger, hungrier business professionals, said T. Boone Pickens Jr., general partner of Mesa Limited Partnership of Amarillo, Texas.

Pickens, the fourth speaker in the College of Business Administration Lecturer Series, talked to an audience of about 600 people in Union Forum Hall.

The "good ol' boys'" club is being phased out in corporate America, he said.

A quick fix for corporate America would be to "take everybody out, including me, between 55 and 65 (years of age) who are in leadership positions," Pickens said. "Take them out and drop it down to the younger people.

"The next leaders in corporate America will have a different resolve than my group and will do a better job."

Pickens said to succeed in business, people have to be realistic about their capabilities.

"Don't undersell yourself, but don't be foolish about what you might be able to do," he said.

Success is going to come to people who have commitment and work hard, Pickens said. A person must organize and prioritize what needs to be done.

He said the freedom to succeed and have a good standard of living is what people in this country want.

"The abundance of opportunity is maybe the greatest asset this country has," he said.

Pickens is known for his corporate takeover battles and role as a shareholder advocate through forming the United Shareholders Association in 1986.

He said the biggest problem in corporate America today is that the incentives of entrepreneurship do not exist in most large corporations. Eighty percent of management does not always have the shareholders' interests at heart.

"Shareholders are owners of public companies and the management of public companies are employees," he said. "Accountability to owners is the key to restoring America's competitiveness."

Stockholders have to bring accountability back into the companies, Pickens said.

"We don't have an ethics crisis in corporate America. We have a leadership crisis," he said.

His primary motive in the corporate takeovers, he said, was "to do the best I can with the capital I have available to me.

> "The next leaders in corporate America will have a different resolve than my group and will do a better job."
> —T. Boone Pickens Jr. business lecturer

"We saw the downturn (in oil prices) and I said, 'We can make better use of capital.' I looked over at situations where I saw undervalue and that was a better investment of capital."

Pickens shared five points on how to succeed in business.

First, people have to be realistic and prepared to do a job. Fitness is also important, he said. It makes a difference in a person's outlook and enables one to think more clearly.

Learning to analyze well is the third key to success, Pickens said.

"Learn to assess risks and be able to assess prospective rewards," he said. "Instinct and gut feelings won't work if you don't have the background to make the decision."

The next step is to make a decision.

"Once you've made your analysis, don't be afraid to make a decision," Pickens said.

People in business who can analyze but never make a decision are called "the ready, aim, aim, aim people," he said. "They can't ever pull the trigger. As a decision maker, you've got to be able to pull the trigger."

The final point, Pickens said, is to know that profit is what drives people in business.

"Businesses are run to make money," he said. "Never apologize for making money honestly.

"Education is one of the keys to success, but I don't believe it is for everybody. Go someplace and get some type of education and be productive."

If a person chooses a college degree, "in higher education, we have to be able to help you to get the key to open the door you choose," Pickens said.

In the past five years, Pickens said he has spoken to between 70,000 and 80,000 students across the United States.

"I believe the future of this country is with people like (students)," he said. "It is not with 60-year-old guys telling horror stories about corporate America. It is your game. The future is not with my era."

Pickens said several common denominators can be seen in young people across the country that differ from those of his generation. Young people are willing to work harder than before and want to know how much money to expect to make. He also said they want to avoid bureaucracies.

"They've closed things out," he said. "Watch out for that. Don't close out the big companies because they have a lot to offer."

Senate to discuss finances

Meeting's agenda includes 2 student fee proposals

By Darren Keller
Collegian Reporter

Student Senate will hear two fee proposals, a bill calling for support of Farrell Library, and several financial allocation requests in its meeting tonight.

"This semester we've been at grips to comprehend and handle what we have before us," said Todd Johnson, Senate chairman. "We are pushed to the limits, but we feel capable and confident that the best decisions will be made regardless of the added pressure."

Senate will vote on the possible $15 increase in the student health fee. If legislation passes, full-time students would pay $75 and part-time students would pay $25 per semester beginning in the fall semester. Students enrolled in summer courses would pay $5 per credit hour to a $30 maximum.

If the student fee from which Lafene is funded stays at $60 and services continue as they are, the center would be in debt more than $500,000 by 1991, said Dr. Robert Tout, director of Lafene.

If a fee increase is not implemented, the health center would be facing a deficit sometime next spring because projected expenditures will exceed revenue, he said.

Senate will also hear first readings of a bill calling for approval of the proposed athletic fee and sending it to referendum.

The KSU Athletic Department also gave a presentation last Thursday in which Athletic Director Steve Miller said the department could face a deficit of more than $680,000 by the end of the year.

If approved, he said, all monies collected would go to the athletic department, and students would receive four benefits.

- Students would receive free admission to all non-revenue sport home games.
- A three-year price cap at the current level would be placed on football and men's basketball games for a three-year period.
- Students would be guaranteed a minimum of 6,000 seats in Bramlage Coliseum through the 1991-92 season.
- Students would be guaranteed that basketball and football tickets will not be combined for a three-year period.

Senate will hear a bill asking for consideration of more support for the library system. It would also urge the administration, Kansas Board of Regents and Legislature to actively pursue additional support for expansion of library facilities and increased acquisitions.

According to the bill, the library is "considered to be an indicator of the academic quality and potential of a university and the libraries at K-State are not a high priority among the Regents system. The K-State libraries rank last in total monograph and serial collections when compared to Big Eight and peer institutions."

Senate will also vote on changes in the Student Governing Association campaign regulations and expenditures.

A bill proposing a $640 allocation to meet a projected deficit of the Kansas State Engineer magazine will be discussed.

The magazine has encountered rising printing costs and an unexpected loss of advertising revenue.

Manhattan schools topic of open forum

By Robert Short
Staff Writer

More than 150 Manhattan residents attended the first community forum on overcrowding in U.S.D. 383 Wednesday to discuss curriculum issues, grade configuration, and other academic issues for kindergarten through 12th grade.

The Board of Education hired a Columbus, Ohio, consulting firm, Planning Advocates, to evaluate student overcrowding in the district and provide a recommendation to the board by May 17.

The forums are part of the information-gathering process for a 30-member core committee made up of parents, teachers, students, and non-parent residents selected by the school board. The committee has been working with Planning Advocates since January to gather ideas from the general public on the problem of overcrowding.

The community forums are asking parents and residents to think and plan ahead to 1998, said Bill DeJong, representative for Planning Advocates.

"We are in a district that is not growing in leaps and bounds, but is growing numerically," DeJong said.

Members of the public attending Wednesday's forum were split into three groups. The groups representing high school, middle school and elementary school interests were asked to complete an 11-point survey concerning academic programs within the district.

Terry Arthur, chairman of the core committee, said the forums were essential in accurately responding to the wants of the general public.

"Everyone has added something to the committee so far," Arthur said. "The forums are necessary to acquire information and establish some idea of what the public wants."

Questions posed in the surveys included prioritizing educational programs such as math, science and social studies; deciding whether computers should be integrated into the classrooms; and deciding whether to provide community programs to non-students.

Bren Abbott, core committee member, said members of the group representing high school interests supported changes in the current grade level configurations in the elementary, middle and high schools. A majority of the group representing high school interests supported a high school made up of only the top three grades.

Police rule student's fall attempted suicide

By Alan Wilds
Staff Writer

The fall that Hai Quach, freshman undeclared, took last Thursday from the sixth floor of Marlatt Hall has now been ruled an attempted suicide by the K-State Police.

Chief Charles Beckom said Quach was alone in the room at the time when he either forced or removed the screen from the room's window before jumping.

Beckom said Quach was noticed lying on the ground in front of Marlatt by a student who was going into the building. The student went inside and notified the receptionist who then telephoned an ambulance. Beckom said there were no witnesses who actually saw Quach fall.

He said a number of people were interviewed throughout the investigation which has now been concluded.

"Unless something furthur develops, we will no longer be working with it," Beckom said.

Officials said Quach has been transferred out of the intensive care unit into a private room. There is still no speculation on his recovery.

Susan Scott, associate dean of student life, said she has remained in contact with the family on a daily basis. She said a hospital social worker is also helping with counseling.

"I have been somewhat of a point person," Scott said.

She said communication with other departments on how to deal with the situation has been her main duty.

Japanese airline to buy jets

TOKYO — All Nippon Airways said Wednesday it will buy 20 of the new Boeing 747-400 jumbo jets for $3.15 billion.

The contracts will be signed shortly for delivery of four to six of the planes a year from the Seattle-based U.S. aircraft maker between 1992 and 1996, said spokesman Takayuki Shimada.

Under a 1986 contract, it received two B747-200s, with nine others expected to be delivered by 1991.

The B747-400s, which can carry 500 people, will be used on domestic and international routes, Shimada said.

ANA currently has a fleet of 102 aircraft, including 21 Boeing 747s, 11 TriStars, 34 Boeing 767s, 14 Boeing 737s, 11 Japanese YS-11s and six Boeing 727s. It has ordered 20 Airbus A-320s to replace the 737s and 727s on domestic routes after 1990.

Swiss not suffering surplus

BERN, Switzerland — The federal budget, reflecting a continuing favorable economic climate, showed a surplus in 1988 for the third straight year, the Finance Ministry said Wednesday.

Federal finances finished $795 million in the black, exceeding the government target by $18.5 million, according to ministry estimates.

Last year, federal spending rose 11.6 percent to $16.9 billion, but revenue rose 12 percent to $17.78 billion, the ministry said.

Regional and local authorities in Switzerland spend much more than the federal government, which accounts for only a small part of national spending.

Ingmar Bergman honored

The $70,000 prize is awarded every other year for work "enhancing European culture." Other artists who have received it in the 1980s include Italian theater director Dario Fo and French author Simone de Beauvoir.

Around the nation

Store clerk stymies robbery

FORT WORTH, Texas — A store clerk in a bulletproof glass cashier's cage told police she simply grinned and telephoned for help when a man who said he had a gun tried to rob her.

Night shift clerk Judy Frisco, 39, said the hold-up man came into her service station-grocery early Tuesday and said, "I want your money. ... I have a 9mm and I am going to get you. ... I can blow this window away."

But Frisco apparently did not believe he could. She began dialing.

Maine lobster gets reprieve

TACOMA, Wash. — A live Maine lobster bought for a Valentine's Day dinner got a reprieve from a boiling pot when a wife told her husband she preferred the sea crustacean as a pet instead of as a main course.

Suzanne Brown had planned to serve the lobster to her husband, Dave, to crown a romantic, home-cooked dinner.

She presented her husband with the $14 catch wrapped in newspaper, a valentine attached. But when it came time to drop it in the boiling water, Suzanne proved to be softer skinned than her hard-shelled prey.

"I kinda fell in love with a lobster," said Brown. "I decided I wanted to keep him for a pet."

The 1¼-pound lobster, dubbed Oscar, stayed alive in the Brown's refrigerator in a damp towel while Suzanne called around for help in setting up a lobster tank.

The Seattle Aquarium couldn't help her, nor could the University of Washington. She finally went back to seafood market, where she learned that the smallest commercial tanks go for $1,200.

So Gary Gerontis of Johnny's Seaford took the lobster back and promised to fly it back to Gloucester, Maine, so that the wholesaler can throw it back into the Atlantic.

"He could live another 50 years, or he could get caught next week," said Harold Frisk, sales manager for the wholesaler.

'Dallas' to lose Sue Ellen

LOS ANGELES — After 11 years of marriage, fights, divorce and revenge, Sue Ellen and J.R. Ewing are through. Actress Linda Gray is leaving Southfork and the "Dallas" cast.

"She's going on to pursue various other things that she had in the works," her publicist, Jeffrey Lane, said Tuesday. He said the ventures would probably be in television or films.

Gray, 46, will leave the show at the end of the season, Lane said.

It wasn't known how her character would be eliminated from the series. In the past, odd twists and bizarre plots have been used to explain character exits, including an entire season that evaporated as a dream.

The actress was in the TV movies "Haywire" and "The Wild and The Free" in 1980. She played a divorced mother of two struggling for custody in "Not in Front of the Children" in 1982.

Two call for arms reductions

NEW YORK — Stephen Hawking, one of the world's leading theoretical physicists, and diplomat George F. Kennan on Wednesday added their voices to those calling for the United States and Soviet Union to reduce the store of nuclear arms.

The two made their comments in statements issued with the announcement that they were among five winners of the $125,000 Britannica Awards for excellence in disseminating knowledge to benefit humankind.

The others were American economist Paul A. Samuelson and two Britons, naturalist Jane Goodall and art historian Sir Ernst Gombrich.

Hawking, who is confined to a wheelchair and speaks through a voice synthesizer because of amyotrophic lateral sclerosis, also called on the United States to abandon the Strategic Defense Initiative, or "Star Wars," which he said stands in the way of U.S.-Soviet cooperation.

Assistant's trial postponed

The trial of a former graduate assistant with the K-State football program on theft charges has been continued and will be rescheduled for a later date, said a spokesman for the Maryland state attorney's office in Rockville, Md.

Richard Crane said the trial date for Timothy W. Lewis, 24, may not be for another three months, but he was unsure of the exact court date.

Lewis was arrested by Riley County Police last November on two warrants containing seven criminal charges issued by the sheriff's office in Montgomery County, Md. All charges except two, storehouse breaking with intent to commit a felony and theft of more than $300, have been dropped.

Lewis and his attorney had been negotiating a plea bargain in the theft case, Crane said. The maximum sentence for the charge is $500 or 18 months in jail or both.

The prosecuting attorney for the state of Maryland, Cheryl McCally, was unavailable for comment Wednesday.

Lewis was hired by the football program in July and worked with the receivers unit.

Honored professor lectures to peers

By The Collegian Staff

Richard McDonald, professor of chemistry and recipient of the 1988 Distinguished Faculty Member Award, delivered his lecture, Light and Chemistry, on Wednesday to pay back the people who honored him with the award.

"It's gratifying to know that your colleagues respect your work," McDonald said.

"(McDonald) was chosen for his attainment in research and special work by a committee of faculty peers," President Jon Wefald said.

The series of lectures by the distinguished faculty award winners began last fall with a lecture by Cornelia Flora, professor of sociology, anthropology and social work. Flora and McDonald both received presidential citations and $1,500.

"In addition to being a first-rate scientist, (McDonald) is a first-rate teacher," Provost James Coffman said. "We rely on chemists like (McDonald) ... to improve our lives."

McDonald's lecture and slides outlined his research on the breakdown of the atoms of elements and the intermediate species produced during chemical transformations. He has been involved with reactive intermediate research since 1960.

McDonald detailed his work with lasers and a flowing afterglow apparatus which funnels ions that have been passed through a laser into separate chambers. The atomic makeup of the new particles is then determined by the mass of the particle.

"We want to uncover the basic underlying factors of how and why reactions occur," he said. "We're able to generate highly reactive interactions which are involved in many reactions."

McDonald said he wanted to determine the least amount of energy it takes to cause the onset of the breakdown of the atom.

"The latest data I have seen indicate that our current fossil fuel supply will run out in about 150 years," McDonald said.

McDonald said the key to being able to produce consumer products, which are derivatives of fossil fuels, is to understand how various atoms are broken down and restructured into different carbon containing forms.

Legislature to consider bill

Freedom of student press raises support, opposition

By Kevin Kramer
Staff Writer

The future of Kansas high school newspapers will be addressed in a committee hearing of the Kansas Legislature on Monday.

The Student Freedom of Expression Act has been introduced to the Legislature with students, teachers and administrators offering both support and opposition.

The bill, co-sponsored by Rep. Katha Hurt, D-Manhattan, plans to create the Student Freedom of Expression Act, from which the Kansas Legislature would enact legislation to prevent school boards and administrators from violating the freedom of any student publication, regardless of whether it is funded by a school district or is located in school facilities.

"We are expecting both support and opposition to the bill," said Dave Adams, associate professor of journalism and mass communications. "Most opponents don't want to give students the opportunity to criticize their actions as public officials. But the bill represents the concerns of all parties concerned, especially school officials."

The act would give students the right to speak freely, write or publish on all subjects, but to be responsible for the abuse of those rights in the publication of matter that is libelous, slanderous, obscene or promotes violation of the law.

It would also prevent boards of education, school districts or school district employees from adopting or approving any restrictions to the rights and freedoms of student publications. It would also free school boards, districts and employees from being held responsible for any actions of the student publication.

"As a journalism educator, I believe it is impossible to teach journalism if there are restrictions to writing about issues of concern and importance," Adams said.

In January 1988, the Supreme Court ruled on Hazelwood v. Kuhlmeier, which upheld the rights of public high school administrators at Hazelwood East High School in St. Louis, Mo., to censor stories concerning teen pregnancy and the effects of divorce on children from a school-sponsored student newspaper.

The Court's decision — by a vote of 5 to 3 — narrowed the ability of students to determine suitable content of school-sponsored publications without fear of administrative censorship.

Adams said the Hazelwood decision limits the probing mind of the journalist, and will be reflected in the future of media down the line at the collegiate and professional levels.

"The public's right to know is being ill-served by this decision," he said. "It has long been the opinion of the federal courts that students were allowed to exercise reasonable freedom in speaking and publishing their thoughts.

"It was only when those thoughts became libelous, disruptive or violated other laws, they would become restricted."

Rep. Sheila Hochhauser, D-Manhattan, said the bill is specifically drawn up to where freedom for student publications would not be a problem or threat for high school newspaper advisers, principals and local school boards.

"It places high school journalism students under the same guidelines which the general press operates," she said.

Jim Rezac, principal at Manhattan High School, said: "I agree totally with the Hazelwood decision. I am not supportive of this legislation to change that decision."

Rezac said he believes the Hazelwood decision was based on sound judgment and thereby reserves the right to censor stories in the school's newspaper.

"There is nothing wrong with the journalism at the high school level as a learning situation, as long as its context is kept within the advice and council of its peers, school adviser and the principal," he said.

Adams said he is concerned about student newspapers because they have "grown up in the past few years" on the type of news they cover.

"High school newspapers have moved from being gossip columns to where they cover stories on sensitive isssues that concern teens — suicide, alcoholism, sexuality and AIDS," he said. The student newspapers of today have become a vehicle from which teens talk to teens about current issues and concerns.

"I am in favor of student press rights," said June Lyle, 1988 Kansas Student Journalist of the Year. She is a freshman at the University of Indiana-Bloomington and former editor of the Manhattan High School Mentor. "The bill will definitely be a good thing for the high school press.

"If journalism students are going to be prepared, they need the actual experience of deciding what should and shouldn't go into a newspaper. Decision making is a vital skill needed by students and should be taught as part of high school journalism."

Mother to talk of son's AIDS

By Robert Short
Staff Writer

The true story of a mother's acceptance of her son's homosexuality and how she dealt with his acquired immune deficiency syndrome-related death will be included in a presentation by Beverly Barbo, Lindsborg, at 4 p.m. today in Union 207.

Barbo, whose son Tim died after contracting AIDS, is giving a presentation sponsored by the dean of student life, United Campus Ministry, Catholic Campus Ministry, Lutheran Campus Ministry and American Baptist Campus Ministry.

The program will touch on three general areas concerning homosexuality and AIDS, said the Rev. Don Fallon, coordinator of religious activities and a member of the communicable diseases committee.

The areas to be covered will include: dealing with the homosexuality of a family member, responding to a family member who has contracted AIDS, and how people can give care and support to a person with AIDS.

"We want this to be a perspective of how a family dealt with the AIDS virus," Fallon said. "(The presentation is) an expression of how this family accepted homosexuality."

Barbo is a graduate of Bethany College, Lindsborg, where she studied elementary education and art. She has written a book, "The Walking Wounded," and has made frequent appearances on college campuses to speak about her family's experiences.

Barbo is a member of the board of the Kansas AIDS network and is a member of the Family and Friends AIDS Network, an organization affiliated with The United Church of Christ. She has coordinated a central Kansas Share and Care Support Group for parents and families of homosexuals.

Barbo was extensively interviewed by Betsy Bergen, associate professor of human development and family studies, for an educational video on AIDS and homosexuality.

Congressman testifies: North denied reports of Contra aid

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The former House intelligence committee chairman testified Wednesday at Oliver North's trial that he relied on White House denials of reports of U.S. military help to the Nicaraguan Contras for more than a year until the Iran-Contra affair became known.

Rep. Lee Hamilton, D-Ind., the first prosecution witness, said then-National Security Adviser Robert McFarlane twice denied any involvement in letters in 1985 and at a committee briefing that year.

A year later Hamilton and his committee directly questioned North, then an aide on the National Security Council staff, about whether he had violated the Boland Amendment, a 1984 prohibition against U.S. military aid to the Contras.

"Colonel North insisted he had not violated the Boland Amendment, that he was not assisting the Contras by raising money, that he had not provided any military advice to the Contras," Hamilton said of the Aug. 6, 1986, meeting in the White House situation room.

"I relied on what Colonel North told me at the meeting," Hamilton said. "I believed what Colonel North told me at the meeting. I did not think there was any credible evidence to the contrary."

North was originally charged with conspiracy in the alleged scheme to divert money from Iran arms sales to aid the Nicaraguan Contras.

Student Senate should consider increased fee

Higher health fee necessary for Lafene

Sorry, we're closed.

The above phrase may become familiar to students in the near future if current legislation in front of Student Senate is not passed tonight to provide adequate funding for the Lafene Student Health Center.

The bill in front of Senate calls for a fee increase of $15, from $60 to $75 per semester, as well as initiation of a part-time fee for next fall.

Without this increase, the center, which is fully funded by students, will not receive enough money to cover expenditures. This will force the immediate elimination of some services, starting a trend that may cause the closing of this facility on our campus.

The increase seems drastic, but it was expected and predicted.

In 1986 a student subcommittee estimated that the fee should be set at $78 for fall 1988.

Student Senate itself mandated that a fee increase be delayed until cost cutting measures were implemented and the reserve fund was spent down to a minimum level. These recommendations have been followed, saving students more than was expected.

Now, however, the center is at its limit. Lafene can't cut out any more services without damaging vital services for the students; i.e., any more operations may kill student health at K-State.

Sound contradictory? In less than two years, without an increase in the fee, Lafene will be in debt more than $500,000. This won't happen. It will be necessary to close the center before this point.

The first question raised is usually whether students really go to Lafene.

They do, at the rate of about 60,000 visits per year. The patient load is near Lafene's capacity. Contrary to belief, it isn't the same 200 people going in every day. Students need it at different times, and some more than others. Typically, the need isn't planned.

Paying the student health fee gives you free access to quality medical attention anytime; you don't have to purchase a concert ticket or a season pass to use it.

Though you may not use Lafene, you still receive benefits directly and indirectly. The educational services Lafene produces through the Health Education Section are used by all.

Also, if you don't use the service (or you haven't needed it yet), you probably have several friends who have. You benefit from their health, plainly and simply.

As a member of any society, you are asked to help share the burden of maintaining a healthy, wealthy and wise society.

An analogy can be used, utilizing the "wise" part of the last paragraph. As an in-state student at K-State, you pay only about one-fourth of your actual tuition. The rest is made up through taxes imposed on various people, most of them residing in the state. (A lot of them don't and won't have a child use the regents system, yet we justify the expense incurred on them by saying that educating our young adults is better for our state, our society and ourselves than having a bunch of idiots walking around.)

Commentary

Douglas L. Oetinger

Guest Columnist

Having a healthy, educated student is better for K-State than having a neglected, ill student.

By denying funding, Student Senate will state that it is basically unconcerned about students' health and the ability to maintain that health. Any service that is eliminated will force students to go without necessary treatment or to seek that service outside at a greater cost.

While no fee is charged for visiting a physician at Lafene, a student will be forced to pay $30 or more to visit a local physician — if they can get an appointment within the next two weeks and survive the office wait.

Other consequences could be:

■ Closing of after-hours services, meaning that an ankle injury could cost $219 instead of $59, as well as a greater cost for all urgent care treatments.

■ An increase in self-diagnosis, or no diagnosis, decreasing the availability of necessary and potentially life-saving services.

■ A decrease in the ability of qualified people to properly educate young adults about their bodies and themselves, costing society in the future, and leaving the present and future health of 16,000 or more people on the conscience of Student Senate.

■ Losing part or all of a facility that is geared specifically toward students and their health specific problems. The Manhattan community won't, nor should they be expected to, pick up the slack — it's just too much.

And, while the costs have been increasing at a rate less than the national average at Lafene, students will be forced out into the community, where costs have risen and will continue to rise at a faster rate.

National health care costs have risen 130 percent in the past 10 years while the fee at Lafene has increased only 50 percent. This is not too bad of a deal.

The Manhattan medical community is understandably anxious to see if the students at K-State are able to take care of their own. They are concerned because they feel they could not withstand the extra load if some or all services were eliminated at Lafene.

Lafene is the second largest clinic in Manhattan, and it would be dangerous for Senate to assume the needs of all the students could be met by the Manhattan community.

The truth is that health care costs money. We are lucky to have the bargain that we do.

Is there room for improvement of the service? Of course! I would not be on an advisory committee if I felt there wasn't. But the answer to improving the students' health and the service cannot be obtained by denying funds. It's done by supporting and carefully analyzing Lafene. That is my main goal.

The University of Kansas has had similar funding problems. (Its clinic is also funded solely by students.)

KU's response was to increase the student health fee from its current $68 level to $80, $92, and $104 in successive years. While maintaining the same service, we will not need to approach that level, but it is interesting to compare priorites at another university.

The Lafene Student Health Advisory Committee and Student Senate have a responsibility to serve the students and their needs. LSHAC proposed this fee as a palatable way to continue a quality student service.

However, some student senators are treating it like a business acquisition and not a service. Some of the attitudes I have encountered relate not passing the fee to saying that we won't have the luxury of chair-backed seats in the coliseum's student section.

Student health is not a luxury. Basic needs and concerns are at stake here, as well as the health of thousands of students who make up our community. Don't allow Student Senate to take our health away.

Editor's note: Douglas L. Oetinger is chairman of the Lafene Student Health Advisory Committee and a senior in general business.

Finals week schedule beneficial to students

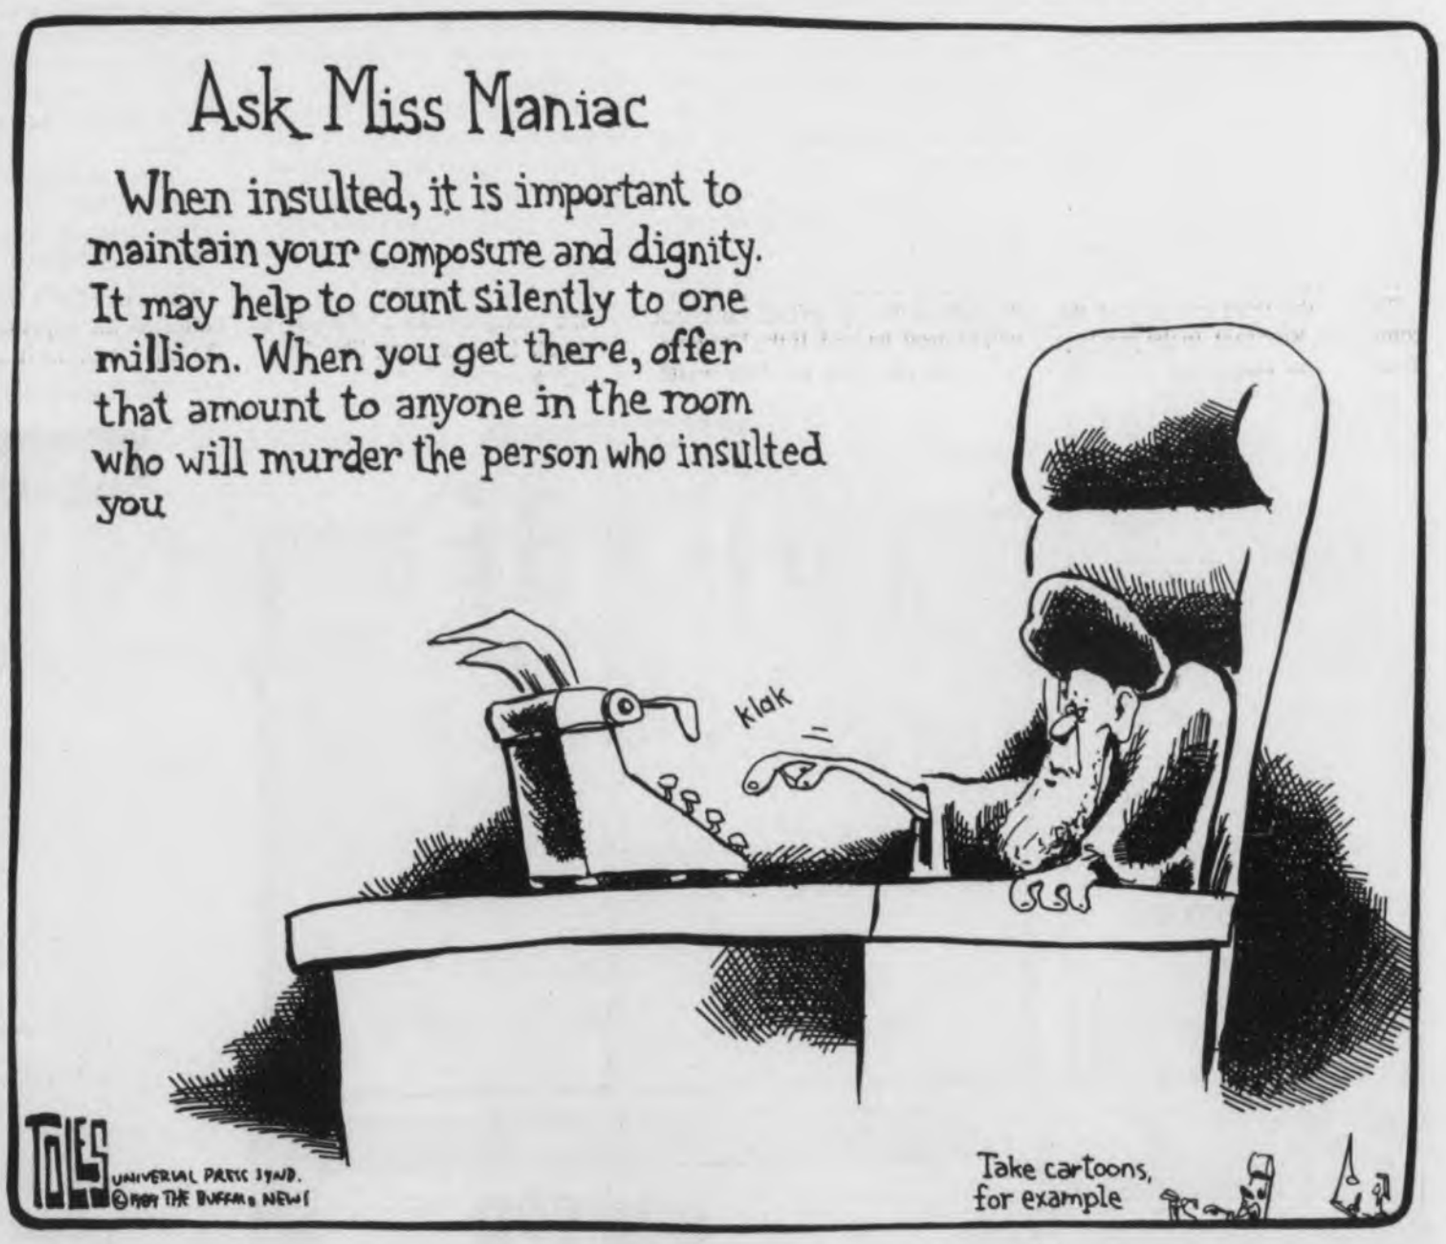
It can be said that the majority of college students get the most out of their college education during finals week.

At least that's the impression one gets at the end of each semester when the lights in the rooms burn a little bit longer at night, the students start looking desperate and the faculty start looking harrassed.

With that in mind, Faculty Senate, at the urging of Student Senate, has been considering expanding the finals examination schedule.

The proposed schedule would expand the length of finals week from five to seven days and would change the amount of time spent on a 110-minute exam to 120 minutes. It is also designed to reduce the amount of exams per day from six to five.

And perhaps most dear to students is that the new schedule would provide for an observed preparation — or dead — day.



So far, however, it seems to have met with resistance by Faculty Senate, which in its last meeting sent the proposed schedule change back to committee because it reduced the amount of class days by two.

Faculty Senate is procrastinating.

Considering the pressure both students and faculty experience during finals week, one would think neither group would be reluctant to approve the change, and certainly not the faculty, whose schedule would be eased as well.

The class schedule concern of the Faculty Senate is a legitimate one and should be addressed, but the time-consuming committee process could have been reduced with a little forethought on the part of the drafters of the proposal.

Despite the delay, Faculty Senate should still approve the proposed change. Only good could come of it, and adding two more class days to the schedule would probably meet with little resistance by students when grades are at stake.

Collegian Editorial Policies

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR are always encouraged. Those which pertain to matters of campus and/or public interest are especially encouraged, and are given the highest priority.

Letters should be kept as brief as possible, preferably under 300 words. Those who cannot condense their opinions should consider submiting their letter in the form of a guest column. All letters are subject to editing for space, style and taste.

GUEST COLUMNS are also encouraged. The column should be no longer than two double-spaced, typed pages. If the submission is used as a column and not a letter to the editor, it will be accompanied by the author's photograph.

Movie has several morals

One of the most popular and most talked about movies currently out is "Rain Man." Almost everyone is praising Dustin Hoffman for his portrayal of the autistic Raymond. Hoffman's portrayal is definitely worth praise and deserves an Academy Award.

Although "Rain Man" gives us provoking insight into autism, we should not ignore what the movie is also saying about growing up.

Raymond teaches us about autism. Charlie teaches us about growing up.

No one will argue that Charlie was fully grown physically, but what about emotionally? In the beginning he was arrogant, self-willed and self-consumed in his thoughts, attitudes and beliefs.

There was no room in Charlie's self-defined life for changes. And if things were different from the norm, then they were wrong. It certainly wasn't Charlie who was wrong.

Barbara Baker

Collegian Columnist

We all encounter many people in our lives, and regardless of age group, race, class or sex, how many of them are just like Charlie? How many people have not grown up yet?

By meeting and stealing his brother, Charlie unintentionally taught himself about differences and about how life wasn't so cut and dried according to his own definitions.

At the end of the movie, Charlie was a different man. His cloud world had been busted.

It's a shame that we can't force more people into situations like Charlie's, to help them mature in their mindset. No doubt it is idealistic to think they will seek alternative thoughts on their own.

For example, some people think their racist ideas are fine, right and have purpose. Others think it's OK to forget hungry, homeless people. "They'll go away. We don't see them in Kansas anyway."

But fortunately, life does touch some and they do grow up.

I'll give a real life example. I grew up in a very sullen, racist community, but during junior high I was paired with a girl who had to be my gym and recess partner.

In order to compete with the other teams in gym, we had to work together, practice together and learn each other's weaknesses and strengths. At recess it was either find things to do together, or sit bored and stare at one another.

So, at the end of the year she said to me, "You know, my parents and grandfather taught me not to trust other people outside of my race, not to be friends with black people. I never wanted to challenge that. I didn't know they could be wrong ... until now."

Cruise didn't receive an Academy Award nomination for his portrayal of Charlie, but he should be applauded for giving us a realistic insight into growing up and being more accepting of others.

Artist gets recognition for paintings

Graduate student's work hangs in governor's office

By Craig Hamrick
Collegian Reporter

When Jerry Thomas moved to Manhattan to attend graduate school in regional and community planning, he considered his artwork a hobby.

Prints of one of Thomas' most recent works, an acrylic painting featuring a farmstead and a bobwhite quail, will be presented to 500 Kansas farmers as the Kansas Wildlife Habitat Award.

Thomas was commissioned to do the painting by the Soil Conservation Service, which chooses the award recipients based on their contribution to maintaining wildlife habitats. The original of the painting was recently presented to Hayden in his Topeka office.

"Governor Hayden is a really nice man," Thomas said. "He held a special one-man art show for my work after the presentation, and I was really impressed at his politeness to everyone who was there."

The Soil Conservation Service was familiar with Thomas' work because it had received other statewide honors. The Kansas Flint Hills Chapter of Quail Unlimited and the Kansas Association of Conservation Districts each selected a print by Thomas for their first edition limited prints.

In 1988, Thomas' "Kansas Daybreak — Greater Prairie Chicken" won the Kansas Wildlife Art Series. The painting was sold as both a limited edition print and a collectors' stamp. Thomas said the details of a painting must be exact to win those contests.

"You've got to have the anatomy of the wildlife absolutely correct right down to the number of feathers or scales," he said. "They will actually count the feathers before they even judge the work from an artistic standpoint."

Thomas joked that he has done almost enough study in animal anatomy to earn a degree. But he said in some cases, the painstaking research can be lucrative.

Each year the artwork for the national duck hunting stamp, which is affixed to hunting licenses, is chosen from an open competition. The winner of the contest is awarded $1.5 million.

"It's better than the lottery," Thomas said. "This year I placed in the top 25, out of 650 paintings. I'll keep trying until I get it."

Late last year, several local businessmen set up a limited partnership to allow Thomas to pursue his artwork as a career. He now works out of a studio in the back of Borck Brothers, a men's clothing store, and hopes to have at least 12 prints ready for sale nationally by the end of the year. His artwork is displayed in the store and can be purchased there.

Thomas worked on his art at home before moving his studio to the clothing store. He said his wife was somewhat relieved at the move because it allowed for more space in the house.

"She's not happy that I'm (at the store) all hours of the day and night, but she's glad to get it out of the house," he said. "It gave us a lot more space."

Campus recycling plan considered

By Joe Kennedy
Collegian Reporter

The KSU recycling committee will formulate a recommendation for University administrators to establish a recycling program on campus in a meeting today at 3 p.m.

The committee will be discussing prospective budgets, revenue projections, collection sites and ways to collect and distribute the materials, said Edward Rice, director of University facilities.

This is the third meeting of the committee, Rice said. In the previous meetings the committee discussed how much recyclable waste there is at the University, how much money K-State could get for it and what type of waste recycling vendors will accept for recycling.

He said the committee is planning to recycle aluminum, glass, plastic, bond paper, cardboard and newsprint.

"At this point, bond paper is a volatile market," Rice said. "They haven't found a use for it yet."

The amount of revenue projected depends on the type of collection that will be used, he said. If the University collects and hauls all of the waste, the cost will be $78,000. If 100 percent of the waste is collected the revenue will be around $130,000.

Most places try to collect 15 to 20 percent of the waste and if the committee proposes to collect 20 percent of the waste the revenue will be $26,000, Rice said.

"The committee is not in it to make money," he said. "It's trying to decrease requirements for the landfill. If we could break even, it would be ideal."

"It's going to take everybody to cooperate for a program like this to work," Rice said.

The recycling project has already started at Edwards Hall, said Lisa Wilds, senior in nutrition.

Edwards Hall has been collecting recyclable materials all year, Wilds said. There is a bag provided for aluminum cans and boxes are provided for newspaper and plastics.

"The plastic is the most important because it doesn't break down and in 500 years it will still be in the same form," she said.

Edwards Hall is using the money collected for expenses incurred by the hall governing board such as parties and movies, she said.

Upward Bound promotes freshmen study habits

By Linda Kleiner
Collegian Reporter

Remember how frightening and lonely it was as a freshman the first day attending classes on campus?

Dawn Davis, freshman in pre-nursing, said that because of her involvement with the Upward Bound program she didn't have the freshman jitters. She is one of 16 K-State freshmen who participated in Upward Bound.

"Being involved in Upward Bound taught me how to ask questions, take notes and how to study," Davis said. "The program has helped me a lot personally. Without it, college would have been harder."

Upward Bound is a pre-college and pre-vocational preparatory program designed to assist about 65 high school students each year from the communities of Manhattan, Junction City, St. George and Westmoreland, said Reginland McGowan, special services director of Upward Bound.

"The program assists and encourages capable but sometimes underachieving students to become interested and successful in school," said Mary Williams, academic services coordinator of Upward Bound.

For 17 years, the program has implemented methods to maintain high school retention rates and give students the skills and motivation to pursue higher education, McGowan said.

Upward Bound services are free. The program is funded by a renewable three-year federal grant, with $203,746 allocated for 1989.

McGowan said student selections are based on their economic and educational needs for academic assistance, including the requirement that neither parent be a college graduate.

The program assists in recruiting minorities into college, Williams said.

Minority students constitute the majority of Upward Bound students because they fulfill the federal government's application requirements, she said.

"Each academic year, students and their parents sign a contract with Upward Bound agreeing to the set conditions regarding attendance, attitude, conduct and academic performance," McGowan said. "The contract is considered a binding employment agreement."

If the contract is broken, the student is asked to leave the Upward Bound program, he said. To McGowan's knowledge, no one has ever been asked to leave.

Throughout the academic year, students are required to attend a weekly academic resource session in their respective high schools, Williams said.

During the academic resource sessions, study skills are taught, and the Upward Bound staff, which is a combination of high school and University personnel, discusses student problems with the participants, she said.

The students' attendance, attitude and academic progress are monitored by the high school counselors and instructors. Students receive a $5 weekly stipend if they attend all program functions during the week, Williams said.

"I help the students to understand and deal with their personal and family problems," said David Kingsley, program counselor/student activities coordinator of Upward Bound.

Workshops are periodically conducted on Saturdays to discuss such topics as career exploration, cultural awareness and post-secondary preparation, McGowan said.

Bowling meet to help charity

By Jill McMahan
Collegian Reporter

Big Brothers/Big Sisters of Manhattan is kicking off the new year with its largest annual fund-raising event, the Bowling Classic, on Saturday.

"We need to raise $30,000," said Linda Teener, executive director of the Big Brothers/Big Sisters program. "We are expecting to have 700 to 800 bowlers for the event."

Big Brothers/Big Sisters receives funding from the United Way and the city of Manhattan, although this funding does not provide for the program's total financial need, Teener said.

Sixty percent of the program's budget for 1989 must be generated from private donations and fund raising.

The Bowling Classic will be at the Union and Wildcat Lanes bowling centers. People can participate by either bowling in the event or sponsoring a bowler, she said.

Teams from fraternities, sororities and the residence halls will be competing in the event. Of these three groups, a trophy will be awarded to the team raising the most donations, she said.

The Pi Kappa Phi fraternity won the division last year by raising the most donations.

Bowlers are guaranteed a minimum score of 100 pins and there is a minimum pledge of 5 cents per pin — to guarantee a $5 donation.

Migette Forssberg, junior in interior design and a big sister, said she is looking forward to the event.

"I am not a good bowler," she said. "They will automatically be giving me my 100 pins, but I am looking forward to the competition and spending time with my little brother."

"We need to raise $30,000."
—Linda Teener executive director, Big Brothers/Big Sisters

Forssberg is also the president of KSU Friends of Big Brothers/Big Sisters. This group is aimed toward students, faculty and their spouses who want to participate in the program, but cannot donate the required three to six hours a week.

KSU Friends is just starting to get off the ground, Forssberg said. There is no definite structure they follow, she said; they basically do what the members want to do.

"We are totally a service-oriented group," Forssberg said. "There are no dues and no obligations in joining, we just want to be able to help kids who aren't as fortunate as we are."

The group provides activities for children on waiting lists for big brothers or big sisters. Members of the KSU Friends will also help coordinate the Bowling Classic and help collect pledges when the event is over.

Teams of league bowlers from K-State and around Manhattan will also be participating in the event.

Prizes will be awarded to non-team bowlers who are not participating in any competition, but who raise the most donations.

Big Brothers/Big Sisters serves children ages 5 through 17 who lack the ongoing involvement of two parents. Teener said the program provides a therapeutic friendship to children who need support, guidance and energy beyond what the parent is able to provide.

Teener said Big Brothers/Big Sisters helps the entire community by giving children a better chance at becoming productive citizens.

Group: Narcotic-laced candy sends 'message'

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A health research group on Wednesday called for a halt to experiments with narcotic-laced lollipops given to children to calm them before surgery, saying that giving drugs in the form of candy sends a "dangerous message."

But doctors defended their experiments with the sedative and discounted the potential for increased drug abuse. They said their studies have found that delivering the narcotic fentanyl in a lollipop instead of with a needle is less stressful and traumatic for children about to undergo general anesthesia.

"In this setting, a one-time occurence, I don't believe that we're going to be putting the subliminal message into children's heads that candy equals drugs," said Dr. Lawrence Feld, a pediatric anesthesiologist at California's Stanford University Medical Center, who headed one of the studies.

Fentanyl has been approved by the FDA as an injectable drug. In the studies, it is mixed into a hard candy, mounted on a stick and given to children to suck on before they undergo general anesthesia or a painful diagnostic procedure.

Lady Cats snap winless streak, 64-60

Staff/Greg Vogel

By Mike Rouse
Collegian Reporter

The K-State women's basketball team bounced back from a home loss to Kansas on Saturday to beat the Oklahoma Sooners, 64-60, Wednesday night in Bramlage Coliseum. The victory broke a four-game losing streak, which had put a big damper on the Lady Cats' NCAA tournament hopes.

"This really built our confidence back up," said K-State's Diana Miller. "This brings us out of a deep shell we were in."

K-State's losing streak looked as if it would continue early in the contest. With the score tied, 12-12, and 15:23 left in the first half, Oklahoma went on an 11-0 run to take a 23-12 lead with 10:15 before the intermission.

The Lady Cats didn't let the Sooners pull away, though. Oklahoma led by 12 points with 5:05 left in the half when the Lady Cats went on a run of their own. K-State outscored the Sooners, 14-0, over a four-minute span and jumped out in front, 37-35. The Lady Sooners added a basket to knot the score 37-37 at intermisson.

"They got disgusted at the way they were playing," said K-State head coach Matilda Mossman. "And they finally decided to do something about it."

K-State's Kristie Bahner was the main key for the Lady Cats during their late first-half spurt. Bahner had four points and grabbed five key offensive rebounds.

"Kristie was the key during the run. Almost by herself, she got us back in the ballgame," Mossman said.

Neither team was able to pull away in the second half until the Lady Cats scored six straight points and jumped out to a 61-51 lead with 3:29 left.

Oklahoma then made a final run at the Lady Cats, narrowing the lead to four with 1:03 left. But from there, neither team converted another bucket and K-State held on to win.

K-State, 17-9 overall and 7-6 in the Big Eight Conference, was led in scoring by Diana Miller, who scored 17 points. Bahner had a double-double with 13 points and a career-high 14 rebounds, with seven of those coming on the offensive end.

"The boards were there. I just finally decided to get in there and the ball was there," Bahner said.

Another key to the victory was that Oklahoma didn't convert on a single free throw and shot only two for the game. K-State was whistled for only six fouls and outscored the Sooners by 14 points from the line.

"Maybe that was the answer — we didn't play defense so we couldn't foul," Mossman said.

Mary Jo Miller added 10 points for the Lady Cats, who finished with three players in double figures. The Lady Cats had only one player in double digits Saturday in their 58-57 loss to Kansas.

Oklahoma drops to 11-14 overall and 4-9 in the Big Eight. The Sooners were led by Jo Mosley and Tammy Rogers, who both scored 16 points, while Rogers contributed with 15 rebounds.

Oklahoma State 82, Missouri 71

At Stillwater, Okla., Darwyn Alexander scored seven of his 17 points during a 14-2 run in the final three minutes as Oklahoma State upset No. 7 Missouri 82-71.

Oklahoma State, 16-8 and 7-4 in the Big Eight, is 14-0 in Gallagher-Iba Arena, including a victory over top-ranked Oklahoma three weeks ago.

Missouri, 22-6 and 8-3 in the conference, got 14 points from Lee Coward. Byron Irvin, who came into the game averaging 19.8 points a game, was held to seven.

The Tigers led 69-68 when Nathan Buntin scored from inside with 5:45 left to put Missouri up for the first time since leading 1-0.

But Missouri assistant coach Rich Daly, filling in for Norm Stewart, was given a technical foul when he protested a blocking call, and Alexander made two free throws with 3:45 remaining.

Alexander then hit a 3-pointer for a 73-69 Oklahoma State lead and the Cowboys continued to score off Missouri mistakes. The Tigers failed to make a field goal in the final 5:45.

Missouri's frustration showed in the final three seconds when Lee Coward was assessed an intentional foul on Thomas Jordan, who led Oklahoma State with 19 points.

Iowa State 97, Kansas 89

At Ames, Iowa, Mike Born scored 26 points, including four 3-point goals to set a school season record of 38 treys, to lead Iowa State to a 97-89 Big Eight victory over Kansas Wednesday.

Born also established a school career record of 74 3-pointers as the Cyclones won their third in a row to improve to 14-9 overall and 5-6 in the conference. Kansas lost its eighth in a row to fall to 16-11 and 3-8.

Iowa State led 20-19 midway through the first half, then went on an 11-point run. The Cyclones used 10 straight free throws and a 3-point goal by Mark Baugh to move ahead 44-32 with 3:45 left in the half. A Marc Urquhart goal with 1:02 left put the half-time score at 52-38.

Milt Newton hit 10 straight points to start the second half.

Nebraska 97, Colorado 59

In Lincoln, Neb., Beau Reid scored 15 of his 21 points in the first half as Nebraska raced to a 20-3 lead enroute to a 97-59 victory over Colorado.

Ray Richardson added 17 points for the Cornhuskers, including a slam dunk that gave his team the 20-3 lead with 12:09 left in the first half. The Huskers closed the half with 17 unanswered points to post a 50-20 advantage at intermission.

Colorado, which suffered its 43rd straight Big Eight loss on the road, cut the margin to 66-43 on Reggie Morton's 3-point goal with 10:33 left in the game. But Nebraska followed with 10 points in a row.

It marked the highest point total of the season for Nebraska, which has won three straight home games and now stands 15-12, 3-8 in the league.

Shaun Vandiver scored a team-high 11 points for Colorado, which fell to 7-17, 2-7 in the Big Eight. The Buffaloes have not won a conference game on the road since 1983.

OU staves off Wildcats' rally

By The Associated Press

NORMAN, Okla. — After rubbing the sleep from his eyes, Oklahoma coach Billy Tubbs tipped his cap to K-State.

"I thought K-State did an outstanding job, particularly in controlling the tempo," Tubbs said after the top-ranked Sooners won 86-82 Wednesday night. "It was a very boring game, just what they wanted, and that is to their credit."

The Wildcats used their deliberate half-court offense to stay close to the Sooners, but Oklahoma got a big three-point play from Stacey King in the closing moments to preserve the victory.

"When you have an 11-point halftime lead, you tend to let up," K-State coach Lon Kruger said. "They may have done that, but I'm also proud of our kids taking advantage of that and jumping on it."

King had 16 of his 23 points in the first half, but didn't score in the second half until he made two free throws with 4:43 to go. His three-point play with 1:01 remaining gave the Sooners an 83-77 lead.

LaKeith Humphrey's three-pointer with 24 seconds left pulled K-State to 85-82. But with 11 seconds remaining, the Wildcats lost a chance to tie the score with a three-pointer when Steve Henson's pass to Tony Massop bounced off Massop's hands and out of bounds.

"If you had told me we would shoot 60 percent and they'd shoot 43, I'd have said we would win by 40 points," said Tubbs, whose team averages 117 points per game at home. "We don't really have any excuses. I thought they took it to us and we just hung on. It was as if we were just happy to get it over with."

Oklahoma, 24-3 and 10-1 in the Big Eight, has won 28 consecutive home games.

K-State, 16-8 and 6-5, used its patient half-court offense and the scoring of LaKeith Humphrey and Fred McCoy to keep things close, pulling within three points five times in the final four minutes. Humphrey had 24 points and McCoy 21.

K-State scored the game's first five points before King sparked a 14-4 run with six points. That spurt gave the Sooners a 14-10 lead and they never trailed again.

Consecutive three-pointers by Herman Henry made the score 43-34 late in the first half. Mookie Blaylock, who scored 19 points, added two driving layups in the closing minutes as the Sooners opened a 13-point lead.

Oklahoma went scoreless in the opening 4½ minutes of the second half as K-State pulled to 52-50. Terrence Mullins then scored seven points in a 9-2 Oklahoma run that made it 61-52.

Boggs' ex-mistress tells all to magazine

By The Associated Press

WINTER HAVEN, Fla. — The Boston Red Sox took in stride Wednesday their move from the sports pages to Penthouse and steamy revelations by Wade Boggs' former mistress about the sex lives of several players.

In the first of two Penthouse magazine articles, Margo Adams describes her four-year affair with Boggs and talks about the third baseman's unflattering views of other players.

Manager Joe Morgan discussed the article briefly in a closed clubhouse meeting before practice at spring training camp.

"I told Wade that he had to deal with the people involved," Morgan said. "We're behind him and right now it's his problem. If it affects the team, then it's my problem."

The Penthouse issue containing the article will be on sale next week. Advance copies were made available to several news organizations, including The Associated Press.

In the article, Adams says Boggs made a racist remark about teammate Jim Rice, was extremely jealous of New York Yankees first baseman Don Mattingly, and felt Red Sox pitcher Roger Clemens acted like "Mr. Perfect."

Adams, who is receiving at least $100,000 for the story, also graphically describes the sex lives of Boggs and several teammates she does not identify.

Adams, now a mortgage banker in Southern California, is suing Boggs for $6 million. She claims Boggs, who is still married, promised to pay her for lost wages while she accompanied him on Boston road trips.

Boggs, a five-time American League batting champion, apologized to teammates mentioned in the article and to General Manager Lou Gorman. In the article, Adams says Boggs thought Gorman was "a bastard."

"Wade went around to each individual and everything appeared fine," Gorman said. "He apologized and denied the statement attributed to him, saying he has the greatest respect for me.

"The general feeling in the clubhouse was 'Let's put this behind us, let's go out and play ball.' I haven't read the article, but you've got to remember she's the one saying things, not Boggs. He and I get along very well."

Boggs declined to talk about the article, saying, 'I'm not going to comment on something I haven't read." But, he added, "I might talk tomorrow, or talk next week."

Outfielder Dwight Evans, at 37 the Red Sox' elder statesman, said "as

'Cats named all-academic

The Big Eight Conference has recognized three K-State athletes for athletic and classroom accomplishments.

From Lon Kruger's men's basketball squad, Mark Dobbins was named to the Big Eight's all-academic team for the third straight year. Dobbins has a 3.08 grade point average in marketing.

Dobbins joins Kruger, Ed Nealy and Eddie Elder as the fourth K-State basketball player to be named all-academic three times. The senior from Humboldt is averaging 6.8 points and 4.3 rebounds a game for the 'Cats this season.

Matteucci, who has started 21 games this season, carries a 3.20 GPA in life sciences/pre physical therapy. The Albuquerque, N.M., native is averaging 8.6 points and 4.4 rebounds a game for the Lady Cats.

Player representatives named

Wildcat football coach Bill Snyder has released a list of 13 players who will serve as player representatives heading into spring workouts.

Snyder said the group, which was chosen by the team, will serve in a leadership capacity until team captains are selected.

By Paige Gantz
Collegian Reporter

A new club featuring a combination of music from the 1950s and 60s, Platter's, will open at 4:30 p.m. today.

The club, located at 2304 Stagg Hill Road, is in the same building as Kennedy's Claim.

In addition to the music, there will also be staff dance routines.

"Every hour the staff will perform song and dance routines as a group on the dance floor," Hudlow said. "If a waitress happens to be in her section, then she'll just do the routine right there.

"There are many different routines. For example, we have routines stemming from the music of 'Soul Man' or 'Willy and the Hand Jive.'"

Patrons will be able to participate in contests.

"There will also be lip-synch contests, and limbo and hoola hoop contests," she said. "Music trivia will also be offered."

A buffet will be offered.

"Platter's will feature free hot and cold food buffets instead of restaurant food," Hudlow said.

Platter's will also impose a dress code.

Hudlow said: "Anyone wearing jeans and athletic wear which includes sweatshirts or T-shirts will not be allowed in the club.

"We want people to look nice when they come to Platter's."

Business hours for Platter's will be from 4:30 to 2 a.m. Tuesday through Friday, and from 6 p.m. to 2 a.m. Saturday.

Poet's work probes daily life

By Grant Snider
Contributing Writer

Poet Stephen Dunn, whose poetry has been described as that which "probes the hidden shoals and depths of daily life," read his work Wednesday evening at the Union to a crowd of about 40.

Dunn's poetry deals with broad topics — love, work, aspirations, family — and places them in intimate contexts.

However, Dunn's poetry does not stray away from controversy. In a poem titled "At The Smithville Methodist Church," he explores the dilemma of how a mother and father, who are basically secular evolutionists, deal with their little girl who has just returned full of faith from a week at a church camp.

The poem draws insights into how much we learn and, particularly, how we learn to have faith.

Soon it became clear to us: you can't teach disbelief to a child,

Only wonderful stories, and we hadn't a story nearly as good.

Later the parents seek practical ways of defending and instilling their beliefs. They wonder how they will compete with the Methodist church.

Evolution is magical but devoid heroes.

You can't say to your child "Evolution loves you."

Dunn entertained and instructed, while not turning off the listener. His deep, calm voice soothed while his words told how life is full of the struggle for love, the pressures of work, and the hard task of confronting the self.

One came away from his reading feeling refreshed and somehow invigorated.

"Dunn is able to have popular appeal, yet is really good," said Jonathan Holden, professor of English.

Dunn is the author of seven poetry books, including "Local Time," winner of The National Poetry Series in 1975. He teaches at Stockton State College in New Jersey and in the graduate creative writing program at Columbia University. Dunn also held a Guggenheim Fellowship in 1984-85.

His most recent book, "Between Angels," will soon be published by Norton.

2 charged with murder in KC

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — One of two men accused of killing a popular honor student gave himself up Wednesday to police in Tulsa, Okla.

Meanwhile, the search continued for Archie E. Owens Jr., 20, and for Tambi Lewis, 18, who was released last week from a juvenile facility where she spent two years for a homicide.

Lewis was charged Wednesday with aiding a felon for helping the two men flee. That same charge, along with one of felony theft, was filed Tuesday against Shari Lyn Bierman, 20, the victim's adopted sister.

Conrad Joseph Hernandez, 24, and Owens, both of whom had been living in Kansas City, Kan., were charged Tuesday with first-degree murder in the killing of 17-year-old Syndi L. Bierman and with felony theft of items from the Bierman home.

Tulsa Police Sgt. John Bowman said Hernandez told officers he parted company with Owens and Lewis on Tuesday after a disagreement over whether they should surrender.

Bowman said Hernandez called police dispatchers shortly before 8:30 a.m. Wednesday and said he wanted to surrender.

ABCs OF FIRST AID

DENTAL EMERGENCIES
The most common of dental emergencies is the toothache. If no swelling occurs, aspirin or Tylenol may be used prior to seeing a dentist. If there is accompanying swelling or fever, antibiotics and prescription pain relievers may be necessary. Visit the dentist as soon as possible. Children's temporary teeth may be carefully removed if they are loose. Permanent adult teeth, loose teeth, broken crowns or knocked out teeth should have dental attention.

The ABCs of First Aid is brought to you as a community service of the emergency room at Memorial Hospital. Be looking for the entire alphabet and remember to clip and save this announcement for your own emergency care.

Studies show oral contraceptives may increase risk of breast cancer

By Laurie Cox
Collegian Reporter

Although two studies were released within the last few months confirming that oral contraceptives, or the pill, cause breast cancer, the information should be interpreted with caution, said Cathie Barry, RN, supervisor of Lafemme Clinic.

According to Contraceptive Technology Update magazine a British study found, "Women who had only one child and were 30 to 34 years old were about three times more likely to develop breast cancer," said Dr. Clifford Kay of the Royal College of General Practitioners in Manchester, England.

In Kay's study, he found no relationship between nulliparity (the condition of having given birth to no children), pill use and breast cancer.

The Update cited an unpublished study from Dr. Sidney Shapiro at Boston University which documented a twofold to fourfold increased risk of breast cancer in oral contraceptive users, even in women who had used the pill for three months or less.

The Food and Drug Administration Advisory Committee on Fertility and Maternal Health Drugs "found the studies suggested oral contraceptives might increase the risk in some subgroups of women — such as women who began using oral contraceptives at a young age. But the studies they reviewed were conflicting and inconsistent, so it was difficult to draw conclusions."

Because the studies' results were inconsistent, the FDA advisory committee concluded that oral contraceptive labeling should not be changed based on the studies' data, although the FDA wants to conduct more research to evaluate the risk.

"(Lafemme employees) have had patients inquire about the issue and advised them not to stop use of the pill based on these results alone," Barry said. "We advise them to wait and see, because there are currently many studies being done."

Dr. Rudy Haun, gynecologist at Manhattan Medical Center, said he agrees with the FDA's conclusions.

"There is no evidence that says I ought not to be prescribing the contraceptives," Haun said. "There is no conclusive evidence to support the accusation."

Barry said women who have a history of breast cancer in their family may investigate the other contraceptive options and complete regular self-breast examinations as preventive measures.

"This recent connection between (the pill and breast cancer) could possibly shy people away from starting use of the contraceptive," she said.

Consumers should be aware of studies published which support both sides of a health issue, Barry said.

Last year a study stated "Drinking alcohol increased the risk of cancer in oral contraceptive users," she said. "A few months later another study was released that counteracted the previous findings. The point I'm trying to make is that (interpreting the significance of studies) is confusing to consumers, and that it is important to pay attention to new and upcoming results."

Both Ortho Pharmaceuticals and Searle & Company, producers of oral contraceptives, include an explanation of the possible dangers of using oral contraceptives. The complications listed were blood clots, an increase in the risk of heart attacks, temporary infertility after discontinuing use, depression and an increase of gall bladder problems.

Barry said, "The oral contraceptive prevents uterine and ovarian cancers. It also protects against fibrocystic breast disease and has an ongoing protection after discontinuing use."

Khomeini: Fixing relations impossible

By The Associated Press

Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini said Wednesday the mounting Western condemnation of his order to kill novelist Salman Rushdie has proven the futility of normalizing relations with the rest of the world.

Iran's revolutionary patriarch also declared the publication of Rushdie's "The Satanic Verses" was a Western plot against Islam.

In New York, hundreds of writers demonstrated Wednesday against the order outside the Iranian Mission to the United Nations and two book stores that pulled "The Satanic Verses" from its shelves.

But Wednesday, B. Dalton bookstore chain and its Barnes & Noble subsidiary announced it would restock the novel.

Rallies were scheduled in Boston, Washington, Chicago, Minneapolis and San Francisco to coincide with the book's official U.S. publication date.

Authors in Finland and the Netherlands also condemned Khomeini's order Wednesday. Publishers in France, West Germany, Greece and Turkey have canceled plans to publish the book, which has been banned as blasphemous to Islam by at least seven countries, including India, Pakistan and Egypt.

West German TV said the Cabinet also discussed "further measures" against Iran. "If the mullahs adhere to the execution order against (Rushdie), then economic sanctions will no longer be ruled out," the ZDF network reported.

The Harlem Blues and Jazz Band
Friday, February 24, 8 p.m.

"They jumped, bopped, and kicked out the slickest, coolest jazz ever written, and the audience couldn't get enough." That's how one critic summed up a performance by these seven New York jazz elders. Vocalist Laurel Watson joins this all-star convocation of original masters from the Golden Age of Swing for an evening of gutsy, bluesy spontaneity and sublime solos.

"It's unfair to call this gathering of veteran jazzmen a band. They're more like a congregation of magicians. The music they stirred up had their concert feeling more like a jazzed-up version of an old camp meeting."

Chapman's debut album wins 3 Grammy Awards

By The Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Tracy Chapman, a quiet and retiring newcomer who brought a disquieting reality to the pop charts with her self-titled debut LP, won three Grammy awards Wednesday night — but the record and song of the year was Bobby McFerrin's ebullient "Don't Worry, Be Happy."

McFerrin, whose voice and body are his only instruments and who won his first Grammy in 1985 for jazz vocals, was the night's big winner with four of the coveted miniature gramophones. He also won the male jazz vocal award for the song "Brothers" in addition to the pop vocal prize for his "Don't Worry."

Both big winners lost to George Michael for album of the year. He won for his platinum "Faith," a blend of ballads, rock and soulful pop, including the hit single "I Want Your Sex." He won last year's R&B award for his duet with Aretha Franklin.

The British vocalist was the first white solo artist to top Billboard's black charts with "Faith," which sold more than 12 million copies in its first year of release.

"I really got to go to the bathroom now," McFerrin said as he collected his fourth and biggest prize of the night — record of the year. "I made my first record when I was 12. My sister and I wrote about love as we understood it, our dog and our family. And this is really quite a way from there.

"This is by no means a gauge of artistic ability," he continued, thanking the other nominees. "It's really an honor and a surprise."

"Tracy Chapman," ranging from folk to pop ballad to reggae, has sold more than 4 million copies for the 24-year-old singer-songwriter who looks uncompromisingly look at poverty, racism, inequality and human rights.

Chapman, 24, who only a year ago was singing in small Boston cafes while an anthopology student at Tufts University, dazzled members of the National Academy of Recording Arts & Sciences much the same way another newcomer did nine years ago — Christopher Cross.

Cross, who also wrote his entire debut LP, won five Grammys in 1980 including album, song and record of the year.

"I want to thank my family — my mother, who bought me my first guitar, my sister, who's always been my best audience, best critic and best friend," Chapman said tearfully as she accepted the award for best female pop vocalist.

She also won the female pop vocal award for her No. 1 single "Fast Car," which tells of a high school dropout who supports her alcoholic father and wants to escape her misery in a fast car with her unemployed boyfriend.

Clad in her customary blue jeans and black leather jacket, she kept her acceptance speech to a brief "Thank you," when she was named best new artist. Jazz singer Anita Baker claimed two rhythm & blues trophies, as the 31st annual Grammy Awards pre-broadcast ceremonies got under way at the Shrine Auditorium.

Manhattan Transfer, the closely harmonious jazz quartet, won best pop performance by a duo or group for their single "Brasil."

"I want to thank my family — my mother, who bought me my first guitar, my sister, who's always been my best audience, best critic and best friend."

—Tracy Chapman Grammy Award winner

Pop singer Linda Ronstadt won in the Mexican-American category for her album "Canciones De Mi Padre," dedicated to her father's heritage.

Chapman, nominated six times, won best contemporary folk recording for her album, "Tracy Chapman." McFerrin, whose voice is a one-man orchestra, had five nominations.

Baker took best rhythm & blues song and best female vocal performance in that category for "Giving You The Best That I Got." She shared best song, a song-writing award, with Skip Scarbourough and Randy Holland.

In the rap category, which was hit by a boycott by some of the major nominees, the best song was "Parents Just Don't Understand" by D.J. Jazzy Jeff & The Fresh Prince, who were among those not attending the show because the award was given during the pre-telecast presentations.

Terence Trent D'Arby won best male rhythm & blues vocal for "Introducing The Hardline According to Terence Trent D'Arby."

Irish rockers U2 won Grammys for rock performance by a group for the single "Desire" and music video performance for "Where The Streets Have No Name."

K.T. Oslin's "Hold Me" was best country song, and the mother-daughter duo The Judds won best country group for "Give a Little Love."

Willie Dixon, the 73-year-old blues master whose songs have been hits for so many rock groups, finally won his first Grammy for his "Hidden Charms" album in the best traditional blues recording category. He mounted the stage with the aid of a cane and received a standing ovation.

"I've been in the music business for about 50 years," Dixon said backstage. "It's about time, don't you think?"

Dixon's compositions for rock groups include such hits as "Spoonful" for the British supergroup Cream in the late 1960s.

The late Roy Orbison won his third Grammy, sharing best country vocal collaboration with country singer k.d. lang for their version of Orbison's "Crying." She was presented the award by a tearful Barbara Orbison, widow of the rock great who died last year.

"I feel that Roy was so fortunate to hold the love from all the fans and the whole world before he passed on and that his life was such a full life," Orbison said backstage.

Renovation of Memorial Hospital to give patients improved facilities

By Carol Knorr
Collegian Reporter

Construction at Memorial Hospital is ahead of schedule, said Julie Davenport, director of marketing and public relations.

Groundbreaking took place Nov. 4 for the $3.2 million renovation and expansion project with a target date of 1991 for completion, Davenport said.

"Due to the extremely nice weather we had in January, we are about one month ahead of schedule," she said.

"Up until three weeks ago, construction was a month ahead of schedule," said Michael Nunamaker, chief executive officer of the hospital. "We lost about a week and a half of that time during the cold weather this month, but we are still way ahead of schedule."

The entire building will be renovated except for the kitchen area, said Nunamaker. Also, 27,000 square feet are being added to the hospital.

"The building has never had an upgrade in the 30 years it has existed," Davenport said. "Technology wasn't as advanced when it was built, so many of the surgery areas are entirely too small."

Davenport said the new additions and renovations will provide facilities for equipment even larger than what is now state of the art.

"We are not only upgrading our facilities," she said, "we are also preparing for the future."

So far construction has been mainly on the outside of the building, Nunamaker said.

"This construction has had a minimal effect on the hospital's operations," he said.

The sequence of construction gives top priority to the front of the hospital and building the new intensive care unit and emergency room, Nunamaker said.

"When those are completed, possibly by late summer or fall of 1990, then we will renovate the areas that will be vacated," he said.

Nunamaker said no one particular phase of construction will be complete until early this fall.

"We haven't foreseen any changes in our plans yet," he said. "We spent the better part of nine months going over them with the staff and architects so we could avoid any surprises, and it seems to have paid off.

"We expect some changes on the interior as we begin to renovate, but we have hopefully minimized the chance for any possible changes."

Nunamaker said construction has stayed within the given budget so far.

There have only been two changes in costs, and they cancel each other out, he said.

Abbott Construction of Manhattan is responsible for renovation and construction.

"We meet weekly, and they keep (the hospital administration) advised on progress," Nunamaker said. "That gives us time to make any special arrangements so that we don't get in each other's way."

Boggs

far as I'm concerned, it's over. The man said he's sorry. That's all you can do. You go on with life."

Mike Greenwell, who signed a $1.7 million contract Tuesday, said he considers the story "a dead issue."

"She's just making things up to tell a story," he said. "She's looking for publicity and money and she's getting it. It's unfortunate there are people in the world who try to hurt other people."

According to Adams, Boggs said Rice "thinks he's white."

Asked to comment on the story, Rice said, "I have not read it and I am not going to read it."

In the Penthouse article, Adams said Boggs told her he had contracted venereal disease from one woman and impregnated another woman who subsequently had a miscarriage.

Adams also detailed a number of Boggs' superstitions. She claimed she took 64 road trips with Boggs, purchased his clothes and avoided sex with him during the day.

Pickens

Young people want to make their own decisions and don't want government involvement, Pickens said.

"(Government involvement) is something you don't want," he said. "Stick with that. Government never solved problems in the private sector."

Randolph Pohlman, dean of the College of Business Administration, said Pickens graduated from Oklahoma State University with a degree in geology. Within the first eight years after his graduation, Pickens started Mesa Petroleum Company, which reorganized in 1985 to become Mesa Limited Partnership.

In a question-and-answer session following the speech, Pickens said he is considering running in 1990 as a Republican candidate for governor of Texas.

Event mixes donkeys, games

Teams play for charity

By Scott Paske
Collegian Reporter

It wasn't the style of play K-State basketball coaches Lon Kruger and Matilda Mossman could have appreciated, but some of the year's most entertaining games took place in Weber Arena Thursday night.

Instead of Wildcat players Steve Henson, Fred McCoy or Nadira Hazim stealing the show, it was Super Stupid, Earthquake and X-Lax providing the thrills as Bob Crosby's Donkey Basketball became a part of Greek Week festivities.

Representatives from most of the 33 participating fraternities and sororities displayed their basketball ability while riding on the backs of Crosby's stubborn animals. The greek groups were divided into four teams, with the winners of two first round games vying in the championship.

Despite having to exhibit their skills while aboard the donkeys, the players did have to abide by some basic rules. Helmets were required, and the participants had to be mounted while attempting to pass, score or play defense. The players also had to take their donkeys with them wherever they went, a feat that was much easier said than done.

"You feel like you're getting hit by a truck — twice," said Dan Nguyen, sophomore in electrical engineering and Theta Xi fraternity member. "Temporarily, you feel like you have a chance to score a basket, but then (the donkey) takes off on you."

Nguyen was one of many participants who was treated rudely by the donkeys. After a rough ride on one of the bigger animals in the opening round contest, the sophomore was given the smallest donkey for the championship.

The "lucky" riders were selected by members of their respective houses. Each participant signed a release form prior to playing, recognizing the potential for some bumps and bruises that might have occurred.

The first round games consisted of two eight-minute halves and not much scoring (2-0 in the first game, 8-6 in the second and 6-4 in the championship). The halves were shortened for the championship game.

Farmhouse fraternity member Silas Ashmore, freshman in pre-veterinary medicine, goes up for a slam dunk after receiving a pass while standing on a donkey's back during a donkey basketball game.

Nguyen, along with members from Sigma Sigma Sigma, Beta Sigma Psi, Alpha Gamma Rho, Kappa Delta, Phi Kappa Theta, Sigma Phi Epsilon, Alpha Xi Delta and Lambda Chi Alpha captured the championship in an exciting finale.

The event also featured donkey races, in which members from each house tried to steer their animal around a barrel at the far end of the court and finish where they started. Rules for the event were hard to come by, other than crossing the finish line on the back of the donkey.

Perry Palmer, chairman of the Greek Week Steering Committee, said any proceeds from the event will go to the Manhattan United Way. Greek Affairs expected to sell about 500 tickets for the event, which were distributed among the participating houses. Tickets were $2.50.

"I felt that for the first time for an event like donkey ball, it went pretty well," Palmer said.

Health fee passes as debate begins on athletic fee

By Nancy Prosser
Staff Writer

Student Senate almost unanimously passed a bill increasing student health fees for full time students to $75 in fiscal year 1990, and to $80 in fiscal year 1991.

The Senate roll-call vote in the meeting Thursday night was 42-8 with one abstention.

"I think Lafene is a necessity. We need to continue with services, then come up with the solutions to problems," said Chris Kern, architecture senator.

"This university is a community, and show me a community of 18,000 to 19,000 that doesn't have a health fee," said Dr. Robert Tout, director of Lafene Health Center. "I pay taxes to the City of Manhattan that supports the health care services of that community.

"The community of Manhattan could not absorb the number of students we see. It is not realistic to think we can lose Lafene on this campus. We have been here since 1913, what you will lose without a health fee is the quality of care."

Business senator Chris Dunitz said he was glad to see the health fee pass.

"I think it will benefit the majority of the student body," he said.

Presently, only those students enrolled in seven or more hours are allowed to use Lafene. With the new plan, part-time students will have access to Lafene's services, but will pay $25 in fiscal year 1990 and $30 in fiscal year 1991.

Part-time students will also be charged on a user basis. The first visit will be free of charge, then will cost $25 for each additional visit until the student reaches the same balance as that which is paid by full time students.

Pat Bosco, vice president for institutional advancement, congratulated the Senate on the passing of the bill, but expressed concern about the amendment on fees for part-time students.

"The amendment could increase a part-time student's fees by as much as one-third," Bosco said. "There are over 2,000 part-time students at the University that could be affected."

The fee increase will be reviewed yearly by the Lafene Student Health Advisory Committee.

Before approving the fee, Senate expressed two main concerns to the Lafene staff and Lafene Advisory Committe members who were present. One was the possibility of funding Lafene totally through individual user charges. The other concern regarded implementing a computer billing system at Lafene.

"We came up recently in the committee with the suggestion of having a user-based fee at Lafene," said Doug Oetinger, senior in general business administration and member of the Advisory Committee. "But a user-based fee would be money that you couldn't count on, and Lafene is

Isenhour announces new teaching award

By Chris Koger
Staff Writer

Ninety teaching awards honoring distinguished faculty and graduate teaching assistants in the College of Arts and Sciences will be presented for the first time this spring, Dean Thomas Isenhour announced Thursday at a faculty meeting.

Overall, $29,000 will be given at spring commencement in the award program, which Isenhour described as "an effort to recognize the excellence in teaching that we have within the college.

"We're making a major statement that we support the level of teaching we've had," he said. The award is endowed by donations from the Telefund campaign.

Fifty faculty members will receive $500 each for the William L. Stamey Teaching Award, named for the former dean of the college, who served as from 1970-1987.

"Most of the excellence in teaching here has come as a result of his leadership while he was dean," Isenhour said.

Forty Arts and Sciences Graduate Teaching Awards at $100 each will also be presented.

At least one faculty member from each of the 24 departments and divisions within the college is guaranteed an award, Isenhour said.

Provost James Coffman said this is the first time this many teachers have been recognized at once.

"I'd say we intend to sustain the awards as an annual program," Coffman said. "The awards are a notable enhancement in showing our appreciation of quality teachers at K-State."

Committee rejects Tower's nomination

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Senate Armed Services Committee voted Thursday to reject John Tower's nomination as defense secretary, splitting 11-9 along party lines as it handed President Bush the first major defeat of his administration.

The full Senate is expected to make a final decision on the nomination next week — one that Democrats are saying will be a close one.

During two and one-half hours of debate — mostly in the form of speeches — before the vote, majority Democrats said they felt no joy in opposing Tower but were compelled to do so. Some cited allegations over the past month of excessive drinking and of womanizing.

Republicans alleged partisanship and suggested Tower was held to too high a standard. Sen. Malcolm Wallop of Wyoming said, "The majority believes we are confirming a defense god, not a defense secretary."

In Tokyo, where Bush was attending the funeral of Japanese Emperor Hirohito, White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater said the president was sticking by Tower and "there's no consideration of any change, period."

"We now go to the floor" of the Senate, Fitzwater declared. He said the committee had "every right to look into" allegations about Tower. But he also complained, "We hear vague talk about concern about his personal habits and we think this debate ought to be on a slightly higher level than that."

If the full Senate should turn down Tower, it would be the first time in history a newly elected president had suffered a rejection of a nominee to his first Cabinet. In all, eight Cabinet nominations have been rejected, the most recent 30 years ago.

Before the committee vote, most of the panel's 11 Democrats and nine Republicans explained their positions in lengthy comments.

Last committee rejection 44 years ago

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — It has been 30 years since the Senate rejected a president's choice for his Cabinet and 44 years since such action was taken by a Senate committee.

All in all, eight Cabinet nominations have been turned down by the full Senate, according to the Senate Library.

The most recent was President Eisenhower's nomination of Lewis B. Strauss to be secretary of commerce, which was rejected by a 49-46 vote on Jan. 19, 1959. Strauss had been serving in the post by an interim appointment since the previous November.

The Senate Commerce Committee, controlled by Democrats, had recommended Strauss' confirmation by a vote of 9-8, with three Democrats joining six Republicans in support of him.

Strauss had previously been chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission. Opponents said that in that position he withheld information from Congress or gave misleading information.

Before the Senate Armed Services Committee voted Thursday to reject the nomination of John Tower as secretary of defense, the last time a Senate committee rejected a Cabinet nominee was on Jan. 26, 1945.

The Commerce Committee then turned down President Roosevelt's nomination of Henry A. Wallace to be secretary of commerce.

Crash kills all 11 passengers

VIENNA, Austria — A twin-engine plane crashed into Lake Constance near the Swiss-Austrian border on Thursday, and all 11 people aboard were killed, including Austrian Social Affairs Minister Alfred Dallinger, officials said.

Dozens of helicopters, boats and a West German submarine took part in international search efforts. Around 6 p.m., seven hours after the crash, the wreck of the Gulfstream Aerocommander AC-90 aircraft was found about 260 feet below surface, about half a mile from the shore.

Waldemar Marquart, a Swiss investigating judge, said that the submarine crew made a video film of the sunken plane to help salvage teams in their efforts to raise the aircraft today.

"On the basis of the (video) pictures it is quite clear that none of the people on board is still alive," Marquart said.

Ernst Sperl, a spokesman for the civil aviation authority, told The Associated Press earlier no hope of survivors existed.

It was not known why the plane crashed as it was preparing to land at Altenrhein, just over the border in Switzerland.

Game clears out bench, team

TERRE HAUTE, Ind. — Sasha Radunovich scored 18 points as Wichita State beat Indiana State 84-69 in the Missouri Valley Conference on Thursday after a first-half brawl left just four Indiana State players to complete the game.

Wichita State led 41-25 when Indiana State's Darrin Liles punched Radunovich with 1:46 left in the first half. The players collided as Liles was called for a foul.

The fight brought both team's benches onto the floor. Liles was thrown out of the game, along with nine of his teammates. Wichita State's John Cooper also was ejected for punching Liles.

Despite having just four players, Indiana State put together a 28-18 run to open the second half.

Two of the four Indiana players then fouled out leaving the team with no choice but fielding two players against Wichita's five.

Representative indicted

COLUMBUS, Ohio — U.S. Rep. Donald Lukens, a conservative Republican, was indicted Thursday on a misdemeanor charge that he had sex with a teen-age girl.

The charge stems from a meeting, secretly videotaped by a TV station, between Lukens and the girl's mother, who contended Lukens paid for sex with her daughter four years ago when the girl was 13 and again last November.

The four-term congressman was charged with contributing to the unruliness and delinquency of a child. The offense carries up to six months in jail and a $1,000 fine.

A state grand jury accused him of having sex with the girl on Nov. 6, when she was 16, in his Columbus apartment.

Car swallowed by street

ST. LOUIS — A 20-foot hole opened up in a street and swallowed a car, leaving two people hospitalized Thursday.

Firefighters used ladders to climb into the 15-foot-deep hole and rescue Charles Robinson, 58, and Marcella Calvin, 29, who were in satisfactory condition at St. Louis University Hospital.

A 20-by-20-foot section began to give way as a bus traveled over the spot Wednesday, firefighters and witnesses said. The car was behind the bus and fell in, witnesses said.

The cause of the collapse was not immediately known, authorities said. The collapse caused a natural gas leak that took two hours to repair.

Man killed, officers suspended

MADISON — A man was shot and killed in Greenwood County Thursday afternoon as a Kansas Bureau of Investigation agent and two sheriff's deputies were attempting to serve three felony warrants, a KBI official said.

Dave Johnson, the KBI director, said in Topeka that the law enforcement officers were not hurt.

He said he did not know how many shots were fired or who fired them, but did say the KBI agent has been suspended with pay while the incident is being investigated, which he described as a normal, routine procedure.

Johnson did not release the name of the dead man, whose body was sent to Wichita for an autopsy.

Judge declares fetus a person

LAWRENCE — A fetus destroyed during an abortion was legally a person whose parents can sue for damages for its pain and suffering, a Douglas County judge has ruled.

District Judge Michael Malone issued the ruling Wednesday in a case involving Brenda and Bennie Humes. The couple filed suit in 1987 against Dr. Dale L. Clinton of Lawrence and Alza Corp., a California manufacturer of an intrauterine birth control device that Mrs. Humes had been using.

The suit contends that the doctor and manufacturer were negligent in not making clear the effective life of the device. According to ruling, it was put in place on June 4, 1985, following an earlier abortion performed by Clinton.

The IUD contained the female hormone progesterone, which was released over a period of time.

Man pleads guilty to battery

LAWRENCE — A man who police said bit a woman at a Lawrence church last year pleaded guilty to an amended charge of attempted battery Thursday.

Larry Tubbs, 29, entered the plea before Douglas County District Court Judge Jean Shepherd. He was sentenced to 30 days in jail, but the sentence was suspended to time served.

Tubbs originally was charged with battery and criminal damage. He had been found competent to stand trial Wednesday after originally being found incompetent and spending time at the Topeka State Hospital.

He also was ordered to pay restitution to the victim, who was bitten on the leg and stomach while attending services at Second Christian Church last November, police said.

Stereotypes, AIDS topic of discussion

By Robert Short
Staff Writer

"(AIDS) is not a 'gay' disease. We have to deal with our own homophobia before we can deal with the disease."

Dealing with homosexuality and acquired immune deficiency syndrome as related to a family member was the topic of a presentation given by Beverly Barbo, Lindsborg, Thursday in the Union.

Barbo's son, Tim, died of AIDS Nov. 24, 1986 in Los Angeles, Calif., after a long illness. She now visits college campuses to share with students and faculty her experiences in dealing with the stereotypes associated with homosexuality and the treatment of an AIDS patient.

More than 100 students, faculty and staff attended the presentation sponsored by the Dean of Student Life, United Campus Ministry, Catholic Campus Ministry, Lutheran Campus Ministry and American Baptist Campus Ministry, said The Rev. Don Fallon, coordinator of religious activities and a member of the communicable diseases committee.

"We have felt a need to be more open and accepting to a person of a different sexual orientation," Fallon said. "We felt it important to be able to respond with compassion, not only as a University but as a student."

A person's sexuality is present before birth, Barbo said. Because they have a different sexual orientation does not necessarily mean they lead a different lifestyle than the "average" person.

"The homosexual is not another species," Barbo said, quoting from her book, The Walking Wounded. "He has the same stresses as his co-workers who are straight."

A stigma surrounds homosexuals in today's society, Barbo said. Many men have never been able to return home after their families discover they are homosexual. And homosexuals who contract AIDS are in a worse situation, particularly if the families are unsupportive or do not have insurance, she said.

Witness testimony continues

Contra leader testifies for prosecution at North trial

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Nicaraguan rebel leader Adolfo Calero testified Thursday in Oliver North's criminal trial that he hadn't expected North to make personal use of any of the $90,000 Calero gave him to help free American hostages in Lebanon.

"I had absolute trust in what Colonel North was doing so I was not intent in demanding an accounting" for the money, Calero said. "He said that he had an accounting. We talked about getting it, but I guess I never got around to it."

Prosecutor John Keker asked Calero if he expected North, who is charged with taking $4,300 of the money, to spend any of it on himself.

No, said Calero.

Calero, one of the top leaders of the Nicaraguan rebels, known as Contras, testified that he gave North the funds in traveler's checks after the White House aide "mentioned the need to help rescue Americans held hostage."

The money came from a Miami bank account that had received $32 million in deposits in eight months after Calero gave North the account number, he testified.

The money began flowing in, he said, in June 1984, soon after official United States financial support for the Nicaraguan guerrillas stopped.

"I informed Colonel North of everything I did," Calero said. "He was the one who listened to all our laments, to all our problems."

Calero, who was president of the Nicaraguan Democratic Force — FDN — was the second prosecution witness at North's trial. As he waited to take the witness stand, Calero did not look at the defendant, who was staring at him intently.

The leadoff witness, Rep. Lee Hamilton, D-Ind., testified he had not known at the time about Reagan administration solicitations of help for the Contras from other countries in return for increased U.S. military and economic aid.

Hamilton said he didn't know then that Secretary of State George P. Shultz asked an Asian country to provide communications equipment to the Contras because the rebels' devices were antiquated.

Japan, world bid farewell to Hirohito

By The Associated Press

TOKYO — The world's royal and powerful joined Japan today to bid a final farewell to Hirohito, the emperor-god who was made mortal by a disastrous war and died in January after a reign of 62 years.

Nine Shinto priests in white robes waved holy branches Thursday to purify the mausoleum in a hilly wooded area where the former Son of Heaven will be buried.

Dawn broke under gray skies today, and a light rain fell on the Imperial Palace as priests performed a private Shinto rite inside that began 13 hours of funeral ceremonies.

Heads of state including President Bush, royalty and other representatives of 163 countries were present for the funeral, protected by 32,000 police.

The officers checked cars and patrolled streets in case of attacks by foreign terrorists or by Japanese radical groups that threatened to disrupt the ceremonies.

Police in Nagasaki said a letter containing a bullet and a death threat was sent on Wednesday to Mayor Hitoshi Motoshima, who had said Hirohito bore some responsibility for for World War II. The mayor was in Tokyo for the funeral.

Opponents of the imperial system held at least three peaceful rallies Thursday evening.

Hirohito, who died of cancer Jan. 7 at age 87, presided over the rise of Japanese militarism, the crushing defeat in World War II and a remarkable postwar transformation into one of the world's leading economic powers.

Ghost from 1960s finds little improvement

Commentary

Doug Folk
Collegian Columnist

During the past couple of months, I'd been awakened during the night by the sounds of footsteps, heavy breathing, moaning, chains rattling, etc. Now, I always assumed these were simply signs that my neighbors were having a good time. But last week I began to suspect that my place was haunted.

I'm not sure what finally tipped me off. I think it must have been the green ectoplasm oozing from my microwave. Or maybe it was when my Cheerios transformed into a bowl of quivering maggots. But I was pretty sure something a little out of the ordinary was going on.

One night, when things were getting out of hand, I decided I'd had enough. I jumped down off my bed, which was currently hovering about six feet above the floor, and phoned the Riley County Police. Unfortunately, I was informed there were no officers available, as they were all busy scouring the Aggieville bars for under-age drinkers. It looked like another night of playing the home version of Poltergeist II.

The next morning I grabbed the Yellow Pages, looking for someone who could help me with my dilemma. A listing under "Mediums" caught my eye. I jotted down the name and address, jumped in the Monte, and headed for Madame Vortelli's Crystal Ball and Grill.

"Come in, my dear," a black-haired Gypsy lady said as she peered at me from behind the counter. "What'll it be? A patty or your palm read? Fries or your fortune? Come now, don't be shy."

"Actually, I've got some pesky ghosts I need to get rid of," I said.

"Oh, splendid, splendid. But let's try talking to them first. There might be a reason they're bothering you. I haven't held a good seance in months. Just give me your address, and I'll be there at 11:45 tonight."

"You mean I'll miss some of Pat Sajak?" Rats.

I knew someday I'd find a use for those four-for-a-dollar Wal-Mart Christmas candles.

The light flickered eerily on my Spuds MacKenzie poster, and the shadow cast by the lava lamp on the TV danced wildly on the wall. The stage was set. Tonight, I would confront my unwelcome roommate.

"Spirits, spirits. Speak. Speak to us. Why are you troubled? Why are you here?" Madame Vortelli asked.

She clutched my hands across the table, then threw her head back. Low grumbling noises emanated from her throat. At first, I thought she might have eaten one too many of her burgers, but then it hit me like Old Spice on a razor-burned face — it was the ghost speaking through her.

"Who's there, man? Who am I talkin' to?" the spirit asked in a decidedly un-spiritlike voice.

"It's me, the guy who lives here. You know, the one whose furniture you've been tossing around. Who are you?" I asked.

"My real name is Gerald, but you can call me Moonbeam." he said. "I was a student at K-State in the '60s, man. I was on a heavy acid trip and tried to fly off the Anderson spire. Gravity, man. A real downer."

"So why are you back after all this time?" I asked. "And why all the spooky mumbo jumbo?"

"Well, ya see, man, I was heavy into the peace thing before I died, and I really wanted to see how far the world had come. I had to do all that other stuff to get somebody's attention," he said. "So like, tell me, how are things on good old mother Earth?"

"I don't suppose things are too much different than when you died," I said. "We finally pulled out of Vietnam. In fact, it's the latest hip thing to be 'aware' of Vietnam."

"Far out! So all the world lives as brothers and sisters now, right? Living off the land, freely expressing themselves, living in peace — all the ideals we worked for."

"Well, not exactly," I said. "Actually, things kind of took a funny turn in the '70s, and the '80s are a little, well, stiffer than you might envision."

"Stiff, you mean, like (cough, cough) conservative?"

"That's about the size of it," I said.

"So, the suits won out after all, huh? But what about the kids?" he asked. "America's youth will always fight the crooked establishment, man. How did Mr. Authority manage to stifle the idealistic college students across the land?"

"BMWs."

"What?"

"They found something that runs deeper than any of those ideals of peace or brotherly love you were talking about. Greed."

"You mean they bought 'em off?" he asked. "Aw, man, very bad trip."

"Yep, for $30,000 a year it's awful easy to forget about the world's problems," I said. "It's hip to be Republican, now."

"So we've still got world hunger?"

"Uh-huh."

"And racism?"

"Yep."

"Homeless?"

"You got it."

"How about war?"

"All over the planet. Like I said, things haven't changed a whole lot."

"Wow. I wish I'd never tried to talk to you," I said. "I thought for sure we'd planted a seed back then."

"I think you did, but the next generation didn't water it. They were too busy with disco."

"What's ... ?"

"You don't want to know," I said.

"Well, I'll leave you alone, brother," he said. "I've got to get going. There's a Hendrix concert tonight at the Ethereal Amphitheater."

"Hey, Moonbeam, just out of curiosity, do you ever see Elvis anywhere over there?"

Duke's win in South disturbing indicator

The election of former Ku Klux Klan leader David Duke to the the Louisiana House of Representatives is both a sad and disturbing indication of the truth about American society.

America has Black History Month and Martin Luther King Day to tell the world it honors and is fighting for liberty, human rights and equality. The election of Duke is an action that reveals the truer dark beliefs of America and a contempt for the "celebration" of black heritage.

It reflects the sad fact that the majority of people who celebrate these dates are black. It also reflects propagation of a stereotype in the form of Willie Horton.

It is ignorant to say that Louisiana is the only state where racism exists. It is in the minds of people all over the country. The political party that offered up Willie Horton as a stereotype won the 1988 election.

And in Louisiana, encouraged by such subtle signals, blatant reality decided to throw off the pretty, but ineffective white lace cloak of American posturing. The voters in Louisiana realized it was see-through.

After 120 years of development, our country appears to be finally talking human rights, and not just minority issues. But it may take us longer than 120 years to finally believe what we are saying.

Rather than toss him aside and refute what he stands for, American society should reach underneath the cloak that only serves to cloud reality and expose all the racial problems.

Just as people must admit their own problems in order to talk about and cope with them, so must society.

Literary value of work lost in furor

Book causes holy frenzy

Commentary

Talat S. Rahman
Guest Columnist

Salman Rushdie and his novel "The Satanic Verses" are very much in the news. What has made this episode most sensational is the call by Ayatollah Khomeini to murder Rushdie and anybody else who contributes to the distribution of this book. Prizes of several million dollars have already been offered for these killings — all of this done in broad daylight, under the auspices of an established government.

Rushdie's only recourse was to the protection of the British police — and ludicrous statements have continued to pour from Iranian authorities.

So far in this dispute, the contents of the novel — some people, even in this country, seem to be unaware that this is a fictional work — and the author's world standing as a literary figure have not been acknowledged as worthy of serious attention. In fact, most people have no idea what the work is really about, except that it is in some way blasphemous to Islam and religion in general.

For an average contemporary Westerner, the whole affair is amazing, quite repulsive and shocking, but not really so surprising.

For some it confirms what they have suspected all along: Those Middle Easterners, particularly the Muslims, are a bunch of crazed fanatics — or "not yet civilized" peoples.

For others, the lesson is that the two cultures are so profoundly different, the gulf between them simply cannot be bridged.

For someone like myself, it is all too close to home — both Rushdie's writings and the repugnant reactions to which we are all witnesses. After all, Rushdie's writings are about people caught between two worlds. They are brilliant presentations of the inner conflicts of emigres from the Indian subcontinent, particularly of those whose roots lie in one or another Islamic soil.

The relevance of his vision, however, is not limited to people of this particular provenance: There is little doubt that he is one of the most important writers of our time, on a par with the likes of Gabriel Garcia Marquez, Milan Kundera and Gunther Grass.

But it is not, of course, the literary value of Rushdie's writings that is being discussed by the self-proclaimed "protectors of Islam." What is it, fundamentally, that has them in such a "holy" frenzy?

Westerners would be well-advised to pause before concluding that it is something so simple and basic as "Islamic" piety — as if "Christian" piety, say, was adequately represented by the convictions of the Ku Klux Klan, or the Pope, or Archbishop Romero of El Salvador, whose commitment to the interests of the poor of his country was rewarded with his assassination.

Granted, for the leadership in Iran, the "protection of Islam," is an opportunity to protect themselves from a careful examination of the devastation they have brought upon the families of the shaheeed (the martyrs in the jihad or holy war).

But for the common people, who they are able to mobilize in the streets — the crowds of men and women we see on our television as degraded mobs — the "protection of Islam" means something very different: The assertion of national identity and self-respect on the part of people long and harshly subjected to foreign interests, legitimized by the supposed superiority of foreign culture.

When we witness the spectacles we have been seeing, we need to remind ourselves of the costs that we all — the manipulated masses of Iran, the coerced governments of countries like Pakistan and India, the brilliant master of fiction, and those whose access to his works, and whose safety in travel is jeopardized — are still paying for this history of colonialism, which, to the sorrow of all of us, is not a thing of the past.

Citizens of the United States will want to ask themsleves how they relish the fact of a foreign power using force and fear to interfere with the freedoms they think themselves entitled to enjoy in their own country.

Citizens of countries like Pakistan now have the opportunity to open a discussion on what version of Islam ought to play what sort of role in the governance of the state.

Many of us, after all, have been brought up to believe that Islam is a tolerant and sensible religion, and that it is Islamic to exploit the Koran as a cover for one's aims to consolidate power over one's fellows.

ICC plagued with internal problems

Columnist questions adviser's actions

Commentary

Lucy A. Athanasius

Guest Columnist

"The source and root of all the evils which affect individuals, people and nations with a poison, and confuse the minds of many is this: ignorance of the truth and not only ignorance, but at times a contempt for, and a deliberate turning away from it." — Pope John XXIII, July 1959

Recently, something of a rather disturbing nature occurred during a meeting of the International Coordinating Council at K-State. Being a concerned member of the international community on this campus, I believe it is my duty to inform fellow members about the crisis at hand. After all, "If the world goes against the truth, then Athanasius goes against the world," (St. Athanasius, Bishop of Alexandria).

At this point, I would like to make it clear that I am not writing this in my official capacity as vice president of the International Club (which is not the same as the ICC) but rather as an ordinary, concerned member of the international community at K-State.

ICC is a student organization promoting "cooperation, understanding and fellowship among students of all nationalities irrespective of racial origin, color or creed, in KSU" (Article 2, section 1 of the ICC constitution).

The last meeting, however, contradicted this purpose due to the considerable amount of friction between several of the council's office-bearers.

I do not deny that this is serious, but the problem I wish to address makes this seem petty: I am concerned about the organization's adviser, Donna Davis.

Advisers, in my opinion, are needed for their objectivity and as guides to give advice without biases. ICC is ailed by one who lacks this vital element.

During the course of the meeting, Davis showed her inability to be level-headed and impartial with regard to the conflict between officers. She openly sided with one of the officers during the meeting while denouncing the other as her enemy, to use her own words: "I have a problem with you."

What we have here is definitely not impartiality. I'm sure we can all agree with Student Body President Laurian Cuffy that "a person in her position should be able to manage perspectives." This lack of professional detachment is, however, just the tip of the iceberg that threatens ICC.

It is to know that in Davis' 10 years as an adviser, which she says with much pride, she is still not familiar with the ICC constitution. In fact, she complained that the vice president had come to the meeting prepared and well-versed in the constitution while she had only a few minutes before the meeting to read it.

There is no excuse for advisers not to be familiar with the constitution of the organization they advise. How can one be confident and trust that the person is giving sound advice?

To further aggravate the situation, Davis did not even know about "Robert's Rules of Order," which is stated in Article 5, section 5 of the General Provisions of the ICC constitution as being, "the authority for questions on parliamentary procedure."

A Senate liaison officer to ICC had to inform her about them, then Davis later tried to refer to them as "... Roger's, er, what was it?"

If you think this is bad, what do you think of an adviser initiating not one, but two motions: To amend the constitution and to impeach that vice president with whom she has a personal vendetta?

Is this not, and I quote Cuffy, "totally out of line" for someone in her position?

I have described an adviser who lacks objectivity and who is ignorant of the group's constitution and parliamentary procedure. This is definitely a handicap for the ICC. But I have not quite finished. After all, what is a cake without the icing, or for that matter what is MADD without a drunk driver?

I am talking about a person inebriated with a tenure of 10 years and the illusion of power. Once again I refer to Davis.

In the procedures that occurred with regards to the appointment of a new director of international affairs, four students applied for the post. Only three of these were interviewed.

Why? Because of the pressure being exerted by Davis on the student body president.

Speaking with Cuffy, I was informed that in his position he should not have to be pressured into doing things.

Even more, in a meeting with the Student Senate on Feb. 2, Cuffy said: "There is so much stuff going on at ICC. There are lots of problems we have to work through and I was being pressured from the adviser to appoint ... a candidate she was in favor of."

Cuffy did not succumb, but appointed a neutral person.

To top this all off, Davis threatened the vice president of ICC: "After I get done with you, you won't have any friends in the international community. I am the adviser; when I speak they will listen to me, not you."

Are we talking about an adviser or a dictator?

Before I end this, I would like to say that I have nothing personally against the adviser. I think she does a rather good job in the Foreign Student Office.

What I am concerned about, however, is her conduct as adviser to ICC. I definitely think it is time, to quote Cuffy once again, that she re-evaluate her duties as an adviser.

Editor's note: Lucy A. Athanasius is a senior in public administration and Spanish. She is also vice president of the International Club.

Other Perspectives

The nation's overflow of garbage is unlike any other crisis. In the middle of a drought, people cut back on water. But people produce tons of trash no matter what.

A bill in the General Assembly could help combat the problem locally. The proposal would require all state government agencies, including Indiana University, to collect their paper products for recycling and to buy recycled paper products.

The bill would make IU's voluntary recycling program mandatory. Of IU's eight tons of garbage a day, about two tons are taken to Stone Belt Council for Retarded Citizens Recycling Center. The rest goes to Anderson Road Landfill, which is filling up fast.

Non-revenue fees

Editor,

With all the hoopla that has been raised concerning the proposed athletic fee, I wonder if anyone has even tried to resolve the need for additional money in the "non-revenue" sports programs through another means.

It's possible that being a new student at K-State, I just don't know where to find out about these events, but I was angry while reading an article on Ahearn Field House to discover that a track meet had been held.

These sports events cannot be attended by the students if they don't know about them.

Didn't anybody think students would come to watch the Lady Cats play against the Jayhawks without giving them free tickets? If this event and others had even a nominal admission fee charged and was advertised more, then the receipts from admission would reduce if not eliminate the need for the proposed fee.

When the Collegian asked what readers would like to have in the paper, many students that I know replied: more information about campus happenings. I agree.

In last Tuesday's paper, for example, out of approximately 1,000 column inches of space available (not .including classifed advertisement page or the Valentine's page) only 160 inches of space was devoted to campus news.

Every day the Campus Bulletin section has about 10 to 15 inches of meeting information. Why can't the athletic department have a similar section on the sports page for athletic events of the week so we can plan and attend? Our lesser known 'Cats need support and the home field advantage too.

The KSU Athletic Department isn't the only one that needs additional help and recognition. Tuesday's paper recognized the upcoming drama competition in Lawrence and the performance put on Wednesday night by the Ebony Theatre to earn money to help defray expenses, but not a word was said about the other students in the competition or their benefit performance on Sunday for their expenses.

Not only this, but how many people on campus can tell you what the national ranking of the debate team is? The last that an acquaintance of mine knew, it was second.

K-State is supposed to be an institution for learning. If the University is going to take money from the students, that money should be spent for the advancement of its primary purpose — for example, new books in the library — not for something that may be able to generate funding a different way.

If a fee must be charged, spread the money throughout all the university's various non-revenue activities.

Actions insulting

Editor,

I am gravely disappointed that there has not been widespread outcry in the so-called free world over Ayatollah Khomeini's bounty on the lives of the author and publishers of "The Satanic Verses."

Those nations that profess to value free speech, such as the United States, ought to view this tactic as an insult to their sovereignty, for it is an attempt to deny every citizen of any of these nations of his rights, even in his own country.

It is no less than an act of war.

Freedom lovers everywhere must let the world know we will not be bullied into giving up our basic liberties. Khomeini should be forced to take back the threat or die.

After all, who has insulted whom in this matter?

Consider the impotence of Allah if he must depend on the Ayatollah and his henchmen to be his instruments of justice. There is the insult.

Let Allah be his own defender. If by saying this, I insult Islam and gain a place on Khomeini's hit list, I stand behind my statements in complete lack of confidence in my government's willingness or ability to defend or avenge me.

That major bookstores throughout the United States have been intimidated into removing this book from their shelves is testimony to their lack of faith in our government's commitment to the defense of the rights of its citizens.

As long as the government remains silent and passive such doubts are well-founded. I know I am not alone in defying Khomeimi, or anyone else who would silence the world with threats.

Cheating not test

Editor,

In response to Lara Dillinger's letter Tuesday, stating that she was appalled students destined to become teachers would lower themselves to, dare I say, cheat on a test — I would like to thank her for saying something that needed to be said.

But before we send all those students to the hell which is destined for other cheaters like Adolf Hilter and Billy Tubbs based solely on her one-sided reporting, let the facts be known.

Fact No. 2: No other authority figure walked back into the room during the entire testing period.

Wouldn't everyone at least think about cheating? It's not like the students schemed to attempt to cheat on the test. There simply wasn't anyone to make sure they didn't cheat.

I am not in any way condoning the action. Nor am I playing the part of judge, jury and executioner, condemning all who might have cheated to a life of driving the big rigs as opposed to possibly becoming a good teacher.

Now, if you subscribe to the Dillinger theory, then all those who cheated should not be allowed to become teachers because they do not have high moral values as do other great individuals like George Washington.

But the point I am trying to make is that one does not have to be a saint to become a good teacher and set a good example. Those who considered cheating might be just as good or better teachers. They will be more likely to relate to students and to allow them to have fun in the classroom instead of making it into the Jerry Falwell School of Morality.

In closing, let me restate that I am not condoning cheating and I am not blaming the regular classroom instructor.

Dillinger stated that those who cheated should reconsider their choices. Well, maybe she should reconsider her perception of reality.

Perhaps not everyone is as morally and ethically upstanding as Dillinger would like, but I do not believe that looking at a textbook during a test, in which there was no authority figure, should be a litmus test to determine the quality of a future teacher.

Thanks for support

Editor,

I would like to start this letter by thanking the community of Manhattan for the continuous support received since 1987 when my health problems began.

I have spent many hours between hospitals for different medical reasons, such as ear infections and surgeries, bone cancer and surgery. I was at the University of Kansas Medical Center, Memorial Hospital, The Saint Mary Hospital, and Stormont-Vail Regional Medical Center, and during the toughest times people here have shown compassion and demonstrated how much they cared.

Prayers were said in many churches here in town. I received cards, phone calls and flowers from people who personally knew me and by others who had only heard about me and were willing to brighten up my days in the hospital. These people were a part of me during those times and I'm sure they will have a reward in heaven.

I also have received great support from this University: from the faculty and staff in the great College of Education, the library, Lafene Student Health Center, the Financial Aid office and from other people who work in different departments here at K-State.

I'm also grateful to the Manhattan Medical Center staff and the Memorial and Saint Mary hospital staffs for their wonderful care and the many times they stood by me by trying to bring company and help with the struggle we face while in the hospital.

I cannot leave behind the three churches here in town which demonstrated great compassion and were there ready to help: my church, the Grace Baptist Church; the Westview Community Church; and the First Christian Church. In each of these churches were many people praying for me and many of them did not even know who I was.

I feel that I have been blessed by God by living here. It is like striking the jackpot. It sure is difficult for anyone who leaves behind family and friends to come to another community and live there, especially for us international students who come from many parts of the world, with different cultural, ethnic, social, religious, and educational backgrounds to a community almost pure in diversity like Manhattan.

I would like to acknowledge each member of this community in a special way for their efforts to receive many people from other lands near Kansas, and many other countries in the world, and how they make us feel welcome and at home.

I am sure many other people here feel the same about Manhattan and its people. May God our Lord bless each of you in a very special way, and may he hold you in the hollow of his hand.

Phobias result in 'irrational' avoidance

Anxiety disorders limit rational behavior

By Jodi Johnson
Collegian Reporter

Horror movies, spiders or darkness may make an individual uneasy and scared. But for some people, leaving home can be a frightening experience, an anxiety disorder that limits rational behavior.

It may not simply be fear, but a phobia.

"Phobias are the irrational avoidance of things such as objects, situations or activities," said Dorinda Lambert, clinical coordinator of University Counseling Services.

"Just having a fear of something isn't necessarily considered a phobia," Lambert said. "Phobias involve extreme avoidance. For example, (people) may just be afraid of dogs because they have been bitten by one in the past. Whereas, someone with a phobia may be afraid of all furry animals and will go to the extreme of avoiding going places in fear that there may be some kind of furry animal there."

Phobias are an irrational form of behavior, said Mark Barnett, professor of psychology.

"(Phobics) realize they shouldn't be afraid of the spider or the snake or heights," Barnett said. "But when a person is afraid of heights and is standing on top of a building, (the experience) is upsetting enough to them that the behavior is irrational. Though they know they shouldn't be afraid, they still are."

Phobias are classified in three general categories, Lambert said. Agoraphobia is the persistent fear of public places. Social phobias are the fear of situations in which the individual fears embarrassment or humiliation by others. Simple phobias are the fear of objects or situations — such as the fear of heights (called acrophobia), the fear of dogs, or the fear of being away from home.

The counseling service deals with some phobia cases, but the incidents are not common, she said. Phobias experienced by people in a campus setting include fear of public restrooms or fear of crowded places.

"These kinds of phobias can be a very limiting problem for a student who has to go to a lot of classes and is afraid of being in crowded places," Lambert said.

About 5 percent to 8 percent of the population is phobic, Barnett said. However, phobias limit the daily activities of 2 percent of the phobic population.

The onset of a phobia can occur at any time, he said.

"Someone who has a fear of snakes and is living in New York City doesn't have much to worry about," Barnett said. "But if that person suddenly gets a job offer in Arizona, where there are snakes, that person's phobia may keep him from taking the job."

The most common type of phobia is agoraphobia — related to panic attacks, he said.

"(Phobics) fear that when they are among people in a public place, they will become disabled and they won't be able to find their way home. They experience a terrible panic attack," he said. "This problem may slowly force them to stay at home and eventually they become housebound."

Psychotherapy is used for phobias that may be the result of a deep-seated problem, Barnett said. The most common type of treatment is behavior modification.

"There are many types of behavior modification," Barnett said.

The most common is systematic desensitization. The doctor outlines a hierarchy of fearful situations, while the patients relax and imagine themselves in the situations, he said.

"The idea of this treatment is to keep the person calm while he is imagining himself in the fearful situation," Barnett said.

Fears may be learned during childhood from parents or others. For example, if children pick up a spider and their parents tell them not to play with it, the children learn to associate fear with the object, he said.

Some statistics state phobias are more prevalent in women, Barnett said. However, the statistics may be sex-biased.

"Females tend to seek out help more often than men," he said. "Males tend not to admit their fears and don't seek help as often."

VIDEO ADVENTURER

Student own's library of 3,000 movies

The video craze has been sweeping America in the past few years, but Roy Patrick, sophomore in human development, has taken it more seriously than most.

In 1977, while in the Army, Patrick was riding a motorcycle when he was hit by a car. As a result of his ruptured knees and a disc in his back, he was listed as a disabled vet. Unable to work or attend school, he became a video buff. Twelve years, two wives and 28 surgeries later, he had collected more than 3,000 movies.

"(When I was injured) I used to rent 10 movies a day and watch every one of them," said Patrick, 34. "When you're in pain you don't sleep much and you need something to take your mind off of it (the pain). There isn't much else to do."

Patrick bought a video cassette recorder in 1977 (costing $1,257 then) and started recording movies from Home Box Office and Showtime cable channels and buying movies at sales.

"I have movies I haven't even watched yet," he said.

He has about 1,500 movies at home and has given or lent the other 1,500 to friends and relatives.

"I lend them out to my friends or anyone that asks me," he said. "When I started recording, it wasn't illegal to rent what I had, but now it is."

Patrick lived in Van Nuys, Calif., near Hollywood, as a child. Because his mother dated the guitarist for Ike and Tina Turner, he had the privilege of attending parties at the Turner residence. During this time, he met stars such as John Wayne, Sonny and Cher Bono, Ray Charles and Lou Ferrigno. These experiences, he said, added to his interest in movies.

"(However) I've always been interested in movies," he said.

Each of his videocassettes has about three movies on them. At the cost of $5 to $7 for a blank videocassette and the cost of his first VCR, Patrick's hobby may seem expensive — especially since he has bought two additional VCRs. But he said by purchasing video equipment at discount stores he saves money, and during a 12 year period, it all accumulates at a moderate cost.

"It would cost a lot of money to buy all this equipment at one time," he said.

Patrick's collection includes a large variety of movies. His favorites are musicals such as "Camelot" and "The Music Man." In addition, he said he has movies that are appropriate for each of his four children to watch that are educational, animated, musical, horror and drama films.

"There are some movies I don't let the kids watch by themselves because they won't understand what's going on," he said. "I try to watch those movies with them."

His wife LeeAnn, senior in theraputic recreation, supports his hobby because he enjoys it and it's a family project.

"He taught the kids how to run the VCRs, but I usually stay away from them," she said. "I would probably break one."

Sometimes his children have friends spend the night and Patrick sets up the machines so they can all watch movies, he said.

Despite the vast array of film as his disposal, he said he still enjoys going to movie theaters and renting movies from video stores.

"You can usually tell when a movie is going to come out on video because they start playing it at the dollar movie theatres," he said.

Patrick said it's convenient to own a wide variety of movies, so in bad weather the family members can enjoy themselves at home.

By recording movies, he said he doesn't have to hassle with advertisements and video stores. In addition, he's available when the movie is scheduled to start.

Some rental tapes have a preventive microchip in them so that they can't be taped, he said.

"HBO video rental tapes have this chip in them. Now I have to record the movie off of the HBO or Showtime cable channels."

Patrick's video library is in his basement next to the master bedroom. There he has two VCRs, so he can record from a comfortable position, he said.

The VCRs are connected to the upstairs living room television so the whole system is controlled from the master bedroom. In the future, he said he wants to connect each of his children's TV's to his VCR so they can all watch the same videos in their own rooms.

Although Patrick is also a video game and computer enthusiast, he said his main hobby is his family.

"I'd spend time with my family before I watched a movie," he said. "Sometimes I get to do both at the same time."

Vintage jazz performers set for McCain

By Doug Fall
Collegian Reviewer

For the past 16 years, a jazz band founded by New York orthodontist and jazz authority Al Vollmer has been touring the United States and Europe. The Harlem Blues and Jazz Band's first performance in Kansas will be at 8 tonight at McCain Auditorium.

The members of The Harlem Blues and Jazz Band are veterans of the jazz heyday of the 1920s and 30s. The average age of the band members is 70. This vast amount of talent allows them to capture the authentic sound of yesteryear and pass it on to the next generations.

"One of my main goals is to have these musicians' contributions to this art form recognized and respected in their lifetime," Vollmer said.

His intense love for the music led him to contact Clyde Bernhardt in 1973, a member of King Oliver's band. Together they formed a group, which has varied in size from seven to nine musicians, to pursue jazz's revival.

> "One of my main goals is to have these musicians' contributions to this art form recognized and respected in their lifetime."
> —Al Vollmer jazz authority

Each member was receptive to the idea of forming a band, Vollmer said.

Today the band consists of John Letman on trumpet, Candy Rose on trombone, George Kelly on tenor saxophone, Charlie Bateman on piano, Al Casey on guitar, Vishnu Wood on bass, John Blowers on drums, and vocalist Laurel Watson.

The amazing aspect of this line-up is that these musicians have actually played and recorded with such jazz greats as Louis Armstrong, Duke Ellington, Count Basie, Nat "King" Cole, "Fats" Waller, Frank Sinatra, Billie Holliday and Benny Goodman. Their list of credits include almost every jazz band of the 1920s and 30s.

The group arrived at its name because Vollmer wanted to include the heritage of the Harlem jazz bands, but the name does not mean all the members hail from New York.

Vollmer, who serves as the band manager while also practicing orthodontics, has led the group across the globe. The band has played extensively in the United States, in every Western European country, and in several Communist-bloc nations, including East Germany.

One of Vollmer's most unique experiences with the band was encountering the barriers posed by customs agents as they left West Berlin and entered East Berlin. He said that despite their "childish" precautions, the East Germans were quite friendly once the band was able to travel farther into the country.

Another of Vollmer's goals for the band is to perform in the Soviet Union. The band had made plans to travel to Russia, but they were canceled at the last minute, he said.

The jazz practiced by The Harlem Blues and Jazz Band is different than the contemporary jazz and jazz fusion of today. Vollmer said today's form of jazz does nothing for him emotionally, which is one reason he prefers the vintage music of the jazz era.

The band's efforts are definitely exposing jazz to a wider audience, he said, adding that the younger generation is starting to pick up on jazz more than it had in the past.

Whether or not jazz experiences a revival, The Harlem Blues and Jazz Band will bring with it years of experience tonight to McCain Auditorium. Student tickets are $10 and general public admission is $14.

'Cats look to avenge loss to O-State

Contest key in league race

By Mike Goens
Sports Writer

Be prepared for a good, old-fashioned shoot-out when K-State takes on Oklahoma State at 1:10 p.m. Saturday in Bramlage Coliseum.

K-State and Oklahoma State are battling it out for third place in the Big Eight Conference. The third-place Cowboys are a game ahead of the 'Cats at 7-4 in the conference, while K-State is fourth at 6-5.

Oklahoma State upset seventh-ranked Missouri, 82-71, Wednesday in Stillwater. The Cowboys used a 14-2 run and 10 straight points with about five minutes left to overcome a 69-68 Missouri lead.

The 'Pokes were led by Thomas Jordan with 19 points and six rebounds, Darwyn Alexander with 17 points and six assists, and Richard Dumas with 16 points and seven rebounds.

"They played Missouri very well," K-State coach Lon Kruger said. "They have a collection of young players who are very dominant. They are very athletic, very physical and punishing inside."

With almost 16 points a game, Dumas leads five Cowboys averaging in double figures. Jordan follows with 14 points a game, Byron Houston and Royce Jeffries average 13, and Corey Williams chips in 11. Alexander is averaging seven points a game, but is scoring 10 in Big Eight contests.

"I really like their guards," Kruger said. "Williams, Gaffney and Alexander have all done solid jobs."

"Oklahoma State is very tough inside, they are similar in ways to Oklahoma," said K-State guard Steve Henson. "Their guards are doing a very good job right now; they are definitely not a weakness."

The Cowboys are 14-0 this season in Gallagher-Iba Arena, but haven't fared so well on the road. Their only Big Eight road win came in Allen Field House against Kansas, not the easiest of places for a visitor to win.

"They are in the ballgames, even leading, and something happens late," Kruger said. "It's a lack of experienced leadership.

"It's a very important game. The standings are becoming jumbled with Missouri, Oklahoma State, us and Iowa State in the middle. It's a significant step for the NCAA tournament. We have three games left with two at home. We need to do well."

The game is not only significant for the NCAA tournament but also the Big Eight postseason tournament. The team finishing in third place in the conference will be in the opposite bracket from Oklahoma, while the fourth place team would meet the Sooners in the semifinals in Kansas City.

Oklahoma State beat K-State, 89-71, in the first meeting of the two teams in Stillwater. Houston was an intimidating force with 29 points, nine rebounds and five blocks. Fred McCoy led K-State with 23 points and 12 rebounds.

"Houston is still playing well. We have to pay him more respect," Kruger said. "He's an outstanding player. He's one of the top freshmen in the country."

"It was a combination of not fully realizing how tough Oklahoma State was and how difficult it was on the road," Kruger said of the first game with the Cowboys. "We've benefited from it, we've grown up a lot in terms of awareness. I'm sure that they'll go into the ballgame with more respect for Oklahoma State."

While Oklahoma State was upsetting Missouri, K-State was taking top-ranked Oklahoma to the wire down the road in Norman. Stacey King's three-point play with a minute left gave Oklahoma an 83-77 lead and made the hill a little too steep for the Wildcats to climb.

LaKeith Humphrey and McCoy led the 'Cats with 24 and 21 points. King and Mookie Blaylock topped the Sooners with 23 and 19 points.

"Fred had one of his better efforts. He covered well on the defensive end and worked hard in the post," Kruger said. "He's been pretty consistent throughout the conference season."

King had 16 of his points in the first half when Oklahoma opened a 52-41 lead, but he didn't score in the second half until five minutes were left.

K-State appeared to be on the verge of being blown out by a 21-12 run over the final 6:36 of the first half that gave the Sooners their 11-point lead at halftime. But K-State scored the first nine points of the second half to get back into the game at 52-50.

"Certainly disappointment is the initial reaction," Kruger said. "But I'm not disappointed by the effort of our kids."

OU shot 67 percent from the field in the first half, which didn't help the Wildcats' cause.

"We worked a little harder (in the second half) and made a game of it until the buzzer," Kruger said.

Oklahoma's full-court pressure also forced several Wildcat turnovers.

"We didn't quite get a handle on it," Kruger said. "We experienced what we needed to do to feel comfortable against Oklahoma."

"We did a pretty good job of taking it to them," Henson said. "The second half we did a better job defensively.

"We know Oklahoma will be in the championship game (of the Big Eight tournament). We would definitely like to be playing them."

The game was also an important one in terms of the NCAA tournament. Even with the loss, the 'Cats played well on national television.

"I don't know if it helps, but it sure doesn't hurt," Kruger said. "They look at quality of wins, and quality of losses. All of those things are considered, as they should be.

"We've gotten ourselves into a pretty good position," Henson said. "We do need the win, but we feel good where we are at."

K-State will end the season with a home tilt against No. 7 Missouri Wednesday at 8:05 p.m. in Bramlage Coliseum and then travel to Ames for a 1:10 p.m. matchup with Iowa State Saturday. The Big Eight Postseason Tournament opens with first round games March 10 at Kansas City's Kemper Arena.

Team effort goal at Big 8 indoor

By Chris Hays
Sports Editor

As opposed to most of the earlier indoor track meets, K-State coach John Capriotti will be looking for an all-out team effort today and Saturday at the Big Eight Conference Indoor Track Championships in Lincoln, Neb.

In the Wildcats' first five meets, Capriotti was looking more for individual efforts that would qualify the athletes for the NCAA Indoor Championships at Indianapolis next month. But this weekend he will be more concerned with team points, as he hopes both his men's and women's squads finish in the upper division of the conference.

"At the Big Eight meet, the No. 1 objective is to compete and earn points," Capriotti said. "This is a meet where the athletes will probably run more than they are used to running because of team points, so it's a lot harder to qualify (for nationals) in a meet like this."

The feature event for K-State will probably be the men's mile relay. The Wildcat men currently hold the Big Eight's season best time of 3:11.5, which missed the national qualifying mark by just .08 second. This weekend will also feature the return of quarter-miler Jeff Reynolds to the mile relay quartet.

"Nebraska has a nice facility, but no mile relay team has ever qualified for nationals there," Capriotti said. "Basically, this weekend we are more concerned with winning than with qualifying, and I think we have a great group of four that can do it."

Among the athletes who will be defending their Big Eight indoor title from a year ago will be Reynolds in the 600-yard dash and Kim Kilpatrick in the 55-meter hurdles.

"Kim is definitely capable of defending her Big Eight crown in the hurdles," Capriotti said, "and I also think that she is capable of competing for the win at nationals and becoming an NCAA all-American."

"I do feel a little bit of pressure," Kilpatrick said of being the defending champion, "but I try not to let that bother me and think of the things that I need to do and go through with it."

The K-State men were picked to finish fourth by the Big Eight coaches, but Capriotti said that may be a bit low and his squad could surprise a lot of people.

"As far as the men are concerned, Nebraska has to be the overwhelming favorite," Capriotti said. "But from there it will be a tough fight for second place between Iowa State, K-State and KU, so we're looking at the top three or four."

The Wildcat women were picked third by the Big Eight coaches, but K-State will be leaving a lot of athletes at home on the women's side due to injuries. The latest injury was suffered by freshman sensation Janet Haskin, who will not compete this weekend because of a stress fracture in her heel. Haskin is the Big Eight's leader in the 3,000 meters.

"Our women have suffered a lot of injuries, but I still expect them to finish in the top half of the conference," Capriotti said. "I don't think that there are that many teams that can leave that many points at home, with the exception of Nebraska, and still be in the top half."

Shot putter Dan O'Mara will be one of K-State's favorites. The senior has thrown three feet farther than any other Big Eight mark at 62-5 and owns one of the top three throws in the nation.

Capriotti said Ray Hill, who has already qauilified for nationals in the 55 meters, has a good chance to qualify in the 200 meters.

"If he wins the 200, he will have to make the qualifying time," he said.

Lady Cats still on bubble

By Mike Rouse
Collegian Reporter

Can the K-State women's basketball team make it into the NCAA postseason tournament?

Nobody knows for sure, so the Lady Cats must benefit from some key performances beginning with a win Sunday, when they travel to Stillwater to play the Oklahoma State Cowgirls in a 2 p.m. tipoff in Gallagher-Iba Arena.

Such a win would give the squad possession of second place in the Big Eight Conference going into the Big Eight tournament next weekend.

"A loss in Stillwater would give us a tie for third with Missouri and a win would give second outright," K-State coach Matilda Mossman said.

K-State, 17-9 overall and 7-6 in the Big Eight, beat Oklahoma State in the first Big Eight game of the year Jan. 11 by a score of 78-68. Nadira Hazim scored 24 points for the Lady Cats.

"The biggest disadvantage for both teams is that it is has been so long since we played each other," she said. "They are a different team and so are we."

Mossman said she knows Stillwater isn't the easiest place to play on the road. The Lady Cats haven't won in Stillwater since the 1984-85 season when K-State won 86-62 in the first round of the Big Eight tournament.

"It's awful difficult to win there, especially with them knowing that they can lock up second place by themselves if they win," she said.

Offense seems to be the biggest worry right know for Mossman, who said she believes her team must do what it is best at and not let Oklahoma State work on K-State's weaknesses.

"We have to be concerned with what our strengths are and use those to our advantage," Mossman said.

Hazim, who has been in a slight scoring slump the past two games, continues to lead the team in scoring, averaging 14.2 points a game. Diana Miller is at 12.7 and 6.5 rebounds a game, while Kristie Bahner is averaging 11.3 points and leads the team in rebounding with 6.8 a game.

Oklahoma State is 16-10 overall and 7-6 in the Big Eight.

Tennis team to face Arkansas, Iowa in weekend dual matches

By Carolyn Holcroft
Sports Writer

The K-State women's tennis team has a long weekend in store as they take on Arkansas in Ahearn Field House Saturday and then head east on Sunday to Topeka's Wood Valley courts to do battle with Iowa.

Both contests will be in the dual match format and Coach Steve Bietau expects a much higher caliber of competition than the Wildcats have seen this season. This is largely due to the fact that both Arkansas and Iowa may prove to have depth rivaling K-State's. He anticipates tougher matches in the lower positions of the line-up this weekend, which hasn't really been the case in K-State's earlier matches.

"Probably the biggest difference is that the teams we've played up to this point have all been fairly strong at the top but they drop off towards the bottom," Bietau said. "These (Arkansas and Iowa) are programs like ours that I think tend to be a little bit deeper. We've been getting some pretty quick points down at the bottom and winning easily down at five and six, and at No. 3 doubles."

This will be the first-ever meeting between K-State and Arkansas, but the Wildcat players did have the opportunity to watch the Razorbacks in competition last fall. Even though the two have never matched up against each other, Bietau still thinks he has a good feel of what to expect this weekend. He is also taking into consideration that Arkansas is coming off a close 4-5 loss to Oklahoma State.

"They've got a very good team," Bietau said. "If they were in the Big Eight, I'd say they'd probably be one of the top two or three programs."

Like Arkansas, Iowa will also be providing unfamiliar competition, as K-State hasn't seen it in a dual match since Bietau has been coaching the Wildcats.

Expected to start at the No. 1 singles spot is Marijke Nel. Claiming other singles spots will be Helen Scheldknecht, Sara Hancock, Valerie Rive, Theresa Burcham, and Emtell. If the line-up remains constant, Rive and Nel will be at No. 1 doubles, followed by Scheldknecht and Miste Bitner at No. 2, and Burcham and Hancock at No. 3.

The dual with Arkansas will start at 2 p.m. Saturday in Ahearn while Sunday's Iowa dual will begin at 9 a.m. in Topeka.

Baseball season to open

By Mike Goens
Sports Writer

The weather in St. Louis, where the K-State baseball team was supposed to open the season today, was not very cooperative this week, so St. Louis University's team decided to come west and will face the Wildcats in a single game at 3 p.m. today at Frank Myers Field. The two squads will play the final game of the two-game series at noon Saturday.

K-State was scheduled to open the 1989 season with a doubleheader last weekend against Friends University, but the games were canceled, so the Wildcats, as well as the Billikens, have yet to play this season.

"The playing field is in great shape and it looks like the weather is going to cooperate," K-State coach Mike Clark said. "Everybody's ready to go."

Senior Jeff Peterson will get the start today for the Wildcats, and senior Jim Haller will be on the mound Saturday.

"We are hoping to get five to six innings from our starters and then go from there," Clark said.

St. Louis is from the southern division of the Midwestern Collegiate Conference and posted an 11-29 record last season. Coach Bobby Hughes is in his first year there.

"He's a quality coach," Clark said. "St. Louis is a great baseball area, but they've never had anybody there to bring (recruits) in until now.

"Before, (St. Louis' baseball program) had been kind of a joke — everybody wanted to get them on the schedule. It was always an easy Division I win. But now they have somebody there that I think can do the job and you'll see a difference this year.

Sister charged in sister's death

Woman's bond increased from $50,000 to $100,000

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — The adopted sister of a popular teen-age girl found stabbed and beaten to death in her home over the weekend was charged with first-degree murder Thursday.

Shari Bierman, 20, is the third person charged in the slaying of 17-year-old Syndi Bierman, an honor student who was buried Thursday.

Shari was charged earlier with felony theft and helping two men escape who have been charged with murder. Mike Grosko, assistant Wyandotte County district attorney, said she still faces the earlier charges and her bond was increased from $50,000 to $100,000.

"Based upon the continuing investigation, we felt today we had enough information to charge her with a homicide," Grosko said.

Asked if he expected anyone else to be charged in Bierman's death, Grosko said, "Not at this time."

First-degree murder charges were filed earlier this week against Conrad Joseph Hernandez, 24, and Archie E. Owens Jr., 20. They were also charged with felony theft of items from the Bierman home.

Hernandez, identified as Shari's boyfriend, surrendered to authorities in Tulsa, Okla., Wednesday and was returned to Kansas City early Thursday. Owens and 18-year-old Tambi Lewis were still being sought Thursday.

Lewis, who was released last week from a juvenile facility where she spent two years for a homicide, was charged Wednesday with aiding a felon for helping Hernandez and Owens flee.

The FBI obtained fugitive warrants Wednesday from U.S. Magistrate Gerald Rushfelt of Kansas City, Kan., charging Owens and Lewis with unlawful flight to avoid prosecution. Frank Storey, special agent in charge of the Kansas City FBI office, said Wyandotte County had requested FBI assistance.

Police Sgt. John Bowman of Tulsa said Hernandez told officers that he parted company with Owens and Lewis on Tuesday after a disagreement over whether they should surrender. Bowman said Hernandez reported his companions were trying to hitch a ride near Tulsa when he left them.

The beaten and stabbed body of Syndi was found early Sunday in the bedroom of her home in Piper, an unincorporated Wyandotte County community of about 2,500 residents located 12 miles northwest of Kansas City, Kan.

Wyandotte County Coroner Alan Hancock said Thursday the autopsy on Syndi showed no evidence of sexual assault. He said any of several injuries could have caused her death, including stab wounds to her stomach and blood loss from a beating to the head. She was also stabbed in the throat.

Syndi would have graduated in May as a Kansas Honor Scholar, among the top 10 percent in her high school class. She was a member of the school volleyball team and student council, secretary of the Home Economics Club and Girls Athletic Association and a former member of the drill team. She had been a candidate for homecoming queen.

Classes at Piper Junior High and Piper Senior High were canceled Thursday so students could attend Syndi's funeral. More than 650 friends and relatives attended.

Captain guilty of neglecting duty

By The Associated Press

SUBIC NAVAL BASE, Philippines — A military jury found U.S. Navy Capt. Alexander Balian guilty of dereliction of duty for failing to help a boatload of Vietnamese refugees who later resorted to cannibalism to survive.

It acquitted him of ordering one refugee shaken off ropes as he tried to climb aboard the warship.

Balian, a highly decorated Vietnam War veteran, could receive confinment for three months and forfeiture of two-thirds of his pay for three months.

Balian, former commander of the amphibious landing ship USS Dubuque, was accused of failing to render adequate assistance to more than 80 Vietnamese boat people June 9 in the South China Sea, 230 miles north of the Philippine island of Palawan.

Study to examine custodial shifts

By Deborah Dinges
Collegian Reporter

In order to deal with alleged intimidation of custodial workers and problems arising from a shift change, Ed Rice, director of facilities management, has directed that a study be conducted examining all aspects of the shift change.

Supervisor for custodial operations Alvin Seely will conduct the study. Rice said Seely will compare the amount of work being completed on the new shifts with that of the other shifts. Seely will also talk to custodians, supervisors and building users and conduct visual inspections.

The study will be completed and recommendations made to Rice within 45 days, Seely said.

The custodial workers have been starting work at 4 a.m., two hours earlier than before, since Jan. 9. About 20 of the 30 workers affected expressed concerns about the problems they have encountered with the shift change to Kansas Association of Public Employees representatives, said Stanley Findley, chief steward of Chapter 11 of KAPE.

"The custodial workers are concerned about the shift because of the problems it is causing in their family and personal life," he said.

Some of the difficulties custodians are experiencing are disruption of family life, difficulty in finding childcare at the needed hours, difficulty in adjusting to the new hours, tiredness and inability to complete as much work, Findley said.

The problems prompted two meetings Thursday involving administrative facilities management, the personnel department, custodial workers affected by the shift change and local and national representatives of KAPE, he said.

Facilities management, personnel and KAPE representatives also discussed intimidation of custodial workers. Findley is concerned with the threats and intimidation the employees face on the job.

"There have been cases in the past that employees have been told — or it has been suggested to them — that if they join KAPE, things might be pretty tough for them on the job," he said.

Some custodial supervisors have put so much pressure on the workers that many of them are afraid to speak up for themselves, he said.

Findley cited a case in which a supervisor I was intimidated and embarrassed in front of other employees by her supervisor II to the point that she cried.

Facilities management representatives said they were unaware of these problems. Rice said no one had contacted him with any problems.

"To work with employees that are being intimidated we need to know who," he said. To pursue the issue, Rice said he needs to know the specifics, but up to this time he has had no complaints.

Jack Watson, assistant director of facilities maintenance, said he, too, was unaware of the problems.

Watson said within the last two weeks, he has worked out a solution for five custodial workers who have had difficulties adjusting to the new schedule.

Rice said facilities management is not leaving the issue untouched. It is sending the personnel to training program sessions held by the Association of Physical Plant Administrators and to K-State's personnel training program, which addresses both technical and personnel issues.

More than 300 facilities personnel attended a seminar on campus Wednesday concerning customer relations and public contact skills, he said.

"Our philosophy is that everyone has rights and should be treated with respect," Rice said.

Findley said he was satisfied with a meeting between facilities administrators and personnel, both of whom showed a willingness to deal with common problems.

"Facilities is realizing that KAPE is going to be involved when there are problems on the job with maintenance and service employees," Findley said. "This is the start of better communication between KAPE and the administration. They are more willing to listen to KAPE than ever before.

"Within a short time, I see better relations on both sides," Watson said.

Isenhour stressed the importance of recognizing distinguished teachers.

"We feel if we really encourage excellence in our teaching program it will set a standard for the entire University," he said. "There hasn't been such a recognition like this at the four universities I have been with."

President Jon Wefald said the awards re-enforce the University's goal to "put the student first."

"Every student in the University benefits from quality teaching in the College of Arts and Sciences," he said.

Jim Scally, assistant to the chancellor at the University of Kansas, said the amount of awards to be given "is unprecedented."

Scally said KU gives seven teaching awards to faculty at commencement, but faculty members from every college are eligible.

a fixed cost operation."

Tout said Lafene is already attempting computerization.

"We have $106,000 in accounts receivable, with a projected 25 percent of those being uncollectable," he said.

An account is uncollectable if it is less than $25 and the student leaves the University and never requests a transcript, Tout said.

Dissenting opinion was voiced regarding the bill.

"I am very against this bill, 62 percent of K-State students already have health insurance," said Barry Beck, business senator. "This bill will make health insurance at Lafene mandatory to KSU students. The mission of K-State is to educate. If we want to also provide health care, it should at least be cost effective for the majority of students."

In other business the Senate heard first readings of an athletic fee referendum bill.

The bill was presented to the Senate in three sections, the first of which set the cost of the fees to be paid by a full-time student at $15 per semester, and by part-time students at $7.50 per semester.

The next two sections set the terms for a referendum. Under the terms of the bill, if the bill goes to referendum undergraduate and graduate students will vote separately March 27 and 28.

Senate must approve the bill by a two-thirds majority for the question to go to the students in referendum.

CBS news show to broadcast live from Town Center

By Kevin Kramer
Staff Writer

Part of the the "Big Apple" is coming to the "Little Apple" this week. The CBS Morning News from New York will broadcast live at 7:30 a.m. Tuesday from Manhattan Town Center as part of a series "Malls in America," which focuses on shopping patterns.

"Manhattan Town Center was chosen for its architectural design and how it influences the customer's longevity in the shopping environment," said Chris Heavey, manager of Manhattan Town Center.

"The architectural experience of Manhattan Town Center has won national attention for its design," he said. "It has prompted Manhattan, New York, to come to come to Manhattan, Kansas, to look at those architectural designs."

During the scheduled eight-minute segment, CBS Morning News co-host Harry Smith will discuss with Mark Randol, president of Forest City Commercial Management Inc., how design plays a role in lengthening a shopper's visit after first drawing a customer into the mall. The interview will be a live remote with Randol walking through the Center while talking to Smith in New York.

Manhattan Town Center is the smallest of the 20 malls that are part of the Forest City Commercial Management Inc., based out of Cleveland, Ohio. It is also Forest City's only mall that is outside a prime market area, which is designated as having a metropolitan area of 300,000 people within a 15-mile radius.

"New York is coming here as a result of the achievement won by Manhattan Town Center, not to reconize us with an award," Heavey said. "It is an honor that Manhattan Town Center has been chosen."

"But, it is also a big honor for Manhattan. The Manhattan area, because of the recognition of Manhattan Town Center, will gain signif-

Largest heroin haul seized in New York

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — It wasn't like the "French Connection" heroin bust. There was no careening car chase, no "Popeye" Doyle cracking the case.

But agents who smashed a Hong Kong-to-Chinatown narcotics ring last week stumbled onto the largest heroin haul in U.S. history when they seized $1 billion worth of the drug packed in hollowed-out golf cart tires.

"This seizure is much bigger than the 'French Connection,'" said U.S. Attorney Andrew J. Maloney, who prosecuted some of the cases stemming from the drug ring that inspired the Oscar-winning 1971 film.

"The biggest seizure from the whole 'French Connection' was about 220 pounds. But this — everybody was amazed by the size of this seizure."

Federal authorities on the night of Feb. 20 hit three locations in the borough of Queens, grabbing 828 pounds of 90 percent pure heroin from Southeast Asia — enough to supply one out of every five U.S. heroin addicts for a year.

The amount of heroin was so big that when Assistant FBI Director James M. Fox arrived at his office Tuesday morning, he cautiously asked if a radio report he had heard was correct: Had 300 pounds of heroin really been seized?

"We didn't know if we were going to get just a couple of pounds (of heroin) or what when we went in," Fox said. "What a way to start the week."

Eighteen suspects were arrested in New York City and 13 in Detroit, Los Angeles, San Francisco, Chicago, Singapore, Hong Kong and Canada. Seized along with the drugs was $3 million cash.

Fox, putting the seizure in perspective, said the FBI had taken in a little more than 500 pounds of heroin in all of 1988. The celebrated Pizza Connection case, in which heroin was distributed nationwide through pizzerias, produced 18 convictions but no major drug seizure.

Operation White Mare — named for the heroin's color and its street name, "horse" — started with an informant's tip that Chinatown businessman Peter Woo, one of the 31 people arrested, was involved in drug trafficking, court papers indicated.

When the probe ended 18 months later, more than 100 law enforcement officials were involved and the FBI had taped more than 100 conversations between New York and Canada, Singapore and Hong Kong.

The FBI combed its offices across the country for Chinese-speaking agents to translate the wiretaps. Complicating the language barrier was a code used by the alleged dealers: Heroin was called "shrimp" or "vegetables," for example.

But there were tip-offs that the end

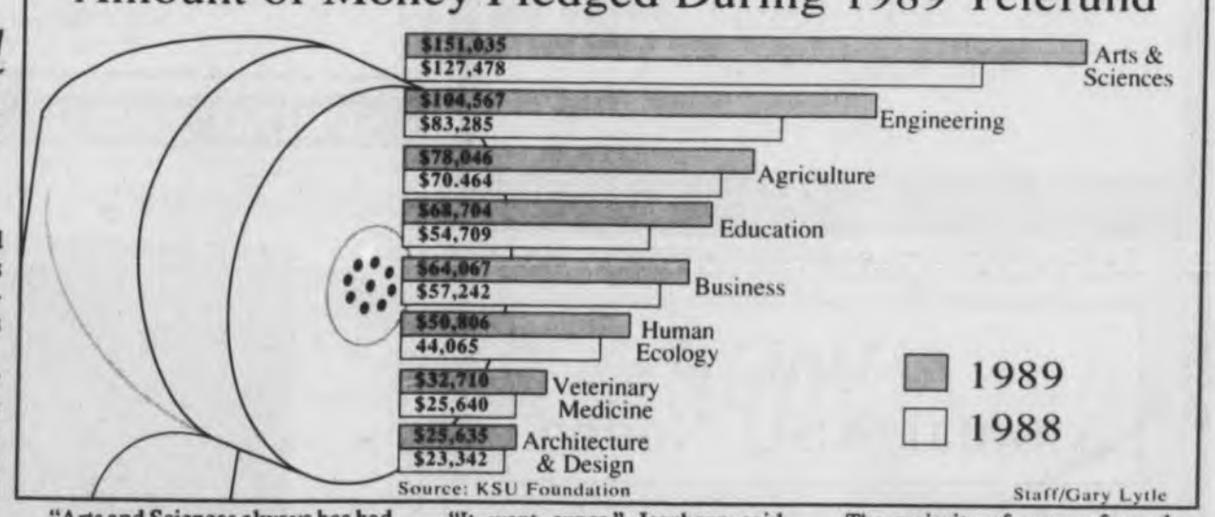
Telefund donations top goal

All colleges break record pledge totals



By Chris Koger
Staff Writer

All eight colleges received record numbers of pledges in this year's Telefund, making it the second consecutive year the fundraiser has raised more than $500,000.

About $575,570 was raised by more than 1,200 student and faculty volunteers during the academic portion of the Telefund, surpassing last year's academic total by almost $90,000.

"We had a goal of topping last year's total, and this amount is much more than we expected," said Beth Mennelle, assistant director of the Telefund.

The College of Arts and Sciences had the most pledge money with $151,035, Mennelle said.

"Arts and Sciences always has had the highest numbers, because that college has the broadest base of alumni, and has the most nights available to call for donations," she said.

Thomas Isenhour, dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, said he was "ecstatic" about the final figures.

"It went super," Isenhour said. "We're going to be able to do much more with the extra scholarship funds. I think it was a terrific statement of support from our alumni."

The College of Engineering had the largest percentage increase, 25 percent, in donations compared to last year, Mennelle said.

The Telefund ran from 6 p.m. to 10 p.m. Sunday through Thursday, beginning on Jan. 29. Colleges were allotted a number of nights according the alumni base.

Tower takes pledge not to drink alcohol

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Defense Secretary-designate John Tower said Sunday that he is not an alcoholic and issued an extraordinary pledge not to take a single drink if he is confirmed by the Senate to head the Pentagon.

As Tower defended his reputation in nationally televised interviews, Senate Armed Services Committee chairman Sam Nunn, D-Ga., accused the White House of leaking information from the FBI report on Tower and threatened to reopen the hearings on the nomination and subpoena anonymous witnesses quoted in the agency review.

The committee voted 11-9 along party lines last Thursday to recommend that the full Senate reject Tower's nomination, with Nunn citing allegations of excessive drinking by the nominee.

In his first interview since the vote, Tower denied that he was an alcoholic, and with his unusual promise sought to allay fears among his former colleagues and remove the obstacles to his confirmation.

The full Senate is expected to take up the nomination on Wednesday.

"Noting the principal concern of Senator Nunn and other members of the Senate relative to my confirmation as Secretary of Defense, namely the extent to which I may engage in excessive use of beverage alcohol, let me state that I have never been an alcoholic nor dependent on alcohol," Tower said in a statement he read on ABC-TV's "This Week With David Brinkley."

"I hearby swear and undertake that if confirmed, during the course of my tenure as Secretary of Defense, I will not consume beverage alcohol of any type or form, including wine, beer or spirits of any kind," he said.

Tower distributed copies of the statement after reading it on the air. Dated Saturday, it was signed by Tower and witnessed by his doctor at Baylor University, Dr. Warren Lichliter, and Department of Transportation Secretary Samuel K. Skinner.

Tower also vowed that if he broke his pledge not to drink, he would step down.

And following the interview, Tower was asked whether it would be all right for reporters to follow him, as they did former presidential candidate Gary Hart, whose bid for the presidency was derailed by his liaison with a part-time model.

"Look, a secretary of defense lives in a goldfish bowl. If anybody wants to put a tail on me, they can," Tower said.

In the interview, Tower read a portion of a letter from Lichliter that said tests conducted prior to his surgery to remove a colon polyp found normal liver functions and that there was no evidence of alcohol withdrawal following the operation.

"Based on this fact that can be stated with relative certainity, Senator Tower shows no evidence at all of alcoholic impairment or alcoholism," the letter said.

Tower conceded that there was a point in his life when he changed his drinking habits, and in an unprecedented display by a former senator, the onetime chairman of the Armed Services Committee and U.S. arms control negotiator, described his past lifestyle to the nation:

Bus crash kills 16 in Brazil

RIO DE JANEIRO, Brazil — A bus collided head-on with a truck in rural northeastern Brazil, killing 16 people and injuring 25, police said.

The bus was packed with 41 weekend travelers making a 30-hour, 1,116-mile trip from Irace in the northeastern state of Bahia to Brasilia, the capital, said Catalao Police Officer Jose da Silva.

The driver lost control of the bus on a hilly curve and swerved in front of an oncoming truck loaded with corn, he said.

"The scene was horrible," said da Silva, who assisted rescue workers. "The truck rammed the bus clear off the road and threw people over the drop that runs alongside the road. The dead bodies were mangled and crushed, and bleeding people were screaming out for help from the twisted wreckage."

Fourteen bus passengers, the bus driver and the driver of the truck died instantly, da Silva said. Two bus passengers died shortly afterwards at Catalao Hospital and six of the 25 injured are in critical condition, he said.

British strike against tunnel

LONDON — More than 10,000 demonstrators marched through central London Sunday to protest British Rail's proposed high-speed rail routes linking London with the Channel Tunnel, organizers and police said.

Residents representing almost every southeast England town and village that could be affected by the project joined the mass protest, the first demonstration against all four of British Rail's proposed routes.

People who live near the proposed routes say the rail link will hurt the environment, be a noisy eyesore and lower property values.

British Rail is expected to announce in early March which route it prefers for the trains, which will run at up to 180 mph.

Mayor recommends Dr. Seuss

BALTIMORE — Baltimore Mayor Kurt Schmoke is a Rhodes scholar, a graduate of Yale University and Harvard Law School. He runs a city.

But when three student reporters from an elementary school paper asked him: "What books are too good to be missed?" he paused, twisted his face into a reflective scowl and announced, "Green Eggs and Ham."

The Barclay School Bugle reporters scribbled the title of the Dr. Seuss work into their notebooks as the mayor added works by Mark Twain and Lewis Carroll to the list: "And, I think, 'The Adventures of Tom Sawyer.' And I told you my favorite is 'Through the Looking Glass,' so you have to read that, too."

Schmoke, who has declared Baltimore "The City That Reads," came to the Barclay School on Friday to help celebrate the school's "Reading Is Fundamental" program.

Secord arrested for DUI

RESTON, Va. — Richard V. Secord, one of four men indicted in the Iran-Contra affair, was arrested on suspicion of drunken driving early Sunday morning, police said.

Secord, a retired Air Force major general, was arrested after officers saw his car weaving on a highway, accroding to Fairfax County Police communications supervisor Pete Kirby.

Secord was taken to an adult detention center where he appeared before a magistrate, the spokesman said.

"He was fully cooperative with the officer and the magistrate and everyone involved," Kirby said. Kirby said he did not know whether a court date has been set.

Track star's car, vase stolen

NEW YORK — A car containing a $15,000 vase belonging to runner Jackie Joyner-Kersee was stolen from a Brooklyn parking lot while the track star was making an appearance in honor of Black History Month, police said Sunday.

The Olympic medalist was making an appearance at a grocery store Saturday afternoon when the car she was using was stolen, according to police and Terrie Williams, a spokeswoman for Joyner-Kersee.

Williams said the car contained a $15,000 Waterford Crystal vase that Joyner-Kersee was awarded Wednesday by the Sporting News as athlete of the year; another piece of crystal she received Friday at the Mobil Indoor Grand Prix track and field championship; her luggage; her husband's luggage; and the luggage of a representative from 7-Up, a sponsor of Saturday's event. The car was provided by 7-Up.

Kansas City fire kills woman

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — Fire swept through an apartment building early Sunday, killing one woman and critically injuring a man, authorities said.

Fire officials responded to a call about 5:15 a.m., said Dennis Cranor, public information officer for the Kansas City, Kan., fire department.

Loise Chewning, 37, died of smoke inhalation and burns, Cranor said. Charles Mayberry, 52, was listed in critical condition Sunday evening at the University of Kansas Medical Center with burns.

Cranor said another man, Richard Leverich, 60, was treated and released.

Vienamese to learn to wrangle

OMAHA, Neb. — Three Vietnamese will come to Nebraska to learn cattle wrangling skills in what a zoo director calls one of the most important wild-animal capture programs in recent history.

The three Vietnamese — a biologist, a physiologist and a veterinarian — will spend three weeks in April at Omaha's Henry Doorly Zoo learning ways to capture the nearly extinct kouprey, a wild ox native to Southeast Asia.

Biologists estimate that 50 to 100 kouprey, once thought to be extinct, might be living in Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia, now called Kampuchea.

Members of the Kouprey Trust hope to capture enough animals to establish a captive breeding herd, said Dr. Lee Simmons, project coordinator and director of the Henry Doorly Zoo.

Alumnus dies in car wreck

Capt. David Pate of the Wichita Police Department said Bales, 24, was driving a Ford Escort when he was hit head-on by a grey Toyota whose driver had crossed the center line while travelling at a high rate of speed.

The collision occurred on East Douglas and Circle Drive at about 11:35 p.m. Pate said the driver of the Toyota is suspected to have been under the influence of alcohol, but the results of the tests are not yet available. An investigation is pending.

Pate said a female passenger, whose name could not be released, was travelling in Bales' car and was taken to Wesley Medical Center, where she is listed in good condition.

The driver of the Toyota was also admitted to Wesley with a broken leg and multiple bruises.

Susan Giebler, junior in elementary education, said funeral services for Bales, who had a degree in advertising and public relations, will be 2 p.m. Wednesday at Campbell Funeral Home in Yates Center.

Blood drive falls short of goal despite record donor numbers

By Lance Schwulst
Collegian Reporter

Despite a record number of blood donors on the first two days of the bloodmobile, only about 1,100 pints of the 1,400-pint goal were donated, said Matt Fairchild, president of Delta Tau Delta fraternity. The Delts helped sponsor the blood drive.

"On Tuesday and Wednesday we had more donors than ever before on the first two days," said Amy Laughlin, coordinator of the Red Cross Bloodmobile. "Normally, we don't have over 300 (donors) on (each of) the first two days."

On Tuesday and Wednesday there were 312 and 302 donors respectively. On Thursday, the numbers began to drop.

"We were really up and now the numbers are down a lot," Laughlin said. "There has been the flu going around but it is mostly gone. I don't know why (the number of donors dropped)."

Because of the low number, she said bloodmobile workers had to turn volunteer workers away.

"I think I'd feel guilty if I didn't donate (blood)," said Ed Bobich, sophomore in environmental design and member of Delta Tau Delta Fraternity.

"I might need blood someday or someone in my family or my house," said donor Mark Nichols, sophomore in business administration.

Most of the members of Delta Tau Delta either donated blood or volunteer time, Bobich said.

He said Friday was the first time he had ever donated blood and the procedure was not as painful as he had anticipated.

"It didn't hurt half as much as I thought it would," Bobich said.

The Red Cross visits K-State once every semester, and Eddi Dunsworth of the Red Cross Blood Service Nursing staff said first-time donors have the most difficulties with the procedure.

"A lot of the first-time donors are nervous and uptight," Dunsworth said. "They listen too much to their friends' colorful war stories about donating blood."

All of the blood collected will be transported to the Regional Red Cross Blood center where it will be processed and distributed to hospitals, she said.

Jet accident investigated

By The Associated Press

HONOLULU — A failed lock may have caused a United Airlines jumbo jet's cargo door to pop open at 22,000 feet, ripping a huge hole up the side of the plane and sending nine passengers to their deaths, federal investigators say.

Damage to the plane is consistent with the cargo door popping open under pressurization of the cabin as the jet gained altitude and atmospheric pressure outside the aircraft declined, National Transportation Safety Board investigator Lee Dickinson said at a late Saturday news conference.

Coast Guard cutters and aircraft continued their search Sunday 100 miles south of here for more debris from the plane as more than 70 people, including 16 from the NTSB, investigated the cause of the accident.

United Flight 811, carrying 354 people, had taken off Friday for New Zealand and was about 100 miles from Honolulu when the fuselage ripped open over the Pacific Ocean. Nine passengers were sucked out and are presumed dead.

The pilot lost power in the one engine and shut down another when a fire indicator light went on, but the plane returned safely to Honolulu.

Two cutters returned to port Sunday morning with items recovered, including part of an overhead compartment, a section of fuselage and two seats.

Also found were safety instruction cards and personal items including shoes and a teddy bear, said Lt. Cmdr. Paul Ellner, a Coast Guard spokesman.

No bodies have been found, officials said.

Michael Marx, the NTSB's senior metallurgist, said there was no evidence that metal fatigue — weakness caused gradually by long-term use — caused the hole in the 18-year-old jet, United's oldest Boeing 747.

Marx said the hole's edge indicated that "overstress" — a stress greater than the plane could stand — had been placed on the aircraft, but he did not say what it might have been.

Stiffer rules proposed

Recent gas explosions prompt action

By Alan Wilds
Staff Writer

In order to provide safer gas service to the state's residents, stiffer regulations for the inspection of natural gas lines in Kansas are being introduced by the Kansas Corporation Commission.

"The federal pipeline rules are just not stiff enough," said Steve Menaugh, KCC spokesman.

The KCC needed to adopt a set of regulations that would make gas lines safer, Menaugh said. Gasoline explosions in Kansas and Missouri have been one reason for this action.

"Regulations were needed as a result of annual inspections and surveys and all things that were learned about the condition of gas lines," Menaugh said.

He said the most recent explosions in Kansas have been in the Kansas City area, including two in Overland Park and one in Independence within the last two years.

The new regulations will require all Kansas utility companies to perform routine surveys of all steel gas lines.

"Many of these steel lines are unprotected and were installed before 1971," Menaugh said. "The older lines have had minimal inspection."

He said another area of concern has been service lines that run from the company into private homes. All of these lines must be inspected annually and customers must be notified in writing if their lines need to be replaced.

John Johannes, Kansas Power and Light Co. district manager, said yard lines differ from service lines in that the meter is positioned closer to a house. Meters for service lines are placed close to the alley behind a house.

He said anytime the meter is in the alley, the gas lines are usually bare steel.

"Our No. 1 priority has been to inspect the service lines," Johannes said.

He said all bare steel lines had been inspected in the Manhattan area prior to the KCC's proposal and he anticipates completion of the survey by this next July.

Johannes said that after 1970, all steel gas lines in the area were installed using a protective coating, and all gas lines installed after 1980 were made of plastic and not as subject to corrosion.

"We have had no serious problems with gas lines in the last 10 years," Johannes said. "We have been fortunate."

He said faulty steel gas lines are being repaired by digging up both ends of the line and inserting a plastic tube on the inside. If they cannot be repaired by this method, Johannes said they are simply replaced with plastic lines.

Lee McQueen of facilities management said he was not aware of the KCC's proposal, but the department has been in the planning stages to update the safety inspection programs for all on-campus gas lines.

He said most if not all campus buildings do have meters on them and are inspected regularly.

He said inspections are done annually using detectors sensitive to line problems.

"We cannot sniff out a leak before it happens," he said. "There must be a leak."

The system can catch a leak soon enough so there will be no danger, McQueen said.

He said he has not been involved with actual inspections but he feels the KCC's proposed regulations are a good idea.

Menaugh said Kansas utility companies will have to make a comprehensive survey of all gas lines and have all faulty lines either repaired or replaced by May 1, 1991.

"I think it will eventually come to line replacement in the future," Menaugh said.

He said location and the type of soil also have a lot to do with corrosion of steel pipes.

Johannes agrees with the KCC's regulations, but he said the Manhattan area is already receiving safe service that meets the standards of the new regulations.

"I don't think the regulations will make us do anything that we are not already doing today," Johannes said.

Attack against author threatens free speech

There is almost a feeling of deja vu in the air.

Almost.

Once again the public has been faced with a dilemma. Less than seven months ago, Martin Scorsese's "The Last Temptation of Christ" created a furor when it chose to portray Christ in a less than favorable "human" light.

Mayhem resulted. Different Christian groups were busy boycotting the movie right and left. Theaters were torn between showing the movie and fighting off the picketers and protesters. Not showing the movie meant being accused of succumbing to social tyrants and infringing on freedom of speech rights.

Across the nation various religious leaders were organizing campaigns to get the movie out of theaters everywhere.

But it didn't work. People argued that these religious groups were affecting the right to freedom of speech; that they were infringing on the rights of people to see the movie; that this sort of thing shouldn't happen in a free society, a modern nation.

But it was. Granted, the aftereffects weren't that bad. It certainly affected some people's ability to view the movie because many theaters chose not to show it. In the end, the controversy probably made the movie far more popular than it would have otherwise been.

This scenario is being re-enacted with the recent release of Salman Rushdie's "The Satanic Verses".

Many people are protesting the book, which portrays Mohammed in a less than favorable "human" light. And, as with the movie, bookstores in many countries, even our own, are choosing not to carry the book.

This is where the resemblance to the movie's situation ends. Before, people were exercising their rights to peaceably protest against the movie. Now, the Ayatollah Khomeini has turned a protest into an act of terrorism by placing a $5.2 million bounty on the author's and publishers' heads.

While theaters were choosing whether to run the movie depending on their and their patrons' attitudes, the bookstores are choosing not to stock it due to a fear for their employees' lives.

There is a difference between protesting a work and placing a price on the head of its creator and publisher.

The Ayatollah's action is no less than an act of terrorism of the mind, openly performed before all the countries of the world. One man is attempting to dictate what all of the people in the world may or may not read, with the threat of death hanging in the air.

Now, after an apology has been issued by Rushdie and countries are taking a stand against this act of terrorism by pulling their diplomats out of Iran, Khomeini describes it all as a premeditated act on the part of the West to guarantee that good relations between Iran and the West will never be a reality.

The reality is that the book and its author and publishers are being used as scapegoats by an authoritarian ruler to draw a nation's mind away from miserable conditions wrought by war and conditions resembling considerably less than Utopia.

CORRECTION: Due to an editing error, the last paragraph of a guest column by Talat S. Rahman should have read: Many of us, after all, have been brought up to believe that Islam is a tolerant and sensible religion, and that it is non-Islamic to exploit the Koran as a cover for one's aims to consolidate power over one's fellows.

Making an entrance can be difficult. Arrive too late or too loudly and everyone will be offended. Arrive too early or too quietly and no one will really care that you showed up.

Even if everybody in one place, say Union Forum Hall on Wednesday afternoon, is waiting to see you, the entrance is still important, telling.

Everyone waiting in Forum Hall, in this case students, faculty and area businessmen, sat or stood quietly talking among themselves, straightening power ties and picking lint off cheap but expensive Dillard's suits. But in their hearts ...

In their hearts they were standing arms akimbo on the deck of a multinational corporation, shouting commands as their brains plotted the most seaworthy, yet flashy, way to board the enemy vessel. Probably.

There were no bugles announcing the entrance of the man worth millions, just the house lights dimming then returning as he and five others slowly stepped toward the stage like pallbearers in search of a lost coffin, instead of drunken pirates after a coffer.

Before T. Boone Pickens Jr. was seated on stage, everybody had closed their yaps and put their dreams on pause. Time to listen, maybe learn.

It went as smoothly as a mutually beneficial business deal. The "real life J.R. Ewing" was punctual, and the tall man who introduced him was short. Then the 60-year-old Pickens spoke.

Unlike the workaholic, phone-in-briefcase image of most modern day, high finance barons, Pickens came off as down-home and relaxed. His words rolled out in a west Oklahoma/Texas drawl, sprinkled with such common folk words as "doin'," "thair," "ole" and "wadn't." His manner and voice brought to mind past late night sessions conducted with coffee and cake over a modest kitchen table.

But his accent allowed the words to flow deceptively quick, broken only by unconscious "uh ... uhs." And he was as amusing as a favorite uncle.

"It is your game more than it is mine. I'm left to give some direction," Pickens told the students. Then without skipping a beat he added, "I'm not retiring today, you understand."

Pickens' lecture, squeezed in categorically somewhere between a Zig Zigler seminar and the Dr. Gene Scott show, offered little real advice. A few simple steps like "play by the rules," "work hard" and "don't be afraid to make well thought out decisions" were turned into Adam Smith-ian axioms.

Too many simple minded sports analogies from such a wise man tend to bore. However, Pickens was classy enough to avoid making a lame joke when comparing the manager of a insolvent company to a losing football coach.

It is easy to see how Pickens has become one of the most successful and influential businessmen of the 20th century. He is a colorful man who made his name and fortune in the gaudy world of the oil bidness.

While we were in gas lines, he was in the deposit line at the bank, yet he has us convinced he is one of us merely because he too was standing in a line. And Pickens would probably be the first to remind you that somebody had to stand in the deposit line.

Then, when the oil business went bottom up, like a survivor Pickens went to the hostile takeover business. He flamboyantly played the role of the pirate who only wants to help the common folk, sort of a Robin Hood meets Blackbeard.

His appeal, like his manner, lies in his identification with the common folk. Advocating "shareholders' rights" he took on corporate management and created a Horatio Alger image to become the Bruce Springsteen of business.

He related to the audience a story about what should be done to invigorate corporate America.

He suggested getting rid of all the leaders between the ages of 55 and 65, though he admitted he had no fear in suggesting the freeze out because it would never happen. But it was a nice thought.

Much as he does when he appeals to the dreams of stockholders, Pickens reassuringly absolved Wednesday's audience of their guilt.

"Never apologize for making money honestly," he canted. "If you're making money honestly, you're causing jobs to be created and that causes the economy to move forward."

The Marxists may disagree, but he is right. "Never apologize," he said, though few probably ever have.

Pickens himself is not one for apologies. In describing his shift from the oil bidness to corporate raiding, Pickens bragged that he saw it more profitable to pursue undervalued stock than to keep searching for new wells to drill.

Yet, he neglected to mention that his money savvy cost the jobs of many blue collar workers — whom a few minutes before Pickens called "the best in the world." No one really noticed.

At the beginning of the lecture, Pickens challenged the audience to put him on the spot during the question-and-answer period. When one young man, unknowingly playing the role of Cliff Barnes, kept pressing Pickens about a lawsuit involving Pickens' company, Mesa Limited Partnership, Pickens avoided the issue by using his common appeal.

"Do yawl really wanna hear 'bout this?" he asked the audience, which earlier he had won over with his talk of Palm Springs. "No" was the reply, and nobody really did. He went on to another question.

With a straight face he went on about the lack of ethics in corporate management. Then he applauded the hard work of Japanese business leaders. Then he told a funny story and said goodbye. Everyone applauded and then left feeling much more secure in knowing he was really on their side.

Students support ICC adviser

Commentary

Cosima Hadidi
Guest Columnist

As officers and members of the International Coordinating Council, we feel compelled to respond to Lucy Athanasius' guest column in the Feb. 24 Collegian.

It is first of all necessary to stress that this column represents the convictions of a large segment of ICC officers and members. As a whole we are offended and stunned by her assertions. Her feelings are not representative of this segment.

This is to publicly demonstrate our support for our adviser, Donna Davis, and we maintain that she plays an extremely fair and balanced role for our organization.

It is curious to us that Athanasius should be so concerned with the "internal problems" of ICC. She has attended only one meeting this year and her column is based on her observations concerning the one meeting which she did attend. She does have the right to express her opinions, but it is incumbent upon her to base those opinions on fact.

She has not done that; her statements are grounded on distortion. It is the opinion of the authors of this column that Athanasius is seriously misguided in her judgments.

The focus of Athanasius' piece is Davis' supposed inability to interact with one specific officer of ICC. While it is not within the scope of this article to dissect the internal workings of ICC, it is imperative to acknowledge that this organization has had an extremely rocky tenure with this particular officer.

Athanasius presents the problem solely in terms of a personal conflict on the part of Davis: Davis' attempts to steamroll over an individual. The issue is much more complicated than this and it is simply not true that Davis is "a person inebriated with a tenure of 10 years and the illusion of power."

There was implication that Davis initiated two organizational motions without consulting with ICC officers. Again, this is simply not the case. According to ICC President Anwar Dabbas, "I requested that Davis introduce these motions because of her experience."

Another important component of Athanasius' article is her belief that Davis' ignorance of ICC's constitution prevents her from functioning effectively as the group's adviser. Considering that Davis was a member of the 1987-1988 committee which amended the document, the assertion falls flat.

What is more, the evidence used to document the belief is flimsy and weak. Athanasius points to Davis misnaming "Robert's Rules of Order" as proof that Davis knows nothing of the constitution. Using any individual's verbal misstep as bona fide proof of incompetence deserves to be dismissed.

The pattern then is clear: Athanasius presents her one-sided perspective. We can be clear about the fact that her picking and choosing of isolated bits of information is misleading. Not only is it bad journalism, it is bad argument.

In conclusion, we find it overwhelmingly ironic that Athanasius should end her article by claiming to have "nothing personally against the adviser" when her entire article revolves around personally grounded assumptions. Accusing Davis of being a "dictator" and suffering from the "illusion of power" are demeaning accusations even though Athanasius may assume an air of objectivity.

She ignores her own exhortations to be "level-headed and impartial." She also assumes that we are being blindly manipulated by Davis and this we all highly resent.

If she is, as she claims to be, a "concerned member of the international community at K-State," why did she speak to only one officer concerning this matter, an officer with a history of conflict with the whole organization, if not a conflict only with Davis herself?

And furthermore, why did she never speak to Davis or with Davis' supervisors? As a group, we are left with the inevitable opinion that Athanasius' major goal was to undermine Davis. And, as a group, we again publicly affirm our support for Davis and for her conduct as our adviser. Rather than re-evaluate her behavior as adviser, Davis should know that she is supported by our group, and readers of this column should know the same.

Editor's note: Cosima Hadidi is a senior in psychology and member of the ICC. She is writing representing Olufunke Ilumoka, treasurer of ICC; H.V. Ravishankar, member of ICC; Scott Quaintance, member ICC; Anwar Dabbas, president ICC; Mahmoud Akhtar, member ICC; Tung T. Ly, member ICC; Corina Hugo, public relations officer of ICC; and Elizabeth Day, graduate student in history.

Movie theaters offer low admission rates

By The Collegian Staff

Movie theaters in Manhattan are making Tuesday nights a great night not to do homework, with two theaters offering reduced prices.

Jeff Barnes, assistant manager of Seth Child Cinemas, said tickets are $3 on Tuesday nights. Bob Howard, sitting manager of Creative Entertainment, manages Westloop 6 Cinema and the Campus Theatre. He said ticket prices are dropped to $2.50 on Tuesday nights at Westloop 6 Cinema.

On the average, Tuesday night was a slow night before the special prices were implemented, Howard said. But he said he doesn't think that special nights have as big of an influence on the high ticket sales as the movie itself.

The Campus Theatre offers a low admission every day on second run movies. Since the complex has only one screen, only one movie is featured, but movies are changed at a faster pace than at the other theaters.

By showing movies on their second run, Howard said, the price could be lowered.

"Last summer we dropped our admission for all shows down to $1," he said. "We try to get the movies as soon after their first run as possible. By only charging $1, it hurts us on ticket sales, but it helps our concessions sales."

Both managers said the number of moviegoers usually decreases after Christmas until summer. Tuesday night specials have helped ticket sales at the theaters, but Tuesday nights still can't compete with the weekend attendance, the managers said.

Barnes and Howard said they aren't sure if the Tuesday night specials are going to continue into the summer.

"We're planning on continuing, but we'll have to see what's going on then," Howard said.

The fate of the Tuesday night specials will be decided before the summer, Barnes said.

"We're expecting to have a good summer with the release of Star Trek V, the new James Bond movie and the new Indiana Jones movie," Barnes said. "I think (Seth Child Cinemas) will be able to get a good amount of the summer movies, because of our large seating ability."

Soldier wins $16 million in lottery

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Army Sergeant Lee Nelson stepped forward Sunday to claim his $16 million Lotto America prize and said he will quit the service "if they let me."

"We haven't really thought about it a whole lot," said Nelson, 29, a 12-year Army veteran who hit the jackpot in the Feb. 18 drawing of the Des Moines, Iowa-based lottery.

A native of South Carolina, Nelson works at the Pentagon as an accounting specialist. He lives with his wife, Mary, and two children, ages 5 years and 9 months, in the Washington suburb of Alexandria, Va.

Nelson, asked whether he would donate any of the money to charity, said, "I am undecided at this time."

He said he would quit his job "if they let me. I don't know now." His Army enlistment is up on June 5.

Clearly uncomfortable in the limelight, Nelson said his greatest fear was "the public." He declined to give the names or sexes of his children or to discuss his plans in any detail.

"We don't want no publicity," he said, adding the family probably will move to his wife's native state, Florida.

Winning the lottery did not change Nelson's routine last week, he said.

"I got up, went to work, spent my lunch hour at the gym, came home and had dinner. I put in a leave request on Tuesday so that I could have Friday off," he said.

Nelson said hitting the jackpot "probably won't" change his life. Asked whether he would continue to play, he said, "Perhaps."

'Cats hold off late OSU rally, win 69-62

By Mike Rouse
Collegian Reporter

The K-State men's basketball team paid back a little revenge in a big way Saturday afternoon by defeating Oklahoma State, 69-62, in Bramlage Coliseum.

The game was deemed as a very important one for both teams' NCAA tournament hopes.

Fred McCoy, who ended with a game-high 18 points, scored the first two baskets of the game and K-State never looked back.

With K-State leading 11-10 at 12:58, the 'Cats went on a 10-0 run during the next three minutes to extend the team's lead to 21-10.

K-State coach Lon Kruger had been arguing with the officals since early in the game and then pushed it to the limit. Kruger was whistled for his first technical foul as a K-State coach with 3:35 left in the half.

The technical seemed to give the crowd and the K-State players a big lift. K-State went on a 13-5 spurt after the technical and grabbed a 44-31 halftime lead.

"I didn't shoot the shots," Kruger said. "I was proud of the way we finished the half. We locked back in there and got back on track and finished the half.

"I think what really pumped us up was we came out of that, they hit two free throws and Mark Dobbins picks up a steal. I think Mark pumped people up and he hit the layup and got us going again."

K-State came out in the second half just as it had ended the first. The 'Cats reeled off the first five points of the final stanza to extend its lead to 49-31.

K-State held a double digit lead until late in the contest when Oklahoma State got as close as five, but the lead was too much for the Cowboys.

"Late we just got a little tenative, we stopped doing what we did to get a 16 or 18 point adavantage," Kruger said.

The K-State defense forced Oklahoma State into 27 turnovers for the game. One key on defense was the play of Mark Dobbins and Billy Ray Smith against Cowboy forward Richard Dumas. The duo kept Oklahoma State's leading scorer to nine points.

"Mark and Billy really battled him hard. They tried to post him early in the second half and Mark kept battling and trying to establish and fight for position inside, and Richard is such a good player he still hit some tough shots," Kruger said.

McCoy believed this was a game where his team could get back at Oklahoma State since the Cowboys beat K-State, 89-71, on national television in January.

Steve Henson, who missed the two free throws he attempted, never found a streak. However, he still ended up with 14 points. He was 5-14 from the field, but hit four three-pointers. Henson ended the game with a season-high 12 assists.

"I rushed some when I really didn't mean to. I just didn't take my time on them," Henson said. "I felt like a couple times I was going to get something started and never did."

Oklahoma State, 16-9 overall and 7-5 in the Big Eight, was led by Byron Houston, who scored 16 points and grabbed 10 rebounds. Thomas Jordan scored 14 points and Corey Williams added 13 points for Oklahoma State.

Oklahoma State continues to stay on the "bubble" for an NCAA tournament bid, but has a lot of points in their favor. While not a good road team, they are undefeated at home and have beaten Oklahoma and Missouri in Stillwater.

"If you finish in the top four in this confrence, there's no question you should be in the tournament," Oklahoma State coach Leonard Hamilton said.

The win not only helped K-State's chance of getting in the tournament, but helped its chances of getting a higher seed.

"I think this puts us in position not only to get into the tournament, but to fight for a good seed as well," Kruger said. "I don't think we are in for sure right now."

K-State, 17-8 overall and 7-5 in the Big Eight, is home again on Wednesday night for a 8:05 tipoff against Missouri.

K-State is tied with Oklahoma State for third place, two games behind second-place Missouri, which makes the matchup between the Wildcats and Tigers loom even larger as the conference race winds down.

The 'Cats will close out the regular season at Ames Saturday against Iowa State in a 3:10 p.m. matchup.

Tennis squad remains undefeated

Netters take two duals against Arkansas, Iowa

By Carolyn Holcroft
Sports Writer

The K-State women's tennis team turned in what was definitely its most impressive wins this season, as the team defeated both Arkansas and Iowa this weekend to remain undefeated for the season.

Going into the weekend, Coach Steve Bietau anticipated the two opposing teams to be the strongest competition to date, and he wasn't disappointed. Arkansas fought the Wildcats all the way to a 5-4 match after posing a serious threat in the doubles matches.

"I think that this is the best weekend we've had so far."
— Steve Bietau, K-State tennis coach

"Arkansas was strong in all three positions," said Bietau. "I felt like the doubles was our weakest point on Saturday."

The No. 1 doubles team of Helen Schildknecht and Miste Bitner were defeated 4-6, 5-7, and Marijke Nel and Valerie Rive went down 3-6, 6-2, 2-6 at No. 2.

"We played pretty well the first set, but then they started to play a lot more aggressively," Rive said. "We kind of let ourselves out of the groove. We started to come back, but it was too late."

However, at No. 3 doubles, Sara Hancock and Thresa Burcham downed Arkansas 6-4, 4-6, 6-2 as Hancock racked up one of her four victories for the weekend. She also gave K-State a much-needed win at the No. 3 singles position, and Bietau said Hancock's consistency and outstanding performance throughout the weekend played a crucial role in the Wildcats' success in both matches.

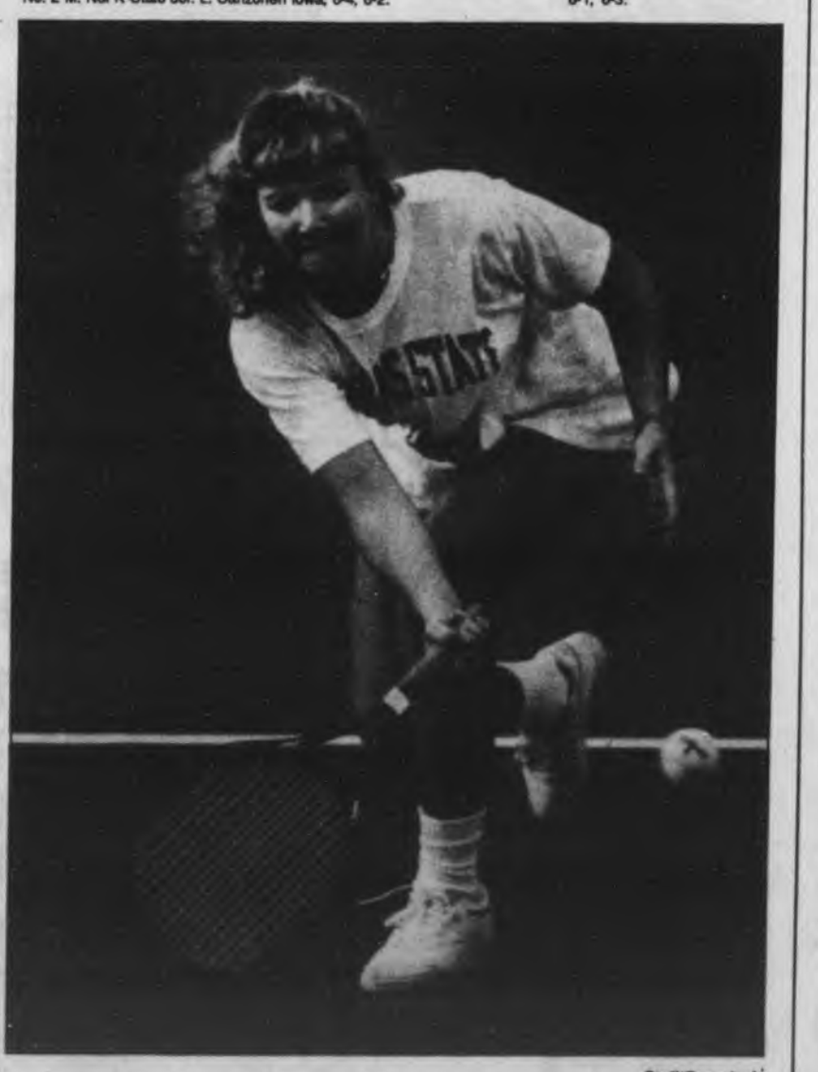
In Saturday's singles, Rive was able to come back to win at the No. 4 spot, and Schildknecht had a solid victory at No. 1.

"I was worried, because we played doubles first, that I would be tired and lose my concentration (for singles)," Schildknecht said, "but I played well from the first point. I'm really happy about it."

After their hard-fought match on Saturday, Bietau was somewhat concerned that the team would not be able to compete at full strength again at 9 a.m. Sunday, especially after several players have been battling illness all week. He was pleasantly surprised when K-State defeated Iowa, 6-3, at Topeka's Wood Valley Racquet Club. He said the Wildcats looked even more ready, and jumped out to a quicker start against Iowa.

He said Nel and Rive played a much better doubles match the second day.

Hancock again turned in two impressive victories at No. 3 singles and with Burcham at No. 3 doubles. Their doubles team remains 8-0 on the season.



"I think that this is the best weekend we've had so far," he said.

Inside players key to victory

By Scott Paske
Collegian Reporter

After being roughed up by Oklahoma State's big men in an 89-71 loss a month ago in Stillwater, Saturday's rematch with the Cowboys provided a shot at redemption for K-State's front-line players.

Fred McCoy, Lance Simmons and Tony Massop held their own against Big Eight newcomer-of-the-year candidate Byron Houston, Richard Dumas and Thomas Jordan and helped the Wildcats move into a third place tie with the Cowboys, winning 69-62 at Bramlage Coliseum. The win improved K-State's conference mark to 7-5 and 17-8 overall.

"I think the guys came to play more today," said McCoy, who led the Wildcats with 18 points. "In Stillwater, we took it on the chin and we didn't like the way they really drove it to us. We decided among ourselves that this game we were going to come out and fight."

McCoy used his soft shooting touch to near perfection in the first half, connecting on 6 of 7 field goal attempts to propel the 'Cats to a 44-31 lead at intermission. The 6-foot-7 center also canned two free throws with 1:30 remaining in the game to help K-State hold off a late rally by the Cowboys.

K-State's effort to control the inside battle was aided by the play of Simmons. Despite yielding two inches to the smallest O-State forward, Simmons was one of four Wildcats in double figures with 11. The 6-foot-5 junior opened the game with a penetrating feed to McCoy for an easy layup, and scored back-to-back buckets late in the opening half to help K-State extend its lead following a technical foul on Wildcat coach Lon Kruger.

"We took it on the chin and we really didn't like the way they really drove it to us. We decided among ourselves that this game we were going to come out and fight."
— Fred McCoy, K-State center

Massop's contribution to K-State's inside success was more noticeable on defense. The 6-foot-8 reserve pivotman, who led the 'Cats in rebounding with six, held Houston in check during much of his 23 minutes of playing time. During a one minute span in the second half, Massop blocked two shots, pulled down two rebounds and added an assist. He also gave K-State its biggest lead of the game at 53-35 with a thunderous dunk off a steal by Reggie Britt.

Houston was limited to 16 points after a 29-point outing in Stillwater. Dumas, who tallied nine points on Saturday, was held below double figures for the first time in 15 games.

Men's track team second in Big 8 meet

By Chris Hays
Sports Editor

LINCOLN, Neb. — With K-State piling up the first-place medals early during the men's finals of the Big Eight Indoor Track Championships Saturday, Nebraska coach Gary Pepin had to be getting worried.

But Pepin and the Nebraska faithful at the Bob Devaney Sports Center had nothing to fear. The Cornhusker men eventually overcame an early K-State lead to post a 123-105 victory over the Wildcats and Iowa State, who tied K-State for second with 105 points. It was the Nebraska men's third straight indoor title.

"Sure I was getting worried," Pepin said of K-State's early lead. "K-State was piling up 10s (firsts) everywhere and we weren't getting any."

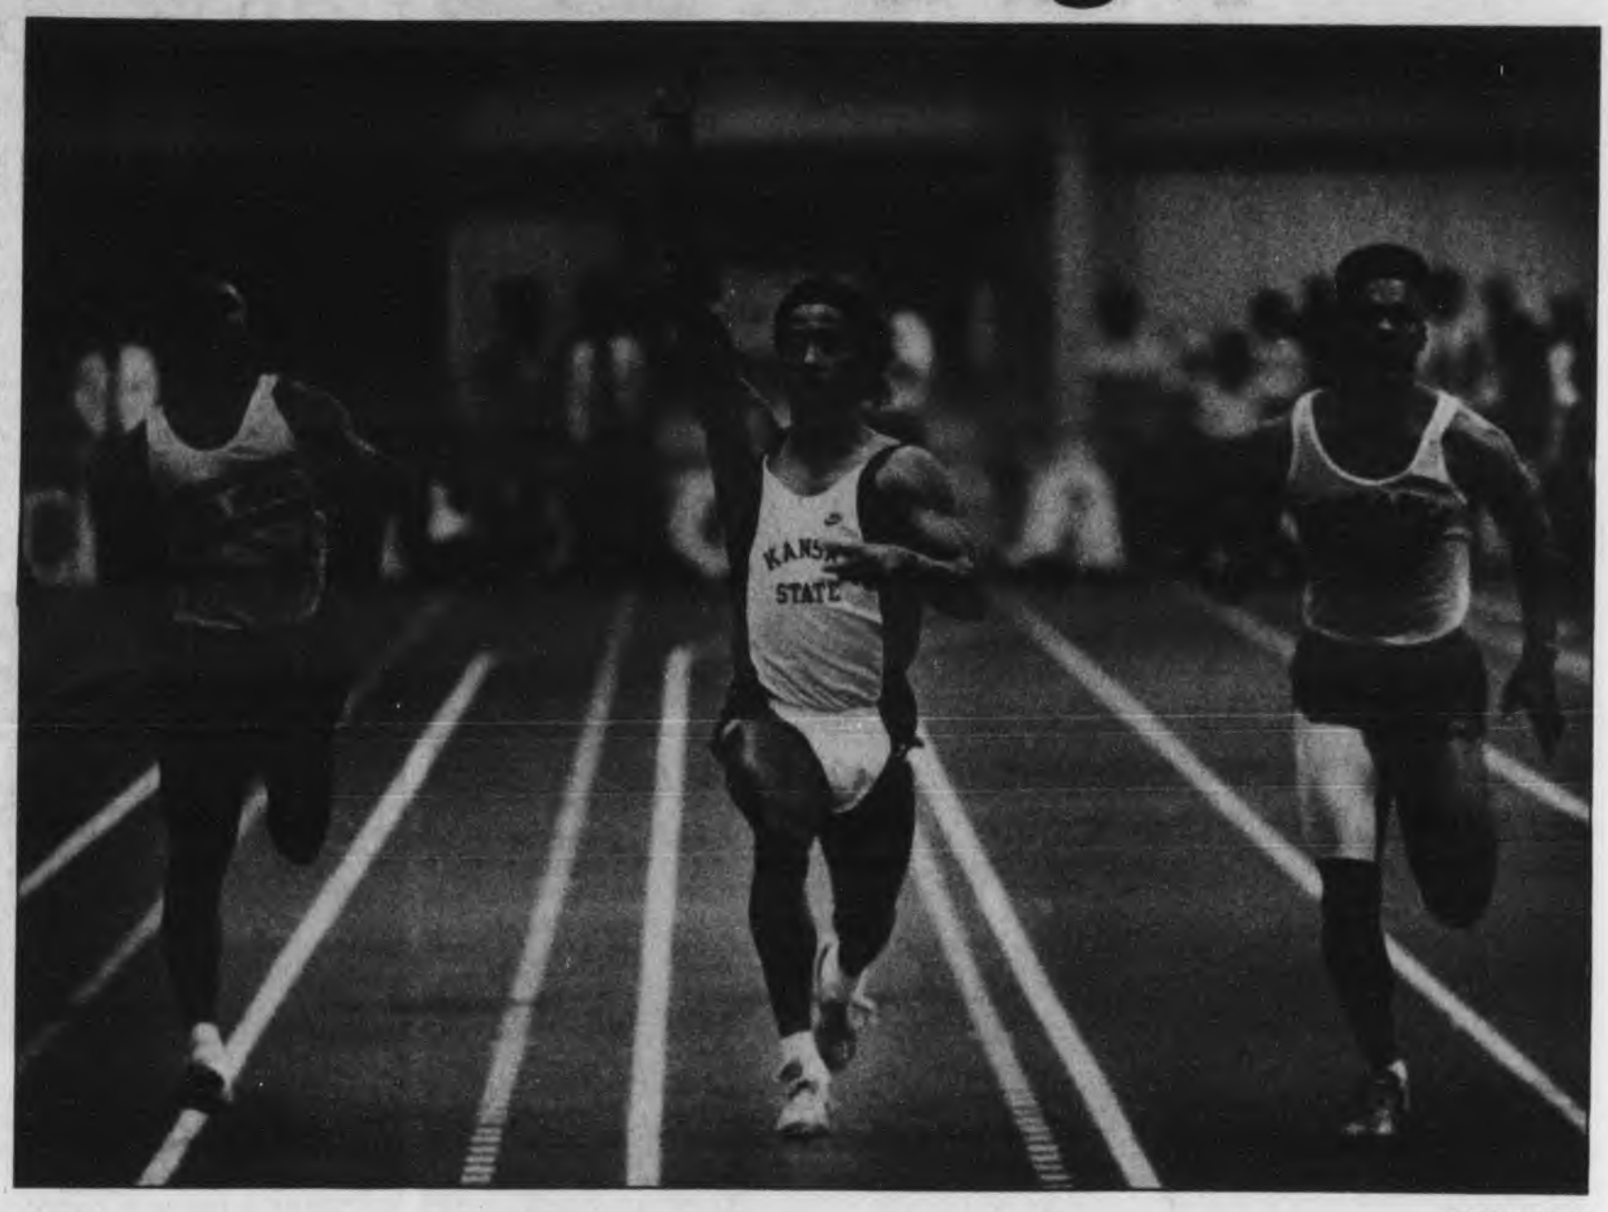
K-State used a near sweep in the 55-meter dash to grab 20 quick points. Led by Ray Hill, the Wildcats finished 1-3-4, and were off and running to an early lead over the favored 'Huskers. Hill won the event with a Big Eight record time of 6.15 seconds. He was followed by Nebraska's Mark Perry at 6.29 and then the K-State pair of Darrell Wyatt and Charles Allen, who had times of 6.34 and 6.35 respectively.

In the very next event, K-State's Jeff Reynolds picked up his second straight Big Eight title in the 600-yard dash and broke the conference record with a time of 1:08.73. Reynolds had been bothered by an illness for most of the season and had not even ran the 600 until Friday's preliminaries.

"That was a helluva race," K-State coach John Capriotti said of Reynolds performance. "Especially for a guy that is not in his best physical shape right now. That tells me Jeff is back."

"It felt pretty good," Reynolds said. "I was a little more tense because I knew the finals were going to be a lot more competitive than the prelims."

Add to those first-place performances Clifton Etheridge's victory in Friday's long jump finals, and K-State was sitting pretty good with a 58-52 lead after seven events.



Two events later, K-State had pulled to an even bigger lead, 72-59. Sean Banks turned in a surprising performance in the 400 meters with a third-place and national qualifying time of 47.13, then Charles Armstead snared a second-place medal in the 55-meter hurdles in 7.42.

But that was where the Nebraska manpower caught up to K-State. In the next four events, the Cornhuskers picked up 45 quick points, and jumped ahead 104-82. K-State was able to manage just 10 points as Ray Hill won his second event with a Big Eight record 21.29 clocking in the 200 meters.

From there the Wildcats made a run for it, gaining two more first-place performances. But it was Nebraska's ability to pick up points in the middle, not just atop the place list, that haunted K-State.

The Wildcats' Dan O'Mara won the shot put with a throw of 59-1¼ . The K-State 4x400 meter relay quartet of Banks, Tyrone Watkins, Hill and Reynolds turned in an impressive performance with a Big Eight record time of 3:10.11, which also qualified them for nationals.

"Overall we were just fantastic today," Capriotti said.

Baseball team beats St. Louis

From Staff and Wire Reports

The K-State baseball squad used big bats to defeat St. Louis University 17-7 Friday. But on Saturday, the Wildcats completed a two-game sweep by using their experienced pitching staff, successfully opening the 1989 baseball season at Frank Myers Field.

Senior Jim Haller pitched six strong innings and senior Jim McClellan pitched three innnings of relief Saturday as K-State ran its record to 2-0 with a 10-4 win over the Billikens.

The Wildcats led only 5-3 before scoring five runs in the bottom of the eighth inning.

Haller allowed six hits and three runs in keeping St. Louis at bay. The Billikens led briefly 2-0 in the first inning, but Haller then threw four shutout innings to allow K-State to take control of the game.

The 'Cats used the extra base hit as a big weapon all weekend long. Outfielders Sean Collins and Rusty Ringgenberg homered for the Wildcats. Ringgenberg also stole two bases for the second consecutive game. Bill Barnard, Kevin Kaufman and Collins all tripled for the 'Cats.

St. Louis' Dan Walsh was the losing pitcher after going seven innings, striking out seven K-Staters in the process.

McClellan picked up K-State's second save in two days by allowing only an unearned run in three innings of work.

Friday afternoon the Wildcats blew open a close game when they sent 16 batters to the plate in a 10-run, nine-hit fifth inning.

Every Wildcat starter got at least one hit and the 'Cats bashed out 15 for the game. Bill Barnard homered and tripled and threw a runner out at home from right field to pace the Wildcats. First baseman Mike Rosenboom added a home run as one of his three hits.

In the field, the Wildcats got excellent defensive play from freshman shortstop Craig Wilson. The 'Cats also benefited from the pitching efforts of starter and winner Jeff Peterson and reliever David Hierholzer, who threw four innings and got the save.

"We have accomplished what we wanted to in this series," said K-State coach Mike Clark. "We are putting pressure on the opposition with our speed. We are getting the right people on base.

"I thought today's effort by Jim (Haller) was as good as any he has given us," Clark added. "We have played well in the field and we're using sound judgement."

The K-State baseball squad will be in action at Frank Myers Field Wednesday through Sunday this week. Wednesday, Bellvue College visits for a double header begining at 1 p.m., then the Wildcats play host to Missouri Baptist at 2 p.m. Thursday, Wayne State comes to town for 2 p.m. matchup Friday and a 1 p.m. contest Saturday and Augustana rounds out the homestand with a 1 p.m. game Sunday.

Injuries hamper women's team

Fourth place still pleasing to Capriotti

By Chris Hays
Sports Editor

LINCOLN, Neb. — Coach John Capriotti said in a pre-meet press conference Thursday that he thought his women's track squad would finish in fourth place at the Big Eight Indoor Championships in the Bob Devaney Sports Center.

And, he was right — but he probably couldn't have been convinced that he would be after the events that occured during Saturday's finals.

The women lost a key performer when Markeya Jones pulled a hamstring in the finals of the 55-meter dash. Jones was also scheduled to run in the 200-meter finals and on the 4x400-meter relay team, so the chances of K-State finishing fourth started looking pretty slim.

"You could have never told me that our team would be two points out of third after losing Markeya."

— John Capriotti, K-State track coach

"You could have never told me that our team would be two points out of third after losing Markeya," Capriotti said. "She's a potential 20 points for us, so I'm very happy with our girls today (Saturday). Our women had a helluva meet.

"We lose Markeya today, and Janet Haskin last week and are still two points from third. So you tell me where we're at. I know our women's team is going to surprise some people."

Nebraska ran away with the women's title, outdistancing second-place Missouri, 155-88. Iowa State edged out K-State for third place with 57 points. The Wildcats had 55.

K-State was led by Kim Kilpatrick, who successfully defended her Big Eight title in the 55-meter hurdles with a conference-record time of 7.67. Kilpatrick then finished fourth in the 200 meters and also helped K-State to a fourth place finish in the 4x400-meter relay.

Freshman Latricia Joyner was a terror on the Devaney track, picking up a third place medal in the 200 meters, a fourth in the 55 meters and ran a leg on the 4x400 squad.

K-State had two athletes place in the triple jump and high jump competitions. Carla Shannon took second in the triple jump with a leap of 40-5 feet and Kim Richeson placed sixth at 37-10¾ . In the high jump, Connie Teaberry took third at 5-9¾ and DeDe Henderson was sixth at 5-6½ .

Angie Miller picked up third place in the shot put with a personal-best throw of 46-11¾ , while Joy Jones finished fourth in the 400 meters with a time of 1:23.19.

Missouri's Teri LeBlanc was named the women's MVP for her victories in the pentathalon and long jump. She was also third in the 55-meter hurdles and helped the Missouri women to a victory in the 4x400-meter relay.

Loss leaves Lady Cats in tie for third place

From Staff and Wire Reports

STILLWATER, Okla. — In the battle for second place in the Big Eight Conference, the Oklahoma State women's basketbll team came out on top, downing K-State, 81-71.

With the loss, the Lady Cats finished out the regular season in a third-place tie with Missouri at 7-7 and end the year with a 17-10 mark.

K-State led by as much as five points in the first half, with its biggest lead coming at the 3:23 mark, 30-25. But from there, the Cowgirls went on an 11-3 run to go into the locker room at the half with a 36-33 lead which they never relinquished.

"I thought Oklahoma State was the better team today, but I thought we competed hard," Lady Cats coach Matilda Mossman said. "We turned the ball over at crucial times and they went down and scored on our mistakes."

Though tied for third with the Lady Tigers, K-State will still get the third seed in this weekend's Big Eight women's tournament, because the Lady Cats split the season series with Oklahoma State, while Missouri lost both games to the Cowgirls.

Men's golf to open with tough tourney

From Staff and Wire Reports

Trying to set a new standard for K-State golf, first-year coach Russ Bunker and the Wildcat men's golf team will be, in a way, making K-State golf history today.

When the K-State quintet tees off at the Sandpiper Golf Course in Goleta, Calif., it will mark the first time that K-State has ventured to such a competitive meet so far away from Manhattan.

The Hammond-Bell Pacific Coast Collegiate Golf Championship, which will be today and Tuesday, boasts 15 of the top 20-ranked teams in the country among its 23-team field.

"In order to get all-American type of kids to even consider your program, you have to go to places like this," Bunker said. "Kids cannot be brought here if we continue to play the kind of schedule that we have in the past."

Making the trip for K-State will be junior Brett Vuillemin, a transfer from Tulsa; senior Troy Keller, last year's third-ranked Wildcat golfer with a stroke average of 78.8; junior Jeff Sedorcek, second last year at 77.6; freshman Brad Stephans from Yukon, Okla.; and junior John Shields, who averaged 80.12 last season.

The tourney will be played in a best-four-scores-out-of-five format per each 18-hole round. Today the teams will play 36 holes and will follow with an 18-hole round Tuesday.

The K-State squad was able to take advantage of some unseasonably warm weather in January but have been confined to practices in Brandeberry Complex for about the past six weeks.

Bowlers raise money

Local group benefits from event

By Laurie Cox
Collegian Reporter

Bowlers participating in the Big Brothers/Big Sisters Bowling Classic fund-raiser filled the lanes Saturday at the Union and Wildcat Lanes bowling centers.

"There were approximately 140 bowlers at the Union and 221 at Wildcat Lanes. We estimate that we can receive $15,000 to $16,000 in earnings from pledges from Saturday," said Linda Teener, executive director of the Big Brothers/Big Sisters program.

"It was a real successful day for us. Participation was well over that of last year's," Teener said.

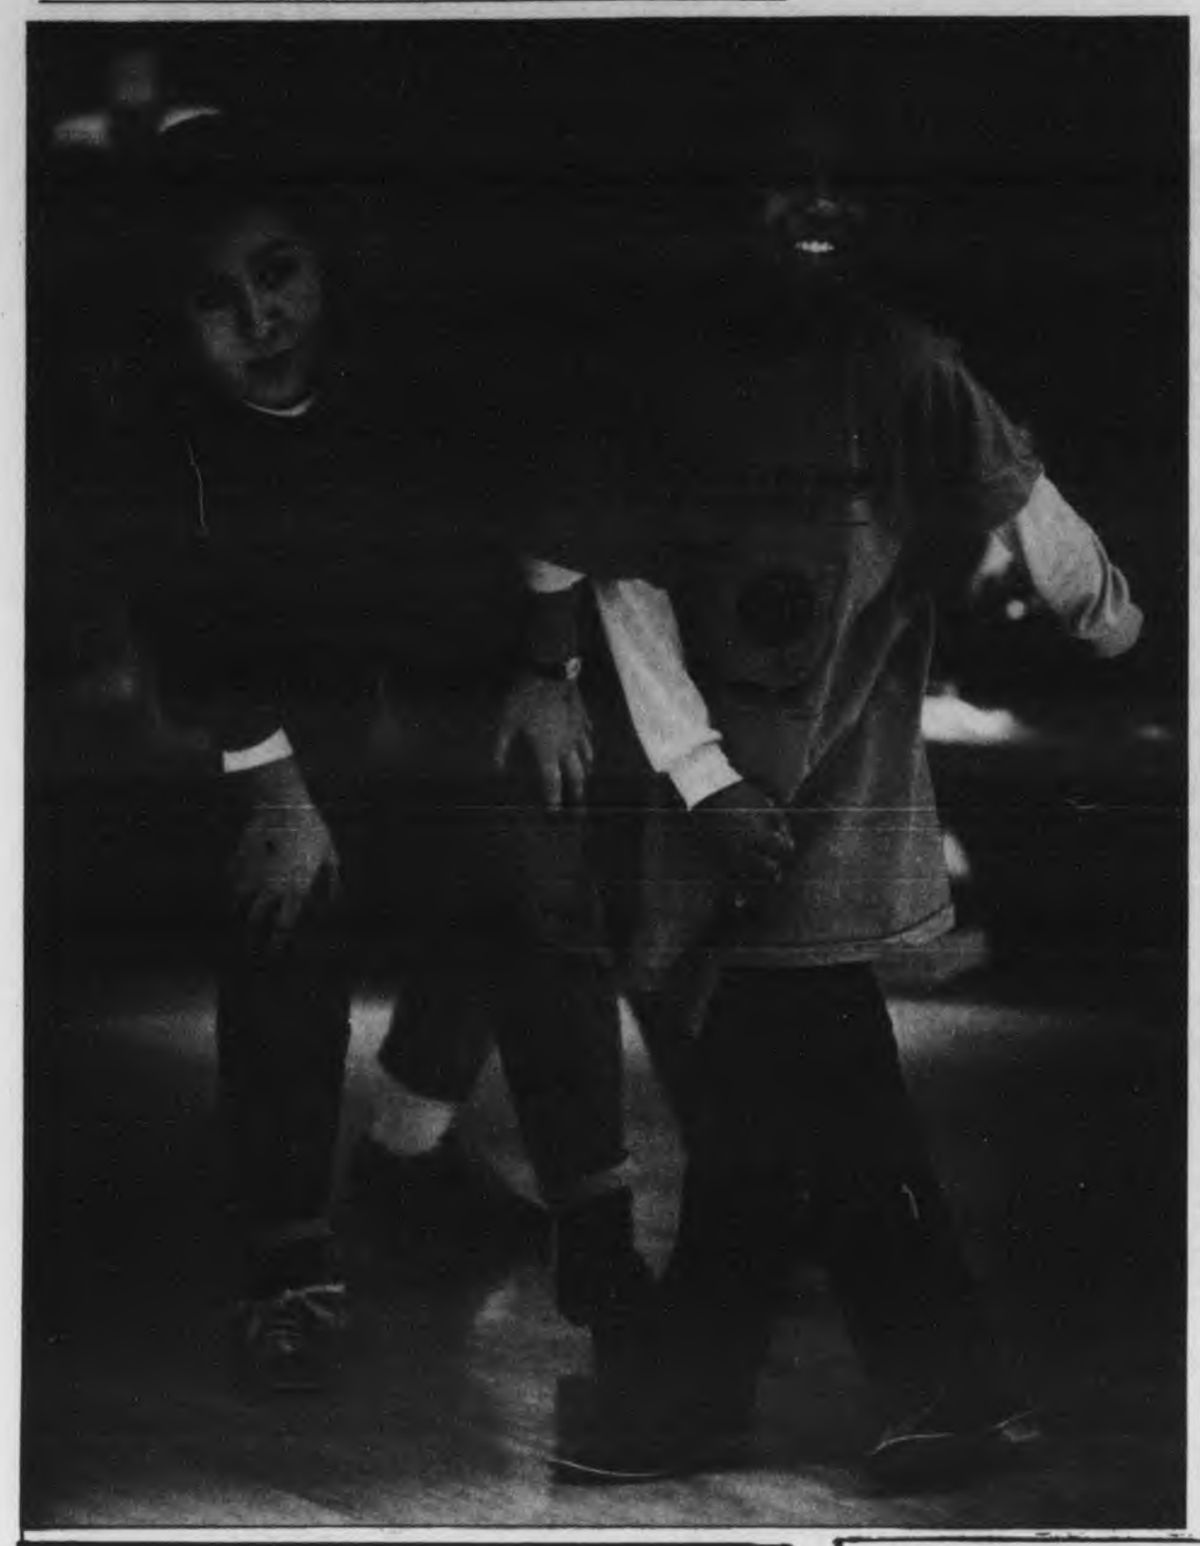
Alpha Xi Delta, Alpha Delta Pi, Moore Hall, West Hall, Haymaker Hall, and the Pre-law Club had teams competing in the Bowling Classic. A trophy will be awarded to the team raising the most donations, Teener said.

"Prizes and trophies will be awarded in late April after pledges have been collected. The awards are based upon best pledge earnings and not high score," said Diane Clark, case coordinator for Big Brothers/Big Sisters.

Participants having at least 15 sponsors were awarded a T-shirt for participating. Businesses in the community also donated items such as a television, VCR, keyboard, bike, dinners and memberships, said Eleanor DeBruyn, president of the board of directors for Big Brothers/Big Sisters.

"A week ago, the Manhattan Fire Department and the city of Manhattan office employees had a bowl-off between themselves. They raised a potential $1,000 in pledges," Teener said.

Because one of the cooperative living groups that had reserved eight lanes canceled at the last minute, one session of bowling at the Union was canceled, DeBruyn said.



"I believe we received a little competition from the K-State basketball game earlier in the day, but it picked up," Clark said.

League bowlers will be bowling for Big Brothers/Big Sisters every league night through March 4.

"We currently have 370 league bowlers signed up to bowl," Teener said.

Big Brothers/Big Sisters hopes to surpass last year's earnings of $26,000 from the Bowling Classic, she said.

Sixty percent of the program's budget for 1989 must be generated from private donations and from fund raising. The Bowling Classic is the organization's single largest fund-raising activity.

Greek Week competition better than in past years

By The Collegian Staff

Kappa Delta, Phi Kappa Theta and Sigma Phi Epsilon won the Greek Week competition by defeating nine other fraternity and sorority teams in this year's revamped week of events, said Perry Palmer, Greek Week coordinator.

"I think it was successful," Palmer said.

Overall, there was good participation in all the events and it was an improvement from past Greek Weeks, he said.

"Putting on the Greek Hits," in which each team performed a lip synching routine, was Saturday at McCain Auditorium.

The winning group of the lip synching competition, Gamma Phi Beta, Triangle, Sigma Chi and FarmHouse, performed to the "Streak," Palmer said.

Special entertainment was provided by the fraternity and sorority housemothers, who performed their own lip-synching routine to "Girls Just Want to Have Fun."

Angie Smith, Delta Delta Delta, and Tim Kubik, Lambda Chi Alpha, were chosen as the greek ambassadors, Palmer said. The ambassadors answer questions about greek life and promote the greek system.

"Everybody seemed to have a good time and all the events were well organized," said Barb Robel, Greek Affairs adviser.

The events will be evaluated by the participants, but the ultimate decisions in changes for next year will be at the discretion of Panhellenic Council and Interfraternity Council, she said.

Greek Affairs will donate the proceeds from Greek Week to the Manhattan United Way, after expenses are paid, Robel said.

The team of Alpha Xi Delta, Theta Xi and Lambda Chi Alpha finished second overall and the team of Delta Delta Delta, Kappa Sigma and Delta Upsilon placed third.

Aggieville renovation approved

By Craig Hamrick
Collegian Reporter

After receiving approval from the Manhattan City Commission, an Aggieville renovation plan including new sidewalks, street lights, benches and decorative archways is one step closer to being implemented.

The city commission approved the $1.95 million renovation plan for the shopping district, agreeing to pay 63 percent of the costs, at its meeting Wednesday.

Last November the commission rejected the plan when the cost was estimated to be $2.3 million. The revised plan excludes some residential dwellings that were in the original proposal.

Juli Salberg, executive director of the Aggieville Merchants Association, said she is happy to finally see the funding approved.

"It's just fantastic," Salberg said. "And it's really going to happen. I'm so glad I can stop calling it 'the proposed plan,' and talking about what it will be like, 'if the commission approves it.' We're all really excited about it."

The commission voted 4-1, with only Commissioner Gene Klingler opposed.

"Commissioner Klingler made it clear that he was not opposed to the plan, he was just concerned about the dollar amount," Salberg said.

Funding for the project will be split between the city and the Aggieville merchants. Under a benefit district plan, merchants will be assessed fees to pay their portion.

Before the plan could be brought before the commission, a petition signed by at least 51 percent of the merchants affected by the assessment had to be obtained. Salberg said 70 percent of the merchants signed the petition.

A committee including Salberg, five Aggieville merchants and a representative from the city revised the plan to cut the cost before resubmitting it to the commission.

Salberg said that after cutting all possible costs without sacrificing quality, the cost was still higher than they thought the commission would approve. Originally, the city was to pay two-thirds of the cost but the committee changed the proportion. The city was asked to provide up to 63 percent.

Band plays authentic jazz

Musicians entertain with classics, solos

By Doug Fall
Collegian Reviewer

The audience at McCain Auditorium got a glimpse of history Friday night. The outstanding performance of The Harlem Blues and Jazz Band will leave in the minds of many the atmosphere of an early 20th century jazz band.

At 8 p.m., the band quietly came on stage and performed a piece entitled "C-Jam Blues," that featured most of the artists individually on solos. For the next two hours, with only a 15-minute break, The Harlem Blues and Jazz Band entertained the audience with stunning renditions of jazz classics and solos by all of the members.

One of the most amazing aspects of the band's performance was the realization that these musicians are some of the original jazz musicians who played in the 1920s and 1930s.

Where many bands combine a variety of experience and generations, The Harlem Blues and Jazz Band is 100 percent authentic jazz musicians, all of whom at one time played with the likes of Nat "King" Cole, "Fats" Waller, Louis Armstrong, and Duke Ellington.

Manager Al Vollmer has rightfully called the musicians "national treasures," and seeks to have their contributions to jazz recognized and respected within their lifetimes.

Following the opening, George Kelly took the vocals to lead the band in a heart-warming version of "Kansas City Here I Come," which the crowd loved. Other songs that received strong crowd reactions were "What a Wonderful Life," sung by John Letman, and "Caravan," which featured John Blowers on a drum solo. Blowers' solo cleared the stage as he brought his drums down to almost a complete silence and then back to life at the end of the piece.

Laurel Watson appeared next and sang a few pieces, such as "I'm Confessing That I Love You."

Light danced on the walls from her dress as she demonstrated her vocal prowess. At one time, she was in front of the bands of Count Basie and Duke Ellington.

The evening was filled with an electricity created by the energy of these musicians. It was hard to believe, from listening to the powerful music, that the average age of the band members is more than 70.

At one point, Letman even exclaimed that he wanted to live forever, summing up the zest the band, as a whole, had for the music. The audience seemed to be completely charmed by these performers who exhibited such a joy to be playing.

Members of The Harlem Blues and Jazz Band are John Letman on trumpet, Candy Ross on trombone, George Kelly on tenor saxophone, Charlie Bateman on piano, Al Casey on guitar, Vishnu Wood on bass, Blowers and Laurel Watson singing vocals.

Organizing and managing the band is Al Vollmer, a practicing New York orthodontist, whose intense love for the music led him, along with Clyde Bernhardt, to form the band in 1973. The band has varied from seven to nine members throughout its history, and has toured extensively in the U.S. and Western Europe.

As The Harlem Blues and Jazz Band finished its final number, the crowd response was so overwhelming that it came back on to perform two encores, including the classic "When the Saints Go Marching In."

The Harlem Blues and Jazz Band certainly demonstrated just what authentic jazz music is made of. The overwhelming talent and experience possessed by these musicians created an atmosphere of magic which took the audience back to the 1920s and 1930s jazz heyday. The band's efforts should go a long way in earning the recognition it deserves in the world of jazz.

Fears of repression raised by violence in Honduras

By The Associated Press

TEGUCIGALPA, Honduras — A surge in violence has raised fears of a leftist revolt and renewed repression by rightist death squads in Honduras, which is squeezed between a civil war in El Salvador and a dying insurgency in Nicaragua.

Since Jan. 7, bombings have injured 10 people, three U.S. soldiers have been wounded in attacks on American troops, and three people have been assassinated.

Honduran officials, however, are quick to point out that the level of violence remains low by Central American standards.

"We are not in the middle of a communal war," said President Jose Azcona Hoyo in an interview with The Associated Press. "Health and education are more serious problems than violence."

But four bombings since Feb. 18 prompted the chief of the armed forces, Gen. Humberto Regalado, to announce Thursday increased internal security and vigilance at public buildings.

Americans are "briefed to keep a reasonable profile and be cautious in their daily lives," said U.S. Embassy spokesman Charles Barclay. He said the instructions had not changed since shots were fired at a military convoy on Feb. 1 and a bomb was tossed at a bus Feb. 18.

About 1,200 U.S. troops are stationed at Palmerola's Enrique Sotocano Air Base, and National Guard troops take part in frequent exercises. Honduras received about $1.15 billion in U.S. civil and military aid from 1981 to 1988.

Set like a keystone between Nicaragua, El Salvador and Guatemala, Honduras has frequently been involved in border problems and regional disputes, most recently by helping U.S.-supported Contra rebels trying to overthrow the leftist Sandinista government of Nicaragua.

"Honduras has been the big loser in Central America," said Efrain Diaz Arrivillaga, presidential candidate of the small Christian Democratic party in elections set for Nov. 26.

Some of the violence can be pinned on leftist groups like the Cinchonero guerrillas, but internal political disputes, drug trafficking and Machiavellian revenge theories also circulate, creating an atmosphere of uncertainty.

No group has claimed responsibility for the most recent bombings.

Carlos Montoya, president of the Honduran Congress, said they "are related to conflicts of an internal order."

He claimed the bombings are linked to drug trafficking and a recent police takeover at the Central Penitentiary, where guards were accused of taking payoffs. He refused to elaborate.

The most significant killing, that of Gen. Gustavo Alvarez Martinez on Jan. 25, was thoroughly professional. He was blasted by six gunmen who knew his routine, and the Cinchoneros promptly claimed responsibility.

Alvarez, head of the military from 1982 to 1984, played godfather to the Contras. He was dumped by fellow officers and made an apparently genuine conversion to evangelical Christianity, carrying a Bible and refusing armed guards.

Storm rages on Atlantic

By The Associated Press

LISBON, Portugal — A fierce storm in the Atlantic Ocean sank or disabled eight ships on Sunday, and rescue workers said eight people drowned and 25 were missing and presumed dead. At least 80 people were rescued.

The storm, which battered a wide section of the Atlantic from Britain to Spain, produced winds up to 80 mph and 30-foot waves.

In Spain, strong winds knocked over billboards and blew off parts of roofs, killing five people in the eastern city of Valencia and two more in central Valladolid, Spanish National Radio reported. A man drowned when his canoe overturned in the Trasona reservoir in northern Spain, the radio reported.

Two vessels sank during the storm and one ran aground.

In the most serious incident, a Nigerian cargo ship with 46 people aboard developed engine trouble two miles off Cape Espichel, Portugal, a rocky promontory.

Gale-force winds and 16-foot waves then drove the 3,000-ton ship, the River Gurara, onto the rocks, a spokesman for the Portuguese navy said.

A Portugese frigate picked up 27 people, including three women and three children, from lifeboats, said the spokesman. Rescue workers recovered eight bodies but called off their search for the 11 people still missing.

A Singapore-registered freighter, the Anna Leonhardt, issued a distress call and sank off France's Atlantic coast Saturday, and rescue workers searched fruitlessly Sunday for 14 sailors who were aboard.

"I think there's no longer any chance to find them," said Francois Reuillot, director of the Regional Operational Rescue Center in Morbihan in western France. Several hours later, the search was called off.

Reuillot said the captain radioed late Saturday to say he and the crew were abandoning the sinking ship in heavy seas about 220 miles west of Bordeaux. The cause of the Anna Leonhardt's distress was not clear.

Reuillot said searchers found debris from the 3,895-ton ship, including lifeboats and life rafts. The search was hampered by howling winds and 30-foot waves.

Tugboats from the Lisbon Port Authority towed a Bulgarian cargo ship to shore after it caught fire and was listing badly in heavy seas about six miles off Lisbon. Officials were unable to say how many people were aboard the Voyana, but they said four people from the ship were injured, none seriously.

An unidentified Libyan vessel with 30 people aboard had engine trouble off northern Portugal and was towed to shore by a tugboat from Vigo, Spain.

Off the coast of Santander in northern Spain, a passing fishing vessel rescued the 13-man crew of the Santo Cristo de Festerrat after the Spanish fishing boat sank in high seas.

Another Spanish fishing vessel, the Agosare, was towed to the northern port of Gijon after it reported it was in danger 25 miles off the northern Spanish coast, said Spanish maritime officals. They did not know how many were aboard.

Two other vessels were disabled by the storm off Britain.

A lifeboat crew from Wales rescued five fishermen from their vessel, which was drifting toward coastal rocks in heavy seas and high winds, rescue authorities said.

A helicopter from the Brawdy Royal Air Force base in Wales flew out to a Soviet trawler battered by 30-foot waves 260 miles out in the Atlantic and winched aboard a crewman who suffered serious arm injuries on the boat.

icantly by having future industries considering Manhattan and additional students attending K-State."

"I think the broadcast is great," said Lori Wempe, manager at Merry-Go-Round. "It will be a good opportunity for everyone to broaden the 'little town' image we have and see us as a big city."

Manhattan Town Center is hosting "Business Before Hours" in conjunction with the live telecast, Heavey said. About 500 people — members of the Manhattan Chamber of Commerence, city and county commissioners, and various governmental department heads from the Manhattan area — have been invited to a special breakfast prior to the telecast. Although these Manhattan citizens will be in the mall during the broadcast, they will be outside of the filming perimeter.

"We will not stage customer traffic," Heavey said. "CBS has stated that the staging of something occuring is not 'news.' Although I think it would have been great to have shown across the nation our typical customers and the things that we do at Manhattan Town Center on a normal basis."

CBS said they could not discuss the architectural merits of a building when it is packed with people, Heavey said.

"This business anymore is a lot of show business and customer service," Heavey said. "Malls are and should be here to entertain that customer. Hopefully a customer comes in and spends more money if it does its job."

"Twelve years ago, I gave up spirits. I used to be a pretty good scotch drinker. I haven't tasted scotch in 12 years. After that I had only wine, and perhaps an occasional martini, occasionally a little vodka with smoked salmon, cavier, something like that. That was just occasionally.

"I really essentially (have) been a wine drinker. Now my only consumption is wine at meals. I don't drink wine ... unless I'm eating."

was near for the suspects, who are accused of shipping drugs from Southeast Asia's "Golden Triangle" via Hong Kong to Los Angeles, where the heroin was trucked across the country.

Wiretaps indicated that Woo, 71, a prominent businessman in Manhattan's Chinatown, believed he was under surveillance; two other busts of the operation turned up 183 pounds of heroin in Boston and more than 100 pounds in Los Angeles.

"This guy Peter Woo is hurting," Fox said. "His friends are out all the heroin, plus the money. I think his people are going to be kind of upset, don't you?"

While a bust of this size will hurt the heroin trade, Maloney acknowledged it was no death blow.

"We're making heavy dents, but there's always somebody waiting to step in and take over," said Maloney.

Committee hears debate on censorship bill

By Nancy Hill
City Editor

TOPEKA — Members of the House Education Committee and about 80 people packed a room at the State Capitol to hear arguments on a bill that would limit administrative censorship of high school publications.

House Bill 2234 — "the student freedom of expression act" — was submitted in response to the 1988 Supreme Court's Hazelwood v. Kuhlmeier decision. The court's 5-3 decision placed limits on the students' rights to determine what is suitable content for school sponsored publications.

The proposed legislation is designed to guard school officials and school districts against liability while reinstating freedom of the press for high school journalists.

Supporters from across the state, including journalism instructors, professional journalists and high school and college students, spoke in favor of the bill. Their efforts were coordinated by Dave Adams, Kansas Scholastic Press Association legislative committee member and director of Student Publications Inc. at K-State.

Adams said students should be allowed to publish stories about sensitive issues such as divorce, AIDS and suicide and freely voice opinions about administration policies.

"This bill will give the students back what rightfully should not have been taken away," said Martin Puntney, managing editor, Arkansas City Traveler. "Administrators' concerns have little to do with responsible journalism, only with comfort — their comfort."

Linda Puntney, director of public relations at Cowley County Community College, said the bill was not radical legislation.

"It protects the rights of school districts as well as the students," she said. "A responsible press should be as free as an underground press."

Susan Coughenhour, journalism teacher at Shawnee Mission Northwest, expressed concerned about students imposing "self-censorship" because of the Hazelwood decision.

"I see my students falling prey to superficial reporting — a fear of revealing facts that aren't so positive," she said.

Students should have the right to ask questions and report on controversial issues and the "ugly side of life," Coughenhour said.

Ted Rippey, University of Kansas freshman and former award-winning high school editor, said "controversial issues do arise, but the solution is cooperation, not censorship."

During questioning, Jackie Engel, executive secretary from the Kansas Scholastic Press, said principals of more than 20 schools in Kansas censor all copy printed in student publications.

In addition, Engel said the national hotline at the Student Press Law Center in Washington, D.C., which fields questions from student advisers and students about libelous material, has experienced a 22 percent increase in calls since the Hazelwood decision.

She called the censorship issue a "scare syndrome," frightening both students and advisers.

Gerald Henderson, executive director of the administrators' organization, and Pat Baker, lobbyist with the Kansas Association of School Boards, spoke in opposition.

Baker said legal problems were present in the proposed bill, and current Kansas legislation concerning freedom of the press was already much broader than the rights guaranteed in the U.S. Constitution.

"We're not asking the committee to endorse censorship, but I have grave concerns in legal areas," Baker said.

The main concern raised by the committee was responsibility for libelous statements if a suit were to be filed against a minor. The bill would free the school from liability for the publication.

Rep. Katha Hurt said she supports the bill and thinks the committee is in general support of the legislation.

"I have more faith in our students (than the opposition)," she said. "We have the safeguards we need."

If the chairman of the committee calls the bill to vote and it is approved, the proposal must be ready for the House by early next week for legislators.

Since the Hazelwood decision, Massachusetts has approved legislation similar to H.B. 2234. Six additional states are considering student free speech legislation.

Features Editor Lisa Pfannenstiel contributed to this report.

Concerns surround space limits

Hobrock: Main campus library to be full by 1993

By Nancy Prosser
Staff Writer

Limited space in Farrell Library is causing administrators and students a considerable amount of concern, said Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries.

"In 1993, the library building that is on the main campus will be full," Hobrock said.

Hobrock said space requirements through the year 2000 for the University of Kansas, Wichita State University and K-State libraries were studied by the consulting firm Pete Marwick.

The report found K-State's library space to be sufficient, but recommended removing the enrollment center in the basement and adding 10,000 square feet of book space in Nichols Hall basement.

"Without the allowance of space in Nichols, we would be full today," Hobrock said.

The report did not consider the ability of some floors in the library to support book stacks, he said.

"The report was seriously flawed," Hobrock said.

Officials regarded the report as inaccurate, but legislators did not, he said.

"Also at that time, the State Division of Architecture Services did a report that said the floors in the reading rooms could hold stacks, which we know now that they can't," he said.

Researching ways to improve facilities and services at Farrell Library is the main focus of a student group called Students Help Enhance Library Funds. The organization is attempting to make legislators aware of the situation.

"We needed more space in Farrell yesterday," said J.D. Llewelyn, SHELF member and junior in business administration. "Right now, SHELF is in the research stage.

"I know that what SHELF is doing now won't have any impact on fiscal year 1990. We are still in the learning stages, but the problems in the library need to be brought out as a concern of the students of K-State."

Lack of funds has forced the library to cut subscriptions to 1,640 professional journals.

"That is way below our peer libraries, and unlike our peers, we are not a member of the Association of Research Libraries," Llewelyn said.

Farrell Library has a yearly budget of $5.7 million, Hobrock said. Were the library to enter ARL, that budget would have to increase to $8.5 million and stay at that level for four years.

"The maintenance and entry level budgets for the ARL are different," he said. "The reason that budgets have to increase to become an ARL member is because the number of periodicals and journals that we subscribe to has to increase."

KU's library has been a member of ARL since its founding, said Janet Riley, library budget director. The KU library has an annual budget of $7.6 million, $350,000 of which is allocated through Margin of Excellence funds.

Provost James Coffman said K-State allocated $140,000 of MOE funds for the library.

K-State budget director John Struve said another $200,000 is "being internally allocated to the library from department budgets across the campus."

The library's long-term plans include improving access systems, collections and services, Hobrock said.

"In the area of service, we are 20 classified staff members behind our peer institutions," he said.

"The library currently has 756 seats for a student population of 17,838," Llewelyn said. "That's about 4.3 percent. A standard library can accommodate 25 percent, but I think that at this point we would settle for 10 percent, or about 300 more seats."

Speaker to focus on religious liberation

By Karen Allen
Staff Writer

Religious organizations trying to suppress liberation movements in Latin America will be the focus of tonight's Lou Douglas Lecture, to be delivered by internationally known theologian and civil libertarian John Swomley at 7:30 in Union Forum Hall.

Swomley, professor of social ethics at St. Paul School of Theology in Kansas City, will speak on "Religion and Politics: Collaboration Against Liberation."

Swomley said organizations suppressing the movements in Latin America include the Vatican, pro-Israeli groups, the Institute on Religion and Democracy, and right-wing fundamentalist groups such as Campus Crusade.

The Israeli groups, which are supported by major Jewish lobbying efforts, are "training people in counterinsurgengy operations in both Latin America and South Africa," he said.

Bob Linder, professor of history, said the concept of liberation theology is the "application of the Bible to the problems of the poor in Latin America."

Linder said Swomley was one of the "best-known, oldest civil rights activists.

"He has a long history of struggling for causes for unpopular people."

In 1973, Swomley organized clergy and civil libertarians to participate in non-violent resistance to the Marcos dictatorship in the Philippines.

Swomley, who is also chairman of the American Civil Liberties Union church-state committee, has supported religious liberty through lectures and published works. He is the author of eight books, one of which was published in 1987. It is titled "Religious Liberty and The Secular State: The Constitutional Context."

Property damaged in snowball fight among fraternities

By Chris Koger
Staff Writer

A snowball fight involving eight fraternities Sunday resulted in an estimated $5,000 damage to four of them.

Pi Kappa Alpha, Delta Tau Delta, Sigma Phi Epsilon and Kappa Sigma fraternities each had windows broken during the fight, which lasted from 4 p.m. to 4:45 p.m., according to K-State Police reports.

Several car windows were broken in the fight, in which apples, rocks and ice chunks as well as snowballs were thrown, according to the report.

Richard Herrman, police investigator, said nobody has been charged in the altercation because no individuals have been named by the fraternities.

"The fraternities are corporations, and the law states a corporation cannot be held responsible for the actions of its members," Herrman said. "We have to be able to charge a certain individual, but the fraternities haven't given us any names, just other fraternities."

Four other fraternities were listed on the police report as having been involved in the fight, but Herrman said it is unsure how they were involved. They are Sigma Chi, Acacia, Alpha Gamma Rho and Phi Kappa Theta.

"There are a lot of people pointing fingers at the other houses, but we need someone to come forward and give us a certain name," he said. "We need a witness or officer who saw it."

A copy of the police report was sent to Barb Robel, Greek Affairs adviser, Monday, Herrman said.

Robel said she had not received the report and was unable to comment on the situation.

She said she could not speculate on what actions, if any, would be taken by Greek Affairs.

Tom Hemmer, president of the Interfraternity Council, said he plans to contact the presidents of the fraternities involved.

"This is a situation where the police can't do much, because we don't know who started what," Hemmer said. "Hopefully we can get it settled between the fraternities."

The campus police have dealt with fraternity snowball fights since the first snow, Herrman said.

"We've sent reports to Greek Affairs about this before, but this shows snowball fights haven't slowed down," he said. "We have problems dealing with the fights, because they are on private property. Without a formal complaint, we have no right to be there."

Presidents at the fraternities not damaged said they weren't involved in the fight.

Europe donates $37.8 million

BRUSSELS, Belgium — The European Economic Community and its member states have given $37.8 million for victims of the earthquake in Armenia.

The community gave $11.4 million in emergency aid, and all 12 member states, except Italy, donated additional aid totaling $26.4 million, the EEC said.

Total foreign assistance for victims of the Dec. 7 earthquake was $65.7 million, the commission said.

The community and its members sent thousands of tents, blankets, heating and power equipment, beds, medical equipment, medicines, clothes, prefabricated buildings and vehicles to Armenia by air and road.

Venezuelans riot over prices

CARACAS, Venezuela — Angry mobs across Venezuela set fire to cars and buses, battled police and national guardsmen, and looted hundreds of stores on Monday to protest increases in gasoline prices and transportation fares.

The wave of riots injured at least 200 people alone in Caracas and the Guarenas shantytown 30 miles east of the capital, a police report said. Rioting broke out in at least seven cities and towns and independent reports estimated damage nationwide to be in the millions of dollars.

Sackings continued in downtown Caracas at nightfall and public transportation ground to a halt, leaving about 100,000 commuters stranded, officials said. Many employees remained in their offices, while a pitched battle went on between police and looters.

"It is a popular uprising. There are riots everywhere. They are all furious," Metropolitan Police Inspector Jose Lara Montilla, who commanded a police unit armed with shotguns in downtown Caracas, told an Associated Press reporter.

OAKLAND, Calif. — The still-spry Nicholas Brothers, who performed an acrobatic tap routine in the 1943 film "Stormy Weather," danced their way into the Black Filmmakers Hall of Fame.

Harold and Fayard Nicholas received a standing ovation Sunday with an impromptu tap routine after a clip of the movie was shown during the 16th annual awards ceremony at the Paramount Theatre.

The brothers got their start in vaudeville in 1928 at ages 10 and 7.

Others honored included Alvin Ailey, a choreographer and teacher who received the Paul Robeson Medal for outstanding achievement in theater arts.

'Mother' gets Truman award

INDEPENDENCE, Mo. — Clara Hale, an 83-year-old New York City woman who cares for drug-addicted babies, has been named the 1989 winner of the Truman Award for Public Service.

Her choice was announced Monday by a selection commission including Barbara Potts, mayor of Independence, the Kansas City suburb that was the home of the late President Harry Truman.

Hale is the founder of Hale House, a refuge for infants and toddlers born chemically dependent. She and her daughter, Lorraine Hale, will attend an award ceremony at the Truman Library and Museum on May 6.

Clara Hale raised more than 40 children as a foster parent in Harlem from 1941 to 1968. The following year her daughter met a woman and her addicted baby and referred them to her mother for care. Since then "Mother Hale" has provided a home for more than 600 babies born to addicted mothers.

Madam sentenced to 2 years

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — A woman accused of running a prostitution ring out of her condominium in the Kansas City suburb of Overland Park was sentenced Monday to two years in federal prison.

Sharon Crisano, 46, pleaded guilty in December to violating a federal law against enticing a person to cross state lines for the purpose of prostitution, as well as to filing a false income tax return.

She was sentenced Monday by U.S. District Judge Dale Saffels, who also ordered her to pay back taxes on income not reported on her 1985 and 1986 federal tax returns.

The charges against Crisano, who had a previous misdemeanor conviction in Johnson County for prostitution, came after an investigation by Overland Park police, the FBI and the Internal Revenue Service. Authorities said she was running a well-organized prostitution ring out of the condo she bought in 1985.

They said as many as 25 women at a time were working for her in an operation that catered mainly to businessmen and professionals. Several of her employees lived in Missouri and crossed the state line to work at the condominium, officials said.

Woman dies in Newton fire

NEWTON — An elderly woman died in a fire in the bathroom of her home here Monday, authorities said.

Leah R. Borchardt, 71, was found dead on the floor of the bathroom shortly after firefighters arrived at 10:46 a.m., said Detective Bruce Jolliff of the Newton Police Department.

An autopsy showed she died of smoke inhalation, he said.

The cause of the fire had not been determined, but the state fire marshal ruled that it started accidentally, Jolliff said.

Ebony Theatre 'received well'

K-State's Ebony Theatre Company returned from the weekend's American College Theatre Festival in Lawrence as regional winner for its production of "Wait 'Til Morning."

Anne Butler, adviser to the company, said the group was also invited to perform selected scenes from "The Colored Museum."

"The group was received very well," she said.

Tom McLaughlin, graduate student in speech and director of the production "Wait 'Til Morning," said although the company's performance won the regional competition, it would not be going to the national competition in Washington, D.C.

"They gave us strong feedback," McLaughlin said. "We had a very strong performance."

In addition to the 18 students who went to the festival with the Ebony Theatre Company, about 10 students auditioned for the Irene Ryan Acting Scholarship.

Harold Nichols, professor of speech, said five students made it into the semifinal portion of the competition. Two students, Kelli Wondra, graduate student in speech, and Wendy Walburn, junior in theater, were finalists.

Nichols said: "It's very unusual for that many students to make it that far in the competition. (K-State tends) to do very well, but this year was exceptional."

Selection process mutual in job search

By Britt Owen
Collegian Reporter

People interviewing for a job should ask their prospective employers what qualities they should possess, other than the required skills and experience, said Marilyn Moats Kennedy, managing partner for Career Strategies.

Kennedy, who is also job strategy editor for Glamour magazine, a consultant for companies across the United States and a writer for Graduate Engineer, spoke Monday at four sessions about resumes, interviews, undecided careers and the hidden job market.

"Interviewing is really a simple process if you realize you are screening them as much as they are screening you," Kennedy said. "If they are not dying to have you, what makes you think you won't be utterly miserable in six months?"

It is a mutual selection process, she said.

Working temporarily at different companies is the best way to find what job a person might be interested in, Kennedy said. This way, a person can find out the internal structure of the company.

"The fast track exists, but with companies with less than 2,500 employees," Kennedy said.

Small companies have more room for advancement in jobs than do larger companies, she said. Smaller companies should be established for five to 10 years, have a profit of less than $100 million and have greater than 20 percent growth.

A very strong foundation in basic courses, computer skills, leadership skills and research skills are qualities every person interviewing should have, she said.

"If you are not computer litcrate, you do not exist," Kennedy said.

A person should replace his or her weaknesses with strengths, she said. For example, low grades can be downplayed with experiences in a particular field.

Kennedy said people should practice interviewing in front of a video camera to get comfortable with the image they present.

She said people should be persistent after the interview by following up with calls to the company to find out how the search for the position is going.

"A rejection does not mean not ever. It means not today," Kennedy said.

Interviewees should continue checking associations of the company, a list of past employers or the Alumni Association to determine more contacts.

The best way to find out what a company is looking for in the people it hires is to write the public relations department of the company and ask for the background information of its employees, she said.

"Visibility is the issue and it becomes so from day one," Kennedy said. "Ultimately, what you major in doesn't matter. It's what you do with it that matters."

Personnel director named

Goals, projects set to promote department's programs

By Joe Kennedy
Collegian Reporter

After a national search conducted by an eight-member committee which reviewed 69 applicants, K-State has named Rosalind Fisher as the new director of personnel services.

The appointment becomes effective Wednesday, said George Miller, vice president for administration and finance.

Fisher has been the acting director of personnel services since October, when former director Jerre Fercho became assistant to the vice president for administration and finance.

The personnel director is responsible for the University's personnel program, including employment, position management services, staff training and development, employee benefits and records, employee relations, and information management, Miller said.

In the past year, Fisher has demonstrated exceptional skill in the general area of personnel services, he said, adding that Fisher's belief that personnel services should be a resource to departments and individual employees will be beneficial to the program.

"As acting director, one shows a reluctance to make any shifts in the program," Miller said. "Now that she is director, we will be working through a new set of goals and objectives for the operation of the personnel program.

"I am rather excited in terms of where we could take personnel services as far as departments and employees go."

Fisher said: "Promoting the use of the services provided by the personnel program for the University employees is one of the first goals of mine.

"We want to be customer-service oriented. A lot of people see us as being tied to regulations. Although we need to follow the regulations, we can sometimes help people use alternatives to solve their problems."

Fisher said she is updating the employee handbook to make it easier for University employees to understand their rights and responsibilities.

Several new programs, such as an employee assistance program, a program for a drug-free work place, a program to prevent racial harassment and a governor's training program, are not mentioned in the older version of the book, but should be, she said.

A project which may be implemented in the future is a human resource management system which would allow personnel services to computerize personnel transactions, decreasing the amount of paperwork, Fisher said.

She came to K-State last year after being the employee relations and training manager at the University of Nebraska, Lincoln.

Rock star Eddie Money, whose recently released single "Love in Your Eyes" advanced to No. 25 on the top 40 charts this week, will perform at 7:30 p.m. March 29 in Bramlage Coliseum.

It is the second single released from the LP "Nothing to Lose," which made it to the No. 5 spot on the album charts. The song features a saxophone solo by Danny Hull and follows the album's first successful release "Walk on Water."

Coliseum Director Charlie Thomas said his staff has been looking for acts that would appeal more to the students and he believes Money is that type of musician.

While Thomas said Money "won't sell out as fast as Def Leppard," he is confident the concert will be a success.

The show will be Bramlage's first "halfway" concert, with the stage set up so that Money plays only to the chairback seats, he said. This setup allows for about 8,000 tickets to be sold.

"Money wanted to play to a smaller audience," Thomas said. "He's happy with a compact house ... with a lot of people in a condensed area."

Thomas said he is all for halfway concerts because they allow for more alternative and "up and coming" groups.

"Groups like INXS started out in smaller halls. It enables them to grow," he said.

A former New York City policeman, the Brooklyn-born Money struck it big in the music world in 1977 with his self-titled debut album which went platinum. Two singles on the album, "Baby Hold On" and "Two Tickets to Paradise," contributed to its success.

In 1986, he released "Can't Hold Back," which included the hits "I Wanna Go Back," "Take Me Home Tonight" and "Endless Nights."

Tickets for the concert will go on sale Wednesday. They will cost $14 plus a service charge and will be available at the Bramlage Coliseum box office; Middle Earth records, Junction City; Mother Earth records, Topeka; the House of Sight and Sound, Salina; and the ITR Office at Ft. Riley.

Party animal image appropriate for Tower

Commentary

Mark Schmeller
Collegian Columnist

I know a good man when I see one. So does George Bush. And we can both see that John Tower is just the man to head the Department of Defense. And don't give me any of this drinking-and-a-womanizing crap.

John Tower happens to be my hero.

He stands at around five foot two, with his flabby, amorphous body stuffed into an expensive but poorly fitting suit. His round, jowl-laden face, topped off by a head of dyed-black hair, makes him look like Yoda with a two-dollar toupee.

I mean, I'm no Tom Cruise or anything. I have these bags under my eyes and my hair is a mess. I'm not exactly Adonis personified. But if the last woman on earth had to choose between me and John Tower, I think I would probably, provided I kept my mouth shut, win out.

Nevertheless, Tower has what The New Republic magazine calls, "a knack for charming women" and is well known in Washington as the Spuds MacKenzie of the Senate and the party animal of the Potomac.

During his 1987 divorce, he was accused of having three affairs, one of them with his maid. While in Geneva as one of President Reagan's arms control negotiators, he was reported to have been seen dancing on a tabletop with a drunk ballerina.

And that's why John Tower is my hero. He's an inspiration to all us not-so-great-looking guys.

No longer do you have to look like Gary Hart, Jack Kennedy or Dan Quayle to score with women. With a few drinks, a dab of Grecian Formula and a high standing in the military-industrial complex, any guy can be a ladies' man.

John Tower is living proof, a role model for all us budding Cassanovas. In other words, I want to cruise for chicks with this guy.

Apparently the Senate Armed Services Committee Democrats don't see it the same way. They pooled their 11 votes to defeat Tower's nomination over nine Republican votes last week.

Why? I think the Democrats are jealous. Tower probably sees more action on a good weekend than the whole committee sees in a decade. And he can probably drink Committee Chairman Sam Nunn under the table.

From Kennedy to Hart, Democrats have held the reputation as the partying party. The Republicans, on the other hand, are the deadbeats and the duds, the party whose idea of a good time amounts to golf, horseshoe pitching, wood chopping and country music.

John Tower is an obvious threat to that image, and the Democrats are up in arms; their territory has been threatened.

In order to quell the fears and jealousies of the Democrats, Tower promised he wouldn't take a single drink as Secretary of Defense. Sure, he didn't say anything about cutting back on the women, but he's a single guy and this is, after all, still a free country.

I'm of two minds about this pledge. On the one hand, it restores my faith in our government, especially the Republican Party. The Tower pledge once again proves that our leaders are not the self-serving politicos they are often made out to be.

In the past month, Congress has refused to take a pay raise and "Drug Czar" William Bennet has promised to quit smoking. And now, John Tower has promised to give up the bottle. What more could we ask of our altruistic and selfless leaders?

On the other hand, how are we going to keep attracting qualified and talented individuals into public service if we don't allow them to have any fun? No smokes, no drinks, no women, no money ... does this sound like the kind of job that's going to draw the best and the brightest? What fringe benefits are left for our leaders to enjoy? What kind of fun could working for the government be if you can't have a few drinks and chase a few skirts after a hard day's work at the Environmental Protection Agency or the General Accounting Office?

Moreover, exactly how are Tower's drinking and womanizing going to keep him from doing his job? I think our government needs more people like John Tower, and not just because he's a role model for guys like me. Let me be the first to say that we need more drinkers and womanizers in Washington.

After all, if Tower is so charming with women, just think how he'll deal with the Russian bear. We need a man who can go vodka for vodka with Gorbo and make Raisa swoon. I mean, I can't picture George Bush or Dan Quayle being able to do that.

But John Tower? You bet. In addition, the job of Secretary of Defense is a stressful one. I know that I don't want some pent-up bundle of nerves in charge of missiles, armies and battleships. Because drinking and sex are known stress-relievers, I can't think of a man more capable of keeping a cool head in a national emergency than John Tower.

Of course, there's this little matter of Tower making more than a million dollars as a "consultant" for the defense industry since he left the Senate in 1985.

But by Pentagon standards, he works for peanuts. If we use the Pentagon base price of a $10 hammer for $300, it only follows that the million dollars Tower made from the defense industry is only worth around $33,000 in real dollars.

That means Tower only made around $8,300 a year over four years. That's nothing! A paltry sum for the great service he gave our country. A man capable of this kind of selfless devotion to public service deserves my support and yours. Write your senators today.

Telefund donations good sign for K-State

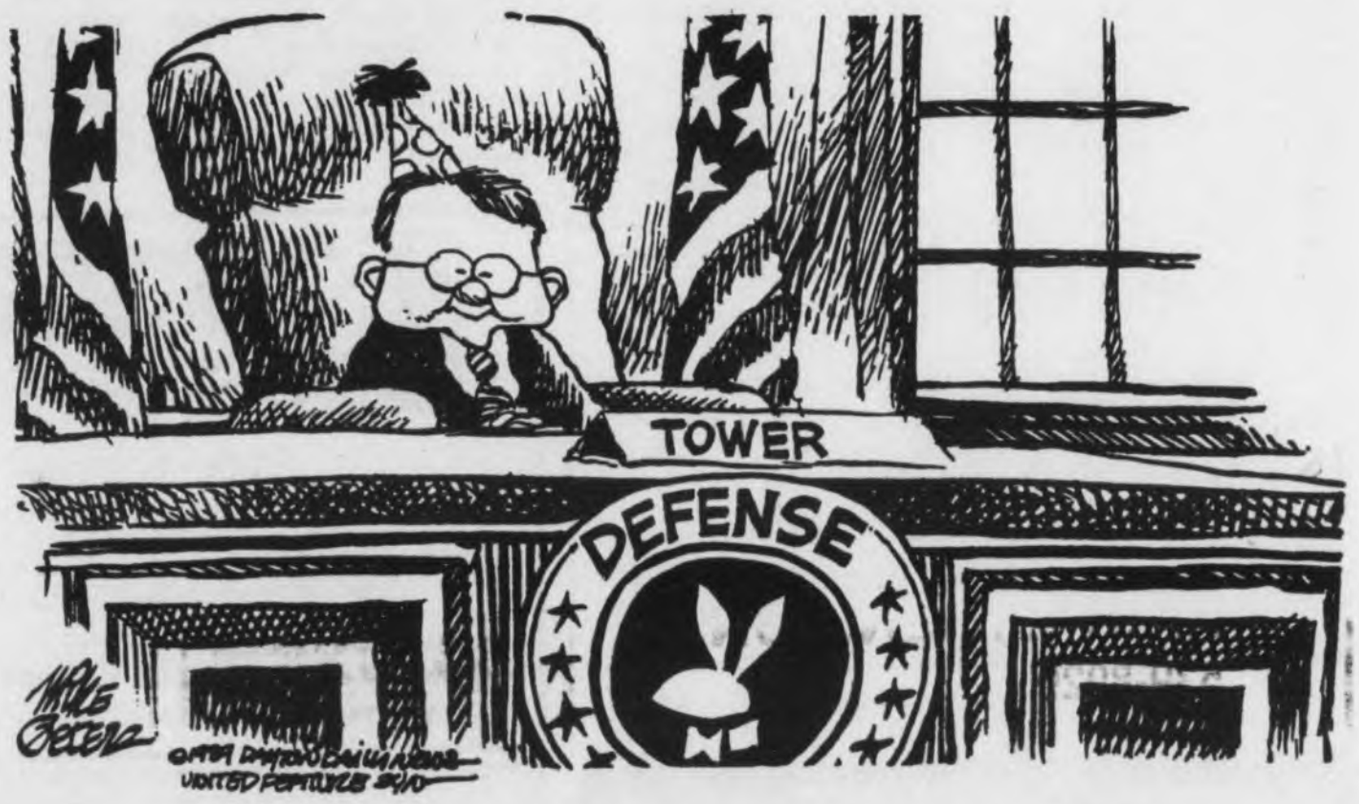
Once again K-State alumni have shown that when it comes to purple pride, they're not afraid to back it up with a little green.

Green being money — and a lot of it.

The 1989 Telefund was a definite success with all eight colleges receiving record numbers of donations. Overall, about $575,570 was raised, passing last year's academic total by almost $90,000. While all of the colleges had increased donations, the College of Arts and Sciences, with the largest alumni base, received the most pledges for a total of $151,035.

The continued strong participation of K-State alumni in the Telefund is very important for all students, as well as for the entire University. It's important, especially since the majority of funds raised from the Telefund donations will go toward funding student scholarships.

And student scholarships are the fuel behind continued academic excellence and increased student enrollment at K-State.



While the support of the alumni is promising, it can't go without saying that the majority of the money would probably never be received without the efforts of more than 1,200 student and faculty volunteers.

And it's these volunteers who keep the green in our purple.

The volunteers donate their time to contact alumni requesting pledges. These volunteers are already active members of the campus community, and the Telefund process is an encouraging sign for the future of the K-State Telefund and K-State scholarship programs.

ICC not plagued by problems

Commentary

Donna Davis
Guest Columnist

Editor's note: Donna Davis is the director of the International Student Center.

In 20-plus years of reading the Collegian, I cannot recall another instance where guest column space was provided so one individual could make a personal attack against another. It seems a dangerous precedent-setting behavior for an award-winning publication.

It also suggests some kind of soap opera mentality among the editorial staff when International Coordinating Council can only get gossip coverage. Last year, our entire International Week went uncovered by the Collegian, as have the activities of this year's ICC member organizations. Some positive support from the staff would be a welcome change.

ICC is not plagued with internal problems. We have one single problem, and the meeting Lucy Athanasius wrote about was filled with tensions and an exchange of differing opinions as we addressed this problem.

The regular members stayed more than two hours beyond adjournment time because they wanted to settle the problem themselves and keep it within the group. Athanasius is not a regular member, nor has she ever been. At most, she has attended two meetings during the past two or three years.

Having no sense of identity with ICC, she chose not to respect the members' wishes and instead made our problems quite public. That is her choice. I do wish she had not so misquoted or taken out of context things I did and did not say.

ICC's problem is one individual who very badly wanted to be elected president. When he was not, the group by acclamation allowed him to be vice president.

He accepted, but continues to be unhappy and sees me as responsible even though I do not vote, make campaign speeches or offer opinions during elections. Since then, he has spent a great deal of time involving himself and three or four friends in activities that are misrepresentative and hurtful to the organization.

Athanasius said in her column that I was inebriated with power after being ICC adviser for 10 years. Actually, it has been only seven years and I have no illusions about any power to be gained from my position.

ICC is made up of a small group of people who meet but once a month. These few committed individuals work very, very hard to bring to our campus cultural awareness and a better understanding of the oneness we all share. Instead of power, I get from ICC a closeness with students that means a lot professionally and personally.

Athanasius quotes Laurian Cuffy, our student body president, as having very strong opinions about what my role as ICC adviser should be and how well I am doing the job. Hopefully, Laurian's words were as misquoted and badly taken out of context as mine.

If quoted accurately, I question the validity of his opinion and the source of his information. Cuffy does not attend ICC meetings.

I would like to invite the Collegian editor, Athanasius and the current ICC vice president and his friends to pull ICC's file in the SGA office. (The vice president knows which files I mean since he's already used information from them in an attempt to illegitimize our president.)

Pull these files, make a list of every ICC officer during my tenure as adviser, then contact these people for their opinions about me as an adviser.

It is a sure bet you will not hear them saying I am the inept, power hungry, and mean-spirited person Athanasius paints me to be.

As a last comment about the column, let me say how reassuring it was to read that Athanasius has nothing personal against me and that she thinks I do a fairly good job in the office. This evaluation from someone who first of all spent nearly one-third of a page attacking me, and secondly who has had minimal contact with our office over the years will be taken for what it's worth.

In closing, I would like to thank Pat Bosco, associate vice president for institutional advancement; Susan Scott, associate dean of student life; Tom Frith, director of housing; Larry Paris and Joan Parker, both from the Foreign Student Office; and the many students, friends, and colleagues who have expressed their understanding and support since this column was printed.

Arguments flawed

Editor,

I feel compelled to respond to Dwayne Lively's ludicrous editorial about gun control in the Feb. 8 Collegian.

To start with, his Constitutional arguments were way off mark. The idea that the right to keep and bear arms should be restricted to the militia was hardly what our anti-federalist founding fathers, such as Jefferson, had in mind when they demanded that the Second Amendment be added to the Constitution. Especially when Article I, section eight and Article II, section two give the federal government the right to take control of the various state militias under several conditions. This actually happened in 1959 in Little Rock, Ark.

His arguments that gun control could save lives were little better. They were based on theory and conjecture rather than facts. The facts are that gun laws have failed much more often than they have succeeded.

He was at his worst, though, when he attempted to stereotype gun owners as a bunch of ignorant, Joe Six-pack rednecks.

In doing this, however, he reveals the real reason why he and the other cosmopolitan liberals hate guns so much. Their hatred for guns has little to do with the fact thay they kill people; after all, so do knives, baseball bats, and car bombs.

The real reason is that guns are symbols of a rural, blue collar way of life that they see as being backward and ignorant. When the truth is known, the liberal infatuation with gun control is little more than cleverly disguised ethnocentrism.

Yes, Lively, some of us rednecks actually know big words like that.

Stereo equipment stolen

Vehicles damaged by burglars

By Chris Koger
Staff Writer

About $3,200 worth of car stereo equipment and radar detectors were stolen this weekend from vehicles parked in two apartment complexes' parking lots.

Four vehicles at the Gold Key Apartments, 1005 Bluemont, and three vehicles at the Cheverly Apartments, 1200 Fremont, were broken into by an unknown person or group Saturday morning, according to Riley County Police reports.

The thefts at the Gold Key Apartments were discovered at 8 a.m. Saturday and the thefts at the Cheverly Apartments were reported around 11 a.m., according to residents at the apartment complexes.

In addition to the thefts, the burglars caused more than $2,300 in damage to the cars while breaking into them.

Riley County Police Sergeant Larry Freeby said the break-ins were probably connected.

"The apartments are in the same vicinity ... and virtually all the vehicles were entered by the same means," Freeby said.

All of the vehicles had been locked at the time of the break-ins, Freeby said. "A considerable amount of damage was done, because the vehicles were opened by punching in the locks."

Freeby said holes had been punched through the car doors around the locks, allowing the burglars to manipulate the locking mechanisms inside the doors.

"They're tearing the lock out of the door, so you can't just replace the lock; there has to be body work done to repair the locking mechanism and cover the hole in the door," Freeby said.

Edward Jacobson, junior in electrical engineering, had a radar detector stolen from his car while it was parked at the Gold Key Apartments.

"They tried to break into the passenger side first, but it didn't work, so they went to the driver's side and got in," Jacobson said.

"I'm personally thinking about getting a car alarm — it's cheaper than paying the insurance premiums if it happens again," he said.

Randy Young, sophomore in elementary education, had his speakers and radar detector stolen Saturday. This was the second time since Thanksgiving his car has been burglarized, Young said.

"I think the same people did it, because my locks were punched in the same way," he said. "And I know that several people here had their cars broken into right after Thanksgiving like I did.

"It feels like there is nothing I can do to keep it safe, because locking the doors doesn't work," he said. "I feel violated."

Tim Burnet, senior in agricultural economics, had a radar detector stolen from his car at the Cheverly Apartments.

"They took what they could, because I know another guy here had his hatchback speakers stolen, but they left his stereo," Burnet said.

Freeby said car burglaries have been an ongoing problem in Riley County.

"We have had similar car thefts the past few months."

Soviets ship military benefits worth $515 million to Nicaragua

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Soviet Union exported about $515 million worth of military equipment to Nicaragua last year, the second highest total since the Kremlin began weapons deliveries in 1980, according to a new U.S. government report.

The report says last year's delivery of 19,000 tons of equipment came during 68 ship visits to Nicaraguan ports, an average of about one every six days.

The unclassified analysis, compiled by intelligence agencies, said the peak year for Soviet arms shipments was 1986, when the Sandinistas received $550 million worth of equipment.

That was the last year Congress approved military aid for the Nicaraguan Contras.

A year ago, Congress suspended military aid to the Contras, and as the months passed, Reagan administration officials expressed deep disappointment that the Soviets did not reciprocate by cutting back on weapons shipments to the Sandinistas.

The aid suspension was quickly followed by an interim cease-fire between the Sandinistas and the Contras in late March. Subsequently, about 11,000 Contras fled to camps in Honduras along the border where the rebels are sustained by a U.S. humanitarian aid program.

The Sandinistas have contended that continued Soviet arms shipments were needed in the event the United States decided to resume military aid to the Contras.

The Kremlin has said that it would suspend arms deliveries to the Sandinistas as part of an overall ban on outside arms shipments to Central America, but the United States has shown no interest in that proposal.

The $515 million listed for 1988 is described in the report as a preliminary estimate which is subject to revision as new data become available. U.S. officials have estimated Soviet economic aid to Nicaragua at about $500 million annually.

A U.S. official, who asked not to be identified, said estimates of military aid were somewhat easier to make last year because a lack of storage space forced the Sandinistas to leave much of the equipment out in the open where it could be photographed by U.S. intelligence agencies.

The United States and the Soviet Union have shown an ability to work together on several regional conflicts, including Afghanistan, Angola-Namibia and the Iran-Iraq war.

But the superpowers remain deeply divided over Nicaragua. The United States looks on the continuing Soviet arms deliveries as the most troubling aspect of Soviet involvement in that area.

Former Assistant Secretary of State Elliott Abrams said last month before leaving office that economic decline in Nicaragua has left the Sandinista government somewhat weaker but that the weapons deliveries have made it stronger militarily.

The report said that the Sandinista army, including "active duty and mobilized militia-reserves," totaled $80,000 at the start of 1989, the same figure as a year earlier.

The Sandinista inventory also included 150 tanks, 250 other armored vehicles, 32 fixed-wing aircraft, 50 helicopters and six airfields, the report said.

Rural Kansas needs doctors

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The number of doctors practicing in Kansas increased 9 percent last year to the highest level in at least a decade, but many rural areas were still "critically underserved," according to a university report.

The report by the University of Kansas Medical Center shows that the number of rural counties rated critically underserved has nearly doubled in five years, to more than half of Kansas' 105 counties.

The report comes as the Legislature is preparing to consider a constitutional amendment limiting the amount of money juries can award in medical malpractice and other damage lawsuits.

Coaches: Proposal not just for athletics

Senate to vote on fee Thursday

Staff/Brett Hacker

K-State has already begun bringing the non-revenue sports facilities up to par with other Big Eight Conference schools with these additions at Ahearn Field House. The proposed athletic fee would enhance the scholarship budgets for those sports.

By Chris Hays
Sports Editor

The six coaches of the 12 non-revenue sports are in agreement on at least one thing right now. An athletic fee is needed to help them promote the University.

The proposed $15 student athletic fee, which will be voted on Thursday night by Student Senate, would provide the department of athletics with an anticipated $420,000 to add to the budgets of the 12 non-revenue sports.

Although most of the heated discussions have involved concerns that athletics may be taking priority over academics, track and cross country coach John Capriotti said "Athletics and academics go hand in hand" and cannot be separated when considering the fee.

"I view athletics as a tool in which to promote the University. That's why we wear Kansas State on our uniforms.

"In our program, we stress academics and athletics, and yes — you can do both if you have your priorities straight."

"There's a mutual benefit between athletics and academics," K-State volleyball coach Scott Nelson said. "You take for instance Georgetown winning the national basketball championship a few years ago.

"The next year Georgetown's applications for admission increased by several thousand and I've got to believe that those several thousand applicants didn't apply just so that they could watch Georgetown basketball."

Capriotti also said that people have a misconception on how the athletic subsidy would be used by the department, citing the belief that it is wasted on elaborate recruiting trips to influence prospective student-athletes.

"Nobody can say that we're wasting money. If they do, then they haven't talked to me about where our money goes," Capriotti said. "A lady said in front of the senate a couple years ago that all we did with our money was spend it on elaborate recruiting trips.

"Well I took direct offense to that, because I can name several instances where I have slept in my car while out recruiting."

Capriotti's main concern is that if K-State is going to compete in the Big Eight, both athletically and academically, K-State should be able to put out a product that is comparable to the rest of the conference schools.

"I think we should put a good product out there if we expect to bring students in here that might be leaning toward another Big Eight school," he said.

"And I don't just mean athletically. Take the engineering school for example. We have a great engineering school and I use that when I'm out recruiting.

"I would be for any proposal that was for the betterment of the University. Just like a new library. If we need a new library then I think we should work on that. If we had the best library in the Big Eight, then you could be sure that I would show it to any recruits that were on campus."

K-State baseball coach Mike Clark echoed Capriotti's thoughts.

"Nobody can say that we're wasting money. If they do, then they haven't talked to me about where our money goes. A lady said in front of the senate a couple years ago that all we did with our money was spend it on elaborate recruiting trips. Well I took direct offense to that, because I can name several instances where I have slept in my car while out recruiting."
— John Capriotti
track, cross country coach

"A lot of people need financial help toward their education and I think that should be supported also," he said. "But if we're going to have an athletic program, then we should be able to compete with the other teams in the conference, and the coach should be given the opportunity to put a quality team together."

The Big Eight limits the number of baseball scholarships to be awarded to 13. Clark's baseball budget allows for him to hand out 10 full-ride scholarships. And making the decision of who gets one of the 10 is not easy.

If Clark opts to hand out full-rides to four pitchers in order to put together a strong starting rotation, then only six are left to divide among the other eight position players.

This leaves most of Clark's players dipping into their own pockets to pay for their education. Of Clark's 36 varsity and junior varsity players, 29 are paying for more than 50 percent of their education.

"We're recruiting against schools like USC and Arizona who already have the kind of weather where they can play almost year-round," Clark said. "Those schools already have some advantages over us, but then we go in and offer less scholarship money and most of the time the kids are going to go where the money is."

Compounding the problem is that each baseball player has to either raise the money for or pay for his own glove, cleats, undershirts and jacket — about $200 — which is unheard of at most other schools.

"It's like a chemistry class having a third of the money needed to make that class the best it can be," Clark said. "This leaves the kids having to pay for all of their supplies out of their own pockets.

"Our kids even have to pay for their spring trip each season. That's why they're out working the parking lots during football games and having the annual marathon baseball games."

The Athletic Department has already started the process of upgrading all of the non-revenue sports facilities. From the new track, tennis and volleyball venues in Ahearn Field House, to the bleacher and backstop additions at Frank Myers Field, steps are already being taken to make K-State every bit as attractive as any other Big Eight school would be to a prospective student-athlete.

Should the proposed athletic fee be passed, Capriotti said the funds would be used mainly for scholarships and then for travel expenses — "Not only for recruiting, but to also take our kids to competitions all over the United States. That will help to, No. 1, promote the University, and then No. 2, help make our kids better with the better competition.

"Any time you are involved in national competitions outside your region, people take notice and remember Kansas State University in a positive way. Just like when our basketball team went to the final eight last year — it definitely helped my recruiting, I can tell you that much.

"The total picture is that athletics helps the whole University and not just from an athletic point of view, and I don't think people realize that."

Freshman Miller named Big 8 newcomer of year

From Staff and Wire Reports

The Big Eight Conference has released its women's all-conference basketball team, and three Lady Cats have been honored for their play this season.

K-State finished the regular season at 17-10 and tied for third in the conference after finishing eighth last year.

Among the K-State honorees was freshman point guard Mary Jo Miller, who was named Big Eight newcomer of the year. Lady Cat guard Nadira Hazim was named second team All-Big Eight, while forward Diana Miller was named an honorable mention.

"There are 20 individuals chosen out of 120 possible, and we had three players named," K-State coach Matilda Mossman said.

"I think the fact that two are sophomores and one is a freshman gives us a lot to look forward to in the next couple of years," she said. "All three individuals are certainly a credit to our team, and we are proud of their individual accomplishments."

Mary Jo Miller of Milroy, Minn., is the first K-State Lady Cat to be tabbed newcomer of the year. She began her K-State career with a bang, making two early-season all-tournament teams. She opened the Big Eight season averaging 19 points a game in the first four contests.

Mary Jo scored a career-high 22 points at Missouri and won the game for K-State at Oklahoma with a jump shot with eight seconds remaining.

She ranked in five different Big Eight statistics this season. For K-State, she led the team in assists with 4.6 a game and in steals with 65. She had the best K-State free-throw percentage in conference games, hitting 79.6 percent. She ended the regular season as the Lady Cats' fourth leading scorer at 9.6 a game.

Hazim, a sophomore from Topeka, earned second team honors after leading the team in scoring with 14.4 points a game. She had four 20-point games in Big Eight play and scored in double figures in all but four. Hazim scored 24 points against Oklahoma State and Nebraska. She was second on the team in steals with 53, including 32 in Big Eight play.

Diana Miller was K-State's second leading scorer with 13.3 points a game. She is also second in rebounding with 6.6 and in free-throw percentage at 77.5.

Diana, a sophomore from Hutchinson, finished strong in Big Eight play, leading K-State in scoring in three of the last four games. She closed the conference season with a career-high 29-point performance against Oklahoma State.

Arizona tops poll; OU slides to No. 4

By The Associated Press

TUCSON, Ariz. — When it comes to the top ranking in college basketball, the first time around is best, says Arizona coach Lute Olson.

Olson's Wildcats moved up a notch to No. 1 this week after a 77-75 victory Sunday over No. 9 Duke in East Rutherford, N.J. It was Arizona's second time on top this year and fourth in the past two seasons.

"I don't know that it will have much effect on us," Olson said Monday. "I think our players have been there, not just this year but, with most of them, a year ago.

"We'd like to finish the total season ranked No. 1," he said.

Arizona, 22-3, the fourth team to be honored as No. 1 this season, spent only one week on top the first time before an 82-80 loss to Oklahoma on Feb. 12. The Sooners then held the top rung for two weeks but dropped to fourth after a 97-84 loss Saturday at Missouri.

Georgetown and Indiana moved up one spot each to second and third as no teams dropped from or broke into the Top Twenty.

Duke held the top spot from the preseason through the first nine polls. Illinois replaced the Blue Devils for a week, followed by Oklahoma and then Arizona the first time around.

Oklahoma's loss cleared the way for the Wildcats to regain the No. 1 ranking, and Sean Elliott made a 3-pointer and another basket in the last 53 seconds as Arizona seized the opportunity against Duke.

Elliott had made only four of 19 shots before his 20-footer from the top of the key.

Golf team in 16th after two

From Staff and Wire Reports

GOLETA, Calif. — The K-State men's golf team finished Monday's first two rounds of the 15th Annual Hammond-Bell Pacific Coast Collegiate Golf Championship in 16th place.

The Wildcats, competing in their first action of the season, shot rounds of 307 and 310 on Monday for a 617 total. San Diego State leads the 20-team field at 593, followed by USC and Fresno State at 595 and Cal-Santa Barbara and San Jose State at 596.

"We're the only team that has come from a place where there has been snow," K-State coach Russ Bunker said. "Every team out here has played four or five tournaments already, so we're a little bit behind the eight ball."

Still, the Wildcats are within striking distance of 10th place, which is presently owned by Stanford at 607.

"If we get a top 10 finish I'll be ecstatic," Bunker said. "The thing you lose by not playing is the chipping and putting, but if we can be better at that part of the game in the third round, we could move up."

Troy Keller and Jeff Sedorcek both turned in two-round totals of 150 to tie for 11th overall. Keller shot 76-74, while Sedorcek shot 75-75. Next for K-State were Brett Vuillemin and John Shields at 161 and Brad Stephens at 162.

The tournament's first-day leader was Tim Todd of San Diego State with a one-under-par 143.

Conference shooting for 5 tourney bids

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Most of the marquee players who elevated the Big Eight to the top of college basketball last year are gone, but their places have been taken.

"The only difference between this year and other years in the Big Eight is that you had some well established big-name players to command a lot of attention," said Oklahoma State's Leonard Hamilton. "Now we have a lot of very good young (players) that have not established themselves among the national elite.

"However, we have a lot of young players who will be just as good as the class that graduated last year. I think the league is equally as tough. And that will bear out just as soon as we get into NCAA tournament play."

Assuming either Oklahoma or Missouri wins the Big Eight tournament and the league's automatic NCAA berth, the league could wind up with three or four entries, with K-State and Oklahoma State getting at-large bids. But Iowa State's Johnny Orr still isn't sure that would be enough.

"You've got teams like Oklahoma State, K-State, Kansas and us who don't have very good records in the league, but doggone, man, outside of the league we've played well," Orr said. "I think we should have five teams in the NCAA. I don't think we're going to get them, but we should have them."

K-State's return to the NCAA would seem especially impressive since Coach Lon Kruger lost four starters from last season, including guard Mitch Richmond, a favorite to take NBA rookie-of-the-year honors.

"I'd be extremely surprised if we don't get at least four teams in the NCAA," Kruger said. "And Iowa State has also been playing well. In league play, we've been beating up on each other. But I think the NCAA committee recognizes that and they research those things pretty carefully. Without any question, I think we're in pretty good shape right now."

Kruger's team is completing its first season in its new Bramlage Coliseum, and many fans are still a bit nostalgic for old Ahearn Field House. Kruger sometimes yearns for the Ahearn atmosphere.

"The support of our fans in Bramlage has been very, very good," Kruger said. "I don't think the enthusiasm and atmosphere exhibited have been as good as they were in Ahearn. But when you use Ahearn as a standard, that's pretty lofty. We've got a good crowd. But I think we could improve on it."

Kruger's team will host Missouri Wednesday night in a game that could virtually cinch an NCAA berth for the Wildcats. But the Tigers, 3-3 since Coach Norm Stewart became ill, are getting used to interim coach Rich Daly.

Stewart remains hospitalized following cancer surgery, but Daly said he's been talking with his boss.

"I try to get hold of him every day, but we do not talk basketball or anything other than how he's getting along," Daly said.

Democrats not convinced by Tower

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Senate Democrats remained unmoved Monday on John Tower's nomination as defense secretary despite his unprecedented pledge to abstain from alcohol if confirmed. President Bush, meanwhile, returned home to rein in wavering Republicans and swing Democrats.

Senators trekked to a special committee hearing room to read the latest FBI report on Tower, while those members the Bush administration hopes to sway indicated they are either undecided or leaning against confirmation.

White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater said the president will meet with 12 senators beginning early today.

Fitzwater declined to identify them but congressional staff said Sens. George Mitchell, D-Maine; Lloyd Bentsen, D-Texas; Charles Robb, D-Va.; Bennett Johnston, D-La., and Dennis DeConcini, D-Ariz., were among those invited to the White House.

Bush also telephoned DeConcini from aboard Air Force One and urged him to reserve judgment until he had a chance to see all the evidence, according to the senator's staff.

Sen. Bob Graham, D-Fla., considered by some a swing vote, told reporters in Miami that Tower's pledge helps but "It's not just the drinking which is a problem to me."

"It's a pattern of bad judgment — bad judgment in the 1970s in drinking, bad judgment by placing himself in compromising positions as the U.S. arms negotiator in Geneva in the mid-80s, bad judgment in accepting large sums from the defense industry in the late 1980s," Graham said.

The Democratic-controlled Senate Armed Services Committee voted 11-9 along party lines Thursday to recommend that the full Senate reject the nomination, with panel chairman Sen. Sam Nunn, D-Ga., citing Tower's drinking habits among other concerns.

Tower on Sunday sought to allay the fears of his former colleagues by issuing an extraordinary pledge not to take a single drink if he is confirmed. The full Senate is expected to take up the nomination Wednesday.

Democrats hold a 55-45 majority in the Senate, meaning Bush must pick up at least five Democrats and hold all Republicans to assure confirmation. Under that scenario, Vice President Dan Quayle would break the tie.

Those Democrats who hinted that they will oppose confirmation emerged from the special Senate hearing room saying that Tower's promise and a reading of the FBI report did little to change their minds.

"It's like marrying someone who says, 'Trust me, I'll reform,'" said Sen. Paul Simon, D-Ill. "You can't do that ... The experience with people who have problems with drink is that these pledges get broken much too easily."

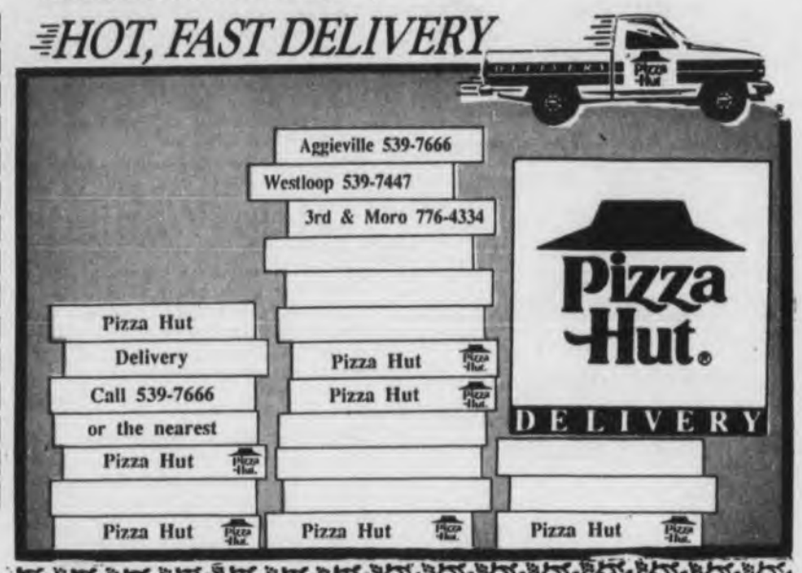
Task force to reveal recommendations

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A special task force of manufacturers, airline operators and regulatory agencies is expected to recommend Tuesday that mandatory modifications be made on aging Boeing jetliners.

The group will make its findings public at a news conference after meeting to put the final touches on its recommendations

The special committee, knowr as the Aging Transport Working Group, was created as part of a 150-member group to study the fitness of older transport aircraft.



For the past nine months, it has examined the maintenance and repair records of Boeing 747s, 737s and 727s and scores of manufacturers' service orders and government directives affecting the planes.

The group has studied the various methods used for aircraft inspection as well as the possible need to intensify the inspection process or to make modifications to the aircraft themselves.

Catering to a different world

Oriental grocery provides unusual foods

Some of the customers at Yi's Friendly Grocery make quick stops for a gallon of milk and a loaf of bread. Other customers run in for a gallon of anchovy oil and a dehydrated squid.

Since November 1984, Sung Hui Yi and his parents have run the small grocery store at 1030 Colorado St. In addition to what Westerners think of as normal groceries, Yi's carries an extensive line of Korean and other Oriental foods that are supplied from Chicago.

"All of the stuff we eat in Korea you can find here," Yi said. "Plus you can get all other things you need too."

One corner of the store is devoted to the staple of the Oriental cultures — rice.

Stacks of 25-pound bags of rice cover about a 10-foot by five-foot area which is piled about four feet high.

"I like all kinds of food and try to go out of my way to find places like (Yi's) which have all of these different foods."
—Scott Conger freshman in business administration

"I'm not sure how many most people eat, but our family eats about one bag a week," Yi said. "I have to have rice every day."

He said there is more than just one kind of rice.

"All different kinds of people like different kinds of rice," he said. "Koreans may like one kind and Chinese another."

The store is stocked with foods that are specifically Chinese or Korean, but Yi said most of his customers ignore international food boundaries.

"It doesn't really matter. Some Koreans buy Chinese food and some Chinese buy Korean food," he said. "A lot of Americans come in and they buy whatever they like.

"(Non-Asian customers) come in and they have tried some of the foods before. They've either been to Korea or they have a friend who showed them Korean food."

As long as the recipe is not too difficult, Yi said he is ready to describe the proper cooking methods to his customers.

"If they ask me what they ate and decribe it, I can tell them how to make it," he said.

The hunt for a Korean hot sauce that Stan Ramsey, senior in marketing, and Scott Conger, freshman in preprofessional business administration, had eaten in Kansas City ended at Yi's.

Distilled vinegar, ground red peppers and garlic were the three main ingredients of the sauce Conger described as an "...all-around, all-season death sauce," because of how spicy hot it is.

"It's great," Conger said. "For about 10 minutes it really lights you up."

"We're doing some experimentation with a wok we got earlier this year," Ramsey said. "We do a lot of stir-fry with lots of vegetables. Stir-frying is really easy and we're eating things which are much more healthy."

Creative cooking with the wok provides a good break from daily routines of studying and their usual eating habits, Conger said.

"(Wok cooking) sure beats eating out all of the time with the typical burger and fry routine," Ramsey said. "It's a good break from the studies because you can really get creative."

Yi gave Conger a sample of dried seaweed resembling a deep-green tissue paper.

"The seaweed is pretty salty," Conger said. "It's good, though.

"I like all kinds of food and try to go out of my way to find places like (Yi's) which have all of these different foods."

Yi said Oriental teas, short ribs and kim-chee are three of the more popular foods of non-Asian customers.

Kim-chee is a mixture of Chinese cabbage, onions, garlic, various meats and spices that are fermented to become a type of pickled salad. Kim-chee is another staple of the Korean diet and is served either by itself or over rice. Yi said although countless varieties of kim-chee exist, the one constant of each recipe is that it is spicy hot.

Next to a selection of about 20 different kinds of seaweeds is an aisle almost completely dedicated to an assortment of spices.

While the typical grocery sells spices in small tins containing one or two ounces, Yi's spices are sold in plastic bags of one or two pounds.

Yi said spices are the main ingredient of Korean food.

"(Koreans) eat food hot and use a lot of spices," he said.

Although Yi's father and mother started the grocery, it is now run primarily by Yi.

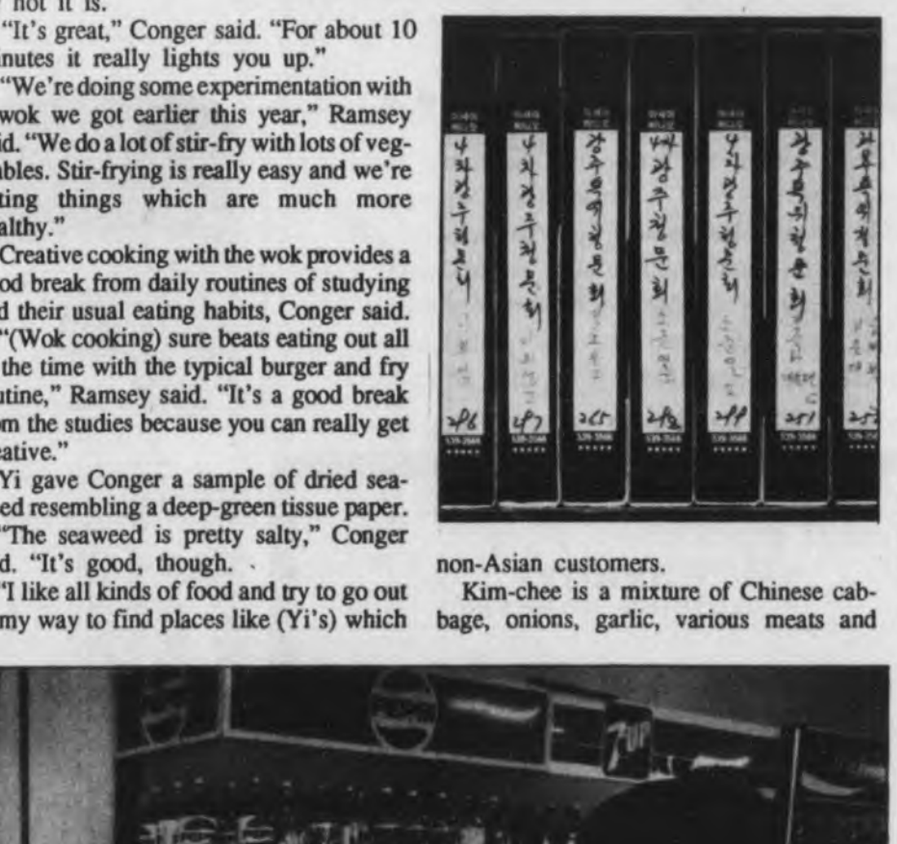
"(The grocery) is kind of family-organized, but I am here most of the time, so I'm the one running it," he said. "I'm not going to get rich, but I survive. I like being around the customers and helping them."

On a typical weekend, Yi rents nearly all of the 250 Korean language videotapes at the front of the store.

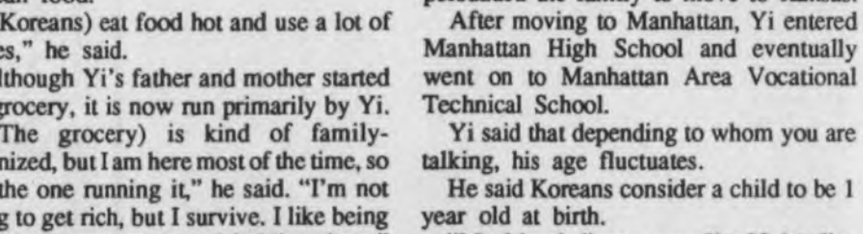
"All of these aren't movies, they are like a soap opera," he said. "By Saturday, they are all usually rented."

After the area public school dismisses, Yi said he sees an influx of candy customers and sometimes candy thieves.

"I have to watch," he said. "I'm not that hard a guy if I catch them. I just try to scare them and tell them not to steal any more."



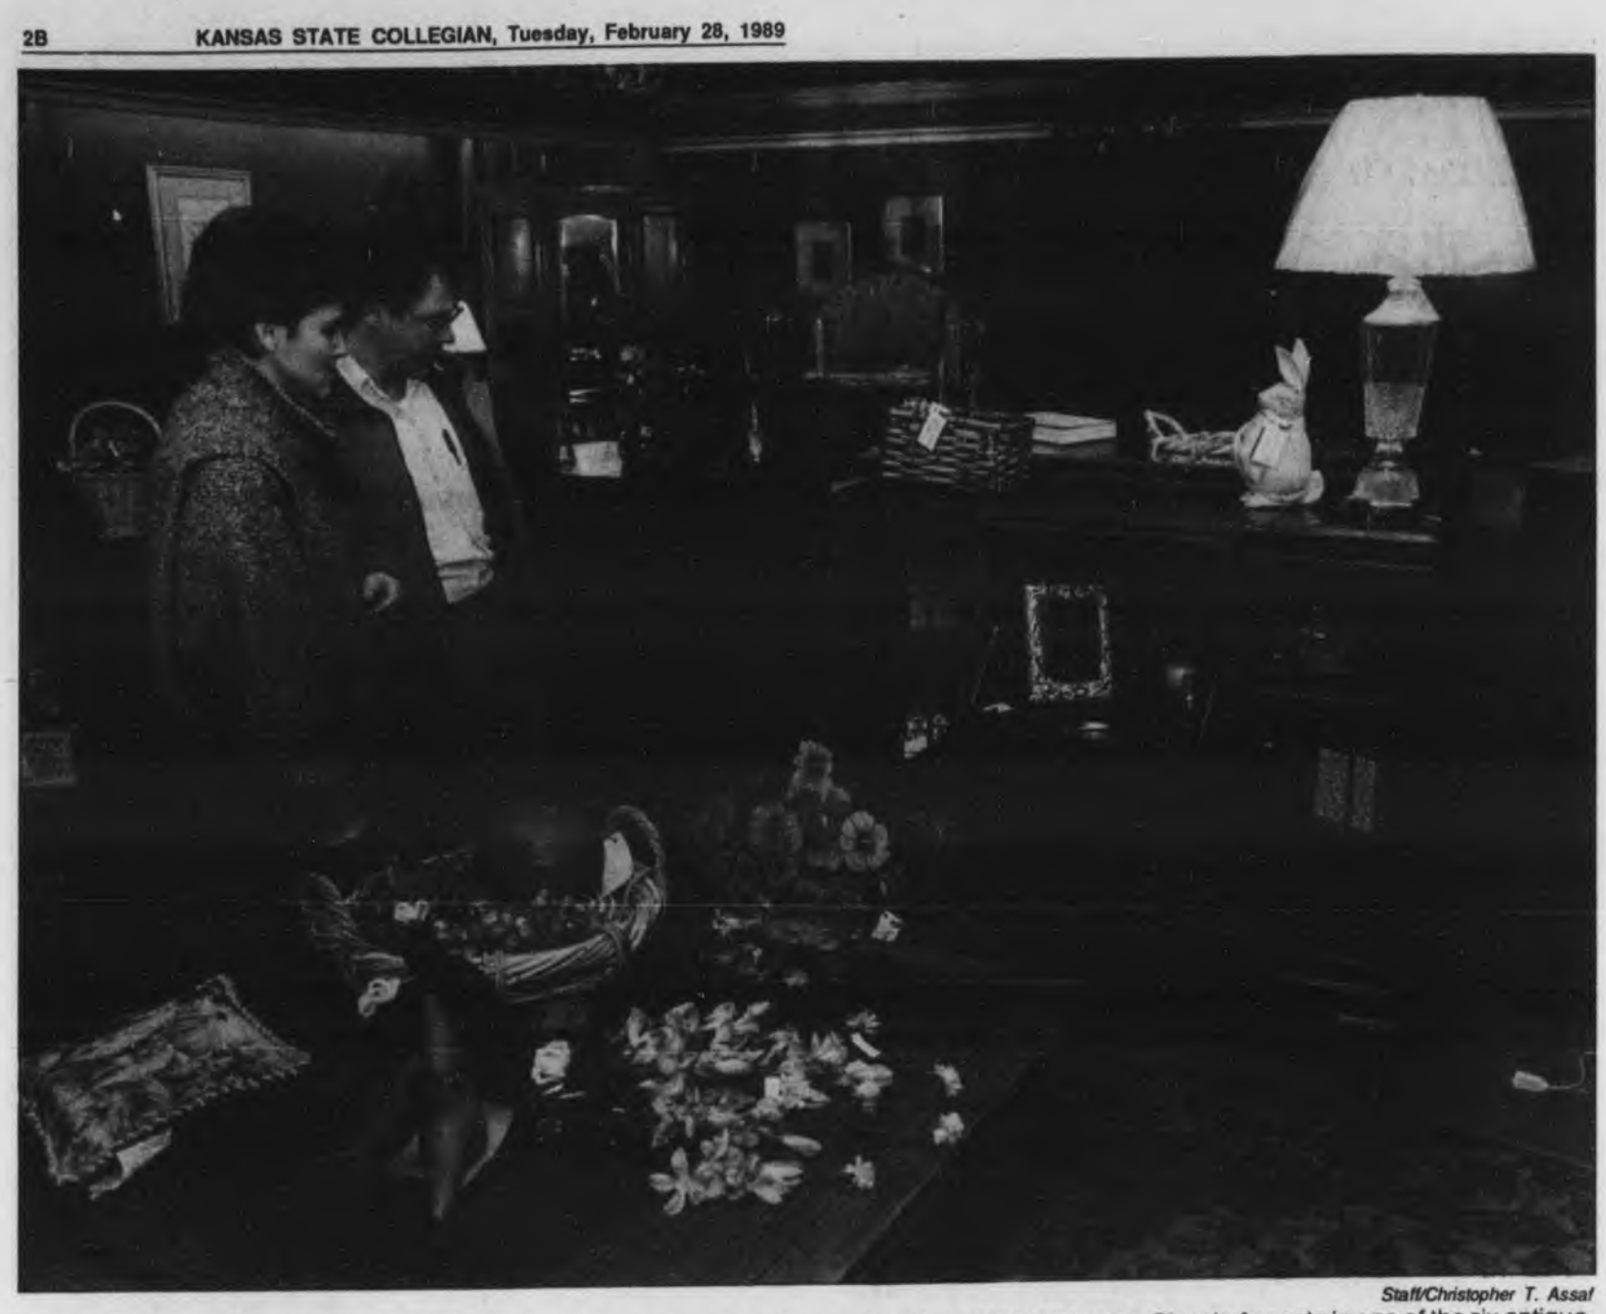
Yi and his family have been in the United States for about 14 years, most of which have been spent living in Manhattan. An uncle of Yi's already living in Manhattan persuaded the family to move to Kansas.



After moving to Manhattan, Yi entered Manhattan High School and eventually went on to Manhattan Area Vocational Technical School.

Yi said that depending to whom you are talking, his age fluctuates.

He said Koreans consider a child to be 1 year old at birth.



"My driver's license says I'm 28, but I'm actually older," Yi said. "But if that's what it says, then I'm 28."

Antiques profitable for area businesses

Area stores experience demand

By Linda Kleiner
Collegian Reporter

Despite having six antique shops competing for business in Manhattan, antique dealers say a strong demand exists for antiques in the city and surrounding area.

"Antique business is definitely profitable in this area because of the large turnover of University and Fort Riley people," said Harry Whitney II, co-owner of the Gumbo Hill Antique Shop.

Gumbo Hill Antique Shop has sold antiques to K-State faculty, to all ranks of military personnel at Fort Riley, and to the University for offices, he said.

"The need (for antiques) doesn't get saturated like in some other communities," Whitney said.

In addition, items have been sold to individuals in Nebraska, Colorado, Florida and southwestern Kansas towns, he said.

"We are to ship a piece to Venezuela soon," Whitney said.

But being located in the country brings only "the more serious-minded customers" to his shop, Whitney said.

The objects found in antique shops are acquired by dealers in three ways.

"A majority of my antiques are purchased at local auctions or sales," said Diette Walters, owner of Country Antiques.

Walters said she hasn't had bidding wars with other antique dealers for a piece at the auctions.

"Most of my competition for a piece is people who want it for their home," Walters said.

Whitney said the majority of antique pieces at Gumbo Hill Antique Shop come from out-of-state antique dealers who sell the items wholesale.

The buying of whole estates, or the contents of a home, locally is another way antiques are obtained for the shop, Whitney said.

A problem with this method is disposing of the items that aren't antiques or aren't wanted, he said. A garage sale is usually held after the estate's items are sorted.

Margaret Miller, owner of Classic Accents, imports antiques from England, Holland, Germany, Belgium and other locations in Europe.

Miller, who has buyers living in Europe, said she makes about two trips a year there to buy antiques.

"I receive a 40-foot semitrailer shipment of English antiques every other month," she said.

The only advertising Gumbo Hill Antique Shop uses is word-of-mouth. It seems to have been an effective one: Whitney said the business is usually buzzing with people and the phone ringing.

Walters said young married couples frequent Country Antiques and she attempts to get antique pieces that are in their price ranges.

Country Antiques has repeat customers from Junction City, Topeka, Salina and Abilene, as well as Manhattan, Walters said. Some pieces have been sold out-of-state.

Profitability of the antique business depends on how big the business is, Walters said.

"(Antique business) is more of a hobby or fun business for me," Walters said.

Other frequent customers of Classic Accents are K-State students and Fort Riley personnel, she said.

"The need (for antiques) doesn't get saturated like in some other communities."
—Harry Whitney II Gumbo Hill Antique Shop, co-owner

"Fifty percent of my business is lay-away plan," Miller said.

She has customers from a 500-mile radius who go to her store to shop.

"I won't sell anything sight-unseen," she said.

Miller said today's furniture doesn't have the quality of yesteryear's furniture. People are buying antiques because they want quality and a good investment.

"I wouldn't be in business if I wasn't making a profit," she said.

Some antique dealers also provide a refinishing service.

Classic Accents provides a refinishing service and free repair work on antiques, Miller said.

Gumbo Hill Antique Shop also refinishes antiques for individuals, he said.

"(Refinishing) fills more needs for the customer and they come back to buy," Whitney said.

Fax sends facts over phone lines; system use increasing on campus

By Chris Koger
Staff Writer

Not too long ago, only express mail services were available for sending letters and documents that needed to get from one place to another in the least amount of time. Now Fax — short for facsimile — machines send the information on a printed page of paper in as fast as 15 or 16 seconds.

Fax machines have been in use for more than 25 years, but demand for them has increased only recently, said Tom Gallagher, director of computing and telecommunication activities.

"What has stimulated the use of Fax machines is the low cost of electronics," Gallagher said. "We could have had the same quality Fax machines as we do now years ago when the microcomputers were developed, but the technology is just being applied to Fax machines now."

A Fax looks similar to a photocopier, but transfers information through telephone lines. Two Fax machines are needed for a transmission: one to send the information and one to receive it.

"It's not just a copier. It only transfers what is on the page, not the page itself," said William Sesler, an assistant in the controller's office. "But it gets it there. You can see it and read it because it's right there in print."

Gallagher's department is in charge of installing the phone lines on campus for the machines. He said about a dozen Fax machines are already on campus, but more are being acquired.

The Union Copy Center has had a Fax for about one month, said Anna Buckland, Copy Center supervisor.

"It's been fairly busy. We have students who use it to get information for papers," she said. "It's the fastest way to get information not available on campus."

Buckland said the quality of the finished copy depends on the quality of the receiving Fax machine.

"We have a good Fax machine here, but if the one on the other end is an older or cheaper model, the paper won't be as clear as the copy you have," she said.

The K-State Union Bookstore sends orders through the Copy Center's Fax machine.

"It speeds up the ordering process; we don't have to wait on the mail system to get our orders there," Buckland said.

The engineering experiment station uses Fax machines to send research documents to other universities in the nation and overseas.

"We have sent papers to Japan, England and Korea," said Brenda Beliel, an employee at the station. "We also send student transcripts to employers before interviews are conducted.

"It's so much faster and easier this way. It speeds up the interviewing process."

The biology department uses a Fax machine to send research documents, said Anette Bergmann, an office assistant in the Division of Biology.

"It's used mainly by the faculty, because they can send information back and forth to colleagues at other universities fairly easily," she said.

Robert Young, assistant director of University computing, said it is standard for businesses to have Fax machines.

"There is no worry about time zones. You can send overseas and it will be there almost instantly for just the price of a phone call," he said.

Students contribute

Local labor force, economy enhanced

By Craig Hamrick
Collegian Reporter

K-State students make up a large percentage of the Manhattan population and add to the labor force as well as the consumer market, said Scott Sewell, director of public affairs for the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce.

Sewell said University students have a positive effect on the local economy. Sewell provides demographic information to businesses considering locating in Manhattan.

"Having students here is definitely a plus," he said. "It expands our labor market. And the fact that we have students, and in some cases dependents, provides a much larger consumer market than it otherwise might be."

In the past six months, about 1,500 of the 6,000 job seekers who received job assistance from the center were age 21 and under, she said. A number of those were K-State students.

"We work as closely as we can with students," Oppy said. "We realize the students are a big impact on the Manhattan economy, and that some people need to work to be able to go to school so we can help the city and the students."

Oppy said the flow of students through the center is constant throughout the year, with increased numbers at the beginning of each semester. A large increase in local hiring is not seen during school breaks, as student workers leave Manhattan because student customers also leave, she said.

The center also helps local businesses seeking employees. The center screens, tests and refers potential workers based on information provided by companies with job openings.

Those looking for work can fill out a general application at the center, located at 621 Humboldt St. They will then be interviewed by a member of the center's staff and referred to job interviews for which they are qualified.

Oppy said the center works closely with the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce to compile information about the local economy. One of the studies prepared by the center is a comparison of wages paid by Manhattan employers.

Julie Grant, general supply manager at Varney's Book Store, said students make up a large percentage of both the customers and workers. Of the store's 25 employees, 21 are students.

"We like to give students jobs because most of our customers are students," Grant said. "It just seems fitting. The student workers can relate well to the customers."

Grant said many of Varney's employees work for as long as they attend school because the management is willing to be flexible about scheduling.

"Sometimes they need a lot of time off (because of school), but they trade off working for each other and it works out well," Grant said.

"Students are usually really aggressive," Duell said. "We feel that hiring students is a service to the University, and they provide us with a good part-time work force."

Farrell replaces card catalogs with on-line computer system

By Alan Wilds
Staff Writer

Card catalogs in Farrell Library will soon be replaced with a computerized on-line system to handle library functions with greater ease and speed.

The new system will handle accounting, check-ins, check-outs and all functions of the current card catalogs, according to Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries.

He said the system, called NOTIS, was developed at Northwestern University and is currently in its trial stages at many of the regents schools.

"All regents libraries were going to get together on this," Hobrock said.

The libraries at Wichita State University, Fort Hays State University and Emporia State University use the NOTIS system and the University of Kansas is using a compatible system, he said. Pittsburg State is in the process of making a decision.

Hobrock said he believes the new system will make an excellent replacement for the current system, which was installed in 1982.

"The old system never reached its full potential," he said. "It is very mechanical and the disks are susceptible to errors."

Hobrock said the current system has been down 20 percent of the time since August, but the new system should be working 99½ percent of the time.

"We are not exactly at the forefront of this system, but it is the future."
—Brice Hobrock dean of libraries

"From what I know, they are never known to go down," he said.

The system will be on the University mainframe computer, which will allow it to be accessed from any terminal on campus or through a modem off campus.

Hobrock said the system has already been installed on the administration mainframe and is available for faculty and staff training use.

Virginia Quiring, associate dean of Farrell, said library employees have begun transferring data to the system.

"The computing center and the library are working very closely together on this," Quiring said.

She said it will be about a year before NOTIS becomes available to students.

Hobrock said the University has yet to give the system final approval before it can be implemented. About 60 percent of the card catalog data have already been transferred into the computer, but it will take several years for full data conversion.

"We are not exactly at the forefront of this system, but it is the future," Hobrock said.

He said use of on-line catalog systems at large universities is becoming common.

Businesses affected by students

By Gary Lytle
Collegian Reporter

When K-State students, who make up about one-third of Manhattan's total population, leave for school breaks, it is keenly felt by local retailers.

Wal-Mart Discount Cities manager Dennis Anderson said the beginning of the fall and spring semesters are "peak periods" of sales.

Anderson estimates Wal-Mart's sales in August are about the same as in November during the Christmas buying season.

"It's just like Christmas in August," he said.

The drop in student population also affects grocery sales, said Linda Schultz, assistant manager for Dillons Food Store. Dillons reduces its work force during the summer and spring breaks because of the drop off in sales.

Although the Manhattan Town Center is not affected as much as other area retailers, "We feel (the reduction in sales) when they're not here," said Chris Heavey, general manager.

Because the mall's business is regional, encompassing about 155,000 people, the absence of the student population does not have as much of an effect, Heavey said.

Aggieville is probably the most affected by the student population because of its proximity to the campus and the fact that many of the merchants market much of their business to students, said Juli Salberg, executive director of the Aggieville Merchants Association.

Students account for about 50 percent of the business of The Palace, said Manager Bryan Taylor.

"It's just like Christmas in August."
—Dennis Anderson Wal-Mart manager

Because the store has been operating since 1929, a large portion of the customers are former K-State students who either live in town or are back for special occasions.

Taylor is hoping the planned renovation of Aggieville will increase the store's sales by providing easier access to Aggieville.

Sonny Ballard, owner of Ballard Sporting Goods, said although close to half of the sales at his store are to students, it does not experience a big drop in business when students leave for summer.

Sales of baseball and softball equipment during late spring and summer alleviate the loss of student business, Ballard said.

The store's slowest period comes during Christmas break, when K-State is not in session and the weather is generally bad, he said.

The absence of students during summer and spring breaks has a significant effect on food sales as well, said Doug Bingham, manager of Pyramid Pizza. During the summer, the store closes about four hours earlier on the weekdays than during the school year.

Some of the few businesses in Manhattan not affected by the lack of K-State students are the movie theaters, said Bob Howard, manager of Creative Entertainment.

Because many of the big Hollywood motion pictures are released during the summer or around Christmas, movie ticket sales actually increase at the same time many area retailers are experiencing a drop in business due to the absence of K-State students.

Chamber attracts potential business

By Steve Logback
Collegian Reporter

The Manhattan Chamber of Commerce is charged with attracting potential business to Manhattan. How it approaches this task often varies, said Scott Sewell, Chamber public affairs director.

"There are several different ways (to attract businesses) and a lot of it depends on what business or industry we are trying to get here," Sewell said. "If someone calls up or makes contact with the Chamber, we're not going to turn them down, whether it be a shoe store, furniture store or a major industry."

Sewell said the Chamber has a listing of several thousand companies which may be compatible with Manhattan. These are companies which may relocate or consider expanding in the future.

"What we've done is try to target those companies and break (the list) down into those that we feel would be the most compatible with Manhattan," Sewell said.

It is not uncommon for intersted businesses to contact the Chamber, he said.

"We get companies, businesses and industries calling up on a fairly regular basis wanting different kinds of information," he said. "Sometimes they want specific information and sometimes they want a basic packet."

The basic packet contains a community profile outlining different aspects of the Manhattan community. In addition to other details, it contains information on available industrial buildings, city population, educational facilities, and even the average climate for the city.

Sewell said that when the Chamber makes several contacts with a customer that continues to show interest, a tailored package can be designed for that company or business.

"By then we know specifically what they're looking for, what they're willing to pay for that property or building, and what kind of laborers they will need," Sewell said.

He said he believes Manhattan's economic growth is on the upswing.

"From what I can tell, (economic growth) is on the increase and Manhattan is really growing," he said. "I think it will continue to grow as long as (the community continues) to have an open mind."

Chamber president Bill Boyd said Manhattan has very low industry turnover.

"Historically, Manhattan has had a stable economy," he said.

The stability of Fort Riley and K-State have a dominant effect on Manhattan, Boyd said. Most of the community's business comes from those two sources.

He said the decline in aviation, oil and agriculture has had little effect on Manhattan.

The most recent major business to come to Manhattan was Idelman Telemarketing, which employs 120 people, in 1988, Boyd said.

The last industry to leave Manhattan was in 1985 when a division of the TRW Corporation, which employed about 50 people, merged with a division in North Carolina, he said.

Sewell said many communities across the nation, including Manhattan, are striving to attract the big companies and industries.

"We're always trying to land that big company that will bring in 200 to 300 people — that's a great boost to the economy by any account," he said. "But even though it may not look as impressive to the general public, it also adds up when (the Chamber) can bring in 40 jobs to 50 jobs each year for three consecutive years."

Sewell said he believes ensuring that the current Manhattan businessess are successful and content is just as important as attracting new businesses.

"If we can't keep what we've already got in Manhattan, that's another job," he said. "I think Manhattan's biggest need is to keep what we have here and make sure that they continue to do well. That's an ongoing need."

Instead of promoting certain areas of Manhattan to potential businesses, the Chamber prefers to present the city as a whole.

"We try to get people to look at Manhattan and then we'll help them relocate depending on their needs," Sewel said.

Downtown still attracts businesses

New shops open, relocate

By Janette Poole
Collegian Reporter

Retail vacancies and changes in downtown Manhattan's business district are not a direct result of Manhattan Town Center, said Kim Brecheisen, Manhattan Main Street Project coordinator.

"Businesses that are now moving or are gone are not a result of the mall. They would have left downtown anyway," Brecheisen said.

Within the past year, nine new retail businesses have opened in the downtown area and four established businesses have relocated to the downtown district, while seven businesses have closed. Two service-oriented stores are changing locations, but will remain in the downtown area, Brecheisen said.

The Phone Connection and Ady's Appliance are both moving into the Town Pavilion, a building complex located in the 300 block of Houston Street, Brecheisen said.

The Phone Connection is moving because of the need for more room to provide customer services, she said. The manager of Ady's would give no comment on the reasons for moving.

Brecheisen said store vacancies are to be expected, but she is not overly concerned about them because she is frequently contacted about the availability of downtown retail space.

Bill Boyd, president of Manhattan Chamber of Commerce, said in the management of an economy, retail business serves to circulate money in the community economy. It does not create new wealth as does industry or corporations. Industry brings money into a community by selling products outside of the community.

"If a retail business such as a shoe store closes — and a number have occurred in the last few years, as in any community — that has no effect on the economy," he said.

If a community has too many of one store, one will have to go out of business, Boyd said. But the law of supply and demand holds that, as far as the economy is concerned, no money is lost because the customer will just go to another shoe store to purchase shoes. The money is still circulated within the economy.

Scott Sewell, public affairs director for the Chamber of Commerce, said the opening of Manhattan Town Center is one reason for the changes downtown.

"Manhattan Town Center is one of the big reasons for change, not only in downtown, but in Westloop, Aggieville and Village Plaza," he said.

Sewell said downtown Manhattan is fortunate that the mall was constructed within the business district, rather than in any other area of the community.

"Hutchinson and Salina malls were built on the outside edge of town and their downtowns are much worse than Manhattan's," Sewell said.

Movement in retail areas is part of the evolution of a city, he said.

"This is what happens when a town grows," Sewell said, adding that mall competition as well as those businesses closing down should be good incentives to improve business.

Some retailers are optimistic about downtown business.

"Businesses are still staying downtown ... buildings won't stay vacant for long," said Allen Renz, owner of Judi's Children's Wear and president of Manhattan Main Street Project.

Clyde Scott, manager and co-owner of Brown's Shoe Fit Company, said Poyntz Avenue is still a viable place to be in business.

Downtown Manhattan is attracting much attention from city officials throughout the country, Brecheisen said. People from Ohio and California have contacted her concerning improvement planning of the downtown district.

"Downtown is being watched nationally. It is a success story," she said.

The Manhattan Town Center, after opening more than a year ago, has had little effect on the downtown businesses. During the past year, nine new businesses have opened in the downtown area and four established Manhattan businesses have relocated downtown.

Hyundai Computers Introduced to Kansas

ADVERTISEMENT

DENVER (FSI). The Hyundai Corporation has selected Connecting Point Computer Centers as their exclusive authorized dealer in Lawrence and Manhattan, Kansas. This selection follows the signing of a major supply contract with the 180 store Connecting Point chain here last month.

Hyundai, the $24 billion company known for its high quality, economical cars, has been a major producer of of microcomputers for the past several years.

Hyundai's Super 16TE line of PCs follows their automotive tradition of price/performance. Myles Schachter, Connecting Point President, said that he chose the Hyundai product line because of its great price, high speed and excellent software bundle. Each Hyundai, he said, is fast at 10 Mhz or twice as fast as the original PC; has a full 640K memory, 12" or 14" flat amber screen and a 101 keyboard.

The Electric Desk software included with every computer is a quality word processor, spreadsheet and database. The system also comes with Keyworks, a program to store keystrokes.

Dr. Rhonda Ross, the firm's Customer Support Manager, has found that the price has not compromised the construction of these powerful PCs. She states that the systems appear to be trouble free and highly compatible. She said this explains the manufacturer's 18 month warranty - far in excess of the industry standard.

Hyundai Super 16TE

Due to the new Connecting Point-Hyundai contract, the Manhattan and Lawrence stores are introducing these PCs at more than 20% off already competitive compatible prices with training included with every purchase. Already, United Telephone Midwest Group, Menninger's Foundation and PARS Service has selected Connecting Point to provide Hyundai PCs to their employees.

Home is where the business is

Local home businesses offer owners flexibility

By Angie Smith
Collegian Reporter

Home is where the heart is and for some Manhattan residents it is also where the business is.

Janice and John Hill own and manage Vern's Donuts & Cakes in their home on South Sixth Street. Janice Hill has lived at this location her entire life and started working there after her father retired in 1969.

The Hills converted the basement of their home into a bakery and have a separate room in which they sell their cakes and doughnuts.

"My father, Vern, opened the store in 1939, after his farm in Nebraska failed due to the Depression," Janice Hill said. "My uncle had borrowed my dad's truck to deliver doughnuts, but could not pay him for gas. So in return, he gave my father his doughnut recipe. In 1939, my father moved to Manhattan with a doughnut recipe and $5.

"After he retired, my husband and I took over the house and Vern's Donuts."

She attributes their success to the quality of the ingredients.

"Just like your grandma's cooking used to taste — that's how we still do it — no mixes," she said. "We have some tough customers who are connoisseurs of food and always keep us on our toes."

Janice Hill said owning a home business offers advantages.

"I don't have far to go to work, I save gas and my kids can always find mama," she said.

Another Manhattan resident, Cleta Dickson, owns and operates a beauty salon in the cellar of her home located on Beck Street.

Ten years ago, Dickson opened The Hair Cellar in her home to "get the best of both worlds."

"It's a great place to work and raise a family," she said. "My kids always know where to find me."

Dickson said her privacy is lessened because people call at all hours of the night.

"A disadvantage is that you run a one-man circus," she said. "You do all the scheduling and all the jobs of a manager.

"There is no one there to fall back on in case you get behind, so you learn to manage your time well and give the customers the adequate time they deserve."

However, Dickson said she enjoys working from her home and many of her customers like it, too.

"Many of my customers say one reason they come to my shop is because it is a home business," she said. "They like the relaxed atmosphere, the homeyness, and say it is much more personable."

Marie Lewis, owner and manager of Marie's Costume Shop, ran a business in her basement for seven years, but decided to buy a store. Lack of space was a major influence on her decision.

"I got a chance to buy out a store in Topeka, and I already had a full house," Lewis said. "Many costumes had to be put in storage and customers were coming in and asking for those costumes."

The location of Lewis' home made it difficult for customers to find, she said. In June, Lewis moved her shop to Fort Riley Boulevard.

"Now, it is easier to find and a lot of people stop by on their way home or just to see what is in the store," she said.

Lewis started her home business because she accumulated many costumes.

"I have 11 children, and that's why I have the shop," she said. "Once my children grew up, I had a lot of costumes.

"People knew I had the costumes and started borrowing them for different occasions. Many times they wouldn't return the costumes until a week or so later, so I started renting them."

In 1980, Lewis started sewing costumes and storing them in her basement.

She said a disadvantage to moving her store out of her home was the cost of rent.

"The overhead rent is expensive and I had to raise my prices," Lewis said. "My customers didn't like that. I also had to hire more help, because the store is three times bigger than my basement.

"However, an advantage is that at home, people would call me when my store was closed, and I would go downstairs and open my shop. Now I can lock the door and go home."

Thomas Walker, senior in hotel and restaurant management, has started a part-time home business giving personality tests to people who wish to change jobs. He also provides them with an estimate of cost and background information necessary to start their own business.

> "It's a great place to work and raise a family. My kids always know where to find me."
> —Cleta Dickson home business owner

"The target market is people who aren't happy with their jobs and do not know why," Walker said. "The personality test would help people decide what type of job they would be good at."

Any one of the ideas could be profitable, he said. He decided to sell the ideas because he is too busy to start the businesses himself.

"There's not a week that goes by that I don't think of a new business idea which would be popular in the next decade," Walker said.

An example of Walker's ideas for starting a business is an all-in-one delivery service that would deliver pizzas, hamburgers and videos. He said he is still gathering information on costs of implementing his different business ideas.

Walker said he does a feasibility study on each idea and provides information packages containing costs of starting the new business and an analysis of how the market would survive.

As well as being a part-time student, Walker said he works two other part-time jobs.

Officials continue investigation of computer thefts

Police have no suspects

By Mike Rouse
Collegian Reporter

None of the computer equipment stolen last semester from Fairchild Hall has been recovered, said K-State Police Detective Richard Herrman.

According to campus police reports, three Zenith personal computers, along with keyboards, a monitor and a printer were stolen Oct. 5 from a computer laboratory in Fairchild 212. The value of the stolen computers was reported to be about $8,000.

Last semester, there were several other cases in which computers or devices dealing with computers were stolen, Herrman said.

A computer worth an estimated $4,000 was stolen Oct. 4 from the KSU Athletic Department football offices. A computer access cartridge was stolen Oct. 16 from Shellenberger Hall. Value of the cartridge was reported to be $550.

Herrman said no one has been arrested in any of the cases.

"Several people have been questioned, but we have not been able to get enough evidence to prove anything or bring anybody to court," he said.

"The athletic department did receive money from insurance because the computer was self-insured," Herrman said. No other insurance money has been collected for the stolen computers because the state doesn't provide enough funds to insure the equipment, he said.

Virgil Wallentine, head of the Department of Computing and Information Sciences, said steps have been taken to help reduce the possibilities of additional thefts from computer labs.

"We have shortened the hours the laboratories are open," he said. "They now close at 10 p.m. instead of being open all night."

Wallentine said the computers stolen are not functionable without the network on campus because the hardware was modified for the network only.

Herrman said there have been no connections made between the theft in Fairchild and that in the football offices. Police have entered the serial numbers of the stolen computers into the National Crime Information Center in Washington, D.C.

Campus outgrowing computers; mainframe system lacks access

By Dave Young
Collegian Reporter

K-State is outgrowing its computers, said Michael Miller, associate director of University Computing and Telecommunication Activities.

"The academic mainframe is very underpowered and the amount of terminals available to access the academic mainframe is poor," Miller said. "You could randomly shoot in the dark and almost be guaranteed to hit something in the network that needs improvement."

K-State chose EDUCOM to conduct an extensive analysis of K-State's computing systems in September. Goals of the analysis include determining computing needs, upgrading K-State's service to meet those of peer institutions and locating potential areas for excellence in K-State's computing future.

When EDUCOM submits its final report this semester, the University will then decide what its next move will be, Miller said.

"Right now, we're last among our peers," he said. "We're playing catch-up, but our peers aren't just hanging around waiting for us."

In August 1958, K-State took its first steps into modern computing by installing the IBM 650 computer in Seaton 15, said Elizabeth Edwards, staff assistant for University Computing and Telecommunication Activities.

"The IBM 650 was the first digital computer on the campus. It was a first-generation machine which used vacuum tubes in the central processing unit," she said. "It had no ducts and required air conditioning as well as exhaust fans."

The computer center had a staff of three at the time.

Thirty-one years and many changes later, K-State has a multi-mainframe network run by a staff of 90 full-time employees.

The present academic computer is only about one-third the size of the IBM 650, but it has 600 times the amount of memory, Miller said.

The network consists of two principle mainframe computers and 15 large computers located around campus.

The administrative mainframe computer, an IBM 4381-P13, is located in the basement of Farrell Library, and is used for administrative computing at K-State.

The administrative mainframe contains student records, financial records, alumni information, student financial assistance records, and other business records for K-State. Access to this mainframe is restricted to protect the records it keeps, Miller said.

According to the December 1988 Summary Report of Activities, by the Kansas Board of Regents Computer Advisory Committee, "Administrative computing is supported by an IBM 4381, Model 13 processor with 16 megabytes (16 million bytes, or units of storage) of memory and a total of 15 gigabyte (15 billion bytes) of on-line disk storage, tape units, printers, card reader and punch and appropriate controllers."

The report also stated that academic computing is principally supported by a "National Advance Systems 6630 system with 12 megabytes of memory and 12.9 gigabytes of on-line storage, tape units, and appropriate controllers.

"The academic mainframe is for classroom work, public service, research and any other work students and faculty might be involved in."

In June 1986, one of the most helpful improvements in computing at K-State was installed: a communication network called Data Switch. Eventually, the network will enable all users to access virtually all large computers on campus.

The mainframe can be reached from any terminal linked to the network.

"It's hard to say how many terminals are linked to the mainframes, but there are around 640 on the academic mainframe and 180 on the administrative mainframe," Miller said.

The September 1988 K-State Computing & Telecommunications Newsletter explained some of the computing services available at K-State.

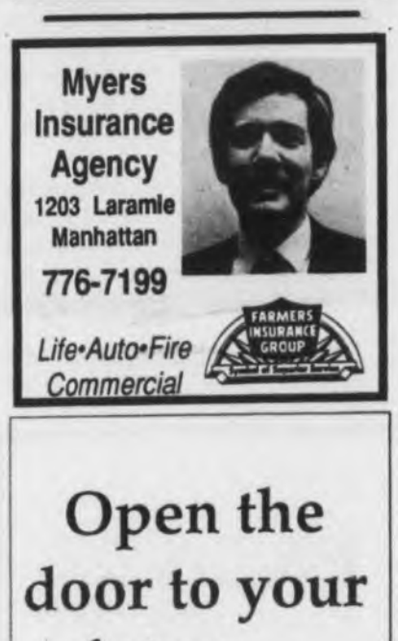
"Computer networks provide a quick, reliable, and inexpensive means of communication with people throughout the world. The academic computer at K-State is attached to two computer networks: BITNET and MIDNET. Both provide electronic mail and other services."

The newsletter explained some of the BITNET functions.

"BITNET (Because It's Time Network) encompasses more than 2,200 computers at more than 700 institutions. Most of these are located in the United States, Canada, Europe, and Japan." For example, a K-State student could tie in the BITNET network and access another student's computer in Japan, then "talk" to him.

MIDNET allows the user to access computers at remote sites and also provides a link between K-State and a Cray X-MP/48 supercomputer, which is located at the National Center for Supercomputing Applications in Illinois.

Literally thousands of computers can be accessed from K-State terminals, with the proper authority.



As of January 1988, all K-State students and employees have been able to receive personal enrichment accounts, free of charge.

Pre-enrollment plan to be tested in spring

Program to involve college

By Karen Allen
Staff Writer

Pre-enrollment may take place in departmental offices next year instead of at the Farrell Library computer center if a project involving community college transfer enrollment is successful this semester.

University Registrar Donald Foster said seven departments are participating in the test project this spring, which will involve the pre-enrollment of students transferring from community colleges. If the project "goes well," Foster said it will be implemented across campus.

The Division of Biology, the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications, the departments of math, psychology, computer science and sociology, and the dean's office in the College of Arts and Sciences will participate in the project, he said. There is no extra cost in implementing the project because all of the departments involved have personal computers attached to the main computer's data switch.

The departments were chosen because they "have a fairly large number of majors," Foster said, and their physical locations will give the Registrar's office an idea as to whether the project will work from all areas of campus.

Besides distributing the work of pre-enrollment among more people, the proposed system change would also "get the enrollment process done more close to the advising process," he said. "If there are closed classes, then the adviser is still near" to help the student select a new class.

Making the pre-enrollment process available on a modem from an individual's personal computer is still "quite a long way off," Foster said. Emerging technology involves enrolling through a touch tone telephone, he said, and it costs in the range of $100,000 to $150,000 to install.

"That would be the way we would go," Foster said. "We work in four- to five-year cycles, and we'll probably look at (the touch tone system) again (in about that time frame)."

One year ago, the University installed a new fee assessment system. During enrollment, the administrative computer system overloaded because there were too many transactions at once for the computer to handle, he said.

While the fee system contributed to the overload, it was just one factor in the breakdown of the system, said Tom Gallagher, director of computing activities. General computer usage by faculty and alumni also contributed, he said.

Gallagher said his department has tentative plans to upgrade the University computer system during the fall of 1989. Upgrading will cost "in the thousands of dollars range," he said.

Either the system has to be upgraded or "procedures other than the computer part" need to be changed to avoid future overloads during enrollment, Gallagher said.

Foster said "We are all well aware of the need," to upgrade the system.

"I feel like the guy in Laugh-In that runs into a brick wall with a tricycle," Gallagher said. "There has to be a tragedy before someone says, 'Hey look what happened,' and (the problem) gets noticed."

Uses of computers increase

By Mike Rouse
Collegian Reporter

Although the term "PC" was virtually unknown a few years ago, awareness and use of personal computers has grown. Although the name suggests the computers are for personal use only, use of personal computers varies.

Nathan Lee, senior in psychology, said his family purchased a Wells-American compu-star last semester to help with business on their farm.

"My father bought a personal computer to help with business at home, but let me bring it to school to work on papers and use it as a word processor," he said.

One reason Lee's family purchased the Wells-American was because of how compatible it was with other software in the computer market.

"My computer is IBM-compatible, which means it can be used with anything dealing with IBM," he said. "That is the main reason I bought this computer."

Lee said the computer has helped him in his school work, especially in writing papers.

"It cuts down on time because I only have to write a paper once and if I want to change anything I can move through the text with a cursor and change it instead of having to write the whole paper over again," he said.

Mark Lapping, dean of the College of Architecture and Design, said personal computers have a variety of uses in the college.

"We used the personal computers for everything from word processor to actual design," he said. "I wouldn't be surprised if somewhere someone is playing Pac-Man."

Lapping said he obtained personal computers for the college because advanced software makes working on computers much easier.

"The software has gotten so sophisticated and so good, we can do a lot on a personal computer instead of on a great big machine," he said.

"We have set up several computer labs ... for students to work on, and they become heavy users of the computers," he said.

Some greek houses on campus use personal computers for personal use by members as well as keeping living group records.

Delta Delta Delta president Becky Griebat said the house benefits from its personal computer in many ways.

"It benefits the house for rush because rush is computerized now," said Griebat, senior in mathematics education.

"It also helps financially," she said. "All of the house's financial records are on the computer, which saves the officers a lot of time."

Griebat said individual members also benefit from having a personal computer available.

"The members with their own software can use the computer for personal use," she said.

Sigma Phi Epsilon treasurer Dan Daveline said his living group uses a personal computer to keep up on alumni records, class files, scholarship and members' grades.

Daveline, sophomore in business administration, said he found the personal computer in his house easy to use after he took the class Introduction to Personal Computers.

ZENITH INNOVATES AGAIN WITH THE NEW Z-286 LP
THE AT COMPATIBLE THAT TRANSPORTS YOU
FROM CAMPUS TO THE CORNER OFFICE!

If your studies need AT power now, and your career could use MS-OS/2* performance later on, then you really need the new Z-286 LP Desktop PC from Zenith Data Systems — the leading supplier of high-speed AT compatibles.*

As the one desktop computer that can keep pace with your data processing requirements and growing ambition, the Zenith Data Systems Z-286 LP lets you harness 286 speed and power in a surprisingly compact design that won't crowd you out of your dormroom.

You'll find the new Z-286 LP compatible with thousands of AT peripherals . . . and virtually all MS-DOS* software. But that's not all. The Z-286 LP also gives you the capability to move up to the new MS-OS/2 technology whenever you feel your career path is ready for more advanced performance.

The Zenith Data Systems Z-286 LP also comes complete with 1MB RAM — expandable to 6MB without using an expansion slot. Plus a single 3.5" 1.44MB floppy disk drive that lets you "read" and "write" 720K floppy disks. And a 40MB hard disk to store thousands of pages of information for heavy-duty word processing and spreadsheets . . . as well as a lot of other software programs that you may need. Either now or in the future.

So transport your success through time with the one desktop computer that can take you all the way from college to career. Get the Zenith Data Systems Z-286 LP today. And think like a true innovator!

Senate to vote on athletic fee proposal

Fee would benefit students, officials say

By Alan Wilds
Staff Writer

About two years ago, K-Staters voted on an athletic fee proposal to support non-revenue sports. The measure failed.

A Student Senate vote Thursday on a revised version of the 1987 proposal will decide whether students will have another opportunity to vote on an athletic fee. Athletic department officials say the fee would benefit the students and the department.

Athletic Director Steve Miller said if the fee passes, it would provide students with a chance to help the athletic department and the University.

"One of the windows through which a university is judged — is athletics," Miller said. "Given that, we must recognize and support the athletic department to a certain extent."

Members of the Student Affairs and Social Services Committee, which prepared the athletic fee legislation for Senate, are in favor of the bill, said Chris Kern, chairman.

Some advantages are guaranteed for students in the proposal, Kern said. They include a 3-year price cap on football and basketball tickets, 6,000 student seats in Bramlage Coliseum, and a provision prohibiting the selling of combined football and basketball season tickets.

See related story/Page 14

"The athletic department would also have to adhere to seating assignments that will be determined by Faculty and Student senates," he said.

Kern said he is unaware of any senators who oppose the fee.

Although the fee's actual amount will not be determined until after Senate's vote, it could be about $15 dollars per full-time student each semester and $7.50 for part-time students, he said.

If the athletic fee is implemented, Miller said one-third of the money will go toward non-revenue sports with the remainder to be used for travel and recruiting for the basketball and football programs.

If the fee fails to pass, Miller said the department will have to work harder to explore alternatives such as increasing ticket prices.

"It would be a business decision," he said.

If the fee is approved, K-State would be the fifth Big Eight university to have an athletic fee. Miller said the University of Oklahoma, University of Nebraska at Lincoln and University of Missouri generate enough revenue from ticket sales and outside support to make an athletic fee unnecessary.

The last athletic fee was proposed in spring 1987. At that time, the athletic department requested a $6.50 per semester fee for full-time and $3 for part-time students to support non-revenue sports. Student Senate sent the proposal to a student referendum where it failed to meet the required two-thirds support for passage.

Larry Travis, then athletic director, said in a Feb. 12, 1987 Collegian article, that if more people would have voted, the bill may have passed. Travis said he believed students showed their support.

Monies that would have been generated from the fee would have gone directly into an account for non-revenue sports scholarships set up by an athletic fee task force.

In comparison to the 1987 referendum, Miller said the athletic department is putting more time and emphasis into disseminating information about the fee.

"We are doing a much better job of communicating and the effort to increase our financial base seems to come at a good moment," he said.

In the past, athletic fees have always met the "popular vote," but never the two-thirds majority required to pass it, Miller said, adding that the athletic department may have been at fault due to a lack of organization and information dissemination.

"The department has not done its homework in the past," he said.

The department's process of raising revenue is a "multi-level" program, Miller said. The athletic fee would become part of the department's budget which includes gate receipts and state appropriations.

Unless there is a delay, Kern said Senate's debate and vote on the proposal will take place Thursday. If the bill is approved, students could vote on it as soon as March 27.

Lecturer identifies 4 'religious giants' practicing repression

By Karen Allen
Staff Writer

Internationally-known theologian and civil libertarian John Swomley identified the Vatican, the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, the Institute of Religion and Democracy, and the Unification Church as "religious giants" whose practices "are to suppress instead of liberate."

Swomley spoke to about 200 people at a Lou Douglas lecture Tuesday in the Union Forum hall.

"The mask needs to be taken away (from these organizations)," Swomley said. "Not to offend them, but to make them and the government more accountable."

The summary of these groups means "there is considerable religious effort to suppress religious (liberation) movements," he said. "The problems liberation movements face today won't be solved by a change in the (U.S.) administration nor by (denying) funding to the Contras. But (changes) must take place within the religious organizations."

Swomley said he thought it was "highly unlikely" all U.S. Jews know of the hardships of Palestines in Israel, nor are "most Catholics aware that the Right to Life is a chief right-wing movement."

Movements of these organizations are not reported by the media nor heard of by the American public because the government is a strong supporter of them, he said. Swomley used the Reagan and Bush administrations' support of the Vatican and its Right to Life movement.

In 1984, the administration established official diplomatic relations with the Vatican and has adopted a form of population control preferred by the Vatican, even though it hasn't worked in third-world countries, Swomley said.

The U.S. government has channeled funding to groups and clinics that practice only natural family planning as a means of birth control, he said.

Anti-liberation movements in South Africa and the persecution of Palestinians by Israel have the "unconditional support" of AIPAC, which is comprised largely of U.S.

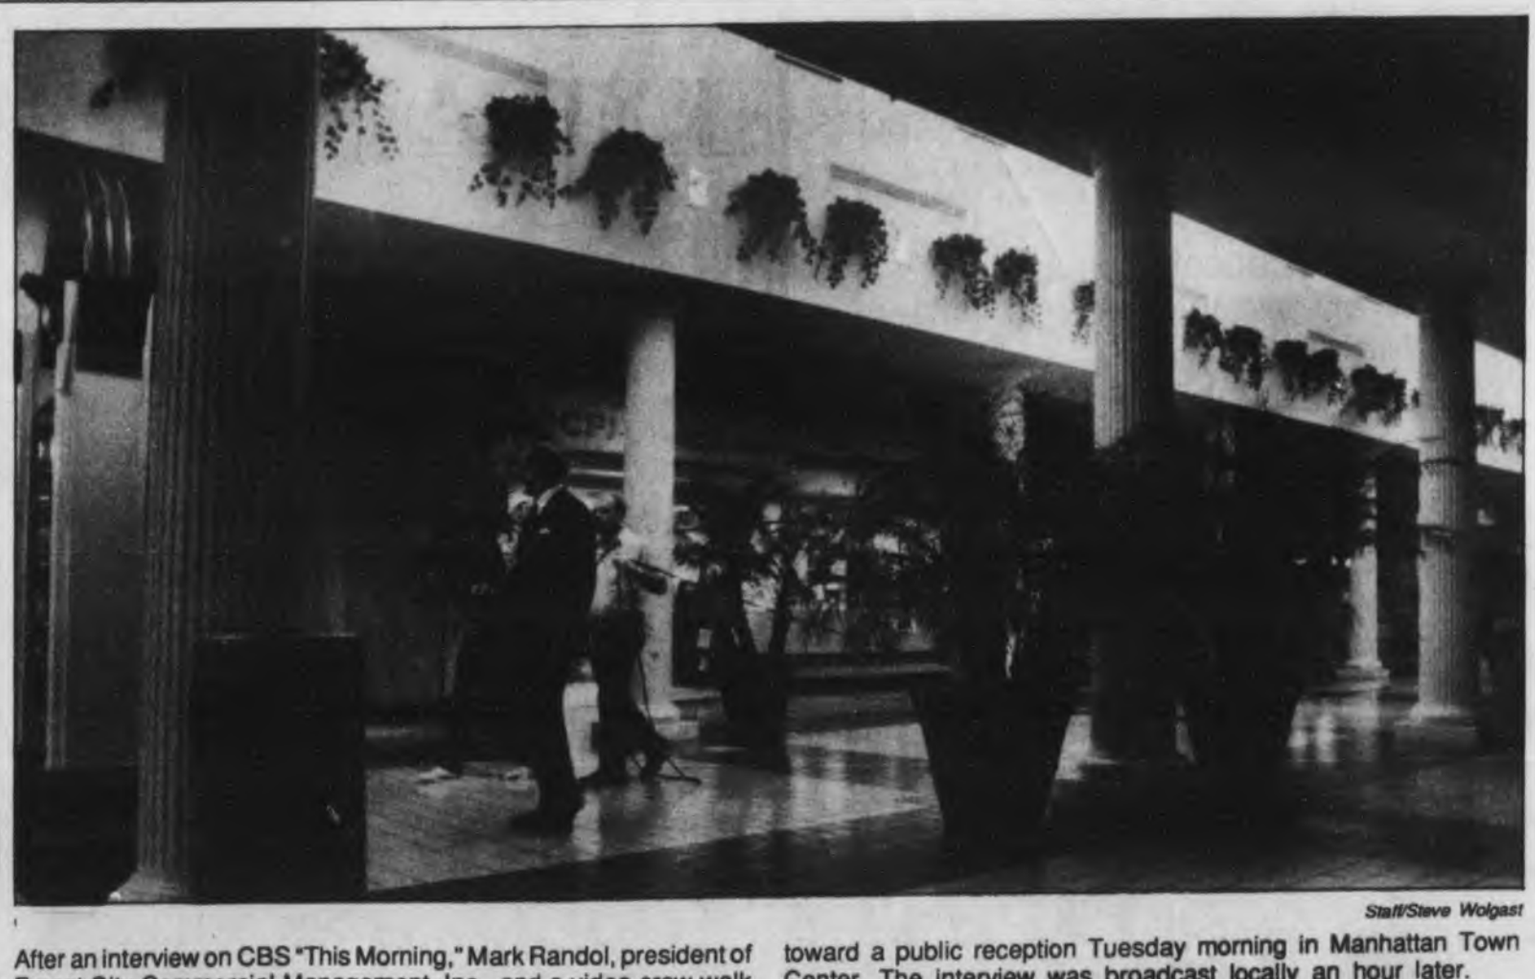
Senators hear testimony for qualified admissions

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Supporters of a selective admissions policy for the state Board of Regents institutions told a Senate committee Tuesday that Kansas students are falling behind national levels of educational preparedness and are not being equipped for the future.

"Twenty-five percent of the freshman class drops out each year at state institutions," said Rep. Bob Vancrum, R-Overland Park. "We are in the bottom 85 percent (nationally) of schools that don't set some minimum standards."



In all, eight supporters of a bill that would repeal the open admissions law and free the regents to institute a selective admissions program testified before the Senate Education Committee. Opponents of the bill will be heard today.

Selective, or qualified, admissions refers to the regents' recommended curriculum for high school students. That curriculum would better prepare students for university course work and would enable them to compete in an internationally-oriented workplace, university and regents representatives said.

The regents curriculum recommends that students who want to attend a regents' university take four units of English; two units of foreign languages; and three units each of mathematics, social sciences and natural sciences.

In addition, high school students would be required to meet one of

After an interview on CBS "This Morning," Mark Randol, president of Forest City Commercial Management, Inc., and a video crew walk toward a public reception Tuesday morning in Manhattan Town Center. The interview was broadcast locally an hour later.

CBS morning show airs live from mall

By Kevin Kramer
Staff Writer

The doors to Manhattan Town Center were opened earlier than usual Tuesday to prepare for an interview between Harry Smith, co-anchor of CBS "This Morning," and Mark Randol, president of Forest City Commercial Management Inc.

CBS feature producer Carol Story and a video production crew from WIBW in Topeka spent most of the morning preparing for the interview to be aired live, 8:50 a.m. EST.

Locally the segment was delayed and shown at 8:50 a.m. CST.

The interview was part of a week-long CBS "This Morning" series titled "Slaves to Fashion," in which Manhattan Town Center was the only mall featured.

In the segment, Randol discussed how the design and architectural elements of malls and shopping centers play a role in lengthening a shoppers' visit.

The four-minute interview with Randol included a walk through Manhattan Town Center that started in the wing where J.C. Penney Co. Inc. is located. Randol continued his walk to Center Court and ended just outside the Picnic Place area.

"The people in New York were happy with the segment," Story said. "The objective was to show how shopping malls are laid out to attract customers, and we did that.

"A lot of people ask why we picked Manhattan Town Center. It had a lot of what we were looking for — in the middle of the country, similar to other malls in communities throughout the country, and also it was a mall that was gorgeous. We could show a lot of it without very many problems."

Following the telecast, the CBS New York office received a number of viewer response calls asking for the shopping center's location, Story said.

A technician from WIBW, the CBS affiliate in Topeka, adjusts Randol's sound equipment before the interview Tuesday morning.

During the interview, a crowd of about 300 people assembled. Members of the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce, city and county government officials, Town Center merchants, media personnel and morning mall walkers of all ages enjoyed hot cinnamon rolls and

Rioting continues in Caracas

CARACAS, Venezuela — Rioting over price increases ravaged Caracas for a second day Tuesday as looting spread, and the government said it was suspending constitutional guarantees to restore order.

Police estimated up to 50 people were killed and 500 injured in the worst violence in 30 years of democratic rule. Thousands of people have been arrested, authorities said.

Civilians exchanged gunfire with police and shop owners took up arms to protect their property in the wake of the riots, which began Monday in Caracas, the capital, and spread to up to seven other cities.

The month-old government of President Carlos Andres Perez announced it has decided to suspend constitional guarantees to re-establish order, and it authorized the army to impose a curfew, although no hours were established. The Education Ministry ordered school and university classes supsended nationwide.

Caracas appeared empty Tuesday afternoon, with police units stationed on the main corners to control the few pedestrians who dared to venture out. Paddywagons and trucks were filled with those arrested for rioting and looting.

Around the nation

Bush still supports Tower

WASHINGTON — President Bush launched a full-court press Tuesday to salvage John Tower's nomination, meeting privately with a dozen swing Democrats and wavering Republicans in hopes of persuading them to back his chosen defense secretary.

"I'm working hard at it," Bush said. "I'm committed."

The administration's efforts suffered a setback when Republican Sen. Larry Pressler of South Dakota announced he was "very much leaning against" confirmation and urged Tower to withdraw before a vote.

"I think that he may very well be doing him (Bush) a favor in this case," Pressler said.

Pressler said he was fearful that Tower would not be capable of cleaning up the Pentagon procurement system if confirmed.

Bush said he did not know whether he could win over senators who have indicated opposition to Tower, saying only that "I hope so."

Aviation experts set proposals

WASHINGTON — A task force of aviation industry and government safety experts proposed Tuesday that the world's airlines be ordered to do $800 million in work on older Boeing 747s, 737s and 727s.

But the task force, moving to ensure the safety of an aging international airline fleet, said none of the proposed repairs was urgent and all could be done during several years' time.

The group set up the Air Transport Association, which represents major U.S. airlines, and asked the Federal Aviation Administration to issue a massive "airworthiness directive" making mandatory modifications and replacements recommended in 150 Boeing Co. service bulletins.

KU freezes campus' hiring

LAWRENCE — University of Kansas officials have imposed a hiring freeze on the Lawrence campus through June 30.

Under the freeze announced in mid-February by Executive Vice Chancellor Judith Ramaley, the university will fill only those vacancies which are absolutely necessary.

The freeze does not affect student workers and is not expected to affect hiring or class offerings for the 1990 school year.

William Eakin, director of the KU budget office, said the freeze was imposed as a precaution to ensure that the university has enough money to pay for more than $900,000 worth of unbudgeted costs.

The costs are resulting mainly from increased insurance premiums on the new contract for state employees that boosts the state-paid portion of the premiums. University officials expect the Kansas Legislature to appropriate money to meet the shortfall, but it is not guaranteed.

"We can't wait wait and see if we're going to get the money and then scramble around to get a million dollars at the last minute," Eakin said.

Robert Jerry, chairman of the KU Senate's executive committee, said the freeze came after all teachers had been hired and didn't pose a problem.

Son finds elderly couple dead

Robert Simpson, 78, and Bertha Simpson, 75, were found dead in the home Tuesday morning, said Police Capt. John Hershberger.

The son of the couple found their bodies after his father was late for a doctor's appointment, Hershberger said.

A note and the handgun used in the deaths was recovered. Hershberger declined to discuss the contents of the note or who fired the shots.

Truck hit school bus, kills 2

JOHNSON — A truck ran into a school bus that had pulled out in front of it Tuesday morning, killing a 10-year-old girl and the driver of the truck.

Asia McKinney, 10, was one of three girls on the bus when the accident happened about 7:30 a.m. as the bus was picking up children for school in Johnson.

The eastbound bus was attempting to cross Kansas 27 when it was struck by the truck traveling north on the highway with an empty grain trailer. The bus driver stopped at a stop sign, but apparently did not see the oncoming truck, according to a statement from the Stanton County Sheriff's Department.

A light snow was falling at the time of the accident. Martie Floyd, president of the Stanton County School Board, said it was not known if poor visibility was a factor in the accident.

Two other girls on the bus were at Stanton County Hospital with minor injuries. The driver of the bus was more seriously hurt and was taken to a Garden City hospital.

Police investigating rape

K-State Police are investigating the report of an alleged rape which occurred on campus Saturday evening.

Richard Herrman, campus police investigator, said a rape complaint was reported Monday afternoon.

"It has not been confirmed as a rape yet," Herrman said. "The investigation has to be done to see if a rape has actually occurred."

He said the suspect is a K-State student, but was unable to say if the victim was a student or where the incident occurred.

Herrman has spoken with the victim and her mother. He said he plans to interview the suspect and two possible witnesses today or Thursday.

"I'm not aware of any actual eye witnesses, but there are a few who possibly know about the incident," Herrman said. "We should know by Thursday if there actually was a rape and if charges can be brought against the suspect."

The victim and the suspect knew each other, he said. "This is more of a case of date rape, but it is still considered to be an alleged rape."

Director of student publications accepts post at Indiana University

By Alan Wilds
Staff Writer

David L. Adams, director of Student Publications Inc., has accepted a position as professor of journalism and publisher of the newspaper and yearbook at Indiana University in Bloomington, Ind.

Adams will assume his new position Aug. 1.

"It has been a privilege to have worked with so many of our brightest students who have gone on to successful careers in the media and journalism education," said Adams, who is also an associate professor of journalism and mass communications. "Their success has been the special reward of my career in my home state of Kansas."

During Adams' tenure as director, the Royal Purple has won eight National Pacemaker Awards in the yearbook division and the Collegian has won two national Pacemakers in the newspaper division.

Two of Adams' most memorable times at K-State include working with the Kansas Scholastic Press Association's fall workshop, which he described as the largest event of its kind in the United States, and a week-long summer workshop for high school students, which he said is of the "best quality and (is the) most diverse."

"The high school journalism teachers have been very special to me," Adams said.

One of his greatest opportunities arose from the decision by the Journalism Education Association to locate its national headquarters at K-State, he said.

Adams served as the journalism and English teacher at Washburn Rural High School from 1969-75. From 1975-81, he was the director of journalism and coordinator of the high school programs at Fort Hays State University.

Adams said being a native Kansan makes it difficult to leave this position.

Harry Marsh, professor of journalism, was department head when Adams was hired. He said Adams has lived up to all the department's expectations and has excelled to become a leader in his field.

"Their success has been the special reward of my career in my home state of Kansas."

—David L. Adams Director of Student Publications Inc.

"What I saw was a continuum of excellent operations in Student Publications.

"The technology was greatly expanded," Marsh said. "When he first came here, the Collegian was operating on a bare minimum of computer terminals — he was able to expand that system."

Adams changed production of the Collegian from a tabloid to a broadsheet and updated the typesetting process to use a laser printer, Marsh said.

At Indiana University, Adams said he will be challenged by working with a strong daily student newspaper, the Indiana Daily Student, and a "photographically excellent" yearbook, the Arbitus.

Adams will be working with 20 full-time employees and 200 paid student employees in one of the top three journalism programs in the nation, he said.

Adams, who will head a search committee to find the replacements for his position, said his duties at K-State will probably be divided among two or more positions.

Carol Oukrop, director of the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications, said a combined effort of the journalism program, Student Publications and the College of Arts and Sciences will determine how to replace Adams.

Workshop stresses teaching, learning

By Brad Camp
Collegian Reporter

Students need some basic tools to be prepared for success, Mabel Phifer said during her seminar Tuesday.

Students need good planning, teamwork and respect for the diversity of culture, said Phifer, director of the Black College Satellite Telecommunication Network at Howard University in Washington.

About 10 people attended Phifer's workshop, "Tools for Success", in the Union.

"The overall goal of the workshop was to look at strategies and techniques that enhance the teaching-learning process on the university campus as it relates to minority students," Phifer said.

She conducted seminars relating to careers and leadership, role modeling and strategies for minority students on a predominantly white college campus.

The seminars, Phifer said, tried to create a positive environment for students.

"I have been pleased with the level of receptivity of the administrators who have taken time to (discuss) concerns," she said.

Lazone Grays, junior in social work and president of Brothers for Progress, said he attended the workshops to compile information for the group.

"I needed to get more information from these seminars so the organization can move in the best and most positive direction for the black minority," Grays said.

"(The group) is a way to get the black students and the black community together," he said.

Preventive measures taken to stop problems in athletics

By Kevin Kramer
Staff Writer

In the hopes of stemming the tide of problems within collegiate athletics before it reaches K-State, the athletic department and administrators have begun to take preventive measures.

Athletic Director Steve Miller said the University must be "proactive" not "reactive."

"I strongly feel the NCAA has its particular place and value as an organization," Miller said. "But, the clean-up of college athletics has to be done on the campuses.

"The burden of control falls directly on the presidents and directors of athletics to keep problems from getting out of hand. You can't do it as a solution to the aftermath."

President Jon Wefald said, "The entire administration is committed to having an honest athletic program within the rules set down by the NCAA."

The goal of the athletic administration is to have everyone from the athletic director, coaches and assistants to the players committed to an open and honest athletic program, Wefald said.

Stories in Monday's issue of Sports Illustrated about problems within the athletic programs at the University of Oklahoma and University of Colorado were not overkill, he said.

"If these incidents have occurred, it needs to be recorded," Wefald said. "I want problems to come to public light. It's healthy in deterring others.

"But, college athletics do not have equable reporting on both sides," Miller said. "The pluses — like K-State being ranked 13th in the nation in graduating student athletes — do not get reported in the news."

College athletes face the same temptations as any other student, he said.

"Because of the status of an athlete, they may be fractionally more susceptible or placed in positions where opportunities are more abundant," Miller said.

St. Patrick's celebration begins

By Britt Owen
Collegian Reporter

The Union Program Council is looking to bring out the green in people this week.

Irishfest, sponsored by UPC, is being held Wednesday through Friday in the Union to get people in the Irish mood and promote St. Patrick's Day, said Stacy Myles, senior in apparel and textile marketing and UPC special events chairperson.

"It gets people into the Irish mood," said Myles.

The Irishfest will be providing entertainment, special events and prizes, she said.

People finding shamrocks hidden inside the Union at various locations will be awarded prizes consisting of shamrock ties, bowling passes, coupons for free food, movie passes and Irish cookies, Myles said.

Today at noon in the Union Courtyard, Miki Thompson, graduate student in music, will be singing Irish folk songs. Thursday at noon in the courtyard, the William Jewell College Caledonian Pipe Band will be performing bagpipe music.

An Irish Jello eating contest will be held Friday at noon in the courtyard. The object of the contest will be to see who can slurp up three squares of green gelatin the fastest, Myles said.

The winner of the contest will receive $25. The second place winner will receive movie passes and the third place winner will receive four tickets to the Twisters & Songsation, Myles said.

The Twisters, a regional band that plays dance music, will perform from 8 p.m. until midnight Friday in the Catskeller The Twisters' performance is spnsored by the UPC Eclectic Entertainment Committee. Songsation will also perform. During Songsation's performance people can choose from 500 popular songs and record their singing in a soundproof booth, Myles said.

Green carnations will be sold for $1 from 11 a.m. until 1 p.m. in the Union each day of the festival. Other union-sponsored events include a discount at the bookstore, a discount at the Copy Center on all green paper and Irish food specials in the food area, Myles said.

Mike Penner, program adviser for UPC special events, said another fun event will be the Blarney Stone. The stone is supposed to be similar to the Blarney Stone found in Ireland, and the people who kiss it will receive a certificate.

The Blarney Stone gives the gift of eloquence when a person kisses it, Penner said.

The stone will be located outside the union stateroom from 11 a.m. until 1 p.m today until Friday.

High school students need freedom of press

Monday afternoon, Kansas students took a trip to Topeka that shouldn't had to have been made. The purpose of the trip was to exercise a constitutional right — that of free speech.

Testifying before the House Education Committee at the State Capitol, about 80 people spoke to legislators concerning House Bill 2234 — "the student freedom of expression act."

The bill was submitted in response to the 1988 Supreme Court's 5-3 Hazelwood vs. Kuhlmeier decision, which placed limits on the students' rights to determine what is suitable content for school sponsored publications.

The bill would make students legally responsible for articles that are libelous, obscene or encourage the breaking of laws or school rules.

Kansas principals, administrators and school boards could not be held liable in court for students' stories, under the proposed legislation.

This progressive bill would enable high school students to learn the basic foundation of reporting — that of fair coverage — without fear of punishment or reprisal from school adminstrators.

Since the 1988 ruling, an alarming number of school officials have taken advantage of the Supreme Court's broad language to censor student viewpoints because the officials are in disagreement with them or because the article in question would reflect badly on school administrators.

The Student Press Law Center in Washington, D.C. reports that in 1988 it received 548 requests from around the country concerning legal advice and assistance. About 80 percent of those calls related to actual or threatened censorship by school officials.

Between Sept. 1 and Dec. 31, the center received 246 requests, a 22 percent increase during the same period in 1987.

Media bashing has become a common practice in our society, with the major complaint being inaccurate and biased reporting. The purpose of journalism is to inform the public of the good as well as the ugly side of issues and events. In order to a have a future of competent and fair reporters, high school journalism students must be given back their constitutional right of free expression.

Purple pit can house intimidating crowd

High fives all around for Saturday's crowd at the men's basketball game in Bramlage. A boisterous group of K-State fans created an intimidating atmosphere that helped the Wildcats to an important win against the Oklahoma State University Cowboys.

During the past few weeks, the whisperings were beginning to grow louder. Despite all the fanfare, all the enthusiasm, all the talk of "transferring the tradition," it appeared as though the magic of the Ahearn crowd might have been lost forever.

Sure, it had been loud at times — really loud. And students were still standing, despite some protests. But somehow, it wasn't the same. Something was missing. Those big black girders weren't rattling like the ancient arches of Ahearn did so often.

Then Oklahoma State came to town. And sensing that folks were beginning to question the health of K-State's sixth man, the Bramlage crowd rose to the occasion. Literally.

Maybe Wildcat fans just needed time to get used to the plushness to which they were so unaccustomed. Or maybe they were too full from eating the hot pretzels they could never get in Ahearn. Or perhaps they were just worn out from the long trek down the stairs.

But no matter what the affliction, if Saturday's crowd is any indication, 'Cat fans appear on their way to a full recovery.

Yes, the new barn was rockin' Saturday afternoon. Many left the "purple pit" talking in hoarse voices. And there were even a few times when fans in the boring ol' alumni section abandoned their $5,000 chairbacks and rose with enthusiasm. The band was loud, the refs were bad, and the 'Cats rolled to a big, big, big, big, big, big win at home.

So no more reminiscing about Ahearn. K-State basketball is played in Bramlage Coliseum, and the sixth man is right there with it. K-State students, the heart of the coliseum crowd, must continue to lead the way. Now is no time to lose the momentum.

Tonight, the Missouri Tigers are going to experience Bramlage Coliseum for the first time. So put on the purple and bring a strong voice and stompin' shoes. Let 'em know that Wildcats are dangerous animals no matter what kind of cage you put them in.

Bill threatens school dropouts

A proposal going before the Kansas House of Representatives Transportation Committee this very day marks an effort by the Kansas Legislature to improve the quality of education in Kansas.

Well, not exactly.

Actually, House Bill 2343 provides an "incentive" for students who might be considering dropping out of school to stick it out and graduate. The bill requires that when students drop out of high school, the principals send their names to the Department of Transportation, which will then revoke their driver's licenses.

The hope is that the desire to drive, whether for pleasure or for necessity, will be incentive enough for the student to stay in school or work toward a GED. (The bill does allow dropouts to keep their driver's licenses if they can show they are working on a GED.)

Rep. Donna Whitehead, a Democrat from Kansas' 102nd District and the sponsor of the bill, justifies it by pointing out that driving is a privilege, not a right, and that if students don't go to school, they should lose that privilege.

Driving is a privilege and if people drive in a way that endangers or takes the lives of others, then their driving privileges should be revoked.

Dropouts, however, do not cause a majority of the automobile accidents in Kansas. In fact, Whitehead admits that she knows of no correlation at all between dropping out and unsafe driving. The fact that a person is a dropout has no discernible effect on his or her ability to drive.

Why then is the bill needed? What threat do high school dropouts pose? What does high school have to do with driving?

Commentary

Dwayne Lively
Collegian Columnist

All these questions are important and must be answered before this bill continues. But another problem exists.

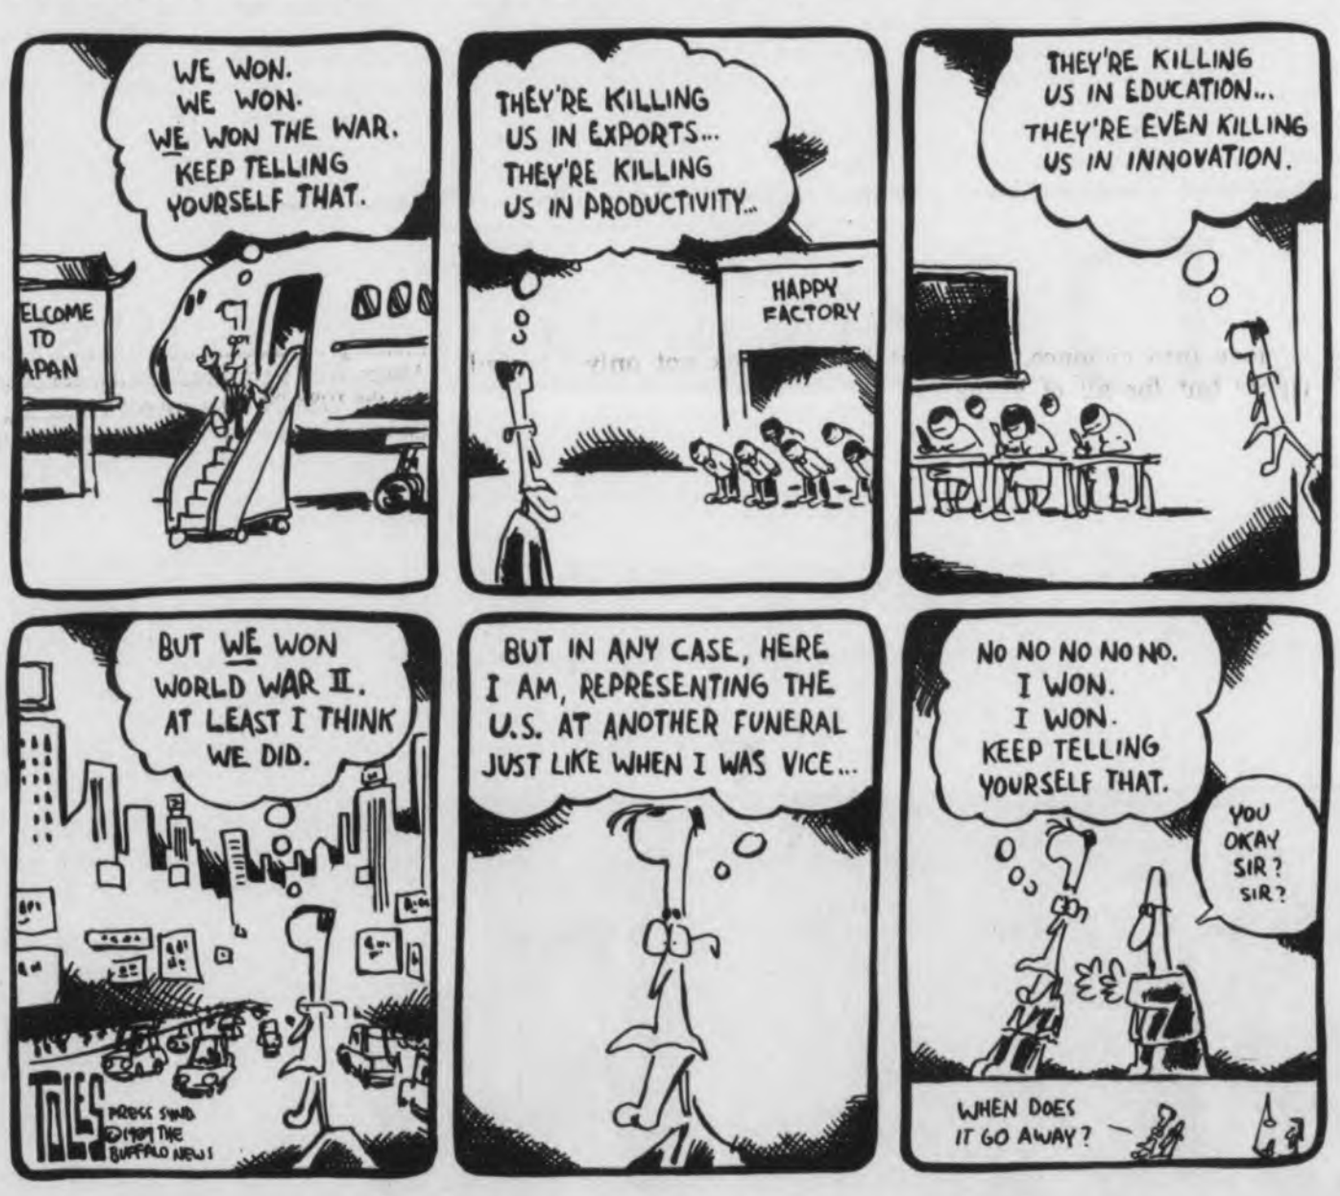
In Kansas, students between the ages of 14 and 16 can get temporary driving permits that allow them to drive with a qualified adult. Driver's Education courses are also offered for this age group. The legal age a student can drop out of school is 16.

Students can be qualified to drive before they are legally old enough to drop out of school. Even though students have taken this safety training, if they drop out of school, their licenses are revoked. Even if they have clean driving records.

Students are therefore being punished for doing something that is well within their legal rights. Dropping out of school may not be the wisest thing one can do, but it is legal. If a punishment is to be assessed, then the legal age at which a student can drop out should be changed as well. A person's lack of wisdom should not be a justification for punishment.

While it is nice that our representatives are interested in education, House Bill 2343 overlooks something important. It assumes that the high schools are perfectly fine and that it is the dropouts who have the problem and need "incentives." It does not analyze the school system itself to see how the school system has failed the dropout. Nor does it examine the students' personal motives for dropping out.

Under HB 2343, if a girl gets pregnant and drops out of school as a result, she must work toward a GED or her license will be revoked. Period. The fact that she might have to drive to work to support her child is not considered.



HB 2343 should be filed under "nice try" and then forgotten because it is not an attempt to reform education. All it does is impose sanctions on students who exercise one of their legal rights.

The incentives to remain in school must come from inside the halls and classrooms of the school itself. Outside punishments will not help a person learn if something is wrong with the school itself.

If their minds want to be somewhere else, physical presence in a classroom does not ensure that students will learn. If a student does not want to learn, a student will not learn. In fact, students who don't want to be in class can make it difficult for those who do by being disruptive.

If just being in a classroom is all that is important in education, then all educational problems could be solved by simply eliminating a student's right to drop out.

Hopefully, HB 2343 will die in committee. It simply does not address the heart of the relatively small dropout problem that exists in Kansas. Instead, it appears to be an effort to make Kansas look good by eliminating all dropouts. It doesn't look to education at all, just to the highways and byways of the state.

World should respect beliefs

For more than a week now, major networks in the United States have been carrying news on the publishing of a controversial book, namely, "The Satanic Verses." Not only have they blown the matter out of proportion, but they have also painted a very confusing picture of the whole situation.

Yes, I am a Moslem, as well as a Pakistani, and I am disappointed at the publishing of this book. But I do feel that with enough insight into the issue, any rational person would feel the same way.

I highly respect the opinions of authors and writers, but some of their comments concerning this issue have disappointed me. They talk about the First Amendment, they talk about freedom of speech and I only wish they thought about respecting the beliefs of a billion Moslems in the world.

It is natural to feel a reaction to a threat to a material object. But people often do not understand the implications of a threat to the distortion of one's beliefs.

People conspiring with the enemy are abruptly labeled as traitors because they want to take away our country. How about a person who tries to distort our beliefs?

The answer depends upon what beliefs we are talking about. Debate, controversy and differences of opinion are well-suited to social issues like gun control, social security, the budget deficit and so on.

But when a notorious person tries to distort and baselessly challenge the beliefs about which most of the Moslems feel so strongly, there is bound to be a commotion.

Commentary

Sheikh Faisal Razzaq
Guest Columnist

I cannot speak for every Moslem in the world, but I am sure that most of them resent the publishing of "The Satanic Verses." There are at least three basic reasons for this.

The first and most apparent reason is emotional. The book hurts the feelings of Moslems because it insults the God they believe in and misrepresents the character of the prophet they follow.

The second and not so apparent reason is logical. A book of this nature is blasphemous. It has the potential to arouse doubts in the minds of Moslems and weaken their faith.

Third, this book conveys incorrect, propagandist and misleading information about the Islamic faith to non-Moslems. I bet most of you have not read the Koran (the holy book of the Moslems) and do not have basic knowledge about Islamic beliefs. Would any true Moslem want a non-Moslem to be misled by the thoughts of a corrupt mind?

Regretfully, the media have tried to equate the reaction to the publishing of the book with the Iranian revolution, fundamentalism and the Ayatollah. This makes the matter even worse because anything relating to Iran has a negative connotation in America.

My point of view is that there is nothing more than deep-seated misunderstandings between the two countries. There are no evil empires. If you don't believe me, just ask the person who learned that after spending eight years in the White House.

The case of "The Satanic Verses" is not the concern of a country or a specific person. This is the concern of many Moslems all across the world who value their faith more than anything else.

I find the whole situation tragic and feel pity for the author of this blasphemous book. But I don't see any reason for him to complain because it is impossible to believe that he did not know what he was getting into.

It is vital to understand that the reaction to the publishing of this book is natural, and is not intended to curtail anyone's freedom of speech. It's very similar to a response when someone attacks our country.

The well-being of our world is greatly based upon mutual respect. And this respect should not stop at respecting each other's claims to physical resources, but it should also encompass respecting and valuing each other's beliefs.

By disapproving the publishing of this book, the world can show that it respects the beliefs of one-fifth of its population.

Editor's note: Sheikh Faisal Razzaq is a senior in finance.

Media ignore some U.S. terrorist activities

Commentary

Scott Miller

Collegian Columnist

Imagine for a moment that international terrorists had publicly threatened to kill people for their beliefs. Imagine that said terrorists even planned to kill people living in the United States.

You're probably thinking that none of this is difficult to imagine because that is exactly what the media have been telling us since the Ayatollah Khomeini made a public death threat against novelist Salman Rushdie and anyone else responsible for distributing his book, "The Satanic Verses."

The story has had regular front page coverage and has occasionally even eclipsed the trial of Lt. Col. Oliver North as the lead story on some network broadcasts. The media have denounced the threat as nothing less than a violation of free speech and the right of sovereign nations to govern their affairs.

Now, imagine further that terrorists not only threatened to terrorize people in the United States, but actually did so. Then imagine that the U.S. government had itself played a significant role in training said terrorists and perhaps later helped them to locate their victims.

It sounds like stuff straight out of a cheap novel, but, if it happened, one would think such a story would get an incredible amount of airplay and front page exposure. That is, after all, the self-assigned task of the media — to find important events and report on them in an "unbiased" fashion.

In fact, the events I'm describing did happen, and yet the major news media of this country — the network news programs and the major newspapers, such as The New York Times, The Wall Street Journal and The Washington Post — devoted relatively little attention to the story, given the media's current fixation with the Rushdie affair.

Beginning in April 1987, people in the Los Angeles area began receiving threatening phone calls and letters from an organization identifying itself as E.M. In El Salvador, opponents of the government are often assassinated by military personnel dressed as civilians, and found with these initials — which stand for Esquadron de Muerte or death squad — carved into their bodies.

All of the people threatened were either activists working for peace in Central America or members of their families.

On July 15, for example, Father Luis Olivares, of a sanctuary church, received a written death threat with the initials "E.M." scrawled in large letters.

The same month, a "death list" of the target activists' names was published. It read in part, "You escaped in El Salvador. Here with us you will not. Nobody will be saved." Central American death squads usually publish the names of their intended victims before abducting and killing them.

The most serious case was that of Yanira Corea, who was attacked in June 1987, and one month later abducted outside the Los Angeles office of the Committee in Solidarity with the People of El Salvador (CISPES). According to an article in the October 1987 issue of The Progressive magazine, the attackers tortured and raped Corea for six hours before dumping her beneath a bridge.

These attacks were possible because the attackers had detailed knowledge of where the victims lived, with whom they associated and how they traveled. Some of that information, it turns out, was probably collected and passed on to the death squads by the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

According to Frank Varelli, a former FBI agent who served as the Bureau's liaison with the Salvadoran security forces, between 1981 and 1984, the FBI conducted a politically motivated investigation of CISPES and other Central American solidarity groups. The information from this investigation was regularly passed on to the Salvadoran military. The purpose of the investigation, Varelli said, was to "break" the solidarity committee.

In testimony before Congress, Varelli said, "The (Salvadoran National) Guard wanted to know the names of persons the United States was deporting back to El Salvador ... (and) who in the United States could be considered to be opposed to the National Guard's interests in El Salvador."

Despite the fact that people living in the United States were not only threatened, as in the case of the publishers of "The Satanic Verses," but were actually attacked, the story of death squad activity in Los Angeles was afforded relatively little coverage, other than by local publications such as The Los Angeles Times, and "radical" publications, such as The Progressive and The Guardian newspaper.

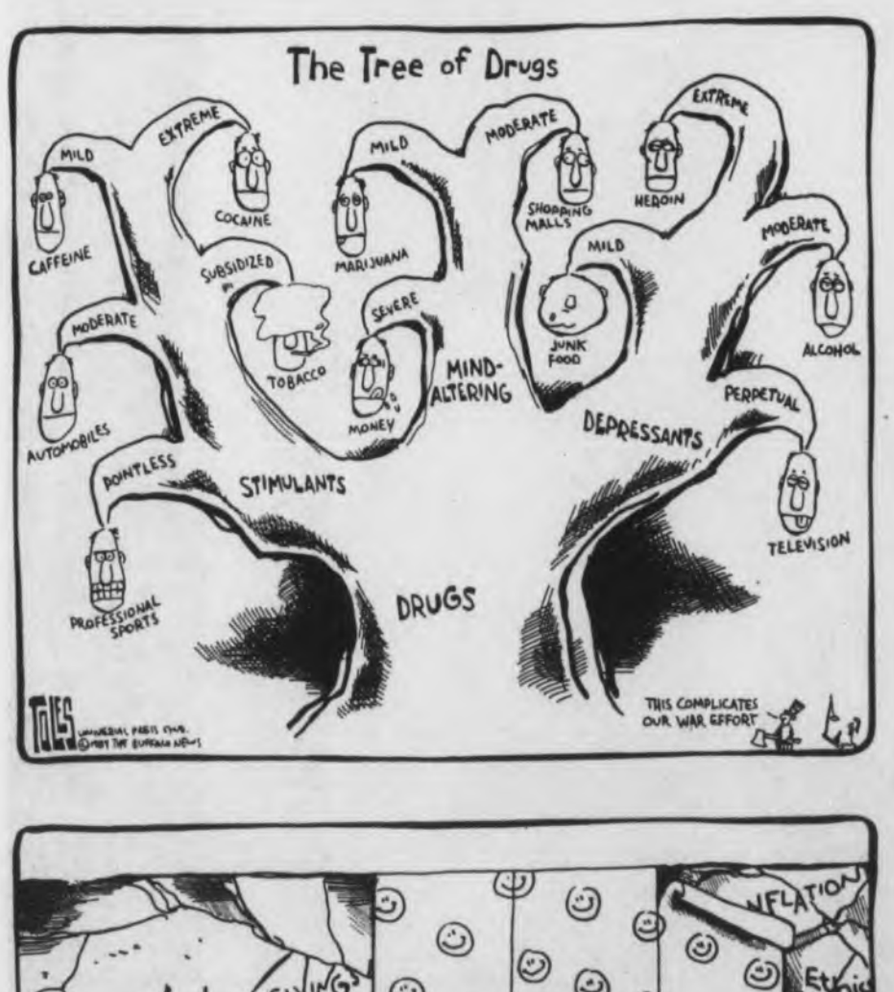
Not only was there no talk in 1987 of the United States breaking off diplomatic relations with the Salvadoran government, as the European Common Market countries did with Iran last week, but U.S. military aid to El Salvador continued to increase after 1987.

Currently, El Salvador is the second largest recipient of U.S. aid — receiving more money from the United States than the Salvadoran gross national product.

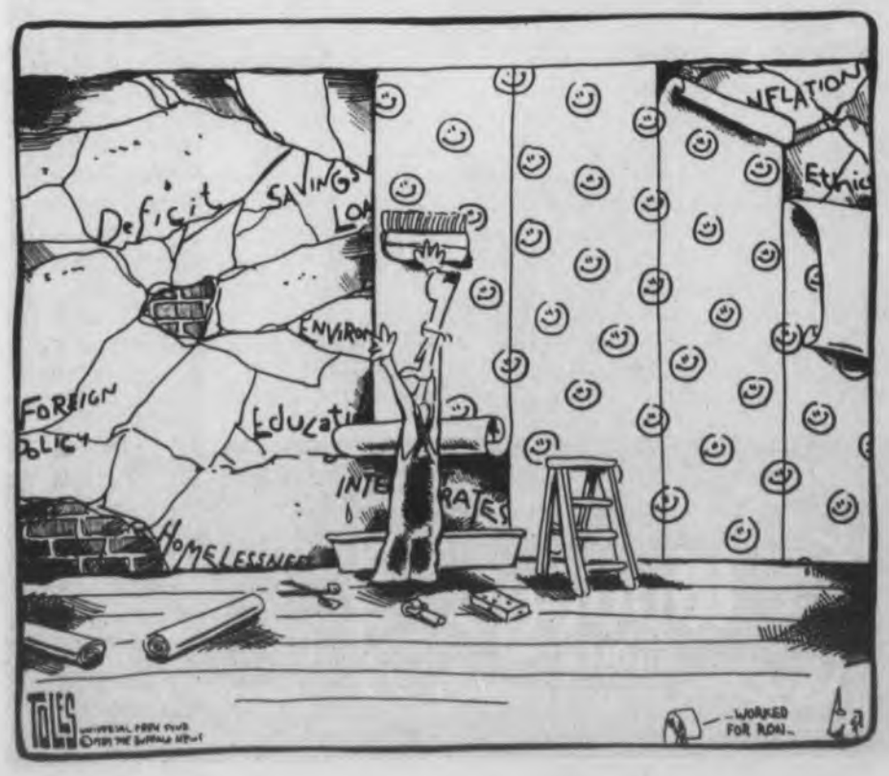
Nor were there pronouncments in 1987 from U.S government officials about such activity "being deeply offensive to the norms of civilized behavior," as President George Bush has remarked about the Ayatollah's death threat.

One can only speculate on the reasons behind the seeming disparity in the flow of "unbiased" reporting, which is so carefully prepared and packaged for our consumption. But such speculation should certainly include acknowledgement of U.S. foreign policy designs in the Persian Gulf and Central America, and which governments are willing to play the role of regional policemen for the United States.

Other Perspectives



In a race which garnered intensive media attention, Louisiana Republican David Duke won Saturday in his race for a seat on the Louisiana Legislature. Duke, who beat opponent John treen by 227 votes, has attracted media attention because of his past affiliation with the Ku Klux Klan as well as his beliefs.



A person like Duke can successfully maneuver his way into power by using his charisma. This seems to be what Duke did. By playing to inherent racism, Duke was able to attract support he might otherwise have not received. By exploiting larger sociological issues, Duke ignored a large segment of society, and in essence, spat on it.

But what makes Duke's victory all the more atrocious is that, by winning, Duke pays lip service to every racist, extremist organization in the country. All that hate could explode into violence. And that is a setback not only for civil rights but for all of humanity.

Fans not improved

Editor,

Bramlage Coliseum is definitely a "new and improved" place for K-State fans to watch the 'Cats.

And the crowd, particularly the student section at Bramlage, is new as well. But it is not improved.

On the contrary, we have found the crowd at K-State home basketball games to be less vocal, less knowledgeable, and just plain less interested than the legendary crowds of Ahearn Field House. Our question simply is, why?

Are the students who attend the games at Bramlage not the same ones who used to give Ahearn such a great basketball atmosphere? Are the 1988-89 'Cats just not as exciting as the teams of past years? Does Bramlage itself just cast a spell on K-State students making them content to just stand, watch the games, and keep their mouths shut?

Obviously, the answer to all of these questions is NO.

While we don't have the pleasure of watching such an outstanding individual as Mitch Richmond this year, the 'Cats as a whole are playing some of the best basketball Manhattan has seen in years.

More dunks, more shots blocked into the seventh row, and great, great hustle like we used to have.

What happened to the days when an opposing player's airball would haunt him for the rest of the game every time he touched the ball? What happened to the days when K-State fans would absolutely refuse to be quiet for the entire length of the time outs when the 'Cats were on a roll?

What ever happened to the days when, after a K-State bucket, the crowd would scream for the entire time the opposing team had the ball, making it hell for them to try to organize any type of offense?

You know, Indiana Coach Bobby Knight once called the K-State crowd in Ahearn Field House "the best basketball crowd in America." He probably wouldn't say the same thing if he brought his team to Bramlage this year.

Let's get in gear, Bramlage fans. Just like the 'Cats can't win if all the players don't come ready to play, we can't be a great crowd — like we used to be — if all of us don't come ready to be rowdy.

We don't want to tackle mascots. We just want to restore the fear in opposing teams that they used to have for Ahearn.

We have one more opportunity tonight when Missouri comes to town. Let's make life miserable for them in the way that only we know how.

Forgotten leaders

Editor,

Have we forgotten our American heritage?

Last Monday was a day in which we paid tribute, or at least should have, to the past leaders of the United States. It was President's Day, for those who forgot.

A week in January was set aside for a distinguished American leader, Martin Luther King Jr., but when the time comes to pay our respects to those who established and have upheld America's great democracy, nothing is done.

President's Day should be a day of honor.

Three presidents come to mind right away when greatness is thought of: George Washington, Thomas Jefferson and Abraham Lincoln.

The father of our nation, George Washington, set the ideals for America, and without him leading the fight for freedom, Americans might not be living in the democracy they do today.

Thomas Jefferson, the writer of probably the most important document in America, the Declaration of Independence, also helped produce many other government documents which we abide by today.

And then there is probably the biggest advocate of civil rights in our history, Abraham Lincoln. He strived for black liberty all the time, even to the extent of war. Not only did he free prisoners of the South, he was probably the reason the Fifteenth Amendment was ratified.

Without him, Martin Luther King Jr. would not have ever had the chance to speak of what he did or the way in which he did it.

I'm not racist in the least. I am grateful for the movement King led, and I detest all forms of racism.

But it seems as though we have forgotten where we have come from in this most free nation in the world.

Let's not forget our past leaders who have made America the "Land of the Free."

Fee essential

Editor,

I would like all K-Staters to join me in giving "purple applause" to the Student Senate and associated student leaders. The cause for applause: passing the health fee increase.

This enables Lafene to maintain quality staff and equipment to continue to deliver quality health care to our K-State community. Medical care is essential to the quality of life in any community. Illness and injury, be they physical or mental, can interfere with reaching goals and enjoying life.

Thanks to the overwhelming vote of our community leaders, we shall continue to provide opportunities for curative and preventive medical care to K-Staters.

Good health and good spirits.

Article inspiring

Editor,

Your article on Andy McDavitt, "When words have no sound," published in the Feb. 15 Collegian was an inspirational example of courage and determination.

We have a 12-year-old, born-profoundly-deaf son who also speaks and is mainstreamed. In a world lacking heroes, Andy McDavitt qualifies for this title.

Your coverage was an outstanding human interest story that truly deserves national coverage. Keep up the top quality journalism so characteristic of your Kansas State Collegian.

Cheating wrong

Editor,

At many universities students are left unsupervised during examinations because the faculty can trust the students not to cheat. Some have explicit honor codes to cover this point, others merely assume students are adults and can be trusted.

Bergkamp's letter Friday explains to me why this is not the way things are done at K-State.

Bergkamp's point seems to be that cheating is not nearly as wrong if the students are not proctored.

Would he also agree then that a mugger should be judged less harshly if he only robs people when no policeman is nearby?

Actually, one can have a great deal of fun considering the implications of Bergkamp's situational ethics. For example, suppose the "authority figure" had returned to the room unexpectedly in the middle of the examination? How should we judge students caught with their books out?

Would the misdemeanor of cheating when not being watched convert instantly to the felony of being caught? Should they be given a grace period to stop cheating due to the change in the situation?

Cheating is wrong. Period. We ought not teach children that they should not cheat only because they will be punished. We ought to teach them that they should not cheat because cheating is wrong.

It is by failing to teach children to distinguish between right and wrong that we have fallen into the morass of drugs, insider trading and recent presidential appointments. To object to this is not to be a member of the "Jerry Falwell School of Morality."

Indeed, civil disobedience protests for civil rights would have been impossible if the participants had subscribed to Bergkamps's ethics. The whole point of civil disobedience is to do what is right, regardless of the coercive power of the state to punish.

If all we teach our children is to avoid punishment, we will have done them and ourselves tremendous harm.

A teacher is not only supposed to relate to students and let them have fun in the classroom. A teacher is supposed to teach children, through instruction and by being a positive role model.

People who worry only about the possibilities of punishment and not about right and wrong are not the role models I want influencing my daughter.

The ability not to cheat, despite the opportunity, is a perfectly reasonable test of a person's moral fitness to be a teacher. Further, a teacher should understand enough about right and wrong to avoid the trap of blaming the victim for not watching the students more carefully.

Someone who does not is not suitable to be a teacher.

I hope Bergkamp either reconsiders his position or changes his major.

Collegian Editorial Policies

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR are always encouraged. Those which pertain to matters of campus and/or public interest are especially encouraged, and are given the highest priority.

Letters should be kept as brief as possible, preferably under 300 words. Those who cannot condense their opinions should consider submiting their letter in the form of a guest column. All letters are subject to editing for space, style and taste.

GUEST COLUMNS are also encouraged. The column should be no longer than two double-spaced, typed pages. If the submission is used as a column and not a letter to the editor, it will be accompanied by the author's photograph.

New law enforcement facilities considered

Jail not up to state standards

By Carol Knorr
Collegian Reporter

County officials are considering a proposal for a new law enforcement center because the jail and administrative facilities are not up to state standards, said Alvan Johnson, director of the Riley County Police Department.

The proposal, which includes expansion of the jail and administration buildings, will cost $6.3 million, said Eric Shoults, assistant county engineer.

"There are actually two projects being done under one shell," Shoults said. "We've always called it a jail project, but it includes a jail facility and an administrative facility."

The jail portion of the proposed center would cost an estimated $3 million, while the administrative portion would cost $2.5 million, he said. The balance would go to legal fees, design costs, communication equipment and interior furnishings.

"The current jail was built in the 1930s," Johnson said. "It wasn't designed in any kind of manner to take into account the current jail standards, including a need for monitoring the prisoners from a safety standpoint."

The jail facility was constructed to house as many as 40 inmates.

"With the right classifications, under today's standards the jail can hold up to 21 inmates," he said.

On some weekends the jail exceeds the number of inmates allowed under state or federal standards. Twenty-nine people were jailed the weekend of Feb. 17, Johnson said.

State standards require that 35 square feet exist for each prisoner, while federal laws call for 50 square feet per prisoner, he said.

"Unfortunately, as a general rule, when lawsuits are filed against a jail facility, comparisons are made using the federal standards rather than the state," he said.

In the past, several suits have been filed against the Riley County Jail, but were settled out of court, Johnson said.

"The state is going along with our current system of running only because they know we are attempting to do something about it," he said.

Shoults said the proposed jail, which will allow 75 square feet per person, is designed to house 53 inmates.

"It's under the class action of civil rights that we are being forced to update the facility," he said. "It's a good thing we didn't build a jail 10 years ago — we'd already be obsolete. That's how much standards are changing."

Shoults said staffing is also a problem with the jail.

"If we were running according to national scales, we would have to have a staff person on each floor monitoring inmates," he said.

This standard is not being met in the three-floor county jail, Shoults said.

"Right now, we have very little direct observation of the inmates from physical constraints of the building," he said.

To alleviate this situation, a method of directly observing all inmates from one control tower is being considered for the new building, Shoults said.

"In today's figures, each staff person is the equivalent of $100,000 per year," he said. "If you can reduce the staffing by one position, over the years the new facility will pay for itself."

The construction of the building adds a variety of problems to the issue of meeting state standards, Johnson said.

"When our jail was built, it was constructed with thick concrete walls and iron and steel bars to keep people in," he said. "To some extent, this prohibits any modification in structure from being made."

It would be nearly impossible to install proper heating and air conditioning with regard to cost and efficiency, Johnson said. Because of the physical structure of the building, central air cannot be installed.

The cells and offices are cooled with individual air conditioners in the windows. Heat is provided by the original boiler, which was converted to gas.

Plumbing, electrical wiring and indoor lighting also do not meet state standards, but changes have been put on hold because of the possibility of a new building, Johnson said.

In addition to construction problems, Johnson said organizational problems arise because various tasks are performed adjacent to the area needed to process people.

Suspects brought in on DUI charges go through processing in the main hallway, he said.

The main hallway provides access in and out of the building, the kitchen, both bathroom facilities and the administrative assistant's office, Johnson said.

"Given all of the utilizations that hall provides in that building, everything else must shut down for one and a half to two hours when a DUI is brought in and processed," he said.

The administrative building next to the jail facility is extremely overcrowded and inadequate from a state standpoint, Johnson said.

It was originally built in 1974 as a temporary building and designed to house half of the current staff, he said.

"The effect that the overcrowding has is severe — much more than is probably realized by the public," Johnson said.

The space limitation causes a lack of privacy, he said.

"Suspects and even victims of sexual crimes are paraded around and often embarrassed needlessly because there aren't enough private settings in which to interview or interrogate subjects," Johnson said. "There are several rooms available, but not enough for 13 investigators."

Because of the lack of privacy, Johnson said fewer people are likely to personally report crimes.

He said the building was not designed to accomodate computers or the 911 emergency phone system.

"We've been living in these kinds of conditions now for quite a number of years, and we've gotten by," Johnson said. "And we can get by for a while longer.

"All we're really saying is that the community needs to really take a serious look at the circumstances and effects these conditions have on law enforcement in the community."

Shoults said because preliminary research has followed a needs assessment into the cost and design of the building, finding funds for the project is the Riley County Commission's next step.

"We needed to come up with the design plan for the dollar amount evaluation," he said. "With the final drawing we've come up with, we've saved 20 percent from the original needs assessment evaluation."

Shoults said several options have been discussed for funding, including bond issues or privatization, but no specific plan has been agreed upon.

A class sponsored by the University for Man was presented Saturday to explain issues concerning the new jail.

JoAnn Bayer, lifelong resident of Manhattan who attended the class, said she was convinced Manhattan needs a new facility.

"From what I've seen so far, the minds behind this plan are looking at economics real closely, and I appreciate that fact," Bayer said. "I just hope we can figure out a way to pay for this."

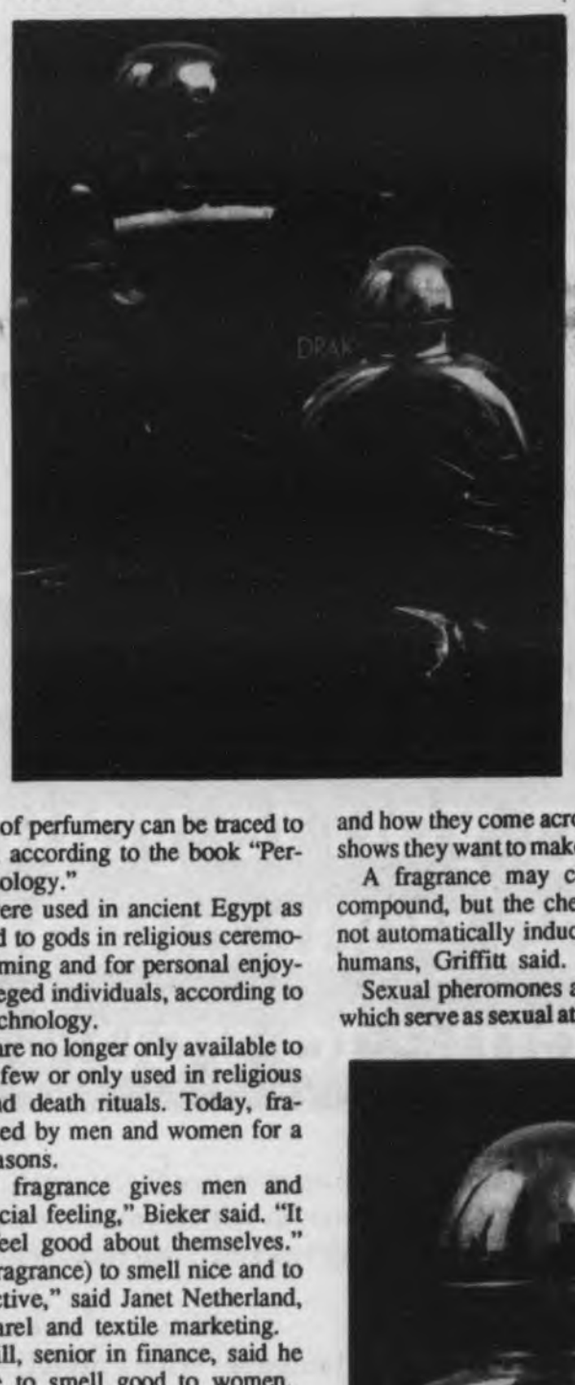
Stylish chemistry



Designed for individuals

perfume bottles courtesy of Dillard Department Store

As a fashion statement, a sexual appeal, or mood enhancement ... perfumes are a part of many individuals daily attire.

"Whether it be sexy, whether it be aggressive, there are lots of different reasons why people wear (fragrances)," said Andrea Bieker, area sales manager for cosmetics at Dillard Department Store.

The origins of perfumery can be traced to ancient Egypt, according to the book "Perfumery Technology."

Perfumes were used in ancient Egypt as incense offered to gods in religious ceremonies, in embalming and for personal enjoyment by privileged individuals, according to Perfumery Technology.

Fragrances are no longer only available to the privileged few or only used in religious ceremonies and death rituals. Today, fragrances are used by men and women for a number of reasons.

Wearing a fragrance gives men and women a "special feeling," Bieker said. "It makes them feel good about themselves."

"(I wear a fragrance) to smell nice and to be more attractive," said Janet Netherland, senior in apparel and textile marketing.

Brent Gaskill, senior in finance, said he wears cologne to smell good to women.

Fragrances such as perfumes can play a role in sexual enticement, said William Griffitt, professor of psychology.

"Perfume is advertised as something that will appeal to the opposite sex," Griffitt said.

A person's response to a fragrance depends on past experiences with that fragrance, he said.

"If (a person) has a pleasurable experience — whether it is purely sexual or not — in the presence of someone who is wearing a particular type of scent, then the fragrance has the possibility of conditioning (that person) to prefer and react positively to that scent in the future," Griffitt said.

The association between sex and fragrances in advertising serves to convince people that fragrances are an integral part of sex, he said. People are responsive to these associations.

"When people put (on a fragrance), they don't really think they're going to meet the perfect person," Bieker said. "It is such a fantasy, and the advertisers want it to be that way."

Gaskill said when people wear fragrances "it tells me they care about their appearance and how they come across to other people. It shows they want to make a good impression."

A fragrance may contain a phermonal compound, but the chemical property does not automatically induce sexual response in humans, Griffitt said.

Sexual pheromones are airborn hormones which serve as sexual attractors in animal and insect mating, he said. Research was conducted to determine if pheromones in humans will elicit a similar response to that of animals and insects.

A pheromone from a monkey was isolated and the same chemical structure was isolated in secretion of women during a stage of the ovarian cycle, Griffitt said.

A study was done to determine if the secretion would serve as a phermonal agent or sexual attractor in males, but men were not able to smell the pheromones, he said.

"Most of the old perfumers would take things that people like to smell, like the odors of flowers," said Cliff Meloan, professor of chemistry. "These types of compounds are very complex mixtures. The smell of a rose consists of hundreds of compounds."

To make a rose fragrance naturally, a tremendous number of roses would be needed, Meloan said. Modern chemistry tries to determine which four or five compounds make the odor.

"(Chemists) want to try to make a fragrance that is as good as nature can make, but they want to be able to make it in large quantities," he said.

The chemist mixes compounds and tests the product on people, asking the participants what the fragrance smells like — possibly a rose or a lilac, Meloan said.

Researchers attempt to determine what characteristic of the compound makes a person experience a particular sensation, he said.

Although people may consider any fragrance a perfume or cologne, these are not generic definitions.

Perfume consists of 18 to 30 percent pure concentrate, according to an Yves Saint Laurent training manual.

Perfume has the highest concentration level of the fragrances, said Karen Miller, fragrance consultant for Dillard's.

Eau de parfum contains 10 to 20 percent concentrate. Eau de toilette has the next highest concentration and cologne has the lowest concentration level, according to the Saint Laurent manual.

Men's products have one concentration and are usually called colognes, Miller said.

"A perfume would be like a full dozen roses, while eau de toilette or cologne would be like a single rose," she said.

Body chemistry, dry skin and medication affect the way a fragrance smells on a person, Miller said.

"Certain people acquire and like a different kind of smell, whether it be spicy or floral," Bieker said.

Name brand is important to some people when choosing a fragrance, she said.

"Society today is very name-brand oriented. The hottest thing on the market is (what people buy)," Beiker said.

Although name brand is important, it is secondary to the smell of the product in determining what fragrance a person will buy, Miller said.

"A lot of people find a particular kind of perfume they like and wear it forever," she said.

Netherland said she wears one fragrance most of the time.

People convince themselves that there is only one fragrance to wear, Miller said. A fragrance consultant demonstrates how men and women can wear several different fragrances.

"Wear fragrances to suit your moods," she said. "Fragrances are really mood lifters."

If a person wears the same fragrance all the time, fragrance fatigue may be experienced, Miller said. A person "will have a tendency to wear that fragrance stronger and put more on because they can't perceive it on themselves."

Men and women should have a fragrance wardrobe of at least three fragrances, she said.

There is a proper way to wear fragrances, Miller said. For women, eau de toilette should be sprayed on the entire body and perfume should be placed at the pulse point.

Men should use cologne on the front of the chest and the back of the neck, she said.

Dancers turn stands at games into stage, entertain at halftime

By Karen Allen
Staff Writer

Dancing in the Bramlage Coliseum for fun has turned two freshmen from St. Louis into celebrities — at least in the eyes of some K-State basketball fans.

Johnny Taylor and Eric MacLin, both freshmen in environmental design, will perform tonight to a song by New Addition at halftime of the K-State vs. University of Missouri basketball game.

MacLin said they first danced at the basketball game against Vanderbilt University, Dec. 10. They stood up in the stands and boogied during the Pridettes' halftime performance.

Neither student said he expected the crowd to take their dancing seriously.

"We liked (the song) and started dancing," MacLin said. "We didn't expect everyone to go crazy."

"We don't think about the people," Taylor said. "We dance because we like to dance."

The two said the fishing hats have lead to them being recognized by students on campus.

"We call them our party hats," Taylor said. "It's the hats that people notice."

MacLin said two woman approached them after the game against the Univeristy of Nebraska at Lincoln to ask for autographs and a picture.

The pair made their halftime debut Saturday at the K-State vs. Oklahoma State University game. The fans seemed impressed with the students' routine to "My Prerogative," a song by Bobby Brown.

Kelly Cooley, sophomore in prepharmacy, said he recognized MacLin and Taylor by their "Gilligan hats." Cooley said the routine was funny because "they talked to each other during the song."

"It was great," said Dayna Lockwood, sophomore in accounting. "Everybody was turning around and looking for them to start dancing during the (Junction City) high school girls' routine, and they didn't get up. But when they announced they were going to dance, everyone went wild."

Amy Hoch, freshman in business administration, said she thought the dancing duo was both "cool and neat."

"It's something different .... It's individuals getting to do something," Hoch said. "They seem to be pretty popular."

Chris Peterson, assistant director of athletics, marketing and sales, recruited the two students to dance at halftime, said a Bramlage official.

Golfers finish No. 11

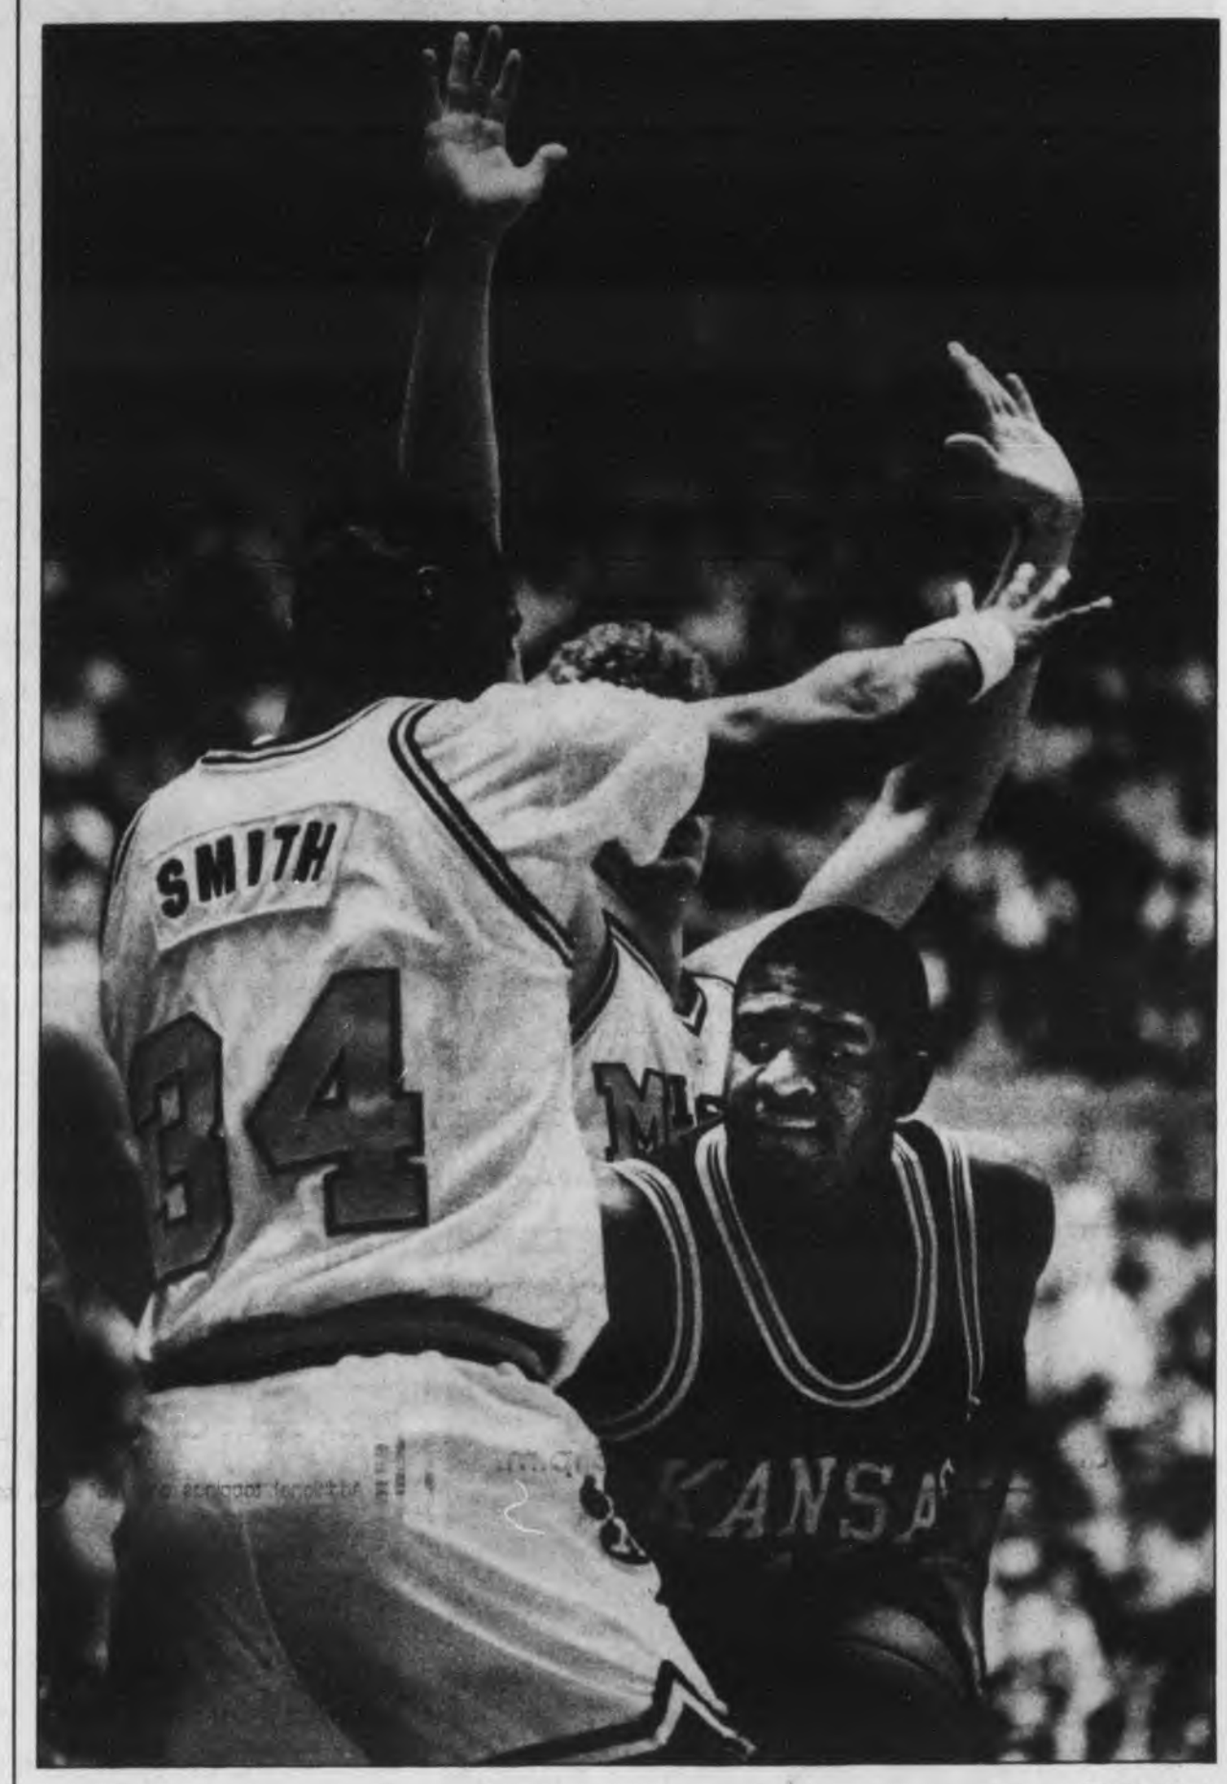
From Staff and Wire Reports

GOLETA, Calif. — K-State golf coach Russ Bunker said Monday that he would be ecstatic if his men's team finished in the top 10 after completing the first two rounds of the Hammond-Bell Pacific Coast Collegiate Golf Championships in 16th place.

The Wildcats didn't quite finish the three-round tournament at the Sandpiper Golf Course in the top 10, but K-State's 11th-place finish Tuesday in the 20-team tourney had to please Bunker.

"We got ourselves in real good position (for top 10), but we just couldn't get over the hump," Bunker said. "We had a couple of penalty shots at the end that hurt us. But I was really pleased that we were able to move up as far as we did.

"I'm really proud of our effort, especially since we haven't played yet this spring."



K-State shot a combined score of 263 Tuesday to go along with its Monday rounds of 307 and 310, then finished with 920 strokes for the tournament. Fresno State claimed the title with a 16-over-par 880. Southern California's Earl Morley took medalist honors after a four-hole playoff in which he birdied the fourth hole.

K-State's Jeff Sedorcek took 12th place individually with a three-round total of 224. To round out the rest of the K-State scoring, Troy Keller shot 230; Brett Vuillemin, 234; Brad Stephens, 237; and John Shields, 246.

Of the 20-team field, 15 were ranked among the nation's top 20. All of the entries but K-State were from traditionally warm-weather climates and had already played in at least four tournaments this spring.

"I got a lot of nice comments from coaches here who were surprised we were as competetive as we were," Bunker said.

'Cats play host to No. 7 Mizzou

Big 8 starting to get interesting

By Chris Hays
Sports Editor

The outcome of tonight's Big Eight Conference match-up between K-State and Missouri could have a major impact on the Wildcats' NCAA postseason tournament plans.

A loss to the Tigers tonight would probably not make or break the Wildcats' chances for an NCAA tournament berth, but a victory against Missouri would almost certainly sew up a spot for K-State among the 64 teams.

"It would be a big step toward securing a bid," K-State coach Lon Kruger said. "It's difficult to say whether you have enough (victories), but you would always like to get one more."

A victory against Missouri tonight would also make the already-jumbled Big Eight standings even more interesting as the teams head into the final weekend of regular-season action. The Wildcats are 17-8 overall and tied with Oklahoma State in third place in the conference at 7-5, two games behind second-place Missouri.

"You never want to speculate too much," Kruger said. "But mathematically, we still have a shot at a tie for second. There's still a lot of things that can happen."

Tonight, though, the 'Cats will be most concerned with the task at hand. Missouri enters Bramlage Coliseum with a 23-6 record and are coming off an impressive win at Columbiaa against then No. 1-ranked Oklahoma, 97-84.

And it doesn't appear Missouri is playing differently than the last time K-State met the Tigers in Hearnes Center. At Columbia, Missouri used its inside game, taking advantage of the smaller Wildcats to post a 73-68 victory.

Missouri has taken on a different look since the two teams' last meeting with assistant coach Rich Daly taking over for Norm Stewart, who is still recovering from cancer surgery in a Columbia hospital.

"There's a difference, of course," Kruger said, "but they just beat the No. 1 team in the nation."

Where there won't be a difference is in Missouri's height advantage. Led by 7-foot-1 center Gary Leonard's 22 points, the Tigers' front-line players scored a combined 53 points against the Wildcats in their last meeting. But since then, the Wildcats have gotten a bit tougher underneath.

Missouri is led by Byron Irvin 19.8 points a game, while Doug Smith is averaging 13.1, Lee Coward 12.3, Anthony Peeler 10.5 and Leonard 10.4.

Against Oklahoma last week, Fred McCoy held OU all-American candidate Stacey King to just seven second-half points as K-State nearly knocked off the No. 1 Sooners. In Saturday's 69-62 victory against Oklahoma State, the K-State front-liners held the Cowboys' leading scorer Richard Dumas to just nine points and starting forward Royce Jeffries was held in check.

So tonight, Missouri will be facing a slightly improved K-State team than it encountered at Columbia, Kruger said.

"I think we've made some progress," he said. "It's three weeks later in the season and you will always have that natural progression, and we anticipate the same from (Missouri)."

Evidence of that progression is the fact that K-State has won five of its past six games and looks to be peaking at just the right time with the season heading into postseason play.

K-State is three wins shy of the 20-win mark, which apparently means an automatic berth in the NCAA tournament. Should the Wildcats reach that plateau, it would be Kruger's third in his three years at K-State.

The 'Cats end the regular season portion of the schedule Saturday at Iowa State in a regionally televised match-up beginning at 3:10 p.m. The men's Big Eight postseason tournament will be March 10-12 at Kansas City's Kemper Arena.

Town Center Ergathon raises $656 for rowers

Miller says athletic department will support crew

By Deborah Dinges
Collegian Reporter

Ginny B. is the name the K-State crew gave the revamped women's varsity shell when it was christened Saturday in the Manhattan Town Center at the end of the annual 24-hour Ergathon.

"It's an inspiration. If the boat looks good, we look good and feel better and row better," said Lisa Gregoriew, women's varsity captain and senior in physical education.

The christened shell was named after Virginia Bussy, a Manhattan resident who donated the funding for the project.

"I'm thrilled to death that I had the opportunity to contribute to something ... to a sport that's struggled so hard to keep afloat," Bussy said.

Forty-eight crew members kept a rowing machine going for 24 hours at the mall during the weekend. Crew members accepted pledges per mile to raise nearly $470, said Mike Janzen, crew treasurer and sophomore in industrial engineering.

The team rowed 358,896 meters within the 24-hour period, crew coach Don Rose said. "It's comparable to rowing 9.2 miles per hour for 24 hours."

"It was strange rowing by moonlight," said Kirstin Wood, varsity crew member and junior in modern language, who rowed at 4 a.m. Saturday.

Donations from passers-by and businesses totalled $186.

The $656 acquired throughout the day from general donations and Ergathon donations will be used for the men and women to go to collegiate national championships the first week of June. The women will compete in Madison, Wis., and the men in Syracuse, N.Y., Janzen said.

"The K-State athletic department is behind the crew and supports them," said Athletic Director Steve Miller.

If the proposed athletic fee passes, Miller said the crew will receive $7,500 from the athletic department.

"Crew (members) have shown a history of success and support for the University and have done it all by themselves," Miller said. "This is an opportunity for the athletic department to share money the crew might not usually get."

"This is the first time the athletic department has been able and willing to donate money in such amounts," Rose said.

The money gained through the proposed athletic fee will be used to pay a full-time head coach, said Eric Custer, crew president and junior in political science.

If the proposed athletic fee does not pass, Miller said the athletic department will continue to support the crew in making workout facilities and equipment storage available as well as offering general support.

"When we can't get money, it costs too much for students to go out. We lose too many good athletes," Custer said.

"It's a situation that plagues the whole sport of rowing," said Mandy Robertson, women's varsity coach. "It doesn't make money. Schools put money into sports that make money."

Using the event's publicity, the varsity men raised $360 toward the purchase of their new boat by selling 36 inches of it at $10 per inch, Janzen said.

It has taken since December to complete the repairs on the women's varsity boat, said Troy Kolb, graduate student in agricultural engineering and one of three crew members who worked on the boat.

Kurt Becker, senior in business management, and Mike Lockas, freshmen women's coach and senior in engineering technology, contributed to the repairs.

Kolb said damaged and leaking spots on the shell were repaired.

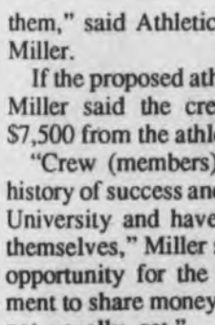
The crew members repainted the shell, installed a new coxswain box to help rowers hear the coxswain's directions, and replaced broken rivets, a bent rutter and damaged seats.

The crew hopes to start the racing season with a good showing at the Heart of Texas Regatta in Austin, Texas, March 18. About 100 novice and varsity crew members will camp out and practice on Town Lake, Texas, during spring break in preparation for the season opener, Rose said.

Custer said organizing the alumni is a priority this season. Through a newsletter and a reunion at the President's Day Regatta in Topeka April 13-14, Custer is hoping to recruit alumni support for the crew.

Bellevue visits for twinbill

From Staff and Wire Reports



The K-State baseball team will proceed with its planned doubleheader against Bellevue College scheduled to begin today at 1:30 p.m. at Frank Myers Field.

The starting time is one-half hour later than originally scheduled. The two teams are scheduled to play a pair of seven-inning contests.

K-State is 2-0 in the young season. The Wildcats used a gunnery of extra-base hits, including home runs from both Mike Rosenboom and Bill Barnard, last Friday to down St. Louis 17-1 in the season-opener.

Bramlage atmosphere needs more enthusiasm, less no-shows

Mid-Week Commentary

TOM MORRIS
Sports Columnist

Writing on such topics as fan support or school spirit is usually as lame as Festus' leg on the television western series "Gunsmoke."

Most of the time, though, the fan support in the opening season at Bramlage Coliseum has been just as lame.

There have been stellar moments when the crowd was enthusiastic. But did it take Lon Kruger's first technical as a Wildcat coach to spark a run which helped K-State to a 13-point halftime lead against the Cowboys?

The answer is most assuredly yes.

The second-half atmosphere against Oklahoma State, in which the 'Cats noticeably struggled without fan support, was a perfect indication of how it has been inside Bramlage most of this season. It's as if K-State was playing inside Lloyd Noble Arena in Norman, Okla., home of the nationally ranked Sooners. Watching a game there is similar to viewing "West Side Story" on Broadway and simply applauding at the end.

ESPN commentator Dick Vitale, who is never at a loss for words, wondered during a cablecast if the crowd watching the then top-ranked Sooners had fallen asleep. Even the Oklahoma players have noticed.

Following Saturday's 97-84 loss to Missouri in Columbia, Sooner forward Tyrone Jones said the infamous Antlers and the Hearnes Center crowd was the difference in the game.

"I wish our crowds were like that," Jones said.

Oklahoma has had just four sell-outs this season. K-State has had eight counting tonight's game against Mizzou. But two of those have averaged 1,000 less than capacity at 13,500-seat Bramlage.

It was generous enough of the KSU Athletic Department to allocate 6,000 student season tickets — the least the students could do is use them. It's especially noticable in the 740-seat non-reserved student section. Half of that section remains empty during most games. At first glance, it even looks as if that's where the band is supposed to sit. But, lo and behold, the band is stationed at the north end of the playing floor.

Let's just say we've warned you in advance. If those tickets remain unused in years to come, the athletic department will probably make them available to the general public. The public will put them to good use as was evident at the Purdue game, a sellout and probably the most enthusiastic crowd we've had this season. Guess what? That game wasn't included in the students' season ticket package.

We can't expect Bramlage to live up to the expectations of that old barn on the other edge of campus. No modern acoustical technology could hold the din the way those old bricks did at Ahearn Field House. Some say the atmosphere is just not there at Bramlage. Even Kruger has noticed a difference.

"I don't think the enthusiasm and atmosphere ... have been as good as they were in Ahearn," Kruger said during Monday's Big Eight Conference coaches' teleconference. "We've got a good crowd, but I think we could improve on it."

He's right. It's people who create the atmosphere. Coaches in Ahearn used to yell during timeouts to relay plays to their players to be heard above the noise. This season, Kruger has to sometimes wonder if the opposing team can hear his instructions.

Bramlage is just as much the fans' responsibility as it is the team's, the band's or the cheerleaders'.

Disease affects personalities, memories

By Linda Kleiner
Collegian Reporter

Visitors are met with the bright eyes and wrinkled smiling faces of 17 special care residents. Some residents look away, while others wonder who the visitors are and why they're in the Meadowlark Hills Skilled Health Center.

The residents are victims of Alzheimer's disease.

"Imagine, not knowing where you are ... or what you're doing at any time," said Pam Oehme, special care coordinator of Meadowlark Hills.

Alzheimer's disease is a progressive brain disease whose symptoms begins with confusion, Oehme said.

"The personality changes and (the individual) eventually becomes immobile and bedridden," she said.

"Alzheimer's disease can only be diagnosed during an autopsy," said Martha Kellstrom, assistant instructor in physical education and leisure studies, who described Alzheimer's disease as a form of dementia.

Dementia is a general designation for mental deterioration.

Tissues in the brain with certain "placques and tangles" will show definite deterioration in Alzheimer's patients, she said. By testing the patient for over-medication, depression, malnutrition, brain tumors or the effects of a stroke, these diseases can be ruled out as a possible diagnoses.

"Fifty percent of chronically confused victims have Alzheimer's disease, while 20 to 25 percent have dementia caused by stroke," Oehme said.

The other 20 to 25 percent of the patients suffer from a combination of Alzheimer's disease and stroke. Five to 10 percent have other types of dementia, she said.

"It is not known if Alzheimer's disease is hereditary," Oehme said.

Kellstrom said 25 percent of people at least 80 years old, which includes 3 million people, have Alzheimer's disease.

Alzheimer's patients need a modified, stimulated environment that is small, calm, quiet and dependable to "avoid sensory overload," she said.

Meadowlark Hills has incorporated a special unit, providing the recommended environment for Alzheimer's victims who can walk, use a wheelchair or a walker, said Linda McAnarney, director of health services at Meadowlark Hills.

Prior to the addition of the special care unit, the Alzheimer's and dementia victims lived with the other residents, McAnarney said.

Nancy Havenstein, daughter of an Alzheimer's victim, said her mother is more relaxed since being admitted to the special care unit.

Havenstein said her mother is happier at Meadowlark Hills than at home because of the regular schedule and the slower pace.

"The lack of facilities at home and lack of knowledge about Alzheimer's disease was very frustrating to me," she said. "My time with her has more quality now.

"The family has made the comment more than once — they did the right thing (by putting their mother in a health care center)."

Oehme said some Alzheimer's patients "may not know where they are, who someone is, what day it is, where to sit in the dining room or know what clothes to put on."

Kris Porter, a certified nursing assistant, said the special care patients are "different in a special way."

"One patient tells me every day that his name is in The Wall Street Journal," said Porter, senior in family life and human development.

The communication with residents varies because they have their own symptoms, she said.

"The facial expressions and eye contact used by the individual speaking seem important," Oehme said.

"Mother communicates by holding hands, eye contact and opening her arms for a hug," Havenstein said.

College Hill Skilled Nursing Center in Manhattan has an integrated system, said Doug Frihart, administrator of College Hill.

The building design does not allow for a special care unit for Alzheimer's victims; however, the personnel is investigating the feasibility of a specific area for Alzheimer's victims.

Separate care units are the best for all residents concerned, Frihart said.

Wharton Manor Inc. in Manhattan has an integrated system, said Nor-

Miss USA crowned; Texan wins again

By The Associated Press

MOBILE, Ala. — Gretchen Polhemus of Fort Worth, Texas, was crowned Miss USA on Tuesday night, making it the fifth year in a row a Texan has won the beauty pageant.

First runner-up was Miss Oklahoma Jill Scheffert of Oklahoma City.

The other finalists, in order, were Miss New Jersey Deborah Lee Husti of Rockaway, N.J.; Miss Louisiana Elizabeth Primm of Houma, La.; and Miss Georgia Michele Nemeth of Lilburn, Ga.

Fifty-one women from every state and the District of Columbia competed in categories of swimsuit and evening gown, where the focus was partly on physique.

However, celebrity judges said that the contestants' personal interviews were where they revealed the best of their personalities.

"You want beauty, but there's a lot more to it — like strength and stamina," author Jude Deveraux said, prior to the judging.

"Personality, intellect, charisma, and endurance are important," added judge Bonnie Kay, president of Select Model Management of New York. "Outer beauty counts 50 percent."

The judges were responding to criticism of the event from the National Organization for Women, which denounced the two-hour pageant as a "Barbie doll contest."

"We call for programs that encourage the development of the whole woman. We call on society to value women for their intellectual, charitable, athletic and artistic achievements," said Betty Gartman, president of the local NOW chapter.

Polhemus inherited the crown from Miss USA Courtney Gibbs, 22. She will receive $200,000 in cash and prizes.

Committee recommends consent bill

From Staff and Wire Reports

TOPEKA — The Senate Federal and State Affairs Committee Tuesday recommended for passage a bill that would require any girl under 18 to obtain permission from one of her parents before undergoing an abortion.

The committee endorsed the bill after approving a series of amendments that strengthened the "judicial bypass" that give girls an avenue for obtaining an abortion if they believe they cannot tell their parents they want an abortion.

However, committee members resisted attempts to weaken the bill by lowering the age to 16, and expanding the definition of parents to mean "responsible party," which could include aunts, uncles or siblings who are 21 or older.

Under the bill, teen-agers would be able to obtain permission from the court if they do not want to go to their parents.

The amendments, proposed by Sen. Doug Walker, D-Osawatomie, would require a school counselor or nurse to provide a pregnant teen-ager with information about her alternatives. They also would refer the girl to a social worker from the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services, who would assist the minor in seeking a court order for an abortion if she did not want to tell her parents.

"This is an attempt to make the judicial bypass work," Walker said, adding that he also wanted to make sure a minor who receives an abortion through court permission receives counseling.

Sen. Eric Yost, R-Wichita, who supports the bill, said case law requires that any parental consent statute have a judicial bypass provision, allowing girls to go through the courts for permission rather than through their parents.

"I don't think supporters of the bill have any choice," Yost said.

Walker said in some cases it is not in the best interest of a minor to seek parents' permission for an abortion, but teen-age girls need assistance in dealing with the court system.

Some members of the committee were not happy with the amendments.

"We're dragging an individual through the courts for something that's their parents' responsibility," said Sen. John Strick, D-Kansas City.

If a girl files a petition in court rather than seek her parents' permission, the petition is anonymous under terms of the bill.

Walker also offered amendments to ensure the anonymity of the teenager, requiring her not to appear personally in court.

The committee rejected an attempt to eliminate the word "parent" from the bill and substitute "responsible party," which was defined as another family member liable to maintain or care for the girl.

Lawmakers also refused to lower the age to 16 at which a girl must obtain the consent of their parents or a court order to get an abortion.

Yost said most of the abortions covered by the bill are performed on girls 16 and 17 years old.

Sen. Bill Morris, R-Wichita, suggested the committee refer the bill to an interim study.

"This is a very complicated thing," Morris said. "We're not going to please anyone."

Bond said lawmakers have not explored all the alternatives.

"We've got the pro-abortion people, we've got the anti-abortion people," he told the committee. "The question on this table is parental rights."

Bond said some states have adopted laws requiring that parents be notified about an abortion, but consent is not required.

"I favor parental involvement," he said. "I'm not trying to be an obstructionist."

"I don't know if any amount of studying will change anyone's minds," Yost responded.

Sen. Janice McClure, D-Sublette, said the bill does not address sex education for teen-agers or male accountability in pregnancy.

McClure called the bill a legislative bandage for a gaping wound, which is the break-down of the family.

"I don't believe we can legislate communication (in families)," she said.

Jews, Swomley said. The U.S. government contributes large amounts of money to Israel.

"Americans contribute $1,000 for every Israeli citizen," he said. "And (Israelis) are not required to buy U.S. products. Israeli products are let into the U.S. without a duty charge."

The IRD, led by the Rev. Sun Myung Moon, was created in 1981 and is supported by several Protestant sects. One way the IRD is "building ideological opposition in Protestant organizations to organize anti-liberation movements" is by holding back contributions to South American liberation-theology groups, Swomley said.

"Campus Crusade for Christ is expressly antagonistic to liberation theologists in South America," he said.

Terry McKinney, campus director of CCC, said he couldn't make a comment on Swomley's statement because "We are not a political organization.

"We are committed to following Christ," McKinney said. "We are definitely not behind closed doors ... but everyone is entitled to their opinion."

Swomley said Rev. Moon's organization was the "most influential right-wing movement in the United States and perhaps the world ... They learned from the communists about organizing front groups to use different names to deceive the public."

entertainment by pianist Kerry Tarrant, a junior in radio and television and Miss Manhattan K-State 1988, as part of the "Breakfast before Business" being hosted by the Town Center.

Randol said before the live interview, they had contacted the CBS New York studio to get an opinion on an initial trial taping.

Randol reported to the "Business before Breakfast" crowd after the live interview that Smith and the program directors said, "'Gosh, what a beautiful mall. What's it doing in Manhattan, Kansas? Why don't you bring it to Manhattan, New York?'"

During the interview, Randol explained that "the design of the mall is not by accident." The design of a shopping mall and particular elements within it are to keep the customer there longer through comfort and convenience.

Chris Heavey, manager of Manhattan Town Center, said he was pleased with how the mall was presented as an example of shopping malls across the country.

"The telecast came off without a hitch," Heavey said. "The cooperation of the mall merchants in coming in early to set-up and open their stores shows how supportive they are of the Town Center."

Despite all this, the University is implementing steps, he said.

"We have just finalized a detailed and very formative drug testing and education procedure for student athletes," Miller said.

In addition, a summer program will be instituted on educating and testing coaches and administrators on NCAA laws and regulations.

"If a coach does not pass the test," Miller said, "their contract will not be renewed, nor will they be allowed to coach on the playing field.

"Also, every (K-State) contract signed by a coach and administrator has a clause in it which says if they are caught cheating on the NCAA rules and regulations, they are immediately fired and pay suspended."

man Wallace, director of Wharton Manor.

However, when the construction of an addition on the west side of Wharton Manor is finished, the existing recreation room will be the Alzheimer's recreation room, Wallace said.

An integrated system is economically and morally better for the staff, he said. The staff can only work so long with Alzheimer's victims before they need a change from the constant care.

Admissions

three admission standards: have a C average on a 15-unit college preparatory curriculum; rank in the upper one-third of their graduating class or have a score of 23 on the American College Testing Assessment, or ACT.

Students transferring from a community or independent college would need to earn a C average in 24 hours of course work. Applicants at least 21 years old would need a high school diploma or General Education Diploma. Some exceptions would apply to those with special academic talents.

Under the open admissions law, any Kansas student with a high school diploma is eligible for admission to the state institutions. No other state has such a policy.

Under the proposed bill, the regents' criteria would be subject to legislative veto. The criteria would take effect in the fall of 1992.

"Our present system of open admissions is flawed and requires some immediate attention," said Stanley Koplik, regents executive director. "Although noble in its objective of providing unrestricted access to the regents universities to any Kansan with a high school diploma, this broad embrace invites far too many unprepared and unmotivated students to experience failure at our state universities."

The qualified admissions policy would reduce the university dropout rate, Koplik said.

The courses most frequently missing on new students' transcripts at the University of Kansas include foreign language, science and mathematics, said Judith Ramaley, KU executive vice chancellor.

"A quick glance at any newspaper should show you why we need these courses and the attitudes, skills and knowledge that they instill," Ramaley said.

Survey indicates students support fee

By Kendra Gensemer
Government Editor

If K-State students were to vote on the proposed athletic fee, it would pass by a simple majority, according to a telephone survey conducted last week by the Collegian.

Student Senate will vote Thursday on proposed athletic fee legislation.

The survey was conducted to determine the level of awareness on the issue, student voting trends and voting probability, and the level of student support for the proposed fee.

If approved, the proposal would impose a $15 fee on full-time students and a $7.50 fee on part-time students. The legislation calls for a separate vote on the bill by undergraduate and graduate students.

The KSU Athletic Department estimates about $420,000 would be generated if the fee is approved. About $160,000 of this money would fund K-State's non-revenue sports to the maximum level set by the National Collegiate Athletic Association. The remainder of the money would be used for the football and men's basketball programs.

Of those surveyed, 90 percent were undergraduate students and 10 percent were graduate students. K-State's population consists of 82 percent undergraduates and 18 percent graduate students. A total of 591 students were surveyed.

Of 526 students surveyed who were decided on their vote, 54.8 percent said they would support the athletic fee.

Fifty-seven percent of the undergraduates surveyed said they would support the fee. Of graduate students surveyed, 28 percent said they would support the fee.

If sent to referendum, the bill would require only a simple majority to pass if one-third or more of the student body voted.

Eighty-six percent of the undergraduate students and 67 percent of the graduate students said they would vote if the athletic fee issue goes to referendum.

Responses to a question about voting tendencies in Student Governing Association elections and referendums indicate graduate students do not vote in SGA elections with the same frequency of undergraduate students. Fifty percent of the undergraduate students surveyed said they have voted in a previous election or referendum while 36 percent of the graduate students responded likewise.

In spring 1987, a bill to fund non-revenue sports went to referendum. Only about 3,900 students out of a student body population of 16,901 voted. The University Registrar's office lists undergraduate student enrollment for this semester at 14,326 and graduate student enrollment at 3,145.

The survey indicates graduate and undergraduate students are equally aware of the legislation. Eighty-two percent of those surveyed said they were aware of the athletic fee legislation.

Jeff Crabb, graduate student in statistics, created a computer program to randomly select the samples from the Campus Directory. Crabb also assisted in analysis of the results.

Infidelity confessed by Tower

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — John Tower, his nomination as defense secretary in grave trouble, made an extraordinary public admission of marital infidelity Wednesday but vowed to keep fighting for Senate confirmation. His prospects were dimmed further, however, by the Senate majority leader's opposition.

President Bush continued to court Democrats in a last-ditch effort to save the appointment, and spokesman Marlin Fitzwater asserted, "We'll just keep up the good fight."

But Senate Majority Leader George Mitchell further dampened Tower's chances by declaring his opposition, even as Vice President Dan Quayle conceded the administration still lacks the votes needed for Senate approval.

The president said his appeal to senators has been, "Look, do what you've got to do, but remember fair play, remember decency and honor and then remember also historically the concept of advise and consent where reasonable doubt is given historically to the president of the United States who after all is responsible for the executive branch of this government."

"We hope the prospects improve. We don't have 50 votes yet. But we're moving in that direction," Quayle said at a White House photo session.

Tower showed flashes of grit and humor as he fielded questions at the National Press Club about allegations concerning excessive drinking, womanizing and lucrative consulting fees he received from defense contractors.

Asked whether he would ask that his name be withdrawn, he replied by quoting from the last letter written by Col. William Barrett Travis, the leader of the Texans who fought and died at the Alamo: "I shall never surrender or retreat."

The former Texas senator paused briefly

Accident involves 2 cars, injures 2 college students

Manhattan Christian College students Diane Cochrane and Melanie Estes were transported to The Saint Mary Hospital Wednesday after a two-car accident about noon.

Estes was a passenger in Cochrane's 1980 Dodge Colt when it collided with a 1973 Chevrolet Nova driven by Manhattan High School student Mark Herbick at Laramie and 16th streets.

"Cochrane was treated and released, and Estes is in satisfactory condition," said Norma Butler, house supervisor at Saint Mary's.

"I'm OK," Cochrane later said. "I hit my head and was knocked out for a while. I'm sore and stiff, and my head is throbbing."

Cochrane's vehicle was heading west on Laramie and Herbick's vehicle was heading north on 16th, said Sgt. Herb Crosby of the Riley County Police. Cochrane's vehicle rolled through the stop sign and was knocked onto the northwest corner of the intersection.

Jack Roets, battalion chief of the Manhattan Fire Dept., said his squad responded to a 911 call.

"(Estes) was lying on the ground, and we had to pull the steering column to give the driver room to breathe. (Cochrane) was trapped between the seat and the steering wheel and the door."

Firefighters had to cut through the driver's side of Cochrane's car with a chainsaw to get her out. About 12:25 p.m. Cochrane, who was breathing through an oxygen mask, was released from the car and taken to Saint Mary's.

"One second I was looking over there and the next ... it was so quick," Herbick said. "Everybody was yelling."

"It looked like she must have rolled through the stop sign going north," said Derrick Sims, high school student and passenger in Hebrick's Nova. "I don't know how she couldn't have seen us ... we were on the (north) side of the street."

No damage estimate was available, but Cochrane's car appeared to be totalled, Crosby said.

Opposition to selective admissions heard

Senate committee considers bill

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Opponents of selective admissions hotly disputed assertions Wednesday that Kansas high school students fall below national standards.

They gave senators a variety of reasons why they disagree with a plan to require Kansas high school graduates to complete certain courses and meet certain criteria before they would be admitted to state universities.

"In the discussion (Tuesday), we heard that Kansas is behind the rest of the national in education," said John Koepke, executive director of the Kansas Association of School Boards. "I don't believe that is true."

Koepke was referring to testimony before the Senate Education Committee by those who support the state Board of Regents' proposed selective admissions policy. That policy would require Kansas college-bound high school students who want automatic admission to a regents' institution to do one of the following:

- Follow a recommended curriculum.
- Score at least 23 on the American College Testing Assessment test.
- Rank in the upper one-third of their class.

Automatic admission also would be granted to those 21 years or older and to those who receive a General Education Diploma with a score of at least 54 on the GED test.

Exempted from those requirements would be 15 percent, or about 3,000, of the approximately 20,000 freshmen per year who enter regents' institutions, said Stanley Koplik, regents executive director. Those exempted would have to demonstrate special academic talents.

The policy would start in the fall of 1992 if the Legislature approves it.

Opposition to the proposed bill that would allow the regents to establish selective admissions focused on how the proposed policy would hurt students, even if they dropped out of college.

"The regents are suggesting that we save students from themselves and keep them from trying, even if they fail," Koepke said. "They're saying we ought to determine who gets into college by percentages. But we ought to deal with students as individuals."

Some also said the policy would prevent late-bloomers from realizing their potential or would limit their choices.

"Many students wait until late in their education to decide on a vocation or profession to pursue," said Craig Grant, director of political action for the Kansas-National Education Association. "Many also change directions and attitudes about the importance of college sometime along the way."

Others said the policy would not address the dropout rate.

"The reasons for dropping out are usually social, personal or financial," said David DePue, executive director of the Kansas Council of Vocational Education. "Selective admissions won't help that."

Onan Burnett, director of government affairs for the Topeka public school district, called the policy "de facto segregation, based on economics."

"It's unfair to make everyone meet the same requirements because they don't have the same role models, especially in drug-infested or poverty-stricken homes," Burnett said.

Koplik told the committee that selective admissions would help all state schools "get more bang for the buck." He said regents schools pay $700,000 annually in remedial instruction to compensate for inadequate high school training. The recommended curriculum would include units in English, mathematics, social and natural sciences and foreign languages.

The bill merely gives the regents freedom to put in force their recommendations. Sen. Don Montgomery, R-Sabetha, questioned why those recommendations were not put in the bill.

"We prefer you trust us with the responsibility," Koplik said. "We would report annually to a variety of committees." That response was met with laughter throughout the room.

Cuffy casts vote for selective admissions

By Kendra Gensemer
Government Editor

Student Body President Laurian Cuffy voted in support of selective admissions at a Student Advisory Council meeting, despite recommendations by various student government leaders opposed to the issue.

"I was concerned with the quality of education at our institution," Cuffy said.

Kansas is the only state with an open admissions policy, and debate is raging about a proposal to change to selective admissions. The proposal would repeal statutes setting the policies of the Kansas Board of Regents.

The statutes giving regents the power to establish admission criteria require that any Kansas high school graduate be allowed access to a regents school.

SAC recommended and gave its approval to the Board of Regents on Friday for the change to selective admissions. SAC is composed of student body presidents from the regents universities and recommends policy to the regents.

Cuffy said he did not speak to any campus organizations to determine students' views before going to the SAC meeting, but he did mention the issue to his cabinet, the Student Senate chairman and some minority students "in conversation."

Although most students he spoke with were against open admissions, Cuffy said he represented K-State students' views because he was aware of the reasons behind the opposing views.

"I have listened to arguments for and against," Cuffy said. "I still think because of this clause (in the admissions legislation) those arguments are being addressed."

Cuffy said he was originally opposed to the selective admissions proposal until a clause was added that would "allow students to prove they could survive in a university setting."

Student Senate Chairman Todd Johnson said he does not support the proposal, even with the clause.

"I don't feel the compromises that were made (in SAC) will address all the concerns," he said.

The cost to the University for screening applicants would be at least $200,000 — money Johnson said could be better spent on academic programs. He also said the proposal is a "back doorway" to get high schools to increase their standards for graduation.

"My basic philosophy is that if a student graduates from high school, that diploma ought to mean something."
—Todd Johnson
Student Senate chairman

"My basic philosophy is that if a student graduates from high school, that diploma ought to mean something. It ought to at least mean they would be offered admission to a state college," he said.

John McIntyre, campus director for Associated Students of Kansas, said ASK has not reached a consensus on selective admissions. However, as a K-Stater, he said he is "strongly against selective admissions."

"The main argument for selective admissions is that students aren't prepared well enough for college, thus there is lower retention. It's an argument to increase the reponsibility in high schools to better educate students," McIntyre said. "But that is trying to solve the problem from the wrong end of the spectrum."

He said lobbying efforts should work on changes within the Kansas Board of Education.

"Not only is K-State a land-grant institution built for people, but it is also a public school supported by taxpayers," McIntyre said.

Sears reopens after facelift

Sears' 824 stores across the nation began reopening Wednesday after a 42-hour facelift to complete price reductions on 1.5 billion pieces of merchandise.

"People are backed up as far as we can see. It's wall-to-wall people," said Bob Dumas, manager of the Sears, Roebuck and Co. store at the Northland Mall in Columbus, Ohio.

"We have Christmas-quantity people, and we have better than Christmas traffic," said Dumas, who estimated more than 1,000 people waited outside for the doors to open.

Workers changed prices Tuesday on everything — including light bulbs, toasters and polished door knobs — as Sears prepared for a new retailing strategy it hopes will win customers.

Employees also had to change signs and displays, take inventory and clean up before the openings, which occurred at noon local time.

Sears intends to keep its prices low year-round, instead of marking them up and down periodically for sales. This marks a major change for the retailer, which helped to pioneer the concept of the sale.

Rap musician pleads guilty

WESTPORT, N.Y. — Rap musician Antonio M. Hardy, better known as "Big Daddy Kane," was arrested after he shot a man in the arm while traveling aboard a chartered bus, police said Wednesday.

Hardy, 20, of the borough of Brooklyn, was on his way from New York City to an amusement park in North Hudson on Tuesday, where he planned to make a music video. Sometime during the trip, he fired a gun, state police said. The bullet ricocheted off a bus window and struck 21-year-old Adrian M. White, said Sgt. Mike Downs.

White, of Freeport, was treated at a hospital and released.

Hardy pleaded guilty Tuesday afternoon in Schroon Lake Town Court to third-degree assault and fourth-degree criminal possession of a weapon.

Drugs improperly prescribed

LOS ANGELES — Allegations that at least two doctors during the past year improperly prescribed drugs for Elizabeth Taylor have prompted an investigation, but the actress is not a target, the prosecutor's office said.

The doctors could face criminal charges if proof is found for the allegations that excessive amounts of various opiates, barbiturates and stimulants were prescribed "without medical justification," district attorney's office spokesman Al Albergate said Tuesday.

He did not identify the drugs or the doctors, nor did he say what prompted the investigation. Taylor has not met with authorities, he said.

The actress, who turned 57 Monday, appeared at a ceremony last week after a month-long seclusion and addressed rumors about her health, saying she hurt her back in a fall on a movie set last summer and it took a long time to heal.

"But I'm fine now," she said.

The two-time Oscar winner did not issue any response to the report of the investigation.

Wolf Creek to pay NRC fine

BURLINGTON — Operators of the Wolf Creek nuclear power plant near Burlington have decided to pay a $50,000 fine proposed by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, spokesman Ronn Smith said Wednesday.

The NRC accused the plant of violating cooling system regulations in 1987. The Wolf Creek Nuclear Operation Corp. was given 30 days to pay the fine or appeal it, and Smith said there would be no appeal.

The regulatory agency said that from Feb. 13 to July 1, 1987, the plant operated with a water cooling system that did not meet NRC standards. Joe Gilliland, spokesman in the NRC regional office in Arlington, Texas, said two identical pipelines are required to cool components such as pumps in the event the plant must be shut down.

Attorney General files suit

TOPEKA — Attorney General Robert T. Stephan filed suit Wednesday against two professional fundraisers from the Washington, D.C., area and five charities alleging deceptive and misleading solicitations that violate state law.

The fundraisers named as defendants are Watson and Hughey Co. of Alexandria, Va., and Robert R. Stone of Washington. The attorney general's petition identified the principals in Watson and Hughey as Jerry C. Watson and Byron Chatworth Hughey.

Named defendant charities are the Cancer Fund of America Inc., Knoxville, Tenn.; Pacific West Cancer Fund Inc., Seattle, Wash.; Walker Cancer Research Institute Inc., Edgewood, Md.; Center for Alternative Cancer Research, Dothan, Ala., and the American Heart Disease Prevention Foundation Inc., Montclair, N.J.

Man in closet shot, killed

SPRINGFIELD, Mo. — A man who leaped from a closet in a television anchorwoman's apartment early Wednesday and began assaulting her was shot and killed by a friend of the woman, police said.

Gregory A. Rader, 30, of Springfield was shot three times with a .38-caliber pistol and died at the scene, police Lt. Darrell Crick said.

Rader apparently was hiding in Leanne Gregg's bedroom closet when she came home about 1 a.m. Wednesday, Crick said.

Gregg, 32, a co-anchor at KYTV, had asked a male friend to accompany her home because she was nervous about a break-in at her apartment the previous day, Crick said.

"The door opened somewhat easier than normal, as if unlocked," Crick said. "They entered and turned the lights on and the woman felt more comfortable after checking the living room and kitchen. She went into the dark bedroom and was attacked."

When Gregg screamed, her friend, whom police would not identify, ran into the room and began scuffling with the intruder, Crick said.

The woman broke free as the fight spilled into the dining room, he said. Gregg's friend, who was carrying a pistol registered to him, shot Rader in the chest, back and head, Crick said. Rader was not armed.

President of local NEA chapter requests lobbying for funds

By Chris Koger
Staff Writer

The local chapter president of the National Education Association urged Manhattan public school educators at the Manhattan USD #383 School Board meeting Wednesday to lobby the state for larger public education budgets.

Dean Stramel said state budget surpluses are being considered for new prisons, highways and lower taxes, but "not many people are pushing for public education."

Stramel said Gov. Mike Hayden has budgeted $45 million for public education in fiscal year 1990, but the Kansas NEA has estimated $125 million is needed for "adequate public education programs."

The Kansas Association of School Boards is sponsoring a political rally March 20 at the State Capitol, he said.

"I'm asking for a delegation from Manhattan to go there, and the more widespread base of support we have, the better our chances are at receiving more funding," Stramel said.

The board also approved the Manhattan Middle School and Marlatt School at-risk program budgets, making them the last of the 11 district schools to receive at-risk funding.

The middle school has $20,000 budgeted for at-risk students. A full-time social worker and after-school tutors will be hired to work with students individually.

Marlatt School's approved $10,500 at-risk budget will allow faculty to use in-service activities to learn how to teach students with learning or peer problems, said Ray Woods, Marlatt principal.

"Our plan focuses on in-service activities, which is where we can begin to educate our teachers on how to deal with this problem," he said.

A total of $155,000, 1 percent of the total district budget, has been distributed to the schools. The distribution of funds is based on the number of students at each school who qualify for the free or partially paid lunch programs, said Barbara Withee, school board president.

The board heard comments from a group in favor of resurfacing the Manhattan High School tennis courts. Jonathan Holden, K-State English professor and parent of a high school student, said the courts are "like the surface of a highway instead of tennis courts," and it would be similar to "playing on Poyntz Avenue.

"The overhead cost of the tennis program is small compared to other sports, and our boys' and girls' tennis teams have state championship potential," he said.

"I agree that the courts have deteriorated enough that this should be a priority for the school board," said Jim Lindquist, board member.

Student Senators to vote on proposed athletic fee, discuss allocation of funds

By Darren Keller
Collegian Reporter

Student Senate will vote tonight on the proposed athletic fee.

"I think there will be much debate over the athletic fee," said Todd Johnson, Student Senate chairman.

An affirmative two-thirds vote by Senate would implement the fee, pending a simple majority vote by the student body. The student referendum would be on March 27 and 28 at polls located in the Union, Derby Food Center and the Veterinary Medicine Complex.

If approved, the legislation would require full-time students to pay a $15 fee per semester beginning fall 1989. Part-time students would pay $7.50 per semester.

Under the bill, students are guaranteed free admission to all NCAA non-revenue sport home events, a price cap on basketball and football tickets for a three-year period, separate football and basketball ticket packages and a minimum of 6,000 seats in Bramlage Coliseum.

Money collected from the fee would go directly to the KSU Athletic Department. Crew, men's soccer and gymnastics would receive potential funding not to exceed $10,000 per year. Rodeo would not receive funding because it is not an NCAA sport.

The fee would be reviewed every three years with the first review starting prior to the 1992-93 academic year. If Senate voted to discontinue the fee, a one-year grace period would be allowed.

Senate will also vote on a bill proposing a $640 allocation to alleviate the Kansas State Engineer magazine's projected deficit.

An allocation of about $1,400 to the K-State Men's Glee Club from the Reserves for Contingencies account will also be discussed. The money would go to partially cover the cost of food and lodging for the club to participate in the Intercollegiate Male Chorus Convention in April at Loyola-Marymount College.

Senate will discuss the approval of seven students appointed to the Parking Citation Appeals Board. The students were interviewed and selected by the Student Governing Association Attorney General and Chief of Staff for the student body president.

A bill requesting an allocation from the student activity fee for Associated Students of Kansas to help cover a budget deficit will also be discussed.

Seven campus organizations will give allocations presentations: Women's Resource Center, Older Wiser Learning Students, K-State's ASK chapter, Black Student Union, Amnesty International, Consumer Relations Board and Men Against Rape.

ICC dispute consequence of 'lack of communication'

By Erwin Seba
News Editor

Members of the International Coordinating Council describe the dispute between the supporters of the organization's vice president and the supporters of the ICC president and adviser as a communications breakdown within ICC.

"(The dispute) is more of a misunderstanding and a lack of communication," said Haseeb Siddiqui, ICC secretary and senior in marketing.

Anwar Dabbas, ICC president and graduate student in political science, said despite attempts to end the dispute with ICC Vice President Sheikh Siddiqui (who is not related to Haseeb), it resurfaced during the organization's Feb. 6 meeting and was publicized in guest columns in the Collegian.

Dabbas said he and ICC adviser Donna Davis met with Sheikh, who is a senior in accounting and finance, in an attempt to answer Sheikh's complaints.

Those complaints center on the constitutionality of last fall's election of Dabbas as president of ICC and on Davis's role as adviser.

Sheikh charges that Dabbas was not a member of ICC when elected, which he said is a violation of the group's constitution.

"(At the end of that meeting) he said that he understood and that he was sorry he brought (the complaints) up," Dabbas said.

But, Dabbas said, Sheikh voiced the same complaints again during the Feb. 6 meeting.

The ICC constitution states "the regular and associate members of ICC shall elect from among themselves a president."

The constitution further states that the presidents or their appointed representatives of all national and international organizations are eligible for regular membership.

Under the constitution the president of the World Friendship organization and the SGA director of international affairs are associate members.

"Basically, what I interpret that (section) to mean is that anyone who is there in a capacity to represent an organization is eligible to be elected."
—Scott Quaintance President of the International Club

Sheikh said Dabbas, who was the ICC representative of the Arab Student Association when he was elected ICC president, was not a regular or associate member of ICC.

Davis declined to comment on the matter, except to say that since questions of Dabbas' election were aired during the Feb. 6 meeting, they should be considered settled.

Scott Quaintance, president of the International Club and junior in biochemistry, said the dispute over Dabbas' election stems from "a difference of interpretation" of the constitution.

"Basically, what I interpret that (section) to mean is that anyone who is there in a capacity to represent an organization is eligible to be elected," Quaintance said.

Only the presidents of member organizations, or in their absence, the organizations' ICC representatives, are allowed to vote, he said.

Dabbas said during an executive meeting prior to the regular ICC meeting Feb. 6, Davis and Dabbas asked Sheikh to resign.

He said the request was made because of telephone complaints stating that Sheikh was claiming to be the authoritative representative of ICC in letters written to embassies.

In addition, Dabbas said the request was made because Sheikh continued to challenge Dabbas' position as president.

Sheikh denied writing letters to embassies claiming to be a representative of ICC.

He also said he had not challenged Dabbas' position as president, but only questioned the constitutionality of Dabbas' election.

Sheikh opposed Dabbas for the ICC presidency.

Dabbas said that during the executive meeting, Sheikh agreed to resign from the vice presidency, but later changed his mind after talking with ICC Student Senate liaison Rattan Nath, graduate student in physics.

Nath said he told Sheikh that resigning "would mean that you feel guilty of something."

Sheikh then decided to withdraw his resignation and announced his decision at the regular meeting, Nath said.

Dabbas said that at his request, Davis made a motion during the Feb. 6 meeting to impeach Sheikh.

Because of the confusion resulting from debate about Sheikh's impeachment, Davis asked Dabbas to table the impeachment motion and a constitutional amendment on eligibility requirements for the presidency, Dabbas said.

None of the groups' officers indicated that a motion for Sheikh's impeachment would be considered again.

Admissions policy should not change

Once again, the Kansas Board of Regents is attempting to get legislation approved by the Legislature that will affect the future of every college-bound student. And if the legislation is approved, some of those students may never see their college expectations realized.

Their thanks in part will have to go Student Body President Laurian Cuffy, who voted in support of the regents' attempt to establish selective admissions at the state universities.

Cuffy cast an affirmative vote for selective admissions at a meeting of the Student Advisory Council, which recommends policy to the Board of Regents.

Cuffy said he voted for selective admissions proposal because a clause was added allowing students to "prove they could survive in a university setting."

The bill the Senate Education Committee is hearing would require Kansas high school students to either complete a recommended curriculum, score a composite score of at least 23 on ACT assessment tests or graduate in the upper one-third of their class if they want automatic admission a university.

About 15 percent, or nearly 3,000, of the 20,000 freshmen who enter regents institutions each year, would be exempted, but would have to demonstrate "special academic talents."

This exemption is the only thing that even remotely resembles the clause to which Cuffy was referring, but it sounds more like a way to allow admittance of the academically deficient offspring of generous alumni and image-building athletes.

It is also an example of bald hypocrisy, revealing more about elitist attitudes than about concerns for the quality of education. Once these people are admitted to the regents' institutions, not much will be left for the truly interested students.

Kansas is the only state with an open admissions policy. That distinction alone is reason enough to keep open admissions, because open admissions is a type of true democracy in that it allows access to an education to all who desire it and are willing to work for it (and who have the money).

K-State, ironically, is caught between selective admissions and the desire to increase enrollment and all the problems and benefits that are entailed in both.

The College of Architecture and Design is already feeling the brunt of that dilemma, but unfortunately for the students who are being rejected, it chose the route of selective admissions.

The state needs to look honestly at the values and problems regarding education, not sneak around them. It created institutions for education; it should support them.

Grad students need advocates

Commentary

Barbara Baker
Collegian Columnist

Almost everyone has heard the phrase, "You need a college education in order to make it in the world." It is also safe to say that with higher employment standards, a person almost needs a master's degree or doctorate to qualify for salary advancements and promotions.

Because higher education is becoming more valuable, college campuses are seeing the return of a new kind of student — the non-traditional student.

Non-traditional students are past the age of 22. They are usually either working full time, part time or are seeking employment. They may have family and financial responsibilities, and they do not depend upon parents or regular undergraduate financial assistance programs to support their education.

Universities are claiming to have a concern for and a commitment to non-traditional students, yet there is hypocrisy in this philosophy.

For example, look at University support groups and programs. It is easy to create support groups for single parents, single women parents or non-traditional women students, while not looking at the problem of accessibility.

If students have children and can't afford a babysitter, then how are they to actively participate in a support group which is supposedly created with their needs in mind?

Task forces have been created to evaluate and make recommendations on the status of minorities and women's undergraduate recruitment and retention on college campuses.

But it is a farce to have task forces that don't consider important segments of the student body. Minority graduate students, who are usually non-traditional, and other non-traditional students are generally left out.

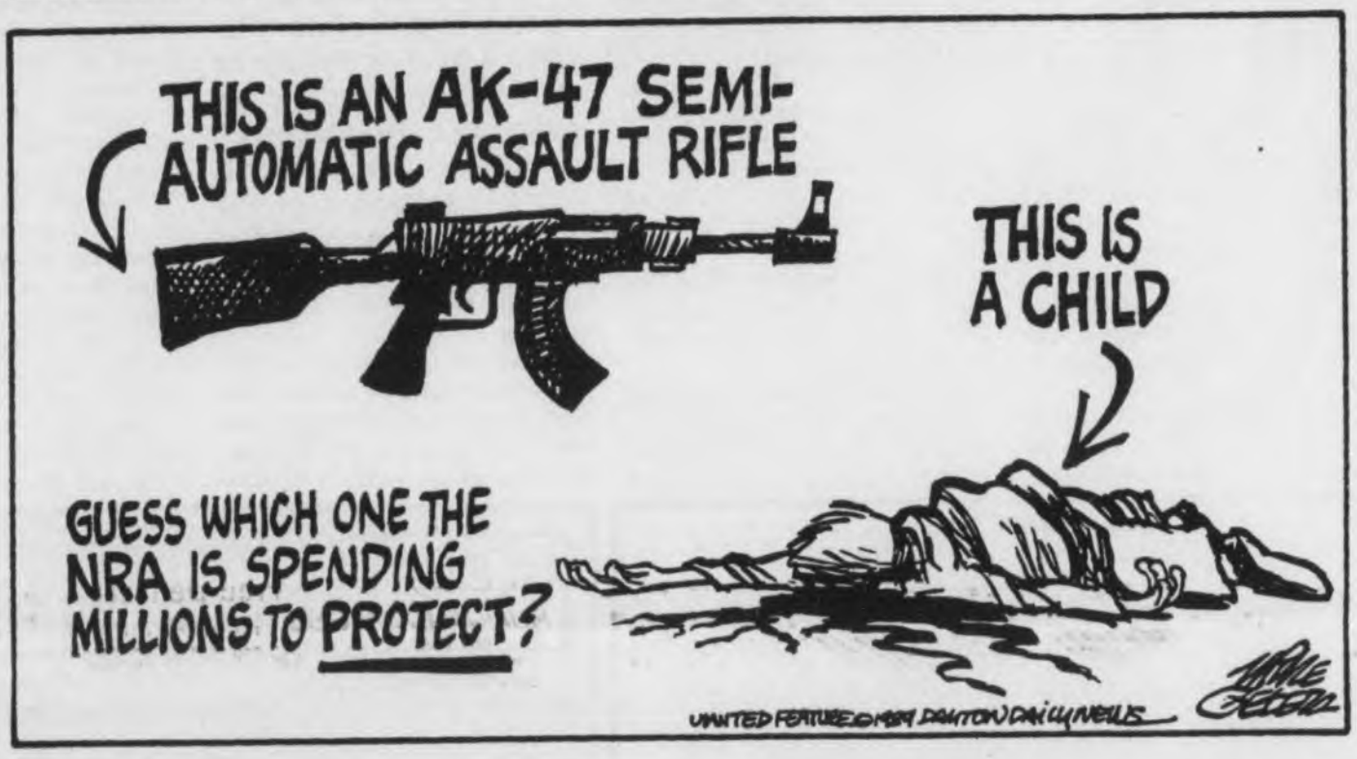
How many times are we told that minority graduate students are a very valuable asset to our University?

They provide role models for undergraduate minority students and will be the future educators and administrators of our society.

However, when minority graduate students do not qualify for traditional undergraduate financial assistance programs and they take on jobs that barely finance the cost of living, it is easy to see why they become discouraged and do not continue their graduate education.

Furthermore, if a university continues to ignore the non-traditional students and their needs, it's easy to see why they become dissatisfied and discouraged.

There is also a need to address career pursuits and how educators advise vocational issues. Students will be advised, "If you can't find a job, why not leave town or the state? The opportunities are out there."



Maybe the opportunities are out there, but it is important to note that this advice usually comes from someone who has a good paying position and a spouse who receives a decent wage.

It is unrealistic to think that a student or recent graduate has the funds to relocate. College expenses eat away at a budget and few student jobs allow enough financial freedom to make relocation feasible.

If universities want to be advocates for minorities, women and non-traditional students, they need to do more then develop task forces and have administrative meetings on the matter.

Being an advocate means one lives, breathes, sacrifices and goes against the status quo for a cause. Advocates are committed day and night; they feel a continuous need in their souls.

No way is it enough to say, "We are advocates for our student body," then go into an office and close the door.

Other Perspectives

If Indiana has an idol, it is Bob Knight. His controversial, hard-nosed coaching methods have drawn scrutiny but have achieved wild success and produced loyal followers. And now Knight is offering to step outside the basketball arena to aid in Indiana's war on drugs.

After a meeting with Gov. Evan Bayh and "drug czar" Jeffrey Modisett to discuss Bayh's proposed Commission for a Drug Free Indiana, Knight has volunteered himself for "assistance in any way ... on behalf of an anti-drug program."

Although Knight's role is unspecified, he likely would be involved in a public endorsement of this anti-drug policy. His appearance in support of such a program would doubtless give it instant credibility in the minds of many Hoosiers.

Humor gives insight to feelings

Korea needs independence

Commentary

Jeong-Hee Kim
Guest Columnist

We sometimes hide in humor as a defense when there are things that touch us deeply. Sometimes jokes include profound meanings.

Saturday morning, the radio anchorman predicted snow. The temperature dropped rapidly, hour by hour, and the plant in front of my windowsill froze overnight. I was so attached to my plant that I performed a funeral for it.

I hurried to change my clothes and put on my boots. It was such a long march from Edwards Hall to the Kramer Food Center where I eat my meals. Bitter cold wind slapped my cheeks and snowflakes melted on them. I did not mind having the cold, I was just too excited to see the white-covered, beautiful scenery.

When I came into the cafeteria, however, I heard conversations here and there.

"Oh I got the flu last night," or "I am constantly sneezing this morning."

While I was waiting in the long line for my order, I recalled Korean students' sarcastic remarks.

When I was a college student in Korea, students were not happy about the political relationship between the Korean and American governments. We thought the American government was controlling our direction too much.

That disturbed students and other Koreans who dreamed of independence. We, as an independent country, wanted to build a democratic government of our own. I did not understand much about politics, but students, including myself, were sensitive to what was going on in the political games between the two countries.

Young students especially avoided direct violence. We used humor to cover our anger and to voice our frustration. We expressed our feelings in a round about way.

"When Americans sneeze, the next day Koreans get a cold," we said.

America is a blessed country where people can live with freedom and where there is an abundance of natural resources. Korea is not quite as blessed as America, but it is the most beautiful and important country for Koreans.

It is sad to say that this wealthy and powerful country influences the less fortunate country. I wonder if people, through hard work, will ever reach equality? I wonder if people will ever learn to respect cultural differences? I wonder if people will ever understand the human dignity of oppressed people?

What can we do as human beings to promote peace on this earth? What can we do to strengthen the love for this world?

Somebody's cough broke my meditation and brought me back to the cafeteria. I heard more sneezing and coughing. Everyone seemed to have the flu.

If the Americans sneeze, Koreans get a cold. Then, if Americans are coughing today, what will happen to the Koreans tomorrow?

Editor's note: Jeong-Hee Kim is a graduate student in human ecology.

Fee not solution

Editor,

The KSU Athletic Department has been doing a lot of crowing about the benefits of a fee for non-revenue sports, which is a very admirable idea. This money, however, represents only about a quarter of the revenue generated by the fee increase. The high ratio of hype to dollars gives the impression that the motives may be less than pure.

During the past 10 years, the athletic department's budget increased more than 4½ times faster than expenditures for instruction in the rest of the University. During that interval, we have seen faculty salaries fall to the lowest among our peer institutions.

Despite this disproportionate budget increase, the athletic department cannibalized the wrestling, swimming and gymnastics programs to divert more funds to the football program. In doing so, it deprived students not only of the chance to participate, but also of the opportunity for financial assistance in the form of scholarships.

Despite these hardships imposed upon the instructional staff and its own athletes, the athletic department still lost more than $600,000 last year. Sadder still is that the football team, which was the object of all these efforts, has failed to demonstrate even a rudimentary understanding of the fundamentals of the game, a reflection of the level of coaching provided to them.

Given the history of the athletic department's financial woes, it would be, at best, naive to assume that the fee increase will reverse the department's backslide.

Equally absurd would be the assumption that, once having tapped the students' wallets, the department would be satisfied with $15 per semester. Miller himself has left the door open to future fee increases.

Hopefully, the Student Senate will recognize the athletic department's newfound interest in academics and non-revenue sports for the smoke screen that it is.

The athletic department should also realize that it lacks both the continuity and strength of leadership to hold the athletic department to the commitments it has made, both explicit and implicit.

Somewhere out there is a proposal that throws a larger bone to sports that don't make money as well as better benefits to the University community as a whole. I urge the Student Senate to keep looking until it is found.

Man claims victim's sister aided him in her slaying

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — A man who pleaded guilty Wednesday to killing a popular high school student at her home said the victim's adopted sister joined him and another man in the attack and that they talked of killing the girls' parents as well.

Conrad Joseph Hernandez, 24, entered the plea to first-degree murder in the death of Syndi Bierman, 17. Her body, beaten and stabbed, was found early Feb. 19 at her home at Piper in western Wyandotte County.

Hernandez, of Kansas City, Kan., surrendered to police in Oklahoma last week. He pleaded guilty under an agreement to testify against the other defendants — the victim's sister, Shari L. Bierman, and Archie E. Owens, both 20.

Shari Bierman is in custody, undergoing an examination to determine her competency to stand trial. Owens is still at large.

Hernandez, whom authorities said was Shari's boyfriend, said the three defendants engaged in bondage sex in Shari's basement apartment at the family home the night of Feb. 18.

Shari had separated from her husband and moved back home with her two children, 2 and 1.

"Archie was making jokes that we ought to tie the whole family up and kill them," Hernandez said. He said Shari remarked that would be a good idea because they could collect life insurance money on her parents, Leonard and Barbara Bierman.

The couple was not home at the time of the murder. They did not return home until after police arrived following a call from Shari.

Wyandotte Conty District Attorney Nick Tomasic told District Judge Philip J. Sieve he would show that Shari struck her sister with a board that had nails protruding from it.

"They would kill Mr. and Mrs. Bierman if they were home," Tomasic said. "They talked about hitting and killing anybody who got in their way."

Hernandez said that after the sexual escapade, he, Shari and Owens went to get her children from a babysitter. Hernandez, who said they were not drunk and hadn't used drugs, said they talked about money and that Shari mentioned items of value in the Bierman home.

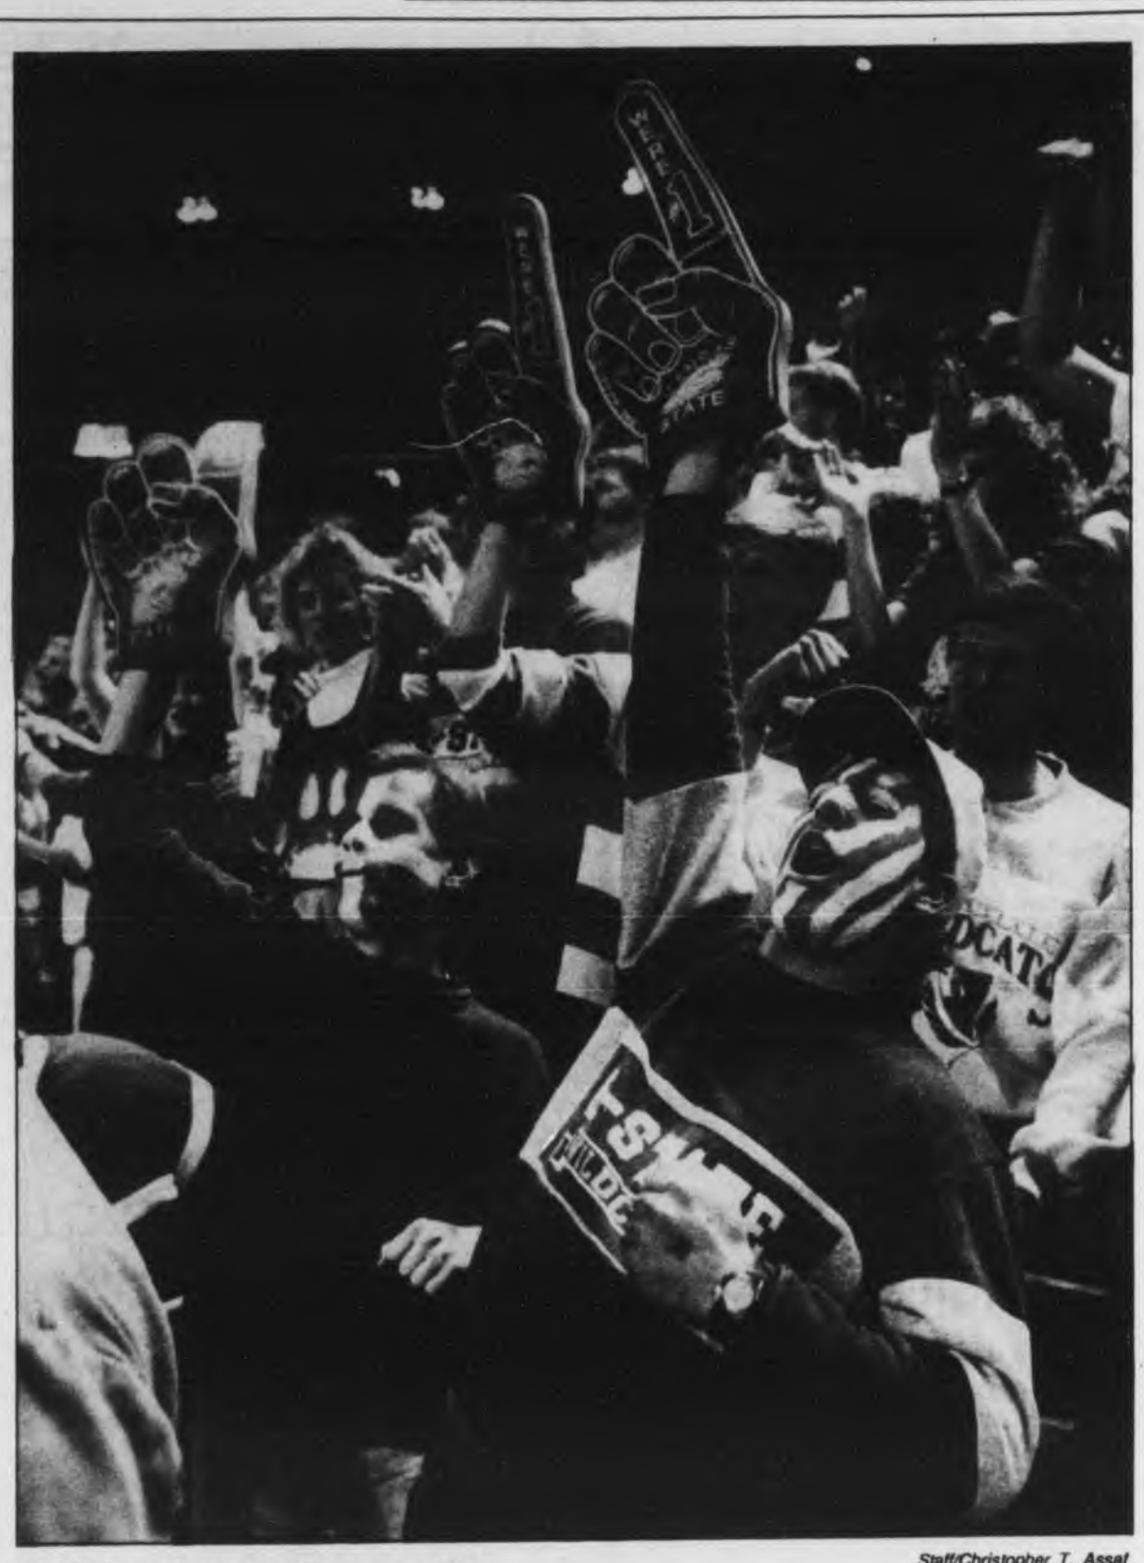
He said they left the children at another home and picked up some boards "just in case we had to knock somebody out."

He said they went back to the Bierman home and found Syndi in her bedroom. Hernandez said he and Owens hit her with the boards, and when she screamed, he put a pillow over her head and Owens hit her again, knocking her out.

Hernandez said they began removing items from the house, and at one point he heard Owens ask Shari for some knives, which she brought.

"I could hear thumps like Archie started beating her with the 2-by-4," Hernandez said of the victim. "I guess she had woken up."

The first-degree murder charge carries a mandatory life sentence, and officials said Hernandez would not be eligible for parole for at least 15 years.



Tomasic said that in exchange for the guilty plea and agreement to testify, the state would drop a felony theft charge. In addition, it would not seek to charge Hernandez, who has a prior felony theft conviction, as a habitual offender, which would increase the time before parole eligibility.

Owens, of Kansas City, Kan., was last seen in Oklahoma in the company of Tambi Lewis, 18. She was just released from a juvenile institution after spending two years there for a murder case, and is charged with aiding a felon in the Bierman death.

Syndi Bierman would have graduated in May as a Kansas Honor Scholar, among the top 10 percent of her high school class. She was listed in Who's Who Among High School Students, was a member of the volleyball team and student council, and had been a candidate for homecoming queen.

Her sister dropped out of school and investigators said there was a long history of animosity.

Officials said that early on Feb. 19, Shari made two back-to-back calls to the police emergency number,

Concert produced by students

By The Collegian Staff

Student Dance '89, a concert organized, designed and produced by students, will be presented at 8 p.m. Thursday and Saturday in Nichols Theatre.

"Any student who was interested was eligible to participate in this concert," said Greg Jennings, production coordinator of the concert. "There weren't any auditions held, there just needed to be the desire to dance."

The concert allows students an opportunity to perform their dance routines in front of an audience, said Jennings, senior in dance and theater.

"We treat this concert as a professional production and do it as professionally as possible," he said.

Dancers and choreographers are spotlighted in the concert, he said.

"It's a good way for them to see what they can produce," Jennings said.

Seventeen performers, four of whom are graduating seniors, will take part in the show, he said. Ballet, modern dance and jazz pieces will be performed.

"We've been working hard all week," said Sharisse Horn, senior in dance. "We want to put on a good show especially since we're representing the dance program."

Because the the Kansas Dance Conference is this weekend, Horn said she expects a lot of people to attend the concert.

"We encourage all people interested in seeing what dance is and what the dance program is about to attend the concert," Jennings said.

Tickets, which are available at the door, are $3 for students and senior citizens and $4 for the general public.

Stalin thought responsible for victims in mass grave

By The Associated Press

BYKOVNIA, U.S.S.R. — Thousands of skulls and skeletons found entwined with grass and bits of clothing testify to the years of murder concealed in a mass grave in a forest outside this Ukrainian village.

The single bullet hole in each skull offers the most chilling evidence that these victims — up to 300,000 by one unofficial estimate — were killed by Josef Stalin's secret police, not the Nazis as the Soviet government claims.

Stalin's men shot people in the back of the head. The Nazis usually lined up their victims on the side of a ravine and machine-gunned them, said Mikola G. Lysenko, a retired economist who is crusading to end what he considers a conspiracy of lies.

After 50 years of silence, elderly residents of this village near Kiev are speaking up, blaming their government for the bodies buried in the forest.

Petro Z. Kukovenko says he summoned the courage to speak after a Soviet commission reburied the bones and erected a memorial in May blaming the Nazis for the killing. On the spot where Soviet government trucks once dripped blood on the forest floor, the monument carved the official version in granite.

"When they put up this monument, I became ashamed that they were blaming this on the wrong people," Kukovenko, 74, said in an interview.

"My father may be buried there," said Kukovenko's wife, Halyna. "My father was a collective farmer, and they killed him for nothing," she said, sobbing.

But it was only in 1987 the Soviet government, as part of the reforms instituted under President Mikhail S. Gorbachev, began to admit that Stalin was responsible for even thousands of deaths.

The monument blaming the Nazis for the victims at Bykovnia was built in May, Lysenko said. In December, he succeeded in forcing the government to form a fourth commission to find the murderers.

The last three commissions all blamed the German occupation army.

But Kukovenko said, "While the Germans were here, no one touched the gravesite." That statement is supported by 50 villagers, Lysenko said.

All four commissions have involved officials with connections to the secret police, Lysenko said.

Kukovenko lived through that terrible time from 1936 to 1941, when canvas-covered trucks night after night hauled their mysterious cargo to the green-fenced compound in the Darnitsia Forest.

He first saw the horror for himself when a German officer forced him and four other men to exhume one of the graves just four days after Nazi troops occupied the area in September 1941.

"I know that this pit we dug up was a fresh grave — maybe the people had been buried there a week earlier," just before the Red Army retreated, Kukovenko said. Since that time, further excavation has revealed the remains of thousands of Soviets in the pits, stacked like canned sardines.

Government estimates range from 6,000 to 68,000 bodies, but Lysenko said there are five to eight victims in every two square yards of the 80,000-square-yard site.

'The Burbs' needs humor; Hanks' talent wasted in film

By Nancy Chartrand
Collegian Reviewer

Tom Hanks should have stayed in the big city after this summer's smash hit "Big," instead of moving to "The Burbs."

Although "The Burbs" is billed as a comedy about life in suburban America, it was possible to count the number of times the audience actually laughed aloud.

Unfortunately, the script Hanks was handed this time wasn't worthy of his comic ability. This movie could have been much funnier than it was.

The Petersons — Ray, played by Hanks, and his wife, Carol, played by Carrie Fisher — have the typical suburban family. They have a son, a dog, cable television and nosy neighbors.

However, it is the Petersons' new neighbors, the Klopeks, who have the block in turmoil. Although they moved in weeks ago, no one has seen the new neighbors come or go during the day.

One night, curious as to what might be going on next door, Ray sneaks out of his house and shuffles across the front lawn to see the Klopeks' house glowing and emitting strange noises.

Soon the Petersons' nosy neighbors convince Ray there is definitely something strange going on next door to him — something worth investigating. Ray and his neighbors then begin spying on the Klopeks.

Review

After several stakeouts, they become convinced the Klopeks are killing people and burying them in their back yard. Well, they get a little carried away trying to dig up one of these supposed bodies, hit a gas line, and blow up the Klopeks' house. However, the police quickly inform them Dr. Klopek is a world renowned pathologist, not a mad scientist who kills people.

When Ray finds this out, he goes off on a tirade. With face blackened and clothes singed from the explosion, he gives a sanctimonious speech to his neighbors, chastising them as well as himself for having nothing better to in "The Burbs" than to spy on their neighbors.

So what exactly is the point of "The Burbs"? Is the audience supposed to get some great social message from Ray's brief lecture on what nosy suburban neighbors can do to people's lives? Is it some lesson about how people in the suburbs spend more time spying on the neighbors than tending to their own lives?

If so, it wasn't worked into the plot very well. The way in which Ray's Sunday school lecture rose up out of nowhere prompted the audience members to look at each other with puzzled faces.

Fisher, giving her usual forgettable performance, didn't add much to the movie. The only character, other than Hanks', who stood out was the Petersons' overzealous, ex-Vietnam veteran neighbor, played by Bruce Dern.

Let's hope Hanks is more selective in his next project. For an actor who has garnered critical acclaim for his two most recent movies, "Punchline" and "Big," he surely can afford to be choosy.

Letterman invites town to visit late night show

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — They oohed and aahed at Times Square and the Statue of Liberty, then gasped when the tour bus squeezed within 2 inches of a truck as it maneuvered through Manhattan's clogged streets on Wednesday.

The folks from Bolan, Iowa, were clearly a long way from home.

"You'll never run into this traffic in Bolan," said Linda Nydegger. "I like to visit but I sure wouldn't want to live here."

"We wave at everybody. They give each other the bird," said Daryl McCready, comparing motorists in Bolan and Manhattan.

The entire population of Bolan's metropolitan area — six Bolanites and 10 from the "suburbs" — had taken David Letterman up on his offer to visit the big city.

Letterman, prompted by a staffer intrigued by Bolan, paid for the Iowans to come to New York for three days and appear on his show, "Late Night with David Letterman."

Low water intake can cause injury, death

By Bryan Ackley
Collegian Reporter

Water is essential for human survival, but not knowing how much to consume each day could lead to serious injury and, in some instances, death.

On a day-to-day basis, thirst is an adequate guideline in determining how much water to drink, said Dr. Guy Smith, director of the Eriksen Sports Medicine Clinic at Lafene Student Health Center.

Normally, a person loses about two quarts of water every day from perspiration and other bodily functions, but increased physical activity, weather and age play a part in determining the amount of water a person should consume daily, Smith said.

"Thirst is no longer a good guideline to follow as far as increased physical activity is concerned," he said.

Increased physical activity in an indoor environment could result in the loss of about one quart of water per hour while the same activity in a warm, outdoor environment could result in the loss of three and occasionally as many as six quarts of water per hour.

According to a Lafene publication, individuals need to consume enough water to cause urination prior to physical activity and consume at least one, four- to six-ounce glass of water every 20 minutes during increased physical activity.

Beverages such as tea, pop and fruit juice can be substituted for water because they consist largely of water; however, Smith said the drinks containing sugar or caffeine tend to inhibit the digestive process.

Insufficient water consumption can cause dehydration which may contribute to heat injury, he said.

A person suffering from heat cramps or heat exhaustion can be treated by being moved into a cooler environment and rehydrated. But a person suffering from heat stroke should be treated as a medical emergency because the body cannot regulate its temperature.

If the human has a temperature of 106 degrees Fahrenheit, brain damage and kidney failure can result, he said.

"A person can be perfectly hydrated and suffer heat stroke," Smith said.

Children and elderly individuals are particularly susceptible to heat injury. Children sweat inefficiently and the elderly may take prescription medications that inhibit the body's ability to cool itself, he said.

George Marchin, associate professor of biology, said dehydration causes severe problems among populations suffering from drought or famine.

Hyundai Computers Introduced to Kansas

ADVERTISEMENT

DENVER (FSI). The Hyundai Corporation has selected Connecting Point Computer Centers as their exclusive authorized dealer in Lawrence and Manhattan, Kansas. This selection follows the signing of a major supply contract with the 180 store Connecting Point chain here last month.

Hyundai, the $24 billion company known for its high quality, economical cars, has been a major producer of of microcomputers for the past several years.

Hyundai's Super 16TE line of PCs follows their automotive tradition of price/performance. Myles Schachter, Connecting Point President, said that he chose the Hyundai product line because of its great price, high speed and excellent software bundle. Each Hyundai, he said, is fast at 10 Mhz or twice as fast as the original PC; has a full 640K memory, 12" or 14" flat amber screen and a 101 keyboard.

The Electric Desk software included with every computer is a quality word processor, spreadsheet and database. The system also comes with Keyworks, a program to store keystrokes.

Dr. Rhonda Ross, the firm's Customer Support Manager, has found that the price has not compromised the construction of these powerful PCs. She states that the systems appear to be trouble free and highly compatible. She said this explains the manufacturer's 18 month warranty - far in excess of the industry standard.

Hyundai Super 16TE

Due to the new Connecting Point-Hyundai contract, the Manhattan and Lawrence stores are introducing these PCs at more than 20% off already competitive compatible prices with training included with every purchase. Already, United Telephone Midwest Group, Menninger's Foundation and PARS Service has selected Connecting Point to provide Hyundai PCs to their employees.

Massop's tip gives 'Cats 76-75 victory

Win takes Wildcats step closer to at-large berth

By Chris Wilhelm
Sports Writer

It was the 'Cats' last home game in Bramlage Coliseum this season. It was the seniors' last game in front of a K-State crowd. It was the 'Cats' first victory over a top-ten team this season — and it was a big, big, big win.

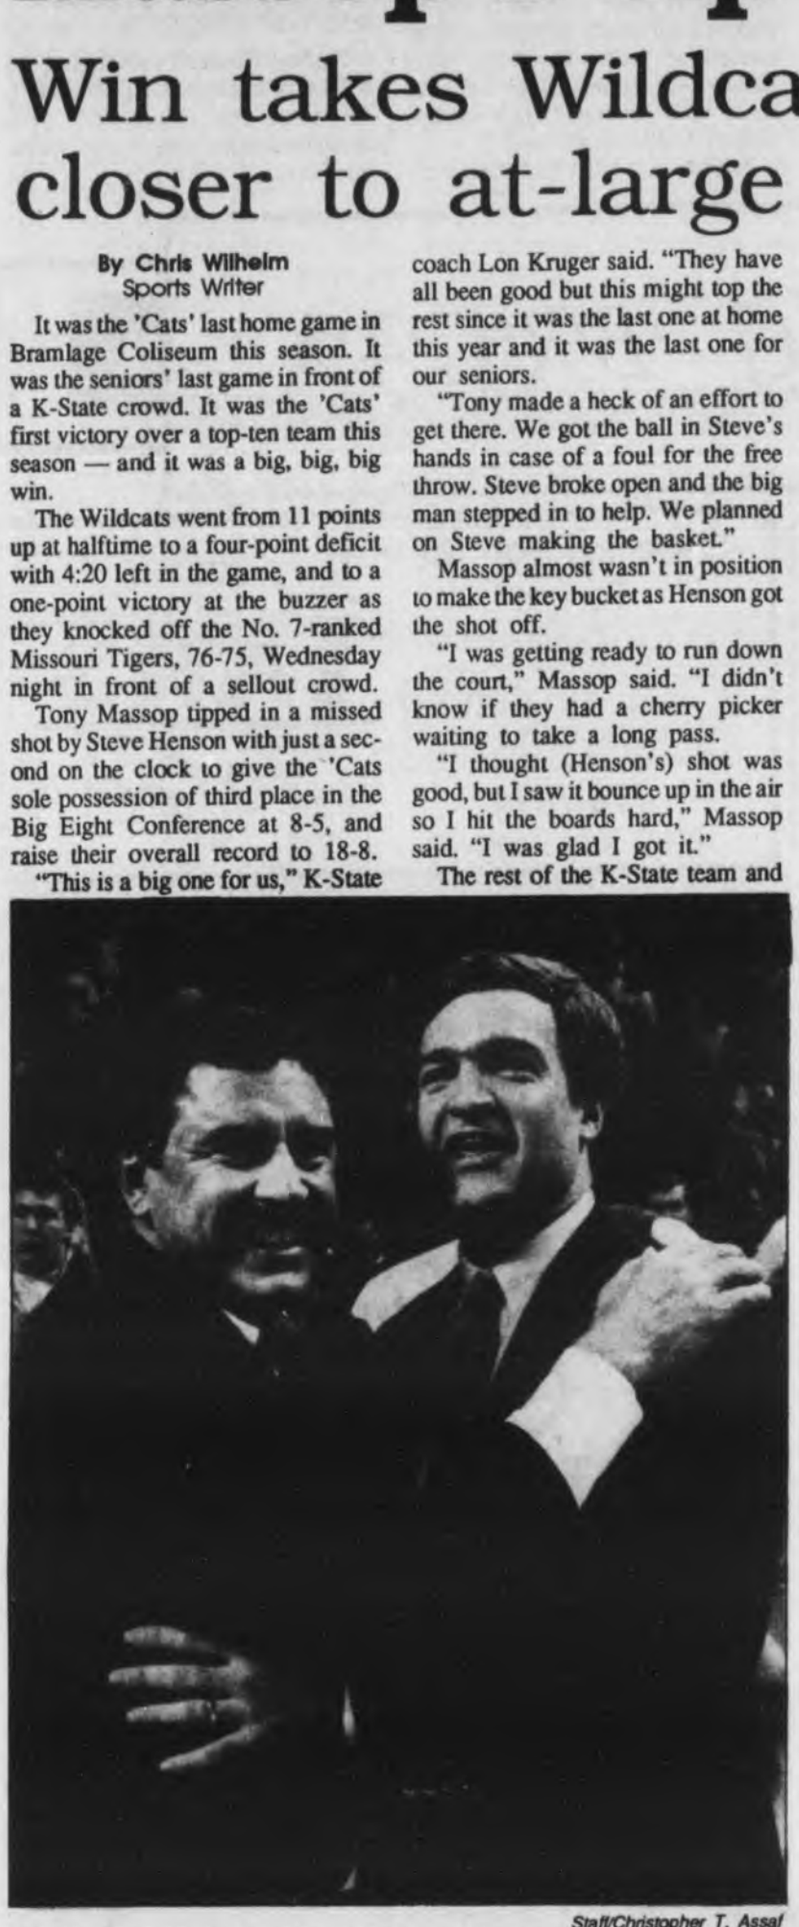
The Wildcats went from 11 points up at halftime to a four-point deficit with 4:20 left in the game, and to a one-point victory at the buzzer as they knocked off the No. 7-ranked Missouri Tigers, 76-75, Wednesday night in front of a sellout crowd.

Tony Massop tipped in a missed shot by Steve Henson with just a second on the clock to give the 'Cats sole possession of third place in the Big Eight Conference at 8-5, and raise their overall record to 18-8.

"This is a big one for us," K-State coach Lon Kruger said. "They have all been good but this might top the rest since it was the last one at home this year and it was the last one for our seniors.

"Tony made a heck of an effort to get there. We got the ball in Steve's hands in case of a foul for the free throw. Steve broke open and the big man stepped in to help. We planned on Steve making the basket."

Massop almost wasn't in position to make the key bucket as Henson got the shot off.



"I was getting ready to run down the court," Massop said. "I didn't know if they had a cherry picker waiting to take a long pass.

"I thought (Henson's) shot was good, but I saw it bounce up in the air so I hit the boards hard," Massop said. "I was glad I got it."

The rest of the K-State team and fans were also happy that the last-second shot was good, but none was probably as happy as Henson.

"Tony tipped it in so quickly that I really didn't have time to react," Henson said. "(My) shot never looked good to me. I'm just glad that Tony was able to tip it in.

"I would have liked to have that shot over. It was good to see Tony go up and hit it in. I think he even did it with his left hand."

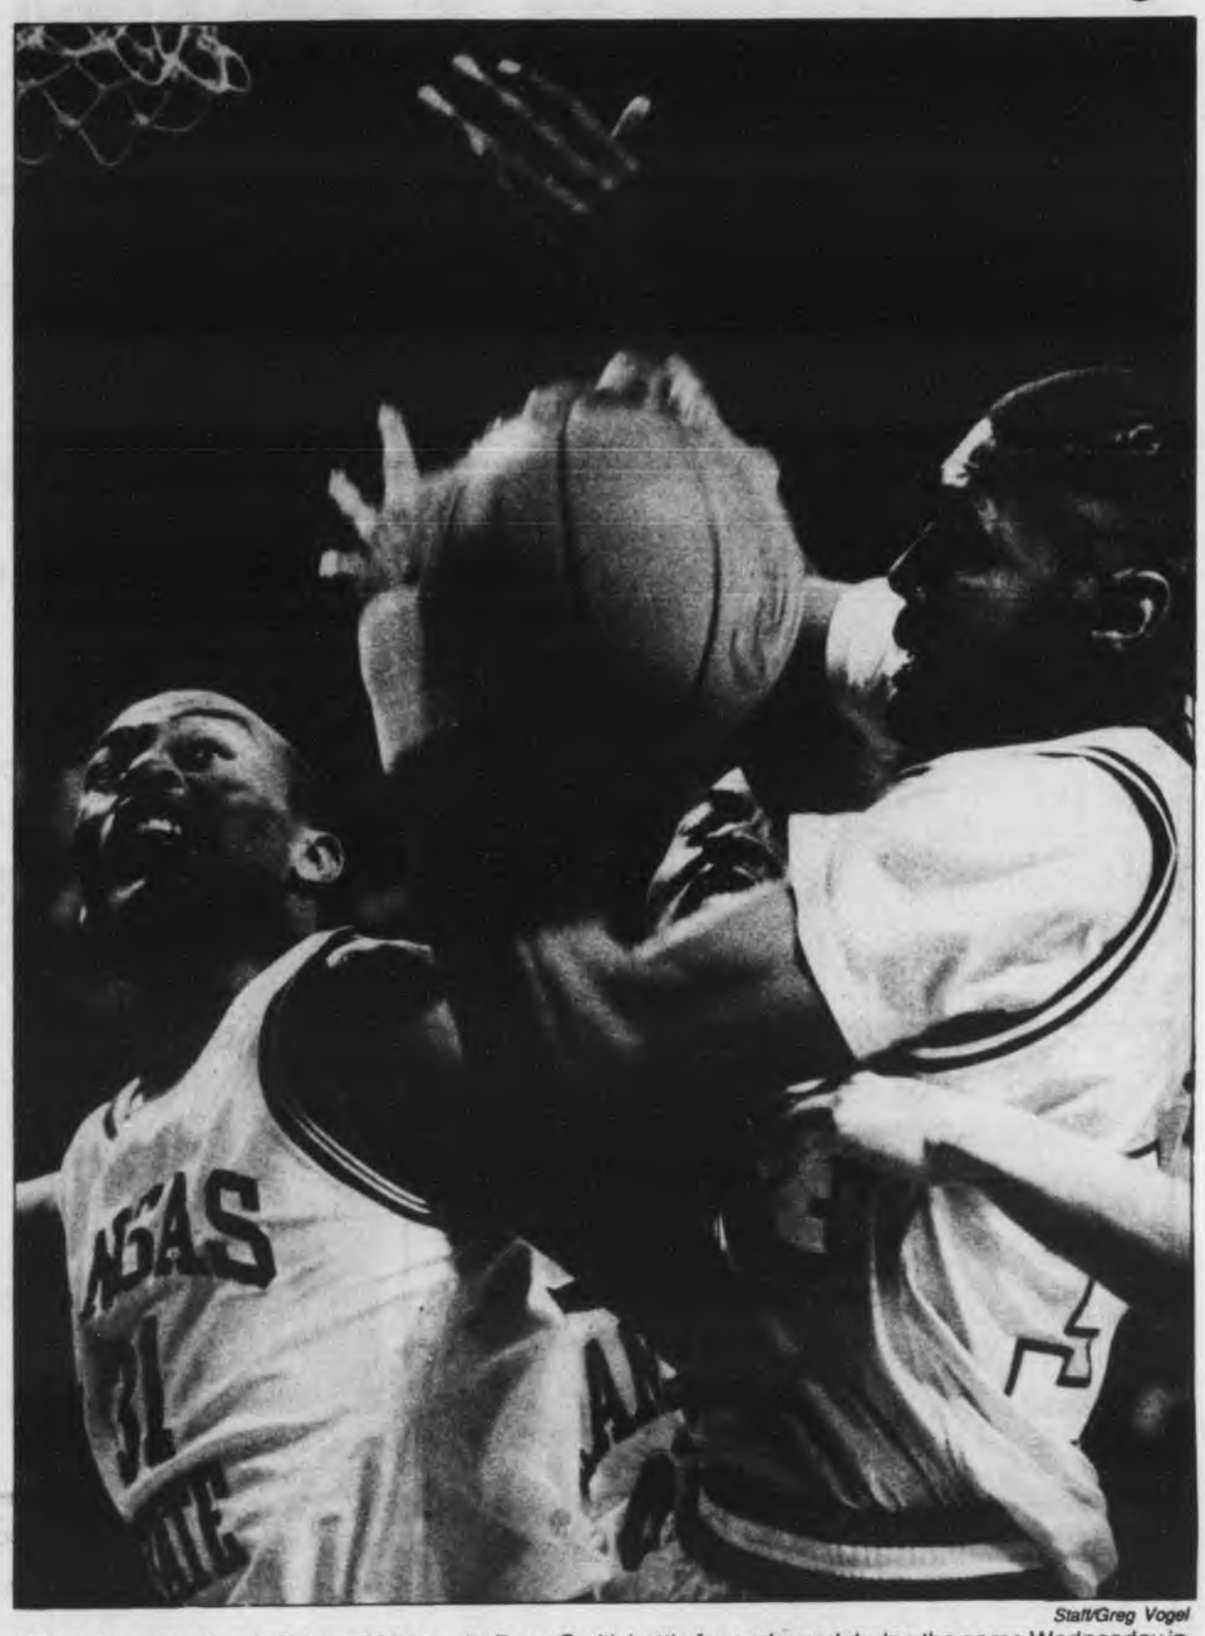
Halftime — K-State 45, Missouri 34. Three-point goals — Missouri 1-10 (Irvin 1-5, Peeler 0-2, Coward 0-3), K-State 6-15 (Dobbins 2-6, Humphrey 1-1, Henson 3-7, Diggins 0-1). Fouled out — None. Rebounds — Missouri 42 (Sandbothe), K-State 21 (McCoy 5). Assists — Missouri 14 (Sandbothe), K-State 21 (Humphrey, Dobbins 6). Total fouls — Missouri 19, K-State 21. Technicals — Coward. A — 13,500.

The first half saw the 'Cats start out slowly, falling behind, 7-2, early in the game to the much taller Mizzou squad. K-State then turned up the heat, outscoring the Tigers, 34-19, over the next 10 minutes to give them an 11-point cushion and the lead for the rest of the first half.

Missouri came out strong in the second half, putting together a 27-12 run in the first 10 minutes to take a four-point lead at 61-57.

The Tiger lead bounced between four and two points until Henson hit a layup and was fouled with 1:20 left. Henson hit the free throw, giving the 'Cats a one-point, 74-73, lead, its first since the 13:32 mark of the second half.

"We got after it in the first half and they got after it in the second half," Kruger said. "Missouri is big and physical and they made us work hard out there."



Greg Church took the game's high scoring honors, as he threw in a career high 31 points for Missouri on 10-of-12 shooting. Byron Irvin added 13 and Anthony Peeler added 10 to round out the double-digit scorers for the Tigers.

Henson led the 'Cats in scoring with 23 points on 9-of-18 shooting from the field. Fred McCoy and Lance Simmons reached double digits for the 'Cats, scoring 12 and 11 points respectively.

The Missouri squad had better statistics than the 'Cats in every category but still couldn't get the job done. The Tigers shot 52 percent from the floor to the 'Cats' 44.3 percent. Mizzou outrebounded K-State by a whopping 37-20 edge. The Tigers also sank 22 of 24 free throws to just 8 of 14 for the Wildcats.

"Our statistics are not really pretty on the year," Kruger said. "We realize that we're not going to accomplish things as smoothly as maybe we did last year.

"This is a ball club that has to work very hard. It seems like we haven't really been able to enjoy our victories. It seems like we win one and have to turn around and win another one. It will be nice this summer when the team can look back and see what it has accomplished and be able to enjoy it."

Sanders excused from drills

By The Associated Press

STILLWATER, Okla. — Heisman Trophy winner Barry Sanders has been excused from spring practice at Oklahoma State to explore his options with the National Football League, Coach Pat Jones said Wednesday.

Sanders also requested that he continue to be unavailable to the media until a later date, said Steve Buzzard, sports information director.

"My responsibility will contine to be in the best interests of the youngster and his family," Jones said.

Sanders, a junior who rushed for 2,628 yards and scored 39 touchdowns last season, both NCAA records, said previously that he had decided on whether to apply for the NFL draft. But he has not disclosed his decision.

His father, William, visited with NFL officials last month to discuss his son's options. But William Sanders told The Associated Press Wednesday night that he was surprised his son was not going through spring drills.

"I talked to Barry Monday night and he said he was going out for spring football," William Sanders said from his home in Wichita. "He said he was going to be out running with everyone else."

Since Sanders has never redshirted, he would not be eligible for the regular NFL draft this spring unless he decides to challenge the legality of the draft in the courts or unless the league changes its longstanding policy of not drafting underclassmen.

OU slips past Cowboys; KU, Cyclones victorious

By The Associated Press

With the exception of Colorado, all of the home teams again came out victorious in Wednesday night's Big Eight basketball action. As is usually the case, the road was again tough for Big Eight teams with Iowa State pulling off the only road win at Colorado. Here's a brief recap of Wednesday's Big Eight men's action:

Oklahoma 111, Okla. State 108

At Norman, Okla., Stacey King scored 27 points, including a key basket from inside with 12 seconds left, as fourth-ranked Oklahoma beat Oklahoma State 111-108 and clinched at least a tie for the Big Eight championship.

Oklahoma State had pulled within a point on Darwyn Alexander's free throw with 52 seconds remaining. But when he missed his second try, King rebounded and the Sooners worked the clock until Mookie Blaylock drove into the lane and dished off to King under the bucket.

By winning its 29th straight at home, Oklahoma improved to 25-4 overall and 11-2 in the Big Eight. Oklahoma State, which knocked the Sooners from the No. 1 spot in the Associated Press poll with a victory earlier this season, is 16-10 and 7-6.

Blaylock's final assist gave him 11 for the night, making him the first player in NCAA history to record 200 assists and 100 steals in consecutive seasons.

A basket by Dumas, who scored a career-high 34 points, gave the Cowboys their largest lead, 74-69, with 14:29 left. But the Sooners quickly tied the score, 76-76, and the game stayed tight thereafter.

A Dumas dunk with 3:32 left gave the Cowboys a 104-103 lead but Blaylock, who scored 21 points, made a jumper 13 seconds later to give the Sooners the lead for good.

Kansas 80, Nebraska 71

In Lawrence, Milt Newton and Mark Randall each scored 20 points to hold off a second-half Nebraska rally and lead Kansas to an 80-71 Big Eight victory over the Cornhuskers.

Kansas, 18-11 overall and 5-8 in the conference, hit 8-of-12 free throws in the last three minutes of the game to seal the victory.

Beau Reid, who finished with 12 points, started Nebraska's comeback with a three-point shot with 13:45 left. He added another three-point shot a minute later to cut Kansas' lead to nine for a 60-51 score.

The Cornhuskers nipped away and got within four points at 4:44 when Eric Johnson landed his jump shot to make it 69-65.

But the Cornhuskers, 16-13 overall and 4-9 in the conference, got into foul trouble and Kansas' free-throw shooting kept them ahead.

Ray Richardson led Nebraska with 19 points, including five three-point shots.

Kansas, with 11 turnovers and poor field goal shooting in the first half, did not pull away until 4:15 in the half, when Newton sank three consecutive shots for a 31-23 score.

Randall came out of halftime with three consecutive baskets of his own, building a 45-34 lead with 19:08 left in the game. The Jayhawks led, 39-34, at halftime.

Iowa State 83, Colorado 68

At Boulder, Colo., Victor Alexander scored 23 points and grabbed 11 rebounds to lead Iowa State to an 83-68 Big Eight Conference victory over lowly Colorado Wednesday night.

It was Colorado's sixth consecutive loss, all in league play.

The Cyclones jumped to an early 15-6 lead before the Buffs went on a 10-4 run, including six points from Shaun Vandiver, to narrow the deficit to 19-16 at the 11:16 mark. Iowa State maintained a 37-30 lead at the half.

The Buffs came out fast in the second half, scoring the first seven points — six of them from Reggie Morton — to tie the game, 37-37, at 18:14. Later, a Morton free throw gave the Buffs their only lead of the night, 49-48, with 14:17 left.

Weather hampering baseball schedule

From Staff and Wire Reports

The K-State baseball squad matchup with Bellevue College Wednesday fell victim to the weather. Meanwhile. the 'Cats will again attempt to play host to Missouri Baptist today at 2 p.m. at Frank Myers Field.

The Bellevue game was the second contest that has had to be postponed due to weather this season. Assistant coach Phil Morgan said Wednesday night that K-State was going to try and reschedule with Bellevue for sometime at the end of March.

Should the weather cooperate, K-State will play Missouri Baptist today and then is also scheduled to play home games with Wayne State Friday and Saturday and Augustana College Sunday. Friday's game is slated to start at 2 p.m., while the weekend games will begin at 1 p.m.

After the 'Cats' four-game homestand, they will hit the road for a spring break trip that begins at San Jose State March 10, and then they play at the University of San Francisco March 11 before heading for Fresno State and the Best of West Tournament in Fresno, Calif.

KC signs Vikings' Ashley

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The Kansas City Chiefs announced the signings Wednesday of unprotected free agents Walker Lee Ashley, a linebacker from the Minnesota Vikings, and quarterback Steve Slayden of the Cleveland Browns.

Ashley, 28, of Bayonne, N.J., spent the last five seasons as a reserve linebacker with the Vikings, playing in 74 games with one start. In that period, the 6-foot, 230-pounder contributed 217 tackles, one interception and three forced fumbles. Last season, Ashley made 29 tackles on defense and another 20 on special teams.

Royals' hurler to have surgery

HAINES CITY, Fla. — Left-handed pitcher Bob Buchanan has been scheduled to undergo surgery on his left knee and will probably miss the remainder of the Kansas City Royals' spring camp.

Buchanan was scheduled to see another doctor Thursday in Tampa for a second opinion before having the operation.

Buchanan was 5-1 with six saves at Omaha, the Royals' AAA farm club, last year. He pitched with the Cincinnati Reds in 1985 and was 1-0 in 14 appearances.

Pell Grant checks delayed for 455 students

Emergency student loans helped

By Deborah Dinges
Collegian Reporter

Due to students turning in financial aid reports late, Pell Grant checks totaling $305,000 were delayed for 455 students this semester, said Carol Durnford, assistant director of student financial assistance.

Pell Grants are a form of federal aid based on students' financial needs. The checks arrived at the Office of Student Financial Assistance Feb. 23, Durnford said.

Kurt Ewert, senior in architectural engineering, received his first check in the fall, but did not receive the check for the second half of his award at spring registration.

"I had to take out an emergency student loan," Ewert said. "It won't cause any problems until it's due."

Students who had to arrange emergency student loans because of the delay will not be charged the regular 1.5 percent monthly interest unless the loans are not paid by the due date, Durnford said.

Ewert said the delay has not caused him any problems. He submitted his student financial aid report around July or August.

"It's certainly an inconvienence, but I realize the forms were turned in late — as long as I know the check will be in eventually," Ewert said.

The delay was caused by a required change in the reporting process, Durnford said. The programs had to be expanded to allow for the information that was reported. This reprogramming and the number of student financial aid reports submitted late caused a delay in the December report to the Department of Education.

After the reports are processed at K-State, they must go through the Federal Department of Education's processing, Durnford said. Reports not received at the federal office by the 15th of the month are not processed until the 15th of the next month.

The December report did not make the deadline for the 15th and caused a month delay, she said.

In the fall and early spring, student financial assistance sends reports to the federal office as soon as they can get processed, Durnford said.

Students who submitted student financial aid reports late were able to get their fall Pell Grant checks because of other students failing to pick up their checks at registration or cancelling them, she said. This money was redirected to some of those who submitted their student financial aid reports late.

K-State had 4,425 Pell Grant recipients listed for the 1988-89 school year and Durnford said about 4,700 students will have Pell Grants before the school year ends. This is the highest number of Pell Grants K-State students have received.

Despite the increase in students receiving Pell Grants, Durnford said the problem with delays is no worse than it was last year.

Student financial assistance does not notify students of a check's arrival until the check has gone unclaimed for several weeks, Durnford said.

Improved notification system needed to protect firefighters

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Firefighters nationwide need a better system of notifying each other of hazardous materials so they can prevent accidents like one that killed six Kansas City, Mo., firemen last year, a House panel was told Wednesday.

"Measures must be taken to prevent firefighters from walking unknowingly into fires in which hazardous chemicals are present," said Rep. Tom Lantos, D-Calif., chairman of the House Government Operations subcommittee on employment and housing.

Lantos, firefighting officials and other members of Congress said the deaths of the Kansas City firefighters in a construction site explosion pointed to the need for tighter and more coordinated regulation of hazardous materials and improved training for firemen.

The Kansas City firefighters were killed when a trailer loaded with tons of a blasting agent exploded at a highway construction site Nov. 29. Lawmakers were told that a dispatcher warned the firefighters that explosives might be in the area, but they were not provided with the specific location or the type of hazardous material involved.

"They had no warning that the fire they were trying to extinguish was a time bomb waiting to take their lives," said Terry Conroy, president of the Kansas City chapter of the International Association of Firefighters.

"If the fire scene had been properly marked and if a professional hazardous materials program had been in place, maybe those men would be alive today," he said.

Although local problems were acknowledged, most of the criticism was directed at the regulatory system, which is spread among federal agencies as well as state and local governments.

John Eversole, commander of the Chicago fire department's hazardous incident team, said laws have created "tremendous duplication and confusion, and at the same time, leave gaping voids."

For example, the panel was told that the city of Kansas City had issued a permit for storage of the explosive materials at the construction site, but that the fire department had not been informed. The city has since taken steps to provide notice of blasting permits to firefighters.

Computers improve students' accuracy

By Dave Young
Collegian Reporter

Once thought of as machines only to be used in the fields of computer science and engineering, computers have come a long way at K-State.

Computers have extended beyond their traditional uses and are being used in a variety of liberal arts courses.

Carol Ann Holcomb, associate professor of foods and nutrition, said computers are used in at least three classes in the curriculum to analyze diets and calculate health risks.

"(Computers) save the students and me a lot of time," she said. "That gives us more time to learn other things.

"The students who have used computers before really enjoy the classes, but the students who haven't have some anxiety when they first start using them. The problem instructors have is that many of our students are in elementary education and aren't required to take any computer classes."

Holcomb said computers are helping students learn.

"The computers are more meaningful to the students, and they allow the students to be more accurate," she said.

Bernard Rueschhoff, instructor of clothing, textiles and interior design, said two classes in the department are using computers this semester.

"The students can design lines of clothing and patterns on the computer," Rueschhoff said. "There are more than 16 million colors to choose from when designing.

"Software is being developed that will tell how efficient a cut is. If the efficiency (how the patterns are laid on the cloth) is poor, then the computer can arrange it in a more efficient pattern. This can save clothing companies millions of dollars."

Rosella Ogg, instructor of art, said the department began using computers three semesters ago. The department teaches one class in which computers are used, but is planning to expand computer use into more classes.

Ogg said the computers are used mainly for topography, page layout and digitizing.

"Students in graphic design are finding computer literacy is needed," she said.

Spices enhance local cuisine

Restaurants offer fiery foods for heartiest of souls

By Carrie Law
Collegian Reporter

"Try Me" seems to leap off the label and promise to perform a Mexican hat dance across the palate. The green and red concoctions of peppers and spices in the glass containers tempt only the heartiest of souls and the bravest of spice connoisseurs.

Several restaurants in Manhattan offer a variety of fiery foods. What makes foods hot and tasty is the many types of chili peppers and spices such as ground red pepper, black mustard seed and cardamom seed that are used.

John Heritage, owner of the Hibachi Hut and the Lone Star Cafe, tried gumbo, a spicy Cajun dish, eight years ago.

"The taste knocked my socks off. The next day I tried red beans and rice," he said. "I've liked Cajun cuisine ever since."

Heritage added Cajun dishes to the Hibachi Hut menu three years ago.

Cajun cuisine originated from former French Canadians who resettled in the Louisiana bayous.

"We started out with approximately 40 spices when we began," Heritage said. "Wherever I go, I always keep an eye out for unusual spices.

"The best places to find new spices are Texas and Louisiana."

Heritage also serves spicy food at the Lone Star Cafe.

"The difference between the two restaurants' fiery food is that at the Lone Star, we use less cayenne pepper and more chili peppers," he said. "We use ancho chilies, fresh jalapeno peppers, chili powder and Cascabel chili powder."

The label on the can of Cascabel chili powder reads "atomic."

The peppers are roasted over a flame and hand peeled at the two restaurants, Heritage said. The ribs and seeds of all chilies are the hottest part, and a chili is hotter near the stem than at the tip.

He said it is wise to wear rubber gloves when handling hot chilies. They should never be handled under running water because the vapors can carry natural oil to the face. An individual should avoid touching the chili oils.

A popular item at the Lone Star is "XXX" Chili. Heritage said it has won awards for the past two years at the Aggieville Chili Cook-Off.

"Most (restaurant) chains are afraid to season their food," he said. "The key to good, spicy food is not making it too hot because the general public likes their food moderately hot."

The sauces at both restaurants vary somewhat in taste because they are made from scratch every day.

Steve Jackman, assistant kitchen manager at the Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon, said the regular customers appreciate variety in the taste of sauces.

"We really can't change the grill menu, so we try to vary the sauces a little each time we make them," he said.

Previously, Jackman worked at Buffalo Bob's Smokehouse in Lawrence, where he and the owner designed their own barbecue sauce.

The hot sauce at a restaurant varies with the mood of the cook, Jackman said.

"I personally hate spicy food," he said. "However, I think that's better because I don't make it to suit my own taste. I can be sadistic and the (lovers of spicy foods) like it."

The most popular spicy food item on the menu at Last Chance is the ribs, Jackson said.

"Everyone loves the ribs," he said. "We use Cattleman's barbecue sauce as the base and add various spices. We try to do everything as easily as possible here (because the establishment is a bar and grill). However, real barbecue sauce needs to cook for four or five hours."

Last Chance uses an assortment of peppers, paprika, sugar and barbecue spice, which is an array of cayenne pepper and sweet spices, Jackman said.

Author Ellen Brown, in her book "Southwest Tastes," said traditional Southwest cuisine developed more as a coincidence of Spanish, Mexican and Anglo-American settlement in the same region than by design.

Retired major general testifies he, North 'assumed worst' about actions' legality

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Retired Maj. Gen. John K. Singlaub testified at Oliver North's trial Wednesday that he and North decided in 1985 "to assume the worst" — that North's actions were covered by a law forbidding official aid to the Nicaraguan Contras — and to act accordingly.

Earlier in the day, Robert Owen testified that he made many trips between Washington and Central America for North, carrying instructions from the presidential aide for how the guerrilla war was to be fought, and carrying maps and money.

Owen said North told him he acted with the knowledge and approval of superiors. The courier testified at one point that North said he had President Reagan's approval, but he said later that testimony was wrong, that North never got more specific than "superiors."

Singlaub, an ardent anti-communist who directed spy activities in three wars, also testified he persuaded Taiwan and another Asian nation — with North's knowledge — to give $5 million each to the Nicaraguan Contras but the plan failed for lack of a required signal from the U.S. government.

At the time, the Reagan administration was under a Congress-imposed ban, the Boland Amendment, against helping the rebels conducting a guerrilla war against the Nicaraguan government. The second Asian country was not identified.

Singlaub said he proposed in December 1984 that North solicit funds in the Far East from Singlaub's "close personal friends at high levels sympathetic to the cause."

"I explained that the policy of the United States was quite clear, to support the Nicaraguan resistance, and that Congress' temporary action stopped us," he testified.

Singlaub, who will return to the witness stand Thursday, was the fourth witness in the trial which resumed despite serious, still-unresolved, national security issues that had halted testimony for nearly two days.

Defense lawyer Brendan Sullivan has renewed a motion to declare that a federal law designed to protect state secrets from being spilled in the courtroom is unconstitutional as applied to the North case. Sullivan also has asked that the 12 criminal charges against North be thrown out.

On Wednesday, the government replied that the process of handling classified material in court "is not, as North contends, a reason to conclude that the trial is unworkable."

North is accused of lying to Congress about his activities on behalf of the Nicaraguan Contras — activities in which both he and Singlaub were deeply involved — in the 1984-1986 period when the Boland Amendment banned such aid.

"I argued that it could not possibly apply to the office of the president," Singlaub said. North, then a Marine lieutenant colonel, was assigned to the president's National Security Council.

"Colonel North said he agreed, but could not get a consensus — some said it did apply, some said it did not," Singlaub said. They agreed that "The best thing was to assume the worst: that it did apply."

Singlaub said they worked out an arrangement under which he would work with rebel leader Adolfo Calero and keep North informed.

Owen, at one point in his testimony, said North told him that everything he was doing was with the president's knowledge. But he later said he "misspoke" and that North only referred to orders from superiors.

"Colonel North never said anything about the president's knowledge," Owen said.

Tower

and said, "I am a little sorry I brought up the Alamo analogy. It just occurred to me what happened at the Alamo just 10 days after Travis wrote that letter." Texas defenders were wiped out by the Mexicans.

Tower said he regards his weekend vow to quit drinking if he wins confirmation as "sacred ... and I can assure you I will abide by it."

Asked whether he had ever broken his wedding vows, the twice-divorced Tower said, "As a matter of fact, I have broken wedding vows. I think I am probably not alone in that connection."

Tower's second wife, Lilla Burt Cummings, alleged "marital misconduct" in court papers in the couple's divorce case.

There was no letup, meanwhile, in the political storm surrounding the nomination.

Republicans were trying to decide whether to seek a delay in the beginning of the debate on the nomination, which has drawn widespread opposition from Democrats.

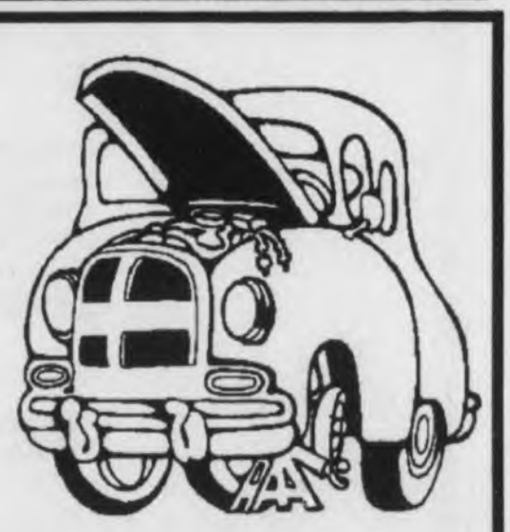
The administration is trying to hold all 45 Republicans and sway five of the Senate's 55 Democrats to get a tie vote that Quayle could break in favor of Tower.

An Associated Press survey of the Senate found 36 Republicans supporting the nomination, 32 Democrats opposed and 29 undecided or undeclared. Two senators were unavailable for comment.

Mitchell, D-Maine, the Democratic leader, announced his opposition to the nomination in a midday speech on the Senate floor, citing Tower's ties to defense consultants and his drinking.

Mitchell said he read the FBI report on Tower and met with Bush at the White House where he expressed his concerns about the nomination.

"It is only after careful study of this record that I have concluded that John Tower is not the man to provide leadership by example to the military and civilian employees of the Department of Defense, especially in the difficult job of reforming the Pentagon's administration and procurement practices in a period of budget stringency," Mitchell said.



Tower lashed out at what he said was the absence of clearly defined standards against which he was being judged.

University sets drug use policy

By Robert Short
Staff Writer

A drug conviction for K-State faculty or staff could result in being fired, when a controlled substance policy goes into effect March 18.

Congress passed the Drug-Free Workplace Act in 1988, requiring all institutions holding and applying for federal grants and contracts to adopt a drug policy.

The policy is part of the University's drug-free awareness program and will be communicated to all employees within the context of the program. Employees affected by the new drug policy include faculty, other unclassified staff, classified staff and student employees.

The drug law violation must have taken place on campus or where federal grants or contracts of $25,000 or more are involved, said Dorothy Thompson, associate University attorney. The University is "required to take appropriate disciplinary action" by the federal government if a drug law is violated, Thompson said.

"We would place the individual in a treatment counseling program," she said. "It is going to be a case-by-case determining of what is appropriate."

According to the policy, "the unlawful manufacture, distribution, dispensing, possession or use of controlled substances is prohibited in the workplace.

"Any employee of the University ... using controlled substances in any part of the University workplace shall be subject to appropriate disciplinary action, up to and including termination," according to the University's drug policy.

Provost James Coffman is to be notified of a conviction for violation of a drug statute no later than five days after the conviction, according to policy guidelines.

"For purposes of this policy, 'conviction' means a finding of guilt (including a plea of no contest) or imposition of sentence, or both, by a judicial body charged with the responsibility to determine violations of the federal or state criminal statutes," according to the drug policy.

A similar policy for students set by the federal government could mean the refusal of federal financial aid.

Athletic fee referendum set

Part-time students' health fee amended

By Nancy Prosser
Staff Writer

For the second time in two years, K-Staters will have the opportunity to vote on a proposed athletic fee.

The referendum has been set for March 27 and 28.

Student Senate approved the legislation 33-13-5 to send the issue to referendum late Thursday night after about three hours of debate.

"This is not a statement on (Senate's) consent or non-consent. It just means we think this is important enough to be voted on by the student body," said Todd Johnson, Senate chairman.

In the referendum, graduate and undergraduate students will not vote as separate bodies.

If one-third of the student body votes, a simple majority will be required to pass the fee. If less than one-third of the body votes, a two-thirds majority of those voting will be required.

Senators raised concerns about whether students are well-informed enough to vote responsibly on the issue.

The question was raised as to whether Senate should act as a representative of its constituants.

"I think that we are a diverse body. We have the power to make decisions for ourselves, the student body does not have the information we do," said David McIntyre, engineering senator.

"We are not elected to spend students' money," said Anja Teasley, arts and sciences senator.

When the bill was first introduced to senators, four friendly admendments were accepted that would not have sent the issue to referendum. Instead, the increase would have been implemented solely on a two-thirds approval by Senate.

"I think it's bogus we told those students that they were going to have a chance to vote on this and now we are changing our minds," said Matt Higgins, engineering senator.

In addition, Senate agreed to add an amendment to the bill that would dictate how the athletic department spends the fee money.

The amendment allocated that 39.8 percent of the money will go to scholarships, 29.3 percent to football recruitment, 9.9 percent to basketball recruitment and travel, 11 percent to academic services and 10 percent to drug testing.

"This amendment will help us control the money that the athletic department will spend," said Todd Giefer, engineering senator.

"At a young age, potential K-Staters are exposed to athletics. It is a very visible window," said Barry Beck, business senator. "It is no secret how KU's enrollment increased after winning the national championship. For every 400 students we recruit, we gain a million dollars in revenue."

Only one polling place, to be located in the Union, will be used for the referendum. Students will be required to have a student I.D. card.

The proposal would require full-time students to pay a $15 per semester fee and part-time students $7.50 per semester.

Students would be guaranteed five benefits: free admission to all non-revenue sport home games, a price cap would be placed on football and basketball tickets for a three-year period, football and men's basketball season tickets would not be combined for a three-year period and students would be guaranteed 6,000 seats in Bramlage Coliseum.

Senate also voted to amend the bill concerning Lafene Health Center to require that part-time students pay a one-time fee of $25 in fiscal 1989, and $30 in fiscal 1990 for full use of the health center.

Under the old bill, the part-time student payed an initial fee and a user-based fee.

"The part-time fee is too much to ask as we passed it last week," said Travis Stumpff, arts and sciences senator. "I think the fee is discriminatory, and we ought to look over it again."

"The first thing that will be cut by lost revenue will be after hours care," said Jill Rathbun, business senator. "That will affect full-time students more than part-time, because full-time students are more likely to use the hospital after hours."

Mike Lynch, assistant vice president for institutional advancement, said $75,000 was budgeted for Lafene from the part-time students' fee.

In other business, Senate voted to allocate $640 to fund the Kansas State Engineer, a magazine of the college of engineering.

"The magazine reflects on the University as a whole, not just the engineering department," McIntyre said.

Senate heard first readings of a bill that would increase dues for the Associated Students of Kansas. A possible ramification, if the increases are not initiated, would be the dropping of K-State's ASK from the state ASK system, said John McIntyre, campus ASK director.

Senate also heard first readings of a bill that would allocate money to men's glee club to attend the Intercollegiate Male Chorus Convention in Los Angeles.

Students detained for prank

By Susan L'Ecuyer
Managing Editor

What began as a college prank may end with several students going before an Association of Residence Hall judicial board.

Thursday night a group of about 30 people invaded Moore Hall and engaged in a pillow attack upon residents of the fifth through ninth floors. The resulting chaos ended with the arrival of the K-State Police.

Jim Sand, director of Moore Hall, said he regards the incident as more than a prank.

"Some of our female staff got grabbed; one person got his glasses broken; some people got shoved around and bruised," Sand said.

He was unable to say if any legal charges will be filed with the campus police.

Several of the invading students were detained by Moore Hall staff, and Sand said he intends to pursue the issue through "judicial channels." If the charges are serious enough, the students may be expelled from the residence halls.

The names of the persons detained were not released.

K-State Police filed an information report on a disturbance at Moore. Police said any charges filed would be investigated.

Marlatt Hall director David Yoder was at a movie at the time of the incident and later said he was unaware it occurred. He said he was aware of entries made earlier by staff the in hall's log book regarding a pillow fight planned for within the hall.

"If they went into Edwards Hall after hours, I could see," Yoder said. "But this, I just don't know. They shouldn't do it."

He said the people, whose names are now entered in the Marlatt Hall log book, "must be brought to justice" before the KSUARH judicial board.

"I don't know what the substance of complaints is going to be," he said. "(The complaints) really have to be initialized by whoever feels they were harmed."

Sand questioned the actions of Collegian staff members who were present at the time. He said it was

Senators debate Tower nomination

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Senators clashed Thursday in a party-line floor battle on John Tower's faltering nomination, while the White House conceded President Bush has failed to persuade a single Democrat to support his chosen defense secretary.

"Not yet," responded White House press secretary Marlin Fitzwater when asked to provide the name of one Democrat the administration had won over after two days of intensive lobbying. Instead, three Democrats joined the ranks of the opponents.

In a session that extended into the early evening, Democrats said the cumulative evidence of excessive drinking and impropriety of Tower's defense ties made him an unacceptable nominee. Republicans said their colleagues have given too much weight to unsubstantiated and unproved allegations, and Bush was entitled to a Cabinet of his choosing.

Sen. Sam Nunn, D-Ga., the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, opened the debate, saying Tower's "record of alcohol abuse cannot be ignored."

"We're not talking about the secretary of interior, we're talking about someone next to the president at the very top of the nuclear chain of command," Nunn said.

In rebuttal for the Republicans, Sen. William Cohen of Maine, described the evidence in the FBI report as so weak, "no prosecutor would even bring a case like this before a court of law."

Later in the debate, Republicans complained about the use of material that appeared in the FBI report and was damaging to Tower. Sen. Pete Wilson, R-Calif., said Tower had been "trashed" by such material when it was leaked to the news media, and said the leakers never mentioned information that cleared Tower and also appeared in the FBI report.

Democrats countered that the Bush administration had characterized the FBI report as contain-

Police fire on rioters; week's unrest claim 200

By The Associated Press

CARACAS, Venezuela — Police opened fire on rock-throwing mobs in Caracas slums Thursday, and President Carlos Andres Perez blamed leftists for continuing Venezuela's worst unrest in 31 years of democratic rule.

Unofficial reports have put the death toll at more than 200 people killed since Monday in riots over price increases. The disturbances have occurred in the capital and at least 11 cities nationwide.

About 100 people ran down hills in western Caracas to shout taunts and throw stones at the police and national guard units. The authorities opened fire, dispersing the protesters.

No report of casualties was given from the clash, which briefly closed two stations of the capital's subway system.

Armored personnel carriers with cannons patrolled the area, and police sharpshooters fired at suspected sniper positions on apartment rooftops. Snipers and authorities had exchanged fire throughout the night, and Perez said an army major was killed in an ambush on the Pan-American Highway.

Media reports have said 1,000 people were injured and at least 4,500 detained in the clashes, and the president said complete figures would be released Friday.

Perez declared martial law and an

Vietnamese return home

HONG KONG — Seventy-five Vietnamese returned by charter jet Thursday to the communist homeland they fled, beginning the first repatriation program for boat people no longer willing to languish in crowded detention centers.

The boat people were among about 11,000 Vietnamese who have sailed into this British colony since it adopted a tough new policy last year that for most of them rules out resettlement.

The 2½-hour flight marked the first large-scale repatriation of boat people, who have sailed by the tens of thousands to seek asylum in non-communist southeast Asia.

Many of the returning 46 men, 19 women and 10 children boarded the U.N.-chartered Boeing 737 jet smiling, waving and shaking hands with local officials. Several wore new clothes; a few carried cassette tape players.

When their plane touched down in Hanoi on Thursday evening, they were met by Vietnamese, British and U.N. officials, Hong Kong radio reported. Relief officials aboard the airplane said there was no tension during the flight, it said.

College fund drive falls short

SALINA — A five-week fund drive to keep Marymount College open fell far short of its goal, but fund-raisers said they might have enough money to keep the Catholic college open one more year.

A total of $988,659 was raised, less than half of the $2 million needed to satisfy the school's $1.2 million debt and pay operating expenses, fund drive organizer Brad Anderson said Wednesday.

Fund-raisers will meet with Bishop George Fitzsimons of the Salina Diocese on today to discuss the college's future, Anderson said.

"We'll be able to offer a plan to the bishop to keep the school open for a year. That is cheaper than closing the school. The bishop is facing a lot of closing costs," said Anderson, an art instructor at the 66-year-old liberal arts college.

In January, Fitzsimons announced that the college, which opened in September 1922, would close June 30, following a recommendation by the college's board of trustees.

A few days after the announcement, the Forever Marymount Fund Drive began an effort to keep open the school of 650 students and 109 faculty and staff members.

Wichita hotel evacuated

WICHITA — Hotel guests were evacuated for about two hours this morning when smoke filled parts of the top 20 floors of the Wichita Plaza Hotel.

Hotel manager Larry Weber said 150 guests were evacuated. They returned to their rooms by 7 a.m. after firefighters put out a small fire in an adjoining storage area off the hotel's parking garage.

Jack Bennett, a battalion fire chief, said the fire started in an area where pictures and paper goods were stored. He said the fire was suspicious in origin.

Bennett said it took firefighters nearly two hours to find the source of the smoke because an air handling unit on the sixth floor of the 26-story building filtered smoke through the top floors.

The small fire was quickly extinguished when it was discovered.

NRA supports gun control bill

TOPEKA — A bill that would allow the Legislature to preempt local control of firearms drew support Thursday from hunters and National Rifle Association representatives.

But opponents of the bill warned lawmakers such a measure would bring back the frontier days, with people being allowed to shop, drink in bars and eat in restaurants with guns strapped to their sides.

The Senate Committee on Federal and State Affairs is considering a bill that would place all regulations over firearms in the hands of the Legislature.

The bill would nullify local municipal ordinances that restrict carrying guns in public and require delays in purchasing guns. But Sen. Ed Reilly, R-Leavenworth, committee chairman, said amendments will be considered later on that would keep some of those restrictions in place.

Train, car collision kills 1

NEODESHA — A Kansas City, Mo., woman was killed and her twin sister injured when their pickup truck collided with a Union Pacific freight train in Neodesha early Thursday, the Kansas Highway Patrol said.

The patrol said Denene J. Fewell, 22, was pronounced dead at the scene. Her twin sister, Denese J., was taken to the Wilson County Hospital in Neodesha where she was listed in stable condition.

The highway patrol said the accident occurred at 12:23 a.m. Thursday at a crossing on U.S. 75 in Neodesha. The patrol said the truck, driven by Denese Fewell, stopped at the first set of railroad tracks, then continued across the second set and was hit in the passenger side by the southbound train.

House to vote on press bill

By Nancy Hill
City Editor

A revised version of House Bill 2234, the student freedom of expression act, is scheduled for vote in the House of Representatives today.

Before moving to the House floor, the bill was approved Wednesday by the House Education Committee after some revision.

If approved, the bill would reinstate freedom of the press for high school students while protecting school officials and school districts from liability for student publications.

The revised version of the bill "allows a certified employee — the teacher or other official — the right to censor material which abuses reponsible journalism, such as libel, obscenity, promotion of illegal activity or materially disruptive expression," said Dave Adams, executive secretary of the Journalism Education Association and director of Student Publications Inc. at K-State.

One of the opponents of the initial bill at Monday's House Education Committee hearing was the Kansas Association of School Boards.

Since the committee's revisions, however, KASB has combined support for the bill with the Kansas Scholastic Press Association, the Journalism Education Association, the Associated Students of Kansas and the Kansas National Education Association, Adams said.

"Our only problem was with how the bill was originally drafted," said Rod Lake, KASB director of communications. "We have never been opposed to First Amendment rights."

"House Bill 2234 strikes a delicate balance in its attempt to protect reasonable freedom of expression for students, as well as protect school employees and boards from liability."

—Dave Adams director, Student Publications Inc.

To support the bill, Lake said the KASB "will follow up (the bill) with our usual lobbying strategy."

"Such support (of the KSPA, KNEA and KASB) indicates that the legislation is in the interest of all parties concerned," said Carol Oukrop, director of the School of Journalism and Mass Communications.

Adams said he was "very excited" to have gained the support of the KASB.

"Teachers, administrators and school boards are a 'team' working together to bring the brightest talents out in our schools," he said.

The bill was submitted in reponse to the 1988 Supreme Court's Hazelwood vs. Kuhlmeier decision, which placed limits on the students' rights to determine what is suitable content for school-sponsored publications.

"The Hazelwood decision could make the teaching of scholastic journalism far less meaningful if students are not given the opportunity to research and write about real problems they are confronted with," Adams said.

Since the 1988 decision, many school administrators have used broad interpretations of the case to censor student viewpoints on sensitive isssues of rape and suicide, or reports criticizing school administation or their policies, he said.

"The Court gave broad power for school officials — government officials — to censor what they want," Adams said. "House Bill 2234 strikes a delicate balance in its attempt to protect reasonable freedom of expression for students, as well as protect school employees and boards from liability."

Oukrop said she believes students should be allowed to report about the "real world."

"If students should learn about the real world, House Bill 2234 should be passed and students should be allowed to publish items about sensitive issues that concern them — abortion, perhaps, or AIDS, or decisions made by the high school administration," she said. "That's the students' real world."

Candidate speaks on role of research

By Todd Jenkins
Collegian Reporter

Research sets universities apart from other types of educational institutions and provides undergraduate students with unique resources from which to draw, said Charles Lochmuller, candidate for the posts of vice provost and dean of the graduate school.

At an open forum Thursday, Lochmuller, who is a professor of chemistry at Duke University, discussed approaches that are important to running the vice provost's office.

"It's my perspective on graduate education and on the role of the vice provost and dean of the graduate school that research is the life blood of the University and it is what distinguishes it from a college or vocational school," he said.

"It really benefits the undergraduate classroom experiences," Lochmuller said. "A student has a right to a community of scholars. I think there is more to graduate research than what can specifically be called sponsored research."

However, he said, sponsored research funding is not a substitute for institutional support.

"The institutions are the most successful in the gathering of sponsored research to make substantial contributions to their own resources — to fostering the necessary foundation for successfull collection of external funds it is a direct return," Lochmuller said.

Lochmuller said he applied for the position because, "I heard that it was a function that had not existed before. I have a personal belief that no organization can be completely changed.

"I believe that it is possible to superimpose on an established culture mechanisms that make them better in the future. Intellectually, it is a challenge to think about that and do it — of some organizational changes in hopes that they will be ready for the 21st century."

"A student has a right to a community of scholars."

—Charles Lochmuller vice provost candidate

Lochmuller is the second of six finalists for the position to visit the K-State campus. During the visits, each of the candidates deliver prepared remarks on "The Role of Sponsored Research and Graduate Studies in Higher Education."

The vice provost position is new and will be responsible for coordination in developing the University's research policy and activities, said Elizabeth Unger, professor in computer and information science and head of the 13-member search committee.

The person who fills the position will be responsible for administering sponsored research.

Company to present 'La Traviata'

By Paige Gantz
Collegian Reporter

Tonight the Little Apple will get a taste of night life from the Big Apple.

The New York City Opera National Company will be performing Giuseppe Verdi's opera "La Traviata" at 8 p.m. in McCain Auditorium.

"La Traviata" is based on a novel by Alexandre Dumas, said Richard Martin, director of McCain Auditorium.

"It is an interesting and unusual story of Violetta Valery, an attractive woman who leads a life which is not socially acceptable," Martin said. "Valery falls in love with a young minor nobleman and leaves her life to flee to the country with him."

The happiness is short-lived, however, when her lover's father pays a surprise visit, Martin said. The father says her affair with his son has caused scandal to his family and has also harmed his daughter's chances for a good marriage. Valery then leaves her lover and as time passes, she finds herself "suffering from consumption," Martin said.

At the end of the opera, Valery's lover learns the truth of her leaving and makes it to her bedside just before she dies.

"This is a very splashy opera," Martin said. "It's absolutely delightful. Singing and catchy tunes will be instantly recognizable."

In addition to the singing, grand sets and costumes add to the opera's appeal, he said.

"People used to be afraid of operas, but when they are understandable, they're just as interesting as musical theater," he said.

Beverly Sills, general director of the New York City Opera National Company founded the company in 1979, has been using "supertitles" at all performances since 1985.

"Supertitles, imprinted on individual slides, are projected above the stage onto a screen," Martin said. "They are an English translation since the singing will be in Italian."

Martin said that although he would like to bring shows such as "La Traviata" to McCain more than one night, it would not be financially feasible.

The New York City National Company made its first appearance at K-State in 1983, he said.

"Tickets in the orchestra section along with the lower balcony have sold out," said Jody Kolderup, undecided freshman and a worker in the box office at McCain. "The only seats available are in the upper balcony."

Tickets are on sale for $18 for the general public, $15 for senior citizens, and $5 for students.

Athletic fee part of overall game plan

In a few weeks, K-Staters will have the opportunity to vote on a proposal which would institute a fee to support intercollegiate athletics. While it's usually kind of tough to get excited about supporting a fee, this is one of those cases where the potential benefits far outweigh a minor dent in the ol' pocketbook.

The athletic fee must be looked upon as an investment. Much of the talk about the fee has centered around that infamous question of the '80s, "What's in it for me?"

Many students have asked for free football tickets, price caps, etc. Well, that stuff is all fine and good, but it's just not the point. If those kinds of immediate "bonuses" are all the fee will produce, then it accomplishes little.

The real benefits of an athletic fee will be realized by the University and student body as a whole, not by individuals. Like it or not, universities gain most of their exposure via their sports teams. The media devote up to one-third of their time and space to sports coverage.

Intercollegiate athletics are the most visible function of the University. At K-State, we've made a few good impressions and a lot of bad ones. So what, you say? Nobody really chooses a college because of their success in sports.

Maybe not consciously. But have you been back home lately? Were any little kids wearing college T-shirts?

I know I saw enough University of Kansas national championship shirts this summer to make me violently ill. No, when these kids are seniors in high school, they won't say "Yes, I'm going to KU because they have a great basketball team." But many will find themselves saying, "You know, I've always wanted to go to KU."

While K-State excels in many academic disciplines, in a lot of areas we have yet to distinguish ourselves from KU, Wichita State University or even the regional schools. When a high school student is interested in one of these undistinguished areas or is undecided on a major, then other factors such as atmosphere and image begin to play a major role in the decision.

Here is where athletics fit in. They should be a part of our overall program to make K-State a more appealing university to attend.

Success in athletics reaps other rewards as well. Other schools have noted marked increases in alumni donations following a bowl or Final Four win. Maybe that sounds silly to you, but when people feel good about their school, they feel a lot better about giving money to it. For many, big wins make life around graduates of area schools a lot more tolerable.

Commentary

Collegian Columnist

One of the best things about this proposal is that athletics are not just relying on students' money for some kind of "bail out." Rather, the student fee would be part of a broader long-range plan for the future of K-State athletics, which is somewhat of a new concept for the athletic department. Students are not being expected to shoulder any big burden, but instead are being asked to be part of a team that will also include alumni, administrators and the community.

Thanks to administrators with real visions of the attainable future, the athletic department has finally put together something one might think would have been natural for the athletic-minded ... a game plan. It's a plan that's realistic, yet one that works toward getting a high rate of return from our investment, not just getting back what we put in.

Of course, some students have the impression the athletic department is coming to us for "more" money; after all, we bought them a new coliseum, didn't we?

Wrong. That coliseum belongs to us and to the University. It is run by its own director, who answers only to upper University administration. The athletic department is very aware that they are only tenants in Bramlage Coliseum — and rent paying tenants at that.

The coliseum project was the brainchild of K-State students, then later involved Fred Bramlage and the Foundation. It was never something athletics requested from the students.

Now let's make it clear that I don't believe this is the University's highest priority. Much higher on my list are building renovations and replacements, the library, equipment needs and faculty salaries. But students can't, and shouldn't, do anything directly about those needs.

All of those deficiencies are in areas funded by the state. Each is annually budgeted an amount of money by the state. For example, if students were to institute a library fee, the Legislature would simply see the fee as an additional source of income, then would deduct that amount from the budget. Not only would the library not gain a cent, but the funding burden would be shifted to the students.

A concrete example of this can be seen in Lafene Student Health Center. Every other health center in the regent's system receives some portion of its funding from the state. Lafene has always been supported totally through student funding.

You will note that the state didn't exactly rush to supplement this funding in recent years when Lafene has desperately needed it.

Athletics, however, are not funded by the state (as they are in Iowa, for example). The athletic department relies solely on donations and its own income for its operation. It may sound a little corny, but athletics give quite a bit to a university, while taking very little.

So take this opportunity to recognize the real benefits intercollegiate athletics afford our university, and the potential that exists to vastly improve their effectiveness.

Take advantage of this chance to play a decisive role in K-State's future and vote in the upcoming referendum.

And when you vote, vote "yes."

Neglected Lady Cats need tournament fans

Some things at K-State just don't get the attention they deserve.

Case in point, the Lady Cats.

Playing before continuously sparse crowds in Bramlage Coliseum, the Lady Cats have nevertheless represented K-State with pride; it's time students show them some support.

Tied for third in the Big Eight, the Lady Cats will travel to Salina this weekend to play in the Big Eight conference tournament. Coming off a losing season last year, Matilda Mossman's squad has turned things around, with an impressive 17-8 record this season.

This is the kind of effort that should inspire crowds and create excitement during the games. Just because the game is being played by women instead of men, doesn't mean the intensity level and entertainment value will be less than at any other 'Cats game.

The Big Eight Tournament will be little more than an hour away — closer than any Big Eight school — at Salina's Bicentennial Center Saturday, Sunday and Monday.

You probably won't see any slam dunks and Dick Vitale won't be on hand, but the Lady Cats should have their share of purple-clad fans cheering them to victory.

Pillow fight turns sour; pranksters go too far

Panty raids, painting the Beta rock and pillow fights. All are college pranks — pranks that start out as a gesture of fun and may end out of control.

They may be small things, but their impact is lasting. And what happened Thursday night is going to have lasting effects.

It's in cases like this that common sense is overridden and a group mentality takes over. Lighthearted fun is replaced with carelessness at the expense of others.

But what clouds this issue is an anonymous tip to the media. Most tips are followed up, some are tossed aside and others don't pan out. What was told to the Collegian staff was that a friendly pillow fight between the members of two residence halls would occur.

A second problem had to be faced — housing officials stated that pillow fights were not condoned by housing. But because the tip was not verified, notifying authorities seemed unnecessary.

A photographer and reporter were sent to Marlatt Hall to verify the tip under the assumption that all of the parties involved were willing participants.

Not until the two staffers followed the group into Moore Hall did they realized the Moore residents were not voluntarily involved.

The pranksters went too far, and perhaps actions by the Collegian staff didn't go far enough. The event was originally thought to have been done in fun and was covered accordingly by the Collegian staff. The importance or ramifications of the situation were not fully realized until too late.

Book causes false controversy

Manjur Karim's article on the controversy concerning Salman Rushdie's book, "The Satanic Verses," was long overdue and I thank him for starting the debate on the important issues of free speech for intellectuals of Islamic background. The article gave some political and ideological explanations for the recent upheavals that occurred in a couple of countries in the Middle East.

These upheavals appear on the surface to be the result of rage and discontent concerning the characterization of some major characters in Rushdie's book who are believed to be central figures in the Koran.

Unfortunately, the recent upheavals go beyond the book's content and author's purpose. In fact, the incidents show the inability of some powerful political figures and their followers to come to grips with western intellectual thought.

One has to wonder what such slogans as "Down with America," and "Salman Zionist," as well as the attack on the American Cultural Center have to do with Rushdie's book.

"The Satanic Verses" is just a fictional piece of literature whose style, according to some literary critics, is apparently hard to grasp by the ordinary public.

Rushdie is not the only, nor the first author to be branded as an outcast and heretic by the Islamic fundamentalists. But the most alarming aspect of this incident is for a national leader, or anyone else, to put a ransom on an author's head for a novel that transcends the usual dualism between good and evil in literary fiction.

Many serious sociological studies based on facts and documents have been published in the West which were critical of the Islamic principle of equality and social justice. Fatima Mernissi's "Beyond the Veil," is one of those case studies that methodologically documents the place of women in Islamic societies starting with an elaborate histography of the Prophet Mohammed's polygamous relationships.

Editor's note: Ismail Said is a graduate student in sociology.

In addition, the books on women by the psychiatrist and writer, Nawal Es-Saadaoui such as "God Dies by the Nile" and "The Hidden Faces of Eve," to name only a few, resulted in her brief incarceration after holding the position of Minister of Public Health in the Egyptian government for many years.

Even Naguib Mahfouz, the literary Nobel prize winner in 1988, could not escape intimidation and censorship for his 1959 book, "The Children of Gebelawi." It is an allegory of human life from Genesis to modern times that ultimately ends with a vision of a man searching in rubbish dumps for clues to his salvation.

His more recent novels discuss the problems of prostitution, corruption and deterioration of families, which are considered taboo subjects in Islamic societies.

Persecution of intellectual novelists and writers is common everywhere. However, writers from Moslem backgrounds face a double danger in that they have to conform with the undefined laws of decency in Islam, and avoid being too critical of the social-political atmosphere found in their country of origin.

The dilemma with Rushdie's book is that it produced a reaction that hasn't been encountered anywhere else. The behavior of some instigators is not even worthy of Islamic principles.

The book burning in Bradford, England early in January by a mob of Moslem fundementalists is an outrage in the eyes of a civilized society. A peaceful march would have sufficed to send the message.

What does a tolerant and peaceful faith such as Islam have to say about activities such as taking innocent people hostage, bombing civilian airliners, massively executing political opponents or using chemical weapons on the Kurdish Moslem population? How about the shameful 1987 Mecca incidents, the 1982 systematic massacre of 10,000 civilians in the Syrian city of Hama, or the 1980 slaughter of 500 inmates and members of the Moslem Brotherhood Group in the Syrian prison of Palmyra with the victims' voices echoing "Allah is great," through the prison cell walls?

How can these deeds go unnoticed and unchallenged? The Moslem communities in England and elsewhere in the West would have been more credible on Rushdie's affair if they had voiced their shame regarding at least one of these atrocities.

Obviously, the controversy surrounding "The Satanic Verses," is a false problem. It seems the whole issue was a pretext to advance the usual anti-Western rhetoric and prove once again the unwillingness of some individuals to come to terms with Western intellectual thought and literature.

Greeks take part in exchange

By Britt Owen
Collegian Reporter

Some members of fraternies and sororities packed their bags — clothes, bedding and bits of personal belongings — for a two-week trip. No, it is neither a casual trip to the Bahamas nor a formal Greek retreat in the Colorado Rockies, but a short-distance trip just across Manhattan.

Every spring, fraternities and sororities participate in a member exchange for two weeks to promote interaction between houses and to exchange ideas, projects and programs, said Barb Robel, Greek Affairs adviser.

Panhellenic Council encourages the visiting live-ins "to become a part of the new house as much as possible," Robel said.

Eleven sororities are participating in the Rotating Roommate Program sponsored by Panhellenic, which began Feb. 26 and will conclude today, Robel said. Alpha Delta Pi is not participating in the exchange this year because it is on probation.

After the sororities select their exchange representatives, Panhellenic randomly pairs the individuals with different houses, Robel said.

Sally Meadows, member of Kappa Kappa Gamma sorority and junior in interior design, is a rotating roommate at Alpha Chi Omega sorority.

"I think this is one of the best experiences I have had," Meadows said.

The program helps all participants expand their friendships, experience the different personalities of each house and receive new ideas, she said.

"We try to let everyone know in our house who will be staying with us and make the roommates feel at home as much as possible," said Jenny Reschke, president of Kappa Alpha Theta sorority and junior in journalism and mass communications.

Gayla Schlaegal, member of Kappa Delta sorority and sophomore in social work, is staying at the Theta house. She said the exchange is a fun experience, but she had some inconveniences.

At the Theta house, she has difficulty adjusting to the atmosphere with four roommates sleeping, studying and getting ready in the same room.

Schlaegal said that at KD, sleeping in dorms that are separated from the three-person rooms is more convenient for her because she can be noisy anytime in her room.

While at the Theta house, Schlaegal has had the opportunity to participate in exercise workouts, yogurt runs and breakfast kidnapping.

Elise Williams, member of Alpha Gamma Delta sorority and senior in elementary education, is staying at the Sigma Sigma Sigma sorority. Williams said some of the hassles she has experienced include adjusting to new roommates' schedules and different meal times.

"We try to let everyone know in our house who will be staying with us and make the roommates feel at home as much as possible."

—Jenny Reschke president, Kappa Alpha Theta

The Tri Sigs decorated her door when she arrived, made signs, and gave her notes, candy and balloons.

She has gained new ideas to share with members of her sorority. Unlike the AGDs, Tri Sig has noteboards for its pledges and members are assigned to answer the phone on the weekends.

In correlation with the Rotating Roommate Program, Interfraternity Council sponsored a Brother Exchange for the fraternities. Joe Gittemeier, Greek ambassador and sophomore in business administration, said 56 men from 20 fraternities are participating.

Delta Upsilon, Phi Kappa Tau and Pi Kappa Phi did not participate. Beta Theta Pi was unable to participate because of its probation for hazing violations.

Men participating in the exchange chose the fraternity they wanted to visit for two weeks.

"The more people participate, the bigger the program will be," Gittemeier said. In past years, "people had to be practically dragged into the exchange" program because of complications with mail delivery, phone messages and moving into the neighboring houses, but more men are participating this year.

Silas Ashmore, member of FarmHouse fraternity and freshman in pre-veterinary medicine, said he chose to live in the Theta Xi house because it was first in grades last semester and he believed Theta Xi had similar principles as FarmHouse.

"Everybody has made a great effort to come up to me and make me aware of who they are," Ashmore said.

Although the differences between the two fraternities were subtle, he said members of Theta Xi were responsible for waking themselves in the morning, whereas members of FarmHouse wake up and eat breakfast together in the mornings.

James Troub, member of Phi Kappa Theta and sophomore in hotel and restaurant management, is staying at the Tau Kappa Epsilon fraternity.

"I'm getting a better knowledge of how each house is set up," Troub said, adding that he attended TKE parties and has gotten to know more of the house's members.

Scott Taggart, member of Alpha Tau Omega and junior in agricultural economics, is staying at the Sigma Chi fraternity.

Taggart said he has been invited to all the members' activities, including trips to Aggieville, parties and intramural basketball games.

His one negative experience was sleeping in the dorms. Taggart said he wasn't accustomed to sleeping in a room which is the same temperature as the outdoors.

Benefit dance set tonight at Wareham

By The Collegian Staff

K-State students will be dancing tonight and part of Saturday away during a dance-a-thon at the Wareham Opera House to raise money for Muscular Dystrophy.

The dance, which begins at 7 p.m. and continues until 1 p.m. Saturday, is sponsored by Moore Hall and the Association of Residence Halls.

"We're not sure of how large a turnout we will have this year. This will be the first year for such an event," said Kenny Martin, ARH representative.

Carolyn Bridwell, president of Moore Hall's seventh floor, said the biggest problem has been generating publicity for the event.

"It's been really hard work, but no matter how much money is made it will still be a success," Bridwell said. "This will only be the beginning of an event to become bigger and better."

KQLA-FM will handle the music for the dance, and free food and non-alcoholic drinks will be provided to the dance participants, Martin said. Door prizes will be given away every hour.

"For the past month and a half, I have been going to businesses every day for donations of food and door prizes," Martin said. "Businesses were very responsive in donating. About 75 percent that were contacted donated."

Students have responded to the idea of the dance very positively, but getting pledges was hard work, Martin said. Students have found sponsors to donate money for each hour danced, Martin said.

Characteristics of college student changing

Non-traditional trend growing

By The Collegian Staff

The typical college student can no longer be described in a neat, concise statement. Individuals attending universities have diversified characteristics.

Michael Dannells, assistant professor of counselor education and educational psychology, said it has become extremely difficult to characterize a college student.

"The public image of a college student has dramatically changed over the past 20 years," Dannells said.

The number of full- and part-time students in their 30s and 40s has increased, he said.

Sue Maes, director of planning and resource development and a K-State student during the '60s, said the non-traditional student has a definite career plan, unlike some of the students in the '60s or present traditional students who haven't experienced other careers or raising a family.

In addition, more than one-third of freshmen are beginning their education at a community college, which is not included in the conventional image of a college student, Dannells said.

"K-State is a comprehensive university, meaning the University offers a wide range of studies, which makes it even more difficult to make a generalization of the typical college student," he said.

Trends of incoming students have been measured during the past five years. Dannells said students have become more interested in obtaining a degree that is preparational, such as a curriculum in business or engineering.

"The expectations to continue education beyond a bachelor's degree have increased in hopes to achieve the good life," he said.

In observing the incoming students, the key point of the research is measuring the change and impact of education on the students, Dannells said.

"The more involved a student is in school, the more change will occur in a student," he said.

Students become more open-minded, Dannells said. Some students may gain an interest for the arts, while others may experiment with drinking and drugs — more than individuals who do not attend college, Dannells said.

"It has been proven that the impact of college has some long lasting effects on students," Dannells said. "A person who has attended college reads more, votes more, has a higher income and tends to be a better leader."

Fred Newton, director of University Counseling Services, completed a projective testing study on students five years ago.

Newton randomly selected 100 students, interviewing 50 women and 50 men of which 50 percent were juniors and seniors and 50 percent were freshmen and sophomores.

During the testing, students' viewed pictures and wrote stories incorporating their views of the pictures, he said.

From the interpretations of the projective testing, the need for a relationship and the pressure to succeed were two important characteristics of college students, Newton said.

His study projected three psychological motivations in students — power, affiliation and achievement.

The desire for power was evenly measured among men and women, the need for affiliation was higher among women, and the need for achievement was higher among men, Newton said.

"This is the age of survival on an economic level, compared to the late '60s when people were into issues," he said.

The political activity on campus is minimal, unless the issue involves money, he said.

"If an issue doesn't affect the individual, they won't get involved," Newton said.

Some students are in their own comfortable little world and are not involved with world issues, compared with students in the '60s, said Jill Sinderson, a non-traditional student and senior in journalism and mass communications.

Introducing The Commodore® Amiga® 2000.

With the Amiga 2000 you can easily create professional-quality, attention getting videos.

By taking advantage of "Hollywood" effects like 3-D animation in up to 4096 colors, high-resolution titling, wipes and fades your videos will become epic productions.

You can also superimpose effects like Amiga-generated graphics over any existing video image. In fact, you can even use its frame grabbing feature to digitally freeze and paint any frame of video footage.

Now for the good news, the Amiga 2000 desktop video system is available at very un-Hollywood prices. Just contact your Amiga dealer and he'll show you how you can get professional results without making a production out of it.

Lunchbag Theatre

Students prepare behind the scenes

He has just been told by Alice Miller, professor of speech, that all the black instructors have been cut because of budget problems. He moves toward her.

"Cut?" he yells. "I'm going to cut you up, lady."

Jefferson, a tall black man, throws a chair out of his way and pins the white instructor against her desk. He pulls books and folders off her desk and continues to yell at her.

Miller crawls onto her desk trying to escape.

Jefferson draws back his fist.

She winces.

From a few feet away, Dorinda Hill, senior in speech education, softly says, "Excellent. Now didn't that feel better?"

Suddenly Alice and Calvin are not Alice and Calvin anymore. They are Maria Santucci, freshman in theater, and Anthony Pauldin, senior in social science, and they had just rerun a scene during play practice for the Lunchbag Theatre production "Open Admissions."

This time, the two had incorporated the changes suggested by Hill, stage manager for the production, and she wanted to know how it felt.

Santucci let out a nervous laugh.

"Yeah, it felt better," she said. "It scared the hell out of me."

In minutes they reset the stage and started back at the beginning of the play for another run through.

One-act plays are performed in the Purple Masque Theatre each week as part of Lunchbag Theatre, directed by and starring K-State students. Thursday's performance of "Open Admissions" was directed by Nancy Zenger, senior in theater. The play deals with the subject of illiterate students being passed through classes by uncaring teachers.

On the day of the performance, Zenger, Santucci and Pauldin spent about an hour in the Purple Masque dressing room warming up and getting into character.

The dressing room is narrow and lined with mirrors, sinks and bare light bulbs, not unlike dressing rooms often seen in movies.

First the actors changed into their costumes to begin the slow metamorphosis from K-State actors to a speech instructor and her troubled student.

While changing clothes, Santucci lapsed into an imitation of Ethel Merman singing "There's No Business Like Show Business." She emerged from the dressing area with her shoes hanging from her ears.

"Look," she said to Zenger with a laugh. "I'm Lady Dumbo."

Zenger smiled. "I'm going to cast you in my next play with shoes plastered to your ears," he said.

"It's how I wear them at home," Santucci said.

Next the actors went through several vocal exercises, first as Santucci and Pauldin, then as Calvin and Alice. Santucci spoke in a deeper, clearer voice to become a 33-year-old speech teacher, and Pauldin's clear intonation became black urban dialect.

Santucci sat before a mirror pulling a curling iron through her curly brown hair, while on the other side of the room Zenger helped Pauldin with his makeup.

"Can you help me with my hair?" Santucci asked Zenger.

"Yes," the director said. "But I'm doing his nose first."

"That's going to take a while," Santucci said.

"Watch it with the nose jokes," Pauldin said with a menacing look.

Nancy Zenger's mother, Dorothy, a gray-haired lady in a black polyester suit, came in carrying flowers in one hand and a camera in the other.

"I'll leave when you want me to," Dorothy Zenger said. "I just thought maybe I could take some pictures."

She put the flowers down and pulled her camera out of its case.

"Oh, Mom," Nancy Zenger said, rolling her eyes. "No more pictures."

After completing makeup and hair work, Nancy Zenger directed the actors as they practiced several dramatic moments from the play. At the end of one, they pulled together in what Nancy Zenger called a "company hug." At Dorothy Zenger's urging, they emerged from it in smiles and her camera's flash bulb fired.

Nancy Zenger said, "Mom, you've already got one like that."

"I don't care, I want another one," her mother said, before slipping out of the dressing room to find her seat in the theater.

As part of the Lunchbag program, most of the backstage duties, such as set construction and makeup work, fall to the director, but lighting is handled by members of the Principles of Stage Lighting class.

A few minutes before the performance, Jim Butler, sophomore in business administration and light designer for the play, checked with Nancy Zenger to discuss the length of the curtain call.

Before leaving the dressing room, Santucci made one last check in the mirror.

"Oh, my God," she said, looking at her newly conservatively styled hair and dowdy blouse. "I look like an Alice."

Show allows businesses to demonstrate services

By The Collegian Staff

Manhattan's first Little Apple Business Show sponsored by the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce opens tonight at 5:30 in Bramlage Coliseum for a sneak preview of booth entries.

The show officially opens at 10 a.m. on Saturday and noon on Sunday. The show will close at 5 p.m. on both days.

The business show is the first of its kind for Manhattan, providing businesses an opportunity to demonstrate their goods and services, said Dennis Cook, sales manager for Campbell Distributors Inc. and chairman of the trade show committee.

"This is the only real opportunity in Manhattan to showcase businesses to residents," Cook said. "This is the big event."

Show organizers have scheduled about 80 business and more than 100 exhibits for the three-day show, said Todd Loescher, director of administration and membership for the Chamber of Commerce. About 3,000 people are expected to attend.

"We expect a good turnout," Loescher said.

Monies collected from admissions and the booth registration fees will go toward paying for rent of the facility, tables and set-up, said Scott Sewell, director of public affairs for the chamber.

Some people were unable to get a booth because of the interest shown by so many local merchants and businesses, he said.

"We are about as full as we can get on this layout," Sewell said. "A business had to be a member of the Chamber of Commerce to get a booth. This helps the business and the chamber."

Participants paid $125 or $150 to reserve a booth for an exhibit. Some businesses reserved more than one booth to set up their exhibits.

A grand prize drawing of two airplane tickets to anywhere in the United States is being offered by International Tours, Cook said. The drawing will be conducted as a raffle using the ticket stubs toward the end of the trade show.

Most of the booths will be holding drawings throughout the show for those attending, Cook said. Door prizes will be given away hourly.

UPC to tape students' songs

By Paige Gantz
Collegian Reporter

People wanting to be the lead vocalist in one of their favorite songs can do exactly that from 8 p.m. to midnight today in the Union Catskeller.

The Union Program Council Eclectic Entertainment Committee is sponsoring Songsation, from St. Louis, Mo., said Monte Stull, committee chairman and senior in marketing.

Songsation will give people a chance to sing their favorite songs, Stull said.

"You get a list that has every available song," he said. "You check off the song you want to perform along with, the lyrics are handed to you and you simply sing along with the tape."

Each person's performance is recorded on cassette.

"The cost of doing each tape is $1 and as long as you pay, you can do it as many times as you want," he said. "The tape is yours to keep."

Stull said the committee has had a video set on the main floor of the Union to show people exactly what Songsation is.

"A different company has done this before at K-State," he said. "It's becoming very popular, especially in bars on the East coast."

Stull said the committee formulated the idea after attending the National Activities Campus Association conference in Denver last semester.

"The conference is full of ideas to use at universities," he said.

In addition to Songsation, The Twisters will perform rock'n'roll and rhythm and blues music.

"This band performed at the Opus Band Competition last year here at K-State and tied for second," Stull said. "We're not sure how many sets Twisters will play, but during their breaks we plan to concentrate on Songsation."

The committee is hoping for an attendance of at least 200.

Lady Cats open tourney with 'Huskers

By Mike Rouse
Collegian Reporter

Saturday will be the start of a new season for the K-State women's basketball team when the Lady Cats take on Nebraska in the first round of the Big Eight Tournament in Salina. Tipoff is scheduled for 8 p.m. in the Bicentennial Center.

"I think both teams are playing with the knowledge that this might be their last game and both teams are going to come out and play extremely hard and give it all they got," K-State coach Matilda Mossman said.

The Lady Cats enter post-season play with a final regular season record of 17-10 overall and 7-7 in Big Eight play. K-State's conference record was good enough for a third-place tie with Missouri.

Saturday's meeting will mark the third time that the two teams have squared off this season. The teams split their home-and-home series during the regular season. K-State won 83-80 on Jan. 21, at Bramlage Coliseum, while Nebraska won 68-56 on Feb. 11 in Lincoln.

"The only difference is we know a little more about them and by the same token they know a little more about us," Mossman said. "The fact we split during the regular season doesn't give anyone an advantage or disadvantage."

Mossman believes that her team must win the tournament this weekend to go on to the NCAA tournament. The last time the Lady Cats went to the NCAA tournament was during the 1986-87 season.

"I don't think we have much of a chance at an at-large bid with 10 losses, plus we would lose another in the tournament and there won't be any at-large teams with 11 losses," Mossman said.

One key factor the Lady Cats must concentrate on is containing Nebraska guard Amy Stephens. Stephens is averaging 22 points a game and she scored 34 in Nebraska's win against the Lady Cats.

"We have to contain Amy Stephens. She is capable of putting very big numbers on the boards and stimulates the rest of the team by her ability to score," Mossman said.

The Lady Cats are leading the conference in offense, averaging more than 77 points a game. Mossman believes her team must do the same thing this weekend.

"We need to be patient in our offense," she said. "We need to get a shot every time down the floor and at the same time we need to be patient within our half-court offense."

Nadira Hazim and Diana Miller have been the top scorers for the Lady Cats this season. The two are averaging 14.4 and 13.3 points a game respectively. Kristie Bahner is averaging 11.2 points and leads the team in rebounds with almost seven a game.

Besides Stephens, Nebraska will also look to Kim Harris for scoring output. Harris is averaging 13 points a game and leads the team rebounding with seven.

The winner of this game will play the winner of the Oklahoma State vs. Kansas game at 4 p.m. on Sunday.

'Cats to face Cyclones

By Tom Morris
Sports Writer

Oh, how quickly things can change in the wild and wooly Big Eight Conference.

The last time Iowa State and K-State met, the Wildcats were watching a possible NCAA berth slip out of their grasp while the Cyclones looked to be fortunate if they reached the NIT.

Now with a 3:10 p.m. tipoff Saturday against K-State at James H. Hilton Coliseum in Ames, Iowa, ISU coach Johnny Orr has an aching case of NCAA postseason fever.

"This is definitely the game we need," Orr said. "We're going into the Big Eight tournament with a great feeling, but we need this win. If we beat Kansas State Saturday, I don't think we'll have to win in the tournament to make it into the NCAA's."

Iowa State, 15-10 overall and 6-7 in the Big Eight Conference, was the only league team to win on the road Wednesday night with a 83-68 win against Colorado in Boulder. Orr promised that Saturday would be "a hell of a game."

"(Kansas State) has two of the greatest guards in the league in Steve Henson and LaKeith Humphrey. In addition, they're one of the toughest teams on the road," he said.

The Wildcats, 8-5 and 18-8, have won seven of their last eight games and have probably assured themselves of an NCAA appearance with a 76-75 win over Missouri Wednesday.

But how have the 'Cats accomplished this feat? With mirrors and magic? Some have accused K-State of slowing the offense to a crawl.

Coach Lon Kruger disagreed.

But then again, the 'Cats aren't running laps around the opposition.

Kruger agreed.

"We're averaging almost 80 points a game. I look around the country and see 52s and 53s all the time. Our conference is so up-tempo. We don't go quite as fast as Oklahoma and Missouri, but we just don't walk it up the court," Kruger said.

"I don't see any reason to go to Oklahoma, try to score 100 points and get beat by 30. Against some people you feel confident in the running game, and against some teams you don't," he added.

One of those teams has to be Iowa State, because K-State topped the century mark for the only time this season with a 104-89 win Feb. 10 in Bramlage Coliseum.

But teams can forget previous encounters when they go on the road in this conference. For example, first-place Oklahoma is the only Big Eight team to win at Ames this season.

Probable Starters

Baseball squad downs Missouri Baptist, 11-5

By Scott Pasko
Collegian Reporter

K-State's batters took seven innings to thaw out in the cold weather at Frank Myers Field, but then erupted for eight runs in their final two at-bats to post a come-from-behind 11-5 win against NAIA opponent Missouri Baptist Thursday.

The Wildcats were held in check by Spartan starter Jim Schlecht for six innings. After yielding a pair of first inning runs, Schlecht retired the next eight batters and held the Wildcats hitless from the second through sixth innings. Schlecht allowed just two hits against the 'Cats, who averaged 14 hits in two games with St. Louis last weekend.

Wildcat starter David Hierholzer also pitched well despite the sub-40 degree weather. The junior hurler gave up four runs through seven innings, struck out four and walked just one in recording his first win of the year.

"David looked real good," K-State coach Mike Clark said. "I probably went with him an inning too long, but he was throwing strikes. That's what we've got to have from him."

The turning point came in the bottom of the seventh when Schlecht was replaced by Spartan reliever Mark Benthall. Trailing 4-3, the Wildcats sent 10 batters to the plate, tallying five runs on four hits.

Shortstop Craig Wilson was hit by a pitch to open the inning. Sean Collins and Jeff Troll recorded back-to-back singles, scoring Wilson to tie the game at 4-4. Russ Ringgenberg then singled home Collins to give K-State the lead for good. The 'Cats picked up three more runs on a fielding error and a two-out single by Brad Rippelmeyer.

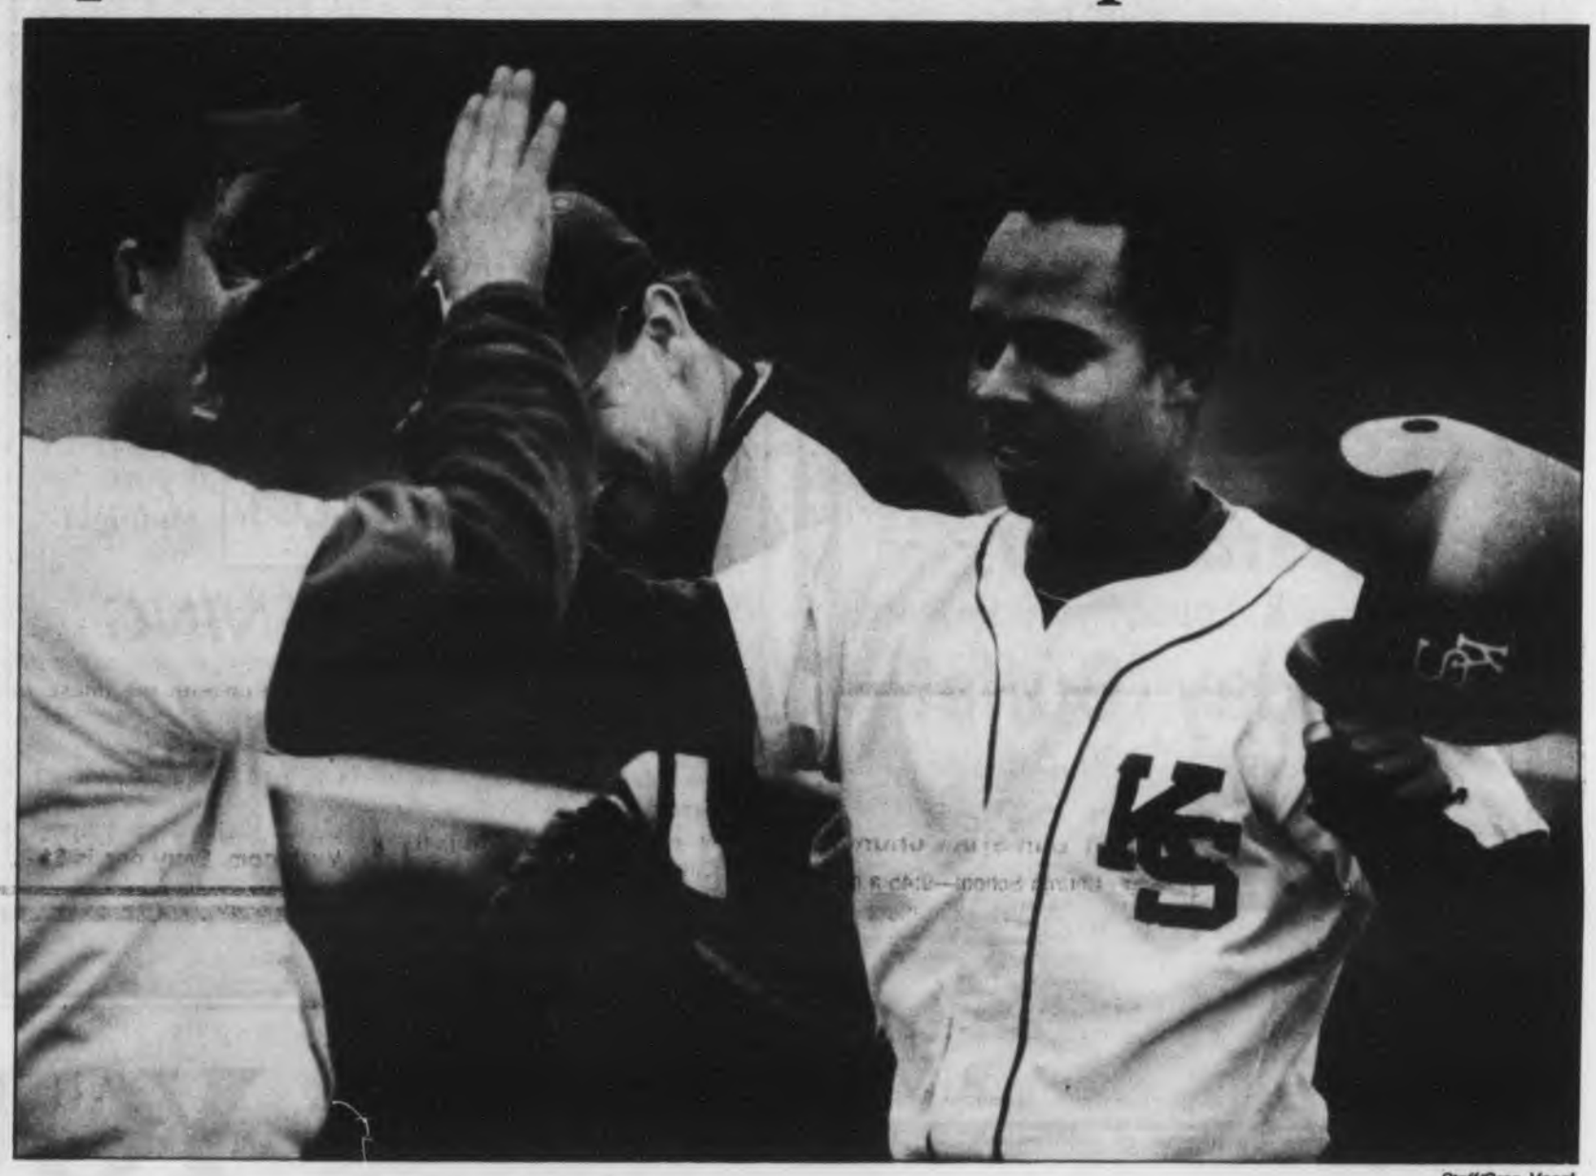
K-State tallied three insurance runs on four hits in the bottom of the eighth and got two innings of relief pitching from junior college transfer Mike Hedrick to remain undefeated on the year.

Collins, Troll and Kevin Kaufman paced a 10-hit attack with two hits apiece. Rippelmeyer and David Amaro, whose opposite field triple in the eighth concluded the scoring, each drove in a pair of runs.

Clark gave credit to Schlecht for K-State's early hitting problems.

"Their pitcher was doing a good job of mixing his pitches," Clark said. "He was throwing strikes and getting ahead of us. I thought the key for us was being a little more patient at the plate.

"It was a tough day to play. The kids worked hard for two hours getting the field in playable condition. It's difficult when you have to concentrate on one thing and then turn around and concentrate on something as difficult as hitting."



K-State, 3-0, is scheduled to play Wayne State, an NCAA Division II school, in a single nine-inning game today at Frank Myers Field. Clark said senior Jeff Peterson will get the starting nod for the 2 p.m. contest.

The two teams will meet again on Saturday at 1 p.m. Either Bill Schafer or Jim Haller will take the mound, depending on who sees action today.

The Wildcats conclude the weekend with a home game against Augustana, another NCAA Division II school. Game time is 1 p.m. for the Sunday matchup.

The K-State baseball team begins a spring tour March 10,at San Jose State. From there the Wildcats go to SanFrancisco March 11, and then they're at the Best of West Tournament in Fresno Calif., March 13-18.

K-State will open the Big Eight portion of its schedule April 2, at Oklahoma. The Wildcats first, home conference game will be with Kansas April 7-9.

Sean Collins is greeted after crossing the plate in the seventh inning, giving the 'Cats a 4-3 lead against Missouri Baptist Thursday at Frank Myers Field. The 11-4 victory means K-State remains undefeated with a 3-0 record. The team will play Wayne State here today.

Netters to face Illini, Tulsa

By Carolyn Holcroft
Sports Writer

K-State's women's tennis team is looking to remain undefeated for the season as it takes on Tulsa at 3 p.m. today in Ahearn Field House.

Following today's meet, the team will venture east to the netters home away from home, Topeka's Wood Valley Racquet Club, to battle Illinois at 4 p.m. Saturday.

Coach Steve Bietau said he expects some tough competition, although the two teams might not be as strong as some the team has already faced, specifically Arkansas.

"Tulsa is, although they may not be the caliber of the teams that we've been playing, still to be respected for a number of reasons," he said.

One reason is that Tulsa has some players in their top positions who have given K-State trouble in the past.

"Laura Eubanks has been playing No.1 for them, and she beat us at one soundly," Bietau said. "They also have a win over Oklahoma at No. 1 doubles."

Although Tulsa's top spots are strong, Bietau said depth will once again be an advantage for the Wildcats.

"(Tulsa is) a team that we really need to play well against," he said. "For the team, it's important they approach every match with a level of respect and intensity."

Bietau said he expects the match against Illinois to be somewhat more challenging, although the only results he's seen of its season have been from a recent match against Oklahoma State, when Illinois was not very successful.

Oklahoma State, ranked No. 1 in the Big Eight and No. 10 in the nation, has downed top 20 teams Brigham Young and Kentucky in 8-1 matches, and blown away both Illinois and Texas Christian University 9-0.

"I think Illinois may be one of those matches that'll be a little bit easier to get up for. ... they've got a little bit stronger reputation."

— Steve Bietau
K-State tennis coach

"In 64 matches, they've lost only four," he said. "They beat Illinois 9-0, but that is not something you can rely heavily on."

He anticipates that it will be easy to psych the team up for Saturday's competition.

"I think Illinois may be one of those matches that'll be a little bit easier to get up for," Bietau said. "It's a Big Ten school, and they've got a little bit stronger reputation."

Bietau said he is basing most of his expectations on reputations, as Illinois is one of the teams never before seen on a K-State schedule. Iowa and Florida State were also added to the lineup this year, in what he says is an effort to strengthen the program.

His overall objective in creating the schedule was to simulate the Big Eight format, which will be extremely important later in the season.

"We tried to strenghten the schedule," Bietau said. "I felt like it was important this year, because I felt we had a stronger team and that we should upgrade the schedule as well."

The Wildcats also have two specific goals for the weekend. The first is to continue to improve tactically.

"After reviewing the videotape of the Arkansas match, it felt like there were a lot of places in there that we aren't playing the smartest shots," Bietau said. "We're not making the best choices, or hitting the right shots at the best time."

He also said he hopes to center more attention on improvement in the doubles matches.

At this point, there are no scheduled changes in the K-State lineup. In singles positions one through six, respectively, will be Helen Scheldknecht, Marijke Nel, Sara Hancock, Valerie Rive, Thresa Burcham and Annika Emtell. The team of Scheldknecht and Miste Bitner will be a No. 1 doubles, and Nel and Rive will be at No. 2. Burcham and Hancock look to remain undefeated at No. 3 doubles.

Track athletes aim for qualifying mark

From Staff and Wire Reports

K-State track athletes will be traveling nationwide this weekend. This is the last chance athletes have to qualify for the NCAA Indoor Championships, which takeare March 10 to 11 at Indianapolis.

After last week's Big Eight meet, the Wildcats have six athletes who have qualified for nationals. However, Markeya Jones, who had qualified in the 200-meter dash, pulled a hamstring last weekend and will probably not be able to compete.

Also qualifying for the NCAA meet from K-State earlier this season were Ray Hill in both the 200 meters and the 55 meters, Kim Kilpatrick in the 55-meter hurdles, Connie Teaberry in the high jump and Sean Banks in the 400 meters.

Jeff Reynolds, two-time Big Eight 600-yard run champion, will travel to Florida to try his luck in the 400 meters. Reynolds is a member of the 4x400-meter relay team that qualified for the national meet last weekend at the Big Eight championships.

Distance runners David Warders, Pat Hessini and Jan Jonsson will try to qualify for nationals at Indianapolis on the same track that the national meet will be run on next weekend.

Seven K-State athletes will be at Nebraska and the Bob Devaney Center Saturday. Carla Shannon placed second in the triple jump at the Big Eight Championships. Shannon's best jump this season is 40-5 and the national qualifying mark is 40-10½ .

Clifton Etheridge, Big Eight long jump champion, will also be shooting for the national meet at Nebraska.

"Clifton went 25-0¾ last weekend, but he took off behind the board. I'm confident if he gets on the board he could qualify," Capriotti said.

Also looking to qualify will be Charles Armstead in the 55-meter hurdles and Chris Samuelson, Connie Teaberry and DeDe Henderson in the high jump. Sameulson and Teaberry each placed third at the Big Eight meet.

K-State will open the outdoor track season the weekend following the NCAA meet, at the UCLA Invitational March 18.

ing no information that should preclude Tower's confirmation, when in fact it contained numerous allegations of excessive drinking or inappropriate behavior with women.

Nunn raised the possibility of a closed Senate session at one point to air the numerous sensitive allegations against Tower, although he said he hoped to avoid one. He also raised the possibility of making the transcripts of closed committee sessions public, but no Republican followed up.

Meanwhile, the ranks of opposition Democrats continued to grow as Sen. Terry Sanford of North Carolina, a Southern Democrat the administration hoped to see in its corner, said he would vote against the nomination. Sens. Alan Cranston, D-Calif., and Paul Sarbanes, D-Md., also said they would oppose the nomination — raising the number of opposition Democrats to 39.

No Senate vote is expected until next week.

An estimated 15,000 troops and 7,000 police maintained order in the capital Thursday, and the president pronounced the emergency "practically over."

But Perez, talking to reporters after a helicopter tour of the city, said he was "preoccupied and ashamed" of the "absurdity" of lost lives.

He said looters were only hurting themselves by destroying small businesses that served poor neighborhoods, and blamed "remnants" of leftist revolutionaries for continued gun battles in the capital.

He said some acts "were induced, and this has to be punished severely."

reported to him that a reporter and photographer had interviewed the group at Marlatt Hall and later participated in the incident.

The Collegian received an anonymous phone call at around 11:30 a.m. Thursday that a "90-person pillow fight" would occur around 9:30 that night between residents of Marlatt and Moore halls.

A telephone message was taken and given to the Collegian photo editor suggesting that the event be covered for its potential value as a feature photograph. The note also said a group of people would be "leaving from the basement of Marlatt Hall and going to Moore Hall."

Because the news tip was not verified nor was the name of the caller known to the Collegian staff, authorities were not notified of the rumor, said Janet Swanson, editor.

"The tip was treated as any other. So many of them don't pan out, we didn't ever anticipate that one side would have been unaware of the other's plan," Swanson said.

Joe Freeman, staff photographer for the Collegian, and Gary Lytle, Collegian reporter, were assigned to the event. The two met the group at Marlatt Hall about 9:15 p.m. and followed them to Moore Hall.

Prior to covering the event, Lytle called Marlatt Hall and was informed that the pillow fight was not officially sponsored nor was it condoned by either of the two residence halls.

Both Lytle and Freeman said they had no idea until the pillow fight began, and it became obvious, that Moore Hall residents were uninformed about the attack. Both also say they did not participate in the incident.

Freeman said he ran ahead of the group to get in position on the fifth floor. Lytle followed the group up to the fifth floor.

Sodomy report sent to county attorney

By Chris Koger
Staff Writer

K-State Police plan to file a report today with the Riley County Attorney's office concerning an alleged sodomy which occurred on campus Saturday evening.

Richard Herrman, campus police investigator, said he will file a report of aggravated criminal sodomy with the attorney's office.

The alleged sodomy took place in Edwards Hall and was reported to the campus police Monday afternoon, Herrman said. The identities of the victim or suspect have not been released, but Herrman said the victim is a minor who knew the suspect.

The suspect is a K-State student, Herrman said.

"It is up to the attorney's discretion what formal charges will be filed, if any," he said. "He may reclassify the charges or find there is not enough evidence to press charges."

Herrman said he plans to talk with the suspect today.

"We are still going to take this to the county attorney," he said.

County Attorney Bill Kennedy said he could not comment on the matter until he decides if it will be taken to court or not.

The Smart Way To Finance A College Education.

If you need money for a college education, we can help.

Our government student loan program offers you a complete range of loan options, one to fit your financial needs.

Choose from the Stafford Loan Program; Supplemental Loan For Students (SLS), or the HEAF PLUS loan. Whichever loan you choose, you get 10 years to pay and an interest rate lower than most conventional loan rates.

For complete information on student loans, contact Citizen's Bank. A government insured student loan. It's the smart way to finance a college education.

Eastern Airlines grounded 2 days, strands travelers

By The Associated Press

MIAMI — Striking Machinists kept Eastern Airlines nearly grounded a second day Sunday, stranding hundreds of weary passengers at airport terminals, but the union called off plans to cripple the nation's commuter railroads at the start of the work week.

Eastern President Phil Bakes, admitting that strike-torn airline service has "been a mess," pleaded for pilots to return.

"Come back now and make this airline work," Bakes told a late-afternoon news briefing. "Come back for your families, come back for Eastern airlines. ... We can make it work."

Bakes also apologized to Eastern's customers and admitted the airline, which had before the strike assured travelers there would be no major disruptions, had miscalculated.

Eastern pilots, who virtually shut down the money-losing carrier by honoring picket lines of the striking Machinists union, threated "the very existence" of the airline, said Eastern spokesman Robin Matell.

"By continuing to stay out, the pilots are committing economic suicide," he said at a news briefing.

Eastern was hit with a strike at 12:01 a.m. Saturday by the Machinists union. About 8,500 mechanics, baggage handlers and ground crews walked out over Eastern's demand for contract concessions, escalating a 17-month union-management battle at the nation's seventh-largest airline.

Eastern ordinarily schedules 1,000 flights with 100,000 passengers daily. On Saturday just 85 flights took off; expectations Sunday were for 125 flights, Matell said. Nineteen had gone by 2 p.m. EST, the pilots said.

The strike had threatened to spill over into a sympathy action against 12 commuter railroads around the country, but after a judge in New York banned railroad workers from honoring Eastern picket lines there, the Machinists called off their plans.

U.S. District Judge Robert Patterson on Sunday signed a temporary order barring employees from honoring picket lines at railroads in the metropolitan New York area, with its 320,000 railway commuters, said a spokesman for the Metropolitan Transportation Authority.

The International Association of Machinists said the union would appeal Monday.

"The IAM will not set up picket lines at any rail carrier's property at this time," Machinists Vice President John Peterpaul said in a statement issued in Washington. "We don't want any IAM member or members of other unions to violate the court's order or put themselves in a position that could jeopardize their jobs. When the court upholds our position

Students participate in rodeo

By Craig Hamrick
Collegian Reporter

Jumping on the back of a sharp-horned steer or riding a bucking bull might not be everyone's idea of a good time, but the two top-ranked members of the K-State rodeo team spend a great deal of time doing just that.

David McComb and Sam Kiefer are two of the 15 K-State students who competed in the 33rd Annual K-State Rodeo held in Weber Arena Friday, Saturday and Sunday.

The rodeo was the third of 10 regional rodeos sponsored by the National Intercollegiate Rodeo Association. Competitors came from the Central Plains Region, including colleges in Kansas and Oklahoma.

McComb, a steer wrestler, has competed in nearly all of the different rodeo events, but said he enjoys steer wrestling the most.

"It's a challenge to see how much strength you've got compared to the animal," said McComb, a junior in agricultural education.

In the steer wrestling event, the competitor jumps from the back of his horse onto the back of a steer, grabbing the steer's horns to wrestle it to the ground. The steer must be on its back with all four feet facing the same direction before the time clock stops. The event is usually completed in six to 10 seconds.

See related story/Page 12

"A lot of times, it happens so fast you don't realize the danger," he said. "You're going 35 to 40 miles per hour. It's just a natural high."

With a time of 9.3 seconds in the preliminary competition, McComb did not qualify for the steer wrestling finals.

"I had a little trouble — I got a leg hung up when I reached for the steer, and I took longer than I should have," he said. "I was two seconds away from the times that made it to finals.

"It's kind of a let-down not making it to finals, but there were a lot of good steer wrestlers here, and it was good just to be able to be competitive with them."

McComb's parents took him to his first rodeo when he was 4 days old, and he first competed when he was 8 years old.

Now, in addition to the 10 intercollegiate rodeos during the school year, he tries to compete in an average of 60 rodeos a summer.

"If the rodeos are close together — 60 to 100 miles apart — you can make it to two a day during the summer," McComb said. "You travel in groups of three or four so when you're not driving you can sleep. It's a case of sleep when you can, not sleep when you want."

After McComb graduates, he plans to continue competing during the summer. He chose to major in agricultural education so he can teach at the high school or junior college level and have his summers free.

His determination to continue competing has not been dampened by the inherent dangers of the sport.

Other than a broken arm, McComb has never been hurt seriously in rodeo work. He said he was injured worse playing football in high school than he has been jumping on the backs of steers.

"I played linebacker and tackle in high school, and it was a lot rougher than rodeoing. I tore up my knee pretty bad in football," he said.

On the other hand, Kiefer, saddle bronc rider and bull rider, was once injured seriously. One of his ears was cut off when he was thrown from a bull during practice.

"I was real lucky. It just tore the outside of my ear off, and they sewed it back on," Kiefer said. "There was no damage to my hearing. I just had to get a lot of stitches."

Kiefer made it to finals in both of his events, but he did not place.

Kiefer's fiancee, Brenda Harris, senior in elementary education, was

U.S. begins debate on nuclear control

By The Associated Press

VIENNA, Austria — Hungary and Poland told Secretary of State James A. Baker III Sunday that the West should play a bigger role in encouraging reform in the Soviet bloc, U.S. officials said.

Also Sunday, the Bush administration offered the PLO the prospect of substantive talks but stressed displeasure with raids against Israel.

Clarification of the U.S. stance seemed designed to assuage the PLO, which last week complained the United States is not involved in serious negotiations on setting up a Middle East peace conference.

Baker met the foreign ministers of the two Soviet bloc nations after arriving in Vienna to launch new East-West arms negotiations this week and have his first talks with Soviet Foreign Minister Eduard A. Shevardnadze.

Hungary's Foreign Minister Peter Varkonyi and Poland's Tadeusz Olechowski told Baker in separate meetings Sunday about their recent political and economic reforms, said U.S. officials speaking on condition of anonymity.

There was "a very strong general sense of an invitation for further involvement" from the West, a U.S. official said.

Neither side agreed on specifics, but topics included improved U.S. trade terms and less restrictions on importing Western technology for Hungary and restructuring of Poland's burgeoning foreign debt, the officials said.

Tower won't stop drinking unless nomination approved

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — John Tower on Sunday reiterated his pledge to stop drinking if confirmed as secretary of defense, but said he saw no reason to do so otherwise and accused his detractors of "hypocrisy."

Tower also drew a distinction between the past "excessive" drinking he has admitted to and an alcohol "abuse" problem that would disqualify him for sensitive military positions.

At any rate, Tower maintained that such judgments are made by a military person's commanding officer and that, in his case, President Bush is his commanding officer.

Appearing on the CBS-TV interview program, Tower also restated his determination not to ask that his nomination be withdrawn — arguing that Bush did not want him to and that the controversy over his selection has escalated beyond consideration of his own personal qualifications.

"I still have (a) sip of wine now and again," Tower responded when asked whether he had stopped drinking since pledging a week ago to do so if confirmed. "Once confirmed, I will give it up altogether."

Asked why he did not stop drinking immediately as "an act of good faith," Tower responded:

"Well, why should I? Why should I? ... It is so little that it doesn't really matter. One reason I can give it up, and give it up easily, is because it doesn't really matter that much."

A few minutes earlier, Tower had been asked about arguments by Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Sam Nunn and others that he would fail to qualify for a sensitive military position because of a history of alcohol abuse.

"Does this not disqualify you?" he was asked.

"No. ... I would be disqualified if you could prove alcohol dependency or chronic alcoholism. ... In the final analysis, it is a decision to be made by the commanding officer that should be based on hard evidence. In my particular instance, the president of the United States is the commanding officer.

"The fact is I am not alcohol-dependent," continued Tower. "There is no conclusive proof to the effect. As a matter of fact, the weight of proof seems to indicate otherwise."

"You've admitted to alcohol abuse yourself," the questioner persisted.

"I've admitted to excessive drinking in the 1970s," Tower replied. ... "I've said 'excessive drinking,' not 'alcohol abuse.' ... There's a difference."

Tower said he had no plans to withdraw his name from nomination and would relish a chance to appear on the Senate floor to defend himself, as suggested by the Senate Republican leader, Sen. Bob Dole of Kansas.

"I think it would be damaging to the president if he withdrew my name or if I withdrew, because it would mean that the president had finally been pressured into pulling down a nominee that he believes to be eminently qualified," Tower said.

The decision on allowing Tower to appear in the Senate rests with the newly chosen Senate Majority Leader, George Mitchell, D-Maine. Mitchell has said he opposed Tower's nomination, but has not ruled on Dole's suggestion.

Dole, appearing on the ABC-TV program, "This Week With David Brinkley," vowed "to fight this to the end."

"John Tower is the best suited man in America. President Bush has said so," said Dole. "And he has the right to make the nomination because he won the election."

Tower said that the real issue was politics, not his personality.

"Senators are quite capable of changing their minds. I think there is an imminent possibility that minds will be changed as this situation plays out and as the arguments against me appear to be more thin," said Tower, who served 24 years in the Senate, including a 1981-84 stint as chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Illegal liquor kills 70 in India

NEW DELHI, India — At least 70 people died and 200 were hospitalized after drinking bootleg liquor in a city where the sale of alcoholic beverages is forbidden, news reports said Sunday.

The victims, mostly poor laborers, drank the liquor Saturday night in Baroda, 560 miles southwest of New Delhi, the United News of India said.

The Press Trust of India news agency said 70 bodies were found in the city Sunday and that 200 people were hospitalized in serious condition.

United News of India said police arrested three people who supplied the liquor to the laborers. The sale of liquor is forbidden in Baroda and all other cities in the western state of Gujarat.

IRA car bomb injures 7

BELFAST, Northern Ireland — A bomb hidden in a car exploded outside a north Belfast military barracks, injuring four police officers and three soldiers as they walked nearby, police said Sunday.

The Irish Republican Army, the mainly Roman Catholic organization fighting to drive the British out of Northern Ireland, claimed responsibility for Saturday night's blast. It said the bomb contained 500 pounds of explosives.

Police said the blast damaged Girdwood military barracks and nearby houses off north Belfast's Antrim Road.

A joint army and police unit had just left the barracks to patrol on foot when the bomb exploded, said a police press officer who declined to be identified further.

Most seriously injured was a police officer whose leg was broken, he said.

Students' restaurant unique

URBANA, Ill. — Every night is opening night at the Spice Room, a gourmet restaurant operated by University of Illinois students.

Customers dare not become too fond of the beef a la Saint Moritz or the ricotta pie with chocolate and liqueur. They never will be served again.

"We never repeat anything," said Jane Myers, who supervises 25 seniors in the restaurant management class. "Each student takes great pride in creating a unique menu."

The Spice Room, open to the public, serves on Tuesday and Thursday evenings. A five-course meal, including wine, costs about $10.

Each night, a different student is in charge of selecting the menu and supervising the other workers. That means selecting food, buying it, timing preparation, and making a profit.

A sample of every dish is prepared in advance to make sure the recipe will work.

"What if my clam chowder curdles?" said Eric Rose. "I'd be in trouble."

Customers fill out detailed evaluation cards, and Myers reviews the comments with students at the end of the week.

Kitty released from treatment

BROOKLINE, Mass. — Kitty Dukakis is expected to return home this week after four weeks of treatment at a Rhode Island alcoholism center, a former aide said Sunday.

The wife of Gov. Michael S. Dukakis entered Edgehill Newport in Newport, R.I., on Feb. 5 because of excessive drinking after her husband lost the presidential election. Most patients undergo a 28-day rehabilitation program sometimes followed by three days of observation on the premises.

"I understand that she'll be back in Boston later in the week," Paul Costello, press aide to Kitty during the campaign, told The Associated Press.

Costello, who is now a public relations executive in Washington, told the Boston Sunday Herald that Kitty, 52, is expected to resume an active life when she returns home.

The newspaper quoted Costello as saying, "She's in good physical shape, in terrific spirits and she's raring to go."

He said Kitty will probably share her efforts against alcoholism with the public because, "She likes to use her life as a way to help others. And I think she'll do that, through her book or in her speaking engagements."

Wright house to go on sale

DETROIT — The only house built in the Motor City by pioneering architect Frank Lloyd Wright has been put up for sale by Domino's Pizza Inc. owner Thomas Monaghan, who decided not to restore the home.

Monaghan, a collector of Wright's work who bought the house a year ago, has listed the cement-block building on Detroit's north side for $295,000. The original purchase price was not disclosed.

The house was designed in the 1950s for a prominent local attorney. Wright died in 1959.

Domino's bought it with the intention of restoring it and loaning it to the University of Detroit, a company spokesman said Friday.

But Monaghan scrapped the project because of a commitment to building a new Wright museum at Domino's Farms, the company's headquarters near Ann Arbor, the spokesman said.

Topeka civil rights lawyer dies

TOPEKA — Charles S. Scott Sr., a Topeka attorney who gained fame in the landmark Brown vs. Topeka Board of Education case, died Friday at a Topeka hospital. He was 67.

In 1951, Scott, his brother John J. Scott and colleague Charles Bledsoe argued the Brown case in federal district court in Topeka. It was filed by the parents of elementary student Linda Brown, who walked past an all-white school in her neighborhood to attend an all-black school.

The case was later appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court, where Scott joined NAACP attorney Thurgood Marshall in oral arguments. On May 17, 1954, the Supreme Court ruled in the Brown case that racial segregation in public schools was unconstitutional. Scott was 33 at the time.

After that, Scott could have gone anywhere to practice law, but he remained in Topeka, friends said.

"He maintained his concern for the grass-roots people," said Bill Minner, a supervisor with the Kansas Commission on Civil Rights. "He did not abandon the people that needed him."

Scientists release information on near nuclear meltdown

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — Scientists averted a meltdown aboard a nuclear-powered Soviet icebreaker by a matter of minutes last fall, a newspaper reported.

Vodny Transport, a newspaper that covers Soviet shipping, said the incident occurred Nov. 11 aboard the Rossiya while it was docked at Murmansk, 1,000 miles north of Moscow in Kola Bay.

It was there for routine changing of a filter in a reactor, the newspaper said.

The reactor was shut down, and cooling water was supposed to be drained before changing the filter, the newspaper explained. But a chief physicist aboard the ship gave incorrect instructions to an operator who opened a drainage valve on the ship's other reactor, which was in operation, Vodny Transport said in its Saturday edition.

The main supply of cooling water was drained off mistakenly. Just 30 or 40 minutes' worth of backup water was left in a reservoir before the reactor would have melted down and released radiation, the newspaper said.

Within four minutes, the "situation was liquidated," according to Dmitri Tarakanov, the newspaper's Murmansk correspondent. He did not provide details of what action was taken to control the situation.

Radiation could have spread from the ship to the city of 440,000 people, Tarakanov indicated.

Vodny Transport comes out three times a week. There was no explanation for the four-month delay in reporting the incident.

A meltdown, the worst possible nuclear accident, occurs when the reactor core overheats to such a degree that the fuel begins melting, as occurred at Three Mile Island in Pennsylvania in 1979.

If the fuel penetrates its protective housing, radioactive materials are released into the environment.

The Rossiya was launched from the Baltic Yard in Leningrad in 1983 and went into operation in 1986, according to Jane's Fighting Ships.

Oleen to cover topics pertinent to students

By The Collegian Staff

Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, will speak to the College Republicans at 7 p.m. today in Calvin 211 in a meeting that is open to the public.

Oleen will discuss her experience as a first-term senator and legislation pertaining to students and K-State, said Ed Frankenberg, treasurer of College Republicans.

Some of the topics Oleen said she would like to address include the Margin of Excellence plan, the affiliation of Washburn University with the Kansas Board of Regents schools, highway planning, legislation that lowered the blood alcohol limit for DUI and the effectiveness of Associated Students of Kansas' lobbying efforts.

Even with only five weeks left in the legislative session, Oleen said many of the issues affecting students have not been decided. She wants to devote at least part of the meeting to getting students' input on those topics.

Oleen said she welcomes the chance to talk with students and considers it very important to keep an open dialogue with them. She has been impressed with the amount of mail she receives from students, which she estimates to be about five to six pieces a day.

Earlier this semester, the group had Kansas Attorney General Bob Stephen as a guest speaker, Frankenberg said.

The group is also planning a "Meet The VIPs Spring Picnic" when students will have a chance to talk with state and local Republican party leaders.

Although the details of the picnic have not been worked out, the tentative date for the event is April 16.

Workshops focus on tax education

By Steve Logback
Collegian Reporter

Tax benefits and obligations will be the focus of two free workshops this week on campus.

The Internal Revenue Service will present the seminars which will also emphasize employers' tax responsibilities.

The workshops, sponsored by the Small Business Development Center and the IRS, are open to anyone, said Sharon Wurl, IRS taxpayer education coordinator.

"(The workshops') purpose is to provide information and assistance to people who are either new in business, just starting a business, thinking about going into business, or interested in general," she said.

"Federal Business Taxes Today" will be presented from 6:30 to 9:30 p.m. Tuesday in Bluemont 101.

Topics which representatives from the IRS will be covering include types of business organizations, record keeping, offices in the home, depreciation, automobile expenses, other business deductions, self-employment tax, and estimation of taxes.

The second workshop, "Federal Employment Taxes," is directed toward small-business owners and self-employed people who have contract labor or anticipate hiring employees in the future. This workshop is from 6:30 to 9:30 p.m. Thursday in Bluemont 101.

The workshop will focus primarily on employer/employee relationships and wages. Other topics to be discussed include the withholding and depositing of taxes, the Federal Unemployment Tax Act tax, and explanations on various employee-related forms.

Barta Stevenson, administrative assistant with the center, said confusion caused by new tax laws spawned the idea for the workshops.

"We figured it would be a good idea, considering the changes in the tax laws this year," Stevenson said. "There have been a lot of questions from people regarding the new laws."

Wurl said informational packets will be distributed to workshop participants. The packets will contain information helpful to small-business owners.

"(The participants) will learn a considerable amount about their tax responsibilities and instructions on completing some of the forms they are required to send in," she said. "Also, they will be able to get any questions answered by the (IRS)."

To ensure sufficient seating and materials for all participants, reservations should be made by calling the KSU Small Business Development Center, Stevenson said.

Lack of intervention hampers airline travel

"Where was George?"

A familiar question from the now trampled and overgrown campaign trail has suddenly gained another meaning.

With the striking Machinists union basically halting all Eastern Airlines traffic across the nation, and a possible union sympathy action from an estimated 12 different commuter railroads, one has to again ask, "Where was George?"

The Eastern Airlines strike, which began Saturday morning, has basically shut down the nation's seventh largest airline, reducing the number of daily flights from 1,000 to less than 100. An estimated 98 percent of Eastern Airlines pilots have honored the Machinists union's picket lines.

The situation is beneficial for no one. In terminals up and down the East Coast, passengers were stranded in long lines, waiting for refunds or hoping to find seats on other airlines.

A possible sympathy commuter train strike could effectively snarl commuter traffic in New York and other large metropolitan areas.

And a little closer to home, the strike could possibly have an impact on students' spring break travel plans.

And in the midst of all this, where was George?

He certainly wasn't intervening, as many had hoped he would, and institute a 60-day cooling off period.

The Rev. Jesse Jackson has already urged Bush to intervene, and Charles Bryan, negotiator for the Machinists union, has commented that the president is ignoring his responsibilites to the public.

Picketers are risking their jobs over the situation, commuters are stranded, air traffic is disabled, the potential for violence is rising, and all sides are looking to Bush to intervene with a cooling off period to help with negotiations.

Where is he? The best thing coming from Transportation Secretary Samuel Skinner was that if the situation warrants, the Bush administration will propose legislation eliminating the provisions in the Railway Labor Act that allow secondary picketing.

What a help. That will have very little impact on the original Eastern Airlines situation.

The situaton has great potential for escalating to an even worse problem. It's time for Bush to take charge of the situation, intervene — as all sides are calling for him to do — and protect the public.

Other Perspectives

LB690 has sparked new interest in the mandatory helmet law, which went into effect two months ago. But LB690, instead of requiring all motorcyclists to wear helmets, would require only those under age 19 to wear them.

This is hardly fair and definitely not smart.

LB690 has been called a compromise bill between enforcing the mandatory helmet law or not enforcing it. But what a silly compromise, enforcing law on one group of people who apparently don't have as many motorcycle accidents in Nebraska. Only two of the 19 motorcycle fatalities in the state in 1988 were under age 19, according to state Sen. Dan Lynch of Omaha.

Mall paradox of consumerism

Commentary

Chad L. Sanborn
Collegian Columnist

A fairy tale in post-modern, post-Reagan America: Once upon a time, there was a quaint village located in the middle of a luscious patch of grassland — a prairie of sorts. And in this village stood one of the most beautiful malls humankind has ever seen.

The mall, dressed in ornate baubles and full of trees which grew indoors because they were fertilized with magic, was a neo-town square for the peasants of the village.

The younger villagers gathered there to play video games, buy trinkets or court someone to whom they had taken a fancy.

Many of the village elders, dressed in their finest sweatsuits and white tennis shoes, would congregate at the lovely mall to walk around and around it, never tiring of its endless beauty.

The mall was maintained by Prince Heavy, a crafty squire from a faraway village. Prince Heavy possessed public relations knowledge that few in the community were familiar with, making him perfect for his job.

One day, word was sent to Prince Heavy that one of the three powerful gods of information dissemination was sending an angel to visit the mall in the unassuming village. Ever upwardly mobile, Prince Heavy devised a plan to make sure everyone would take notice that the gods were smiling on the mall.

Before the angel came, Prince Heavy made sure everyone in the kingdom knew of the visit. He created and circulated throughout the land announcements promising coffee, cinnamon rolls and juice for all who made their way to the mall on the morning the angel came. Yet still, some were ignorant.

Before the sun rose on the day of the angel's coming, many of the elders put on their walking garb and trudged off to the mall. When they arrived, they were shocked.

Due to the presence of the angel, the mall was abnormally full, and the peasants were confined to the royal food court, so as not to interfere with the day's proceedings.

Penned up like compliant show livestock, the elders could not strut their laps. Hence they ate their free rolls, drank their juice and coffee, and listened to a beautiful pianist — who was wearing an electric blue dress with matching bow and pearl-like earrings — run the "Chariots of Fire" theme into the ground.

No one was sure which peasants came to the mall to see the angel and which unwittingly just happened to walk into a PR nightmare.

As the music swirled and the peasants became wired due to caffeine and sugar, the anticipation grew. It grew like only manufactured anticipation can.

At one point, a brave village elder tried to throw off the chains of the public relations tyranny. With metal walking cane in hand, he tried to bolt past a barricade of knighted security guards.

But for the sake of order and the elder's life — for he would surely have been incinerated for looking upon the angel without the god's permission — his valiant efforts were thwarted.

Before the elder could hobble through the barricade, a chunky monkey of a security guard tossed aside his complimentary cinnamon roll, stopped the man and sent him merrily back from whence he came.

Still, the vines of anticipation creeped in, out and around the royal food court, yielding only the fruit of free food.

A roaring fountain in the middle of the royal food court symbolized the potency of the village's social enclave. It was early morning, the peasants were juiced and the anticipation for something to happen was unbearable. Yes, they truly had this civilization thing down.

But, alas, nothing happened. The report to the god was sent through the heavens via satellite, yet no one had witnessed it. Then, full of free drinks and cinnamon rolls, everyone either ran home to see on television what had happened where they had been or started their laps. But, in some metaphysical way, the peasants could cling to the belief they had been a part of it.

The angel was sent to the beautiful mall to absorb its architecture. So gorgeous was the mall that many in the land considered it little short of art, held back only by its functionalism. And it was the mall's functionalism which appealed to the god.

Designed to keep the peasants in the shopping mode longer, the mall was a paradox of the bittersweet joy of consumerism.

Its looks were as enticing as the song of the sirens, but eventually the mall would smash those who ventured too close to the rocks of overextended credit.

When it was all said and done, everyone had manipulated everyone and gotten what they wanted: publicity, free eats, insight into consumer control or even a silly column. And everyone lived blissfully ever after.

Book rebuttal

Editor,

In response to Sheikh Faisal Razzaq's editorial, "World should respect beliefs," I feel that he is sorely one-sided in his views.

He offers three reasons why Moslems resent the publishing of the "The Satanic Verses." I would now like to offer a rebuttal to these rather flimsy arguments.

First, I don't feel that Allah is losing any sleep over what one satirical author is writing (that's satirical, not satanical) about his religion. Even devout Catholic priests have occasionally taken jabs at their own faith.

Does this make them any less faithful, or their god weak? I think not.

Secondly, I don't feel this book is going to weaken the faith of any devout Moslem. If people are going to quit worshipping their god or not read the Koran or the Bible because someone else has said it's wrong, then their faith was plenty weak already.

Also, I think that a fanatical religious leader placing a bounty on the head of a foreign author is more likely to raise doubts in the minds of the world's Moslems than a mere work of fiction.

Third, Razzaq thinks that just because the book "misleads" non-Moslems, that it should be banned.

I have news for you. The Ayatollah misleads the world about America (not that they listen), but I don't think he should be banned.

Razzaq said we need to respect one fifth of the world's population with the same freedom of speech that we embrace. Offer one British author the same courtesy.

Animal cruelty

Editor,

I am writing this letter in the hope of gaining some attention to an animal cruelty case on campus.

Fairchild Hall is built around an open space. Maintenance has placed a net over this space. I'm not sure why this net is there, but it seems quite successful at trapping innocent birds.

As I am writing this letter, a bird has been trapped in this area for several days. It desperately flings itself at the net in an attempt to get out. Its mate looks on anxiously from the outside, or walks precariously over the net in an attempt to find a way to be with its mate.

This is not an isolated case. This has happened on several occasions before. Last week, several birds were trapped, but finally a big enough hole formed in the net that they were able to get free.

Then maintenance sewed up the hole. Now a bird is trapped with no way to escape.

Several of my colleagues and I have called several departments and people on campus concerning this situation. We have called maintenance, the K-State Police, and several professors on campus who work with birds. We also called the Humane Society, who told us to call the Animal Warden at the City Police Department, who said it had no jurisdiction on campus. Yet nobody on campus seems interested in this problem.

I hope by the time this letter is published that the bird will have been freed. But even if this happens, it will only be a matter of time before more birds are trapped.

My first question is, why is this net there in the first place? Secondly, why is it that no one on campus or in Manhattan is interested in, or capable of, freeing these birds?

Road concern

Editor,

Last week I learned that a road was to be constructed which would become the northern entrance for the new parking lot, B-3. I am very concerned about this for several reasons. .

First, looking at it from a motorist's perspective, the entrance to that road will be just below the crest of the hill on North Manhattan Avenue (next to the American Institute of Baking). This will make six outlets onto this road within a very short span of a very heavily traveled section of the street.

This wouldn't be so bad on a flat section of street, but it's just below the crest of a hill! Imagine this on an ice-slickened winter morning.

A suggestion would be to revise the plan and move the entrance to the top of the hill where it would more visible.

Secondly, from the perspective of a parent whose children attend Stonehouse, I'm not too thrilled to know that the University doesn't think enough of our little children to even plan on installing a fence between the impending road and the playground.

Can you imagine reducing the size of the playground almost in half, which will place the road within a few feet of the climbing structures and tricycle tracks, and without a fence figured into the plans?

To me, this is evidence of not looking at all of the points and alternatives which always exist in any situation.

A third important concern will be all the confusion, noise and general interruption to the 30 children, teachers, graduate students and teacher asssistants who are there all day.

I imagine the building of a road is not a very clean and quiet endeavor. Can you imagine trying to put children down for their naps or teaching or even calling out to a child playing outside with all the noise the bulldozers, trucks, graders and workers are sure to create?

I'm sure that any parent can understand my concern in this matter. Whether your child attends Stonehouse is not important. I am asking for the support of all parents who believe that our children have rights and deserve a voice in an adult world.

Please take the time to cut out this letter and return it to me with either a signature or initials. We need all your responses as soon as possible. The University is at this very minute doing the transit work and has its chainsaws cutting into the very woods that my children have been lucky enough to explore and affectionately call the "Witchy Woods."

Scientists to begin use of treatment for muscle disease

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — An experimental treatment for the most severe form of muscular dystrophy has worked in two new studies in mice, and tests in human patients may begin this summer, scientists say.

"This is the most exciting approach for human therapy that, in my opinion, has ever come along," declared Donald Wood, director of research for the Muscular Dystrophy Association.

"We basically have the first step toward a potential to do therapeutics. It looks promising," said Louis Kunkel, co-author of one of the studies.

The mice belonged to a strain that lacks a protein called dystrophin in the muscles. In humans, that defect causes Duchenne muscular dystrophy, the most common and severe form of dystrophy.

After the mice were treated, portions of muscle began to produce the protein.

Duchenne muscular dystrophy is a genetic disorder that strikes boys almost exclusively, appearing in about one in every 3,500 male babies in the United States. It causes a progressive weakening and wasting of voluntary muscles. Most patients must use wheelchairs by age 12, and most die in their early 20s.

One of the mouse experiments was done by Kunkel and Eric Hoffman of Harvard Medical School, Children's Hospital and the Howard Hughes Medical Institute in Boston, and Terry Partridge and others at the Charing Cross and Westminster Medical School in London.

Their results are "extremely exciting," said Theodore Munsat, professor of neurology and pharmacology at Tufts University Medical School and director of neuromuscular research at the New England Medical Center Hospital in Boston.

Similar results appeared in research by George Karpati and colleagues at the Neuromuscular Research Group of the Montreal Neurological Institute. Both studies were presented at a recent meeting of muscular dystrophy researchers in Perth, Australia.

Scientists from several nations will meet in June to discuss prospects for testing the approach in human patients, Wood said. He and Karpati said preliminary experiments in a limited number of patients might begin this summer.

Those studies, focusing on single muscles or a few muscles, could lead to larger human studies. It is too early to say when the experimental procedure could be made widely available, Wood said.

The mouse experiments involved immature muscle cells called myoblasts, which normally help repair muscle fibers that have broken because of injury or strenuous exercise.

Researchers injected myoblasts into mice that lacked dystrophin and found that the myoblasts fused with muscle fibers. Once inside a fiber, the myoblast nucleus, or core, provided a gene that allowed the fiber to begin producing dystrophin.

Hoarse voice hampers show

R.E.M. concert entertaining, despite shortcomings

By Doug Fall
Collegian Reviewer

Despite the effort by the band, R.E.M's concert at Kansas City's Kemper Arena Saturday was severely hampered by Michael Stipe's hoarse voice.

At about 9 p.m., R.E.M. came on stage with the first song "Pop Song 89," off its new album "Green." For the next 30 minutes, R.E.M. knocked off crowd favorites from recent albums such as "Get Up," "Feeling Gravity's Pull" and "The One I Love," which featured a slow beginning before engaging the upbeat tempo.

Shortly thereafter, however, Stipe's voice became extremely hoarse. This greatly hampered his ability to sing, and resulted in him becoming unclear and finally inaudible as he croaked through the rest of the show.

Despite this problem, which would render most bands helpless, R.E.M. managed to still put on a good show. About half of the songs on "Green" and "Document" were played as well as many from "Fables of the Reconstruction" and "Reckoning."

The best audience responses came during R.E.M.'s recent single "Orange Crush," "You Are The Everything," the reminiscent "Cuyahoga," and the lofty "Feeling Gravity's Pull."

Review

A projector displayed different scenes on a screen behind the band, such as swimming fish or "inspirational" messages, and gave the performance a unique atmosphere.

The lighting was arranged so that each song had a different background color, but only if the screen was not being used to accompany a song with pictures. At the end of the show, a message on the screen encouraged safe driving as well as a sweet piece telling everyone they were important and their actions spoke loudly about their character — not something that every concert features.

Obvious audience-pleasers were Stipe's shenanigans. His very individual style of dancing, along with throwing his pants aside during the concert, gave him a stage persona reminiscent of Jim Morrison of The Doors, and David Byrne of The Talking Heads. Every move Stipe made had the crowd in anticipation of his next move.

Even though the show went on despite the singing, there were several times this problem glared through the attempts of the band to cover it up.

During "It's the End of the World (And I Feel Fine)," Stipe's voice was so bad that instead of the frenzy generated by the rapid-fire lyrics, about two words were discernable while the rest were lost or filled in by the crowd. Another time, during "I Believe," Stipe changed the lyrics to "I believe my throat hurts," and in another he said, "I want to go home." The between-song banter was limited to "this next song has a great deal of inspirational power," which actually turned out to be quite humorous.

Problems aside, the audience loved R.E.M. Any attempt by the band to end the show was met by an unrelenting four encores. Many of these were obviously planned. One even included "Stand," which the group neglected to perform until then.

Opening for R.E.M. was Robyn Hitchcock and The Egyptians. Hitchcock, matched only by Stipe in the weirdness category, sang for about 45 minutes with decent crowd response.

With the problems of Stipe's voice and unpredictable behavior, R.E.M. could easily have been a disaster. Obviously it wasn't — the show was entertaining and the music great. With about 90 percent of the tour remaining, R.E.M. will need to remedy these problems, or at least Stipe's voice if it wishes to make it successful.

Girls' suicide attempt shocks Koreans

By The Associated Press

SEOUL, South Korea — A suicide pact by four girls who took rat poison so their parents could lavish everything on their brother has shocked Koreans and raised questions about male chauvinism and the plight of the poor.

The girls, aged 6 to 13, were found unconscious Feb. 27 after they took the poison. The youngest died immediately, but doctors said the other three would recover.

Yang Soon-mi, the eldest daughter, told police the girls made the suicide pact because they wanted to save their parents money and ensure their 3-year-old brother would have the best education possible.

The incident has shocked South Koreans, who have sent toys, dolls and more than $15,000 worth of donations to the hospital where the three surviving girls were taken.

A social organization vowed to pay the girls' school expenses through college, and Kim Ok-sook, the wife of President Roh Tae-woo, sent a letter asking the girls "not to lose hope."

Newspaper editorials blamed public policies they said do too little for the poor in a nation of growing prosperity.

Education in South Korea is free up until the end of the sixth grade, and the oldest daughter was due to enter seventh grade. Educating four daughters would have been a major expense, especially since most Korean women have little hope of finding good jobs in the male-dominated society.

"It's regrettable and shocking that the male-first idea was planted deep inside the minds of such young girls," said Lee Kye-kyung, publisher of the weekly Women's News, a leading advocate of women's rights.

"We still live in a society dominated by men, despite our economic success," she said. "This is a typical case that gives us a lesson. It may lead to a movement against prejudice and restrictions on women's rights."

Opposition politician Kim Dae-jung visited the girls' parents at the hospital and said, "I am grief-stricken. I feel a great burden as a politician, and I will focus on ways to promote the livelihood of alienated people."

The girls' father, Yang Tae-bun, 44, is a factory worker who supports the family on the equivalent of $362 a month. Police said the family lived in a small two-room apartment.

"The deprivation of these children forced to resort to suicide contrasts sharply with their affluent peers whose birthdays and graduation from school are often celebrated at posh hotels by expensive feasts," said an editorial in the Korea Herald.

OSU puts halt to Lady Cats' season

Liz Brown's 24 points leads Cowgirls to finals

By Mike Rouse
Collegian Reporter

SALINA — It's over.

That is, unless the basketball gods smile upon K-State and award the Lady Cats with an at-large bid to the NCAA postseason tournament.

Oklahoma State's quickness was too much for K-State's women to handle as the Cowgirls beat the Lady Cats, 65-52, in the semi-finals of the Big Eight Conference women's tournament Sunday at the Bicentennial Center.

OSU's Liz Brown scored 13 of her game-high 24 points in the first half and was able to break any press the Lady Cats applied toward the Cowgirls' offense.

"(Brown) was tough to keep up with. She is real quick and she handles the ball really well," K-State's Nadira Hazim said. "You just have to play off her and then get on her when she pulls up for the shot."

Oklahoma State forced the Lady Cats into 11 turnovers and shot 50 percent from the field to lead 38-23 at halftime.

"We got ourselves in a hole early in the game because we were a little undisciplined offensively, but I think their defense attributed to that," K-State coach Matilda Mossman said.

"I think Liz Brown is the key to everything they do," she added. "Before Liz, they were an average team. Liz takes them up another level."

Oklahoma State scored the first basket of the game and never looked back. The Cowgirls led by as many as 16 points in the first half before leading by 15 at intermisson.

The Cowgirls continued to dominate the game in the second half, as its defense never allowed the Lady Cats to come within eight points the rest of the game.

K-State was able to make one last run at the Cowgirls. Oklahoma State led by 17 points with 13:04 left in the game when the Lady Cats went on a 13-4 run to narrow the lead to eight with 6:41 left.

But Brown continued her tear on the Lady Cats as she scored seven straight Oklahoma State points to put away any hopes K-State had, and the Cowgirls breezed into Monday night's final against Colorado.

K-State's defense was able to shut down Jordan, who came into the game as Oklahoma State's leading scorer. Jordan was held to only nine points before fouling out with 4:21 left in the game.

K-State was led in scoring by Hazim with 10 points. Arneetrice Cobb and Kristie Bahner each added nine points for the Lady Cats.

Diana Miller and Mary Jo Miller combined for only nine points. The two came into the game averaging over 22 points a game.

The Lady Cats end the season with an 18-11 record.

"We were picked to finish last in the Big Eight this year and I don't think our team competed like a last-place team," Mossman said. "We were proud that we were able to finish third in the conference."

In Saturday night's first-round game, the Lady Cats used a balanced scoring attack by having five players in double figures to rout Nebraska, 74-59.

"When we have won this year, we won with four or five in double figures," Mossman said. "If we don't get that balance, we don't win."

The Lady Cats jumped out to a 34-27 halftime lead and was able to record its first win in the tournament since 1987, when K-State made it to the finals.

K-State was led in scoring by Diana Miller who scored 22 points. Hazim scored 11 and Amy Davidson, Rita Matteucci and Bahner all added ten points.

Nebraska ended its season with a record of 14-14. The Huskers were led in scoring by Amy Stephens who scored 18 points.

"The key to the game was we held Amy to 18 points and I feel good about that," Mossman said.

Davidson, who started in her first game of the year, had one mission going into the game. Her mission was to stop Stephens.

"Amy Davidson got her first start of the season, and her mission was to stop Amy Stephens and she did a great job," she said.

"It was Amy Stephens in practice Wednesday and Coach Mossman told me Thursday my job was to stop her. I had a mission to shut down Amy Stephens," Davidson said.

Exciting games prevalent as tourney draws near

Tournament time in college basketball is upon us again, and the quality of play in several games contested over the weekend would indicate we're in for one heck of a run between now and the Final Four in Seattle in just over a month.

Fantastic finishes abounded, though K-State wasn't able to put one together of its own.

The first televised thriller was between Kansas and Oklahoma State. Yes, those hated Jayhawks gave basketball fans everywhere a real treat by handing the Cowboys their first home loss of the year.

With just seven ticks of the clock remaining, Milt Newton launched a three-point shot that found nothing but the bottom of the net, and KU had rallied from a seemingly insurmountable deficit. KU trailed by two prior to the shot, but Coach Roy Williams discarded traditional basketball ideals and went for broke in the form of Newton's try.

The game wasn't quite over yet, however, and Oklahoma State was able to get away a last-second shot by Thomas Jordan that was cleanly rejected by KU's Mark Randall.

Jordan's shot came after a disputed call against KU's Scooter Barry as time ticked away. The referees, after reviewing television footage, put two seconds back on the clock and thus set into motion Randall's dramatics.

Randall's block was but his second of the year and only the third of his collegiate career. That's the stuff college ball is made of. Randall's block was huge, but it took the guts of Williams to make any of it possible.

Just when the luster of KU's win had worn off, it was time to head to Greensboro, N.C., for a four-overtime thriller between North Carolina State and Wake Forest.

Four overtimes would seemingly be enough to excite anyone in his right mind, but it took a gamble and a lucky bounce of the basketball to send the game to overtime in the first place.

At the end of regulation, Wake Forest led by three with time running out. The Wake Forest coaching staff, doing the right thing in wanting to prevent a three-point shot and a tie game, instructed their players to foul. A foul was committed, and NC State hit on the front end of the 1-and-1 opportunity.

What now for NC State? There was but one thing to do — miss the second free throw intentionally and hope for a kind bounce into the hands of an awaiting rebounder and a quick shot to tie the game.

That's exactly what the Wolfpack miraculously got.

The overtimes were really icing on the cake that Jim Valvano's team baked in regulation.

And if two great finishes weren't enough, witness the end of Sunday's matchup between Big Ten powers Indiana and Illinois in Bloomington, Ind.

With the clock ticking down in regulation and Illinois holding to a slim 67-65 lead, the Hoosiers worked for a final shot. They got the ball into the hands of Jay Edwards, who threw up a desperation, fall away jumper from the left baseline with three seconds left that also found nothing but the bottom of the nylon.

The clock ticked off its final seconds here, too, but the officials correctly put two back on the clock. That was enough time for Illinois Coach Lou Henson to diagram a play during a timeout that would end a most improbable final five seconds.

Illinois made a three-quarter court line drive pass to Nick Anderson, who turned with a hand in his face and launched a shot that was estimated — depending upon who was describing it — at between 27 and 35 feet.

Bet you can't guess what happened. Anderson's shot found nothing but ... you know the rest.

Illinois' win Sunday and those by KU and North Carolina State Saturday are the essence of late-season NCAA basketball.

One can only hope the NCAA tourney can live up to the advance billing it got this past weekend.

Iowa State slams 'Cats; Henson hits career high

By Tom Morris

AMES, Iowa — Fact: K-State should have realized it was in trouble at least 24 hours before it played Iowa State.

The team's flight to Ames was grounded at Kansas City International Airport Friday night due to dense fog, so the trek to Iowa was made by bus through less-than-favorable weather conditions. The Wildcats didn't arrive at the game site until midnight.

Fact: K-State rolled out the red carpet when it played defense against the Cyclones. Iowa State scored 24 points via the layup in the second half Saturday. The Cyclones ran so many back door plays it looked more like a revolving door.

Fact: Five ISU players scored in double figures, led by Victor Alexander's 29.

Fact: ISU attempted 38 free throws and made 31, and shot 57.6 percent (34-of-59) from the field.

Look at these facts in mathematical terms, and the sum is K-State lost, 101-89, to Iowa State Saturday at the James H. Hilton Coliseum.

It was the first time a team had scored 100 points against the 'Cats since Oklahoma scored 112 last season, only the fifth school to do so in K-State history. It was sweet revenge for ISU, which lost to K-State earlier this year, 104-89.

In other words, paybacks are hell.

Steve Henson, who led K-State with a career-high 33 points, said the team hadn't played that bad since it lost 89-71 at Stillwater against Oklahoma State.

"(The loss) takes all the fun out of it. We might have needed that scoring today, but we needed more," Henson said.

But since that loss to OSU, the 'Cats had went 7-3 and had won seven of their last eight games.

"Maybe we were hearing too many good things about ourselves," K-State coach Lon Kruger said. "I didn't think we lined up to do the same things today that we have for the last three weeks."

And those things were playing with intensity for 40 minutes and playing smothering defense.

"They pretty much dictated inside. We didn't cover them and they got great shots. You can't get much satisfaction (out of playing hard) for two possessions at a time. You have to do it for 40 minutes," Kruger said.

K-State forward Tony Massop said it wasn't just Alexander who hurt the 'Cats — even though the 6-foot-9 sophomore center, who was voted as ISU's most valuable player and fast food expert this season, was 11-of-18 from the field and hauled down a game-high 10 rebounds.

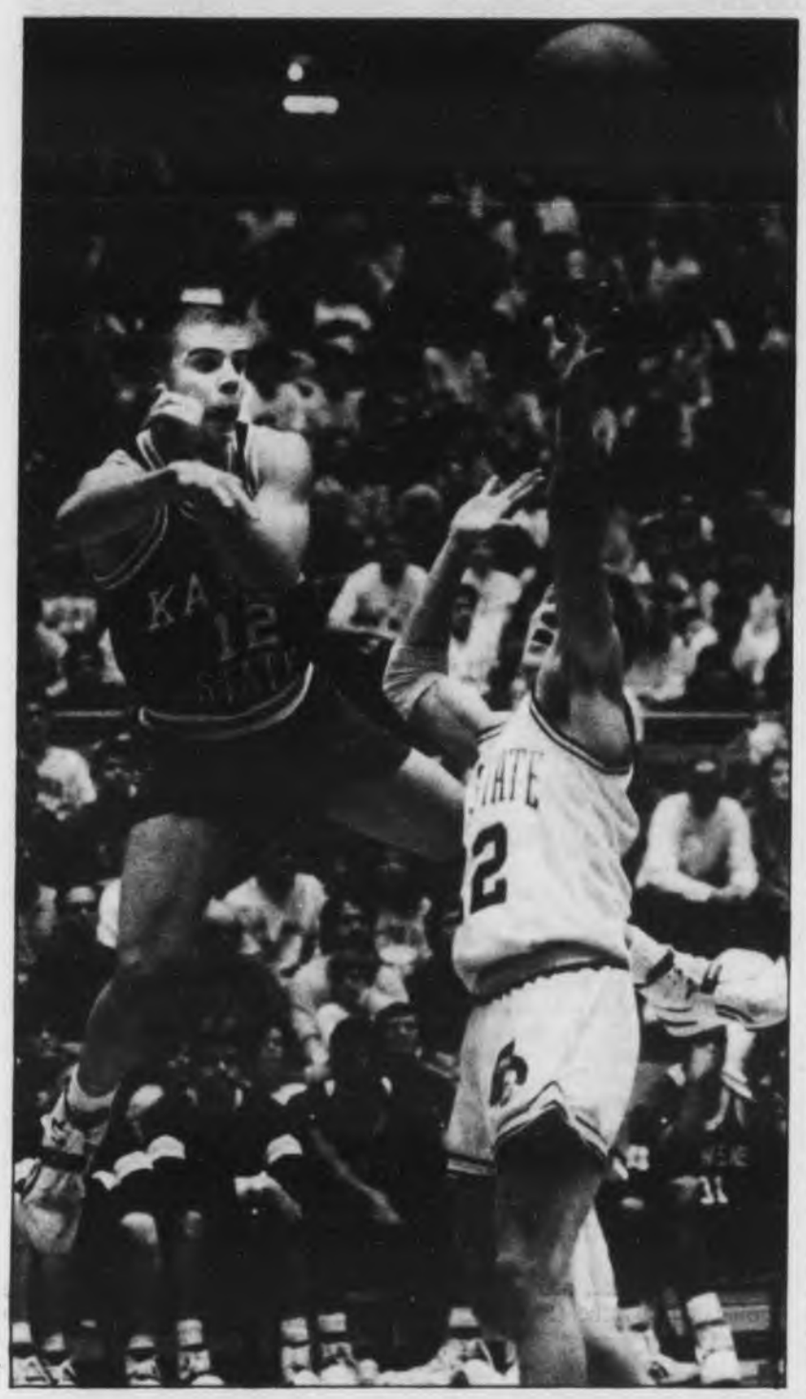
"Once he gets down there low, you just don't move him out. But it wasn't just Alexander. They were all killing us inside. Sometimes we'd have two guys on one and one guy open. We needed to talk to each other more," Massop said.

Added Henson: "I'm not sure what (the problem on defense) was. Either we weren't talking or we weren't listening to each other. The guys inside were getting awfully confused."

Henson, though, could've used a little help. He had 18 points in the first half and his 30-foot shot with 17 seconds in the half enabled K-State to tie the Cyclones 40-40 at the half.

"He was unreal in the first half," said Iowa State forward Mark Baugh.

K-State's last-ditch effort came when Henson closed ISU's lead to three, 56-53, with 14:05 in the game. The Cyclones then outscored the 'Cats 10-2 and built a 66-55 lead on Baugh's 3-point shot with 9:46 remaining. The lead never dipped below double digits after that.



Iowa State, 16-10 overall and 7-7 in the Big Eight Conference, took a big step towards the NCAA tournament with its rout of the Wildcats.

"This team definitely deserves an NCAA bid," Cyclones' coach Johnny Orr said.

K-State, 18-9 and 8-6, didn't lose much by losing to ISU. The 'Cats still have the third seed in the Big Eight tournament, which starts Friday.

Still, one can get the feeling Kruger or his players won't easily write off the defeat.

"You just can't blow off a loss without it stinging a little bit," Kruger said.

Conference titles elude North Carolina, Indiana

By The Associated Press

For Indiana and North Carolina, a conference title is an elusive thing.

Both the Hoosiers and the Tar Heels had chances for championships Sunday and lost them.

North Carolina dropped an 88-86 decision to Duke that gave North Carolina State the regular-season title in the Atlantic Coast Conference and left the Tar Heels and Blue Devils in a tie for second going into the ACC tournament starting next Friday.

Third-ranked Indiana, meanwhile, lost a chance to clinch the Big Ten title when Illinois' Nick Anderson hit a desperation 3-pointer at the buzzer to give the Illini a 70-67 victory.

The Hoosiers, who lead Illinois by two games, can still win the title by beating either Wisconsin at home Thursday or Iowa on the road next weekend. They can also clinch if the Illini lose one of their two.

The Duke-North Carolina and Illinois-Indiana games were two of three Sunday involving six of the nation's top ten teams. In the other, sixth-ranked Syracuse beat No. 2 Georgetown 82-76 in overtime.

NCAA Roundup

The North Carolina-Duke game was as much a boost for ninth-ranked Duke as it was a downer for the fifth-ranked Tar Heels.

"We haven't been in a lot of close games that we've won this year," said Quin Snyder, who hit two straight 3-pointers to spark the Blue Devils on a run that brought them back from a 70-60 second-half deficit. "We need that going into the tournament."

The game left the two teams at 9-5 in the final regular-season ACC standings, a game behind 10-4 North Carolina State. North Carolina is 24-7 overall; Duke is 22-6.

No. 8 Illinois, 25-4 and 12-4 in the league, also came from far behind, a 47-34 deficit in the second half before they went on an 18-7 run.

Indiana, 24-6 and 14-2, managed to hold the lead until Stephen Bardo hit a 3-pointer for Illinois for a 67-65 edge with 1:38 left. Jay Edwards' fallaway jumper with three seconds left seemed to have sent the game into overtime but then came the heroics by Anderson, who led the Illini with 23 points.

No. 6 Syracuse 82, No. 2 Georgetown 76 OT

Derrick Coleman and Sherman Douglas led Syracuse in overtime after the Orangemen overcame a 14-point deficit in the second half before a record crowd of 32,683 at the Carrier Dome.

Syracuse, 25-6 overall and 10-6 in the Big East, broke a six-game losing streak against the Hoyas. Georgetown, which captured the Big East regular- season championship with a 13-3 mark, slipped to 23-4 overall.

Coleman led Syracuse with 21 points, Billy Owens added 19 and Douglas 16. Mark Tillmon had 18 for Georgetown.

Big Eight Roundup

By just about every statistical measuring stick, Oklahoma earned the No. 1 seed for this weekend's Big Eight Tournament.

With a 103-76 laugher over Nebraska Saturday, the fourth-ranked Sooners closed the regular season as the conference champions in won-loss record, scoring and rebounding.

With Stacey King and Mookie Blaylock, Oklahoma also goes into post-season play with the league's top two individual point-producers. King, the 6-11 senior center, also led the rebounders.

Elsewhere Saturday in Big Eight regular season finales, it was Kansas 79, Oklahoma State 78 and and No. 7 Missouri 66, Colorado 65, in what nearly became the upset of the year.

The Tigers, though, used Greg Church's last-second heroics at the free-throw line to wrap up a 24-7 overall record and a 10-4, second-place finish in the Big Eight. Colorado, which has lost 59 of its last Big Eight road games, finished 7-20, 2-12.

Cowboys dominate Big 8 wrestling meet

By The Associated Press

AMES, Iowa — Oklahoma State earned three individual championships and advanced all 10 of its wrestlers to the NCAA meet Sunday in winning its third straight Big Eight Conference title.

Chris Barnes won his second consecutive championship at 177 pounds to lead the Cowboys, who compiled 95 points to hold off challengers Iowa State and Oklahoma.

Iowa State's Tim Krieger became the fourth Big Eight wrestler to win four league crowns and teammate Eric Voelker captured his third title as the Cyclones finished with 82 points and four champions.

Iowa State won three of four head-to-head matches with Oklahoma State in the finals, but still couldn't catch the Cowboys, who began the championship round with an 85½ -70 lead. Nine Iowa State wrestlers qualified for the NCAA meet, which is March 16-18 at Oklahoma City.

Oklahoma had two champions and 62¼ points, followed by Nebraska with 39½ points and one champion and Missouri with 14½ points. Only five Big Eight schools have wrestling.

"Our goal was to qualify 10 people (for the NCAA meet) and get all of them seeded in the top 12," said Oklahoma State coach Joe Seay, whose team is ranked second nationally. "I think we'll get a seed for everyone except our heavyweight.

"But to be honest, it doesn't really matter if you're seeded or not. It's so many matches in a row. You have to prepare for one match at a time and then get ready for the next one. That's how we're going to approach it."

Oklahoma State is the only one of the top contenders for the NCAA title to qualify all 10 wrestlers. Defending champion Arizona advanced eight, as did No. 1-ranked Iowa, Michigan and Penn State.

Tennis team blanks Tulsa

The winning streak continues.

Chalk up yet another victory for the Wildcat netters as the K-State women's tennis team defeated Tulsa, 9-0, Friday night in Ahearn Field House to remain undefeated this season.

The evening went well for K-State, which Coach Steve Bietau had anticipated going into the match. Although Tulsa was not as challenging as other schools that the team has faced, he said the girls were able to keep their momentum going throughout the line-up.

"We weren't challenged a lot, except at No.1 singles," Bietau said. "Even so, the players did a good job of keeping their intensity up through the entire meet, so I was happy about that."

Marijke Nel also had a much better weekend than she has recently. Nel had a solid win at No.2 singles, and teamed with Valerie Rive', easily defeated Tulsa's No.2 doubles team. Nel has lately been battling some inconsistency, but Bietau said he was pleased with her performance this weekend.

Sophomore Miste Bitner saw some action in the singles line-up, as she sucessfully took over the No.5 spot to defeat Tulsa's Nikki Edwards, 6-0, 6-0.

Another new addition was featured in singles play as freshman Wendy Calta assumed the No.6 position to take an impressive 6-2, 6-0 win for the Wildcats.

Both Bitner and Calta have been strong contenders for singles spots throughout the season, and after the doubles rounds Bietau said the team was in a good position to give them the chance to gain some experience.

The meet scheduled for Saturday against Illinois was cancelled due to bad weather.

Singles results

Helen Schildknecht, K-State, def. Laura Uebanks, Tulsa, 6-1, 6-7 (7-4), 6-1.

Wendy Calta, K-State, def. Debbie Beaver, Tulsa, 6-2, 6-0.

Doubles results

Schildknecht/Bitner downed Uebanks/Westfall, 6-1, 6-2.

Nel/Rive defeated Fitzsimmons/Brown, 6-2, 6-4.

OU guard arrested Sunday

By The Associated Press

NORMAN, Okla. — Oklahoma guard Daron "Mookie" Blaylock was arrested Sunday for alleged public drunkenness following a report of an argument at a convenience store, police said.

Blaylock, 21, was arrested shortly after 4 a.m. and booked into the Cleveland County jail on a municipal public drunkness complaint, said police Sgt. Olan Nystrom.

He was released on bond and is expected to appear next week in municipal court.

A convenience store employee called police to the store because Blaylock was arguing with a female companion, Nystrom said.

"He displayed the characteristics of an intoxicated person," Nystrom said. "He was arrested for public intoxication."

Ukrainians mark death of Stalin by forming group

By The Associated Press

KIEV, U.S.S.R. — About 5,000 Ukrainians on Sunday marked the 36th anniversary of dictator Josef Stalin's death by forming a group to expose his crimes, but they saved much of their energy for what they see as current repression.

"Our aim is to fight against modern Stalinism," Villan Ochakievsky, a Ukrainian activist freed from imprisonment in a mental hospital last summer, told the crowd.

"Stalinism Lives!" shouted Volodimir Solopenko. He told the crowd four activists were arrested in this Ukrainian capital 10 days ago for organizing a legal demonstration. One of the four was beaten in jail and sent to a hospital, where he has begun a hunger strike, Solopenko alleged.

More than 2,000 people heard speakers express similar sentiments in Moscow in a rally organized by Memorial, the parent group of the one founded Sunday in Kiev. The Moscow crowd, huddling under a canopy in Gorky Park, applauded vigorously when literary critic Yuri Koryakin linked Politburo member Yegor K. Ligachev to Stalinism and demanded his resignation.

"Democracy Yes! Stalinism No!" one banner at the Moscow meeting read. "For a Society Without Executioners and Victims," read another.

More than 100 groups nationwide are campaigning for construction of monuments to Stalin's victims, but they also take up a wide range of issues.

The 5,000 people gathered in front of Kiev's Republic Stadium formed the new group. The meeting ended with adoption of resolutions calling for a national day of mourning for the victims of Stalin and opening of secret police archives.

The group also demanded legalization of the Ukrainian Catholic Church, rehabilitation and compensation of dissidents and the release of Ukrainian human rights activist Anatoly Ilchenko from imprisonment in a psychiatric hospital.

Stalin, who ruled from 1924 until his death on March 5, 1953, has been blamed for the arrests, killings, or other repression of 40 million Soviets.

President Mikhail S. Gorbachev resumed a campaign begun by Premier Nikita S. Khrushchev to clear the names of Stalin's victims and acknowledge the extent of the dictator's crimes.

Security agents did not interfere with the four-hour meeting.

Kiev's prosecutor, Vladimir I. Shevchenko, made a reference at the rally to a mass grave at Bykovnia, a village outside Kiev. Activists say as many as 300,000 bodies were dumped in the mass grave. Three government commissions had blamed the Nazis, who occupied the village from 1941 to 1943, but villagers say the killers were Stalin's secret police.

Opera company's return moving

By Chappell White
Contributing Writer

A near-capacity crowd braved a late winter storm Friday night to welcome the New York City Opera National Company in its return to McCain Auditorium for what has now become almost a ritual on the K-State cultural calendar.

The audience was rewarded with a moving and occasionally brillant performance of one of the central masterpieces of the Italian operatic repertory, Giuseppe Verdi's "La Traviata."

"La Traviata" is the quietest of all Verdi's great tragedies, the only one that is in any sense a drawing-room drama. No one is murdered; vengence and jealousy are minor aspects of the story; and the "lost one" of the title dies quietly at home.

The characters are affluent enough to give the opportunity for at least some brilliance of staging, but they are people of little consequence, not heros and heroines battling a malign fate. "La Traviata" is the sad story of unlucky love. It is also uniquely moving — Verdi at the height of lyrical powers, without bombast, bloodshed or horror.

The central figure of the drama, the one that touches us most directly, is Violetta, the title role. Fortunately for the production, the role was in the capable hands of Sandra Ruggles.

Ruggles' voice is not especially rich in variety of color, and it acquires a slight harsh edge occasionally when forced in the upper registers. But she sang always with dramatic conviction and a good sense of Verdi's soaring lines, and her technique is secure. Her rendition of "Sempre libera" in the first act, probably the most famous and certainly the most appropriate of cabalettas, was satisfactorily brilliant and especially notable for the sense of desperation that underlies her determined gaiety.

Review

Ruggles' voice is at its best in floating half voice passages, and she used these with fine dramatic sense. All in all, it was a consistant and convincing portrayal both musically and dramatically.

In the leading male role of Alfredo, Robert Brubaker displayed a strong, well-focused tenor. Occasionally, a characteristic Verdian tune lacked clarity, perhaps because of a tempo somewhat faster than necessary, but such rare minor details detracted not at all from his characterization. Like Ruggles, Brubaker knows the difference between declamation and melody, and he has the voice to make the most of the high lyrical moments.

Compared to the romantic leads, Germont is a minor role. However, he is a key figure, and his long scene with Violetta is one of the most significant and impressive in the entire drama.

If Germont were to emerge here as a dry or cruel character, much of the pathos of the final tragedy would be lost, and Verdi composed the scene with consummate care and inspiration. Ron Peo's powerful baritone gave us a Germont of dignity and determined force, but possessed of innate sympathy.

One of the most impressive aspects of the national company is the quality of minor roles. James Wood as the Baron; Barbara Rearick as Annina; Donna Stephenson as Flora; Stephan Kirchgraber as Dr. Grenvil; Mark Tobias, Mark Moliterno and Mark Calkins as other party guests; even Eric McCluskey with a very brief appearance as a messenger all displayed fresh voices and convincing stage presence. The chorus, somewhat smaller than usual for "La Traviata", sang with more vigor and better intonation than we often hear from opera choruses.

The orchestra also was smaller than the optimum size for Verdi. The intonation was generally satisfactory and the ensemble secure, but the string tone was a little thin, and the balance at climactic points left something to be desired. Perhaps because of the tonal limitations, or perhaps the result of six weeks on the road with the same work, the accentuation was sometimes carelessly rough and lacking in sensitivity.

Maestro Joshua Greene's tempos were occasionally pushed, causing minor ensemble difficulties between the singers and the orchestra and losing a little of the spacious quality of Verdi's expansive melodies. But Greene's refusal to linger unduly over the details provided a welcome dramatic pacing.

This was a conventional production of "La Traviata," fortunately without the distortion and mannerism that seem to disfigure many operatic productions these days under the guise of originality. Peter Beck's single set served well for the four different scenes.

As with any effective production of "La Traviata," the real star of the evening was Giuseppe Verdi. No matter how familiar the tunes, they always go straight to the heart of the dramatic moment, from the feelings of the characters to the feeling of the audience — the creations of a master melodist and a master dramatist.

On this occasion, a good number of students responded to McCain Director Richard Martin's reduction in prices, and they responded with the rest of the audience to a throroughly professional performance of a masterful musical drama. The New York City National Opera Company is now this country's only major touring operatic troupe, and it is now virtually a tradition for K-State.

Honorary offers help with taxes

By Craig Hamrick
Collegian Reporter

Beta Alpha Psi accounting honorary is offering free federal and state tax help to individuals having trouble filling out their tax returns.

Members of the organization are available from 4 to 6:30 p.m. Mondays and Tuesdays at the Manhattan Public Library. They have been trained by the IRS as part of a program called Volunteer Income Tax Assistance.

Members of the honorary must be accounting majors with at least a 3.0 grade point average.

Johanna Lyle, Beta Alpha Psi faculty adviser, said VITA is designed to help individuals with low incomes who cannot afford professional tax preparation or non-English speaking people who cannot understand their tax returns.

In addition, she said students with simple tax returns can receive assistance through the program, or can ask questions of the volunteers.

Jackie Ohm, senior in accounting and chairwoman of the VITA committee, said the volunteer work is required of the honorary's pledges. There are 51 volunteers.

"It's a good experience for them because it familiarizes them with the tax laws and it gives them an opportunity to see if this is something they might like to pursue as a career," Ohm said.

Maurice Stark, head of the accounting department, was the Beta Alpha Psi adviser 10 years ago when the organization began offering tax assistance. He said the program is as beneficial to the volunteers as it is to the individuals who are seeking help.

"It's good experience for the students to get practice filling out the returns," Stark said. "One of the goals of Beta Alpha Psi is to perform a service for K-State students and the community of Manhattan, and the VITA program fits well into that goal."

Lisa Harms, junior in accounting, is one of the volunteers. She said she will be able to make use of the training she received.

"The training sessions (provided by the IRS) lasted three hours and took three nights," she said. "We had to learn how to fill out all the different forms, which I think will help me fill out my own forms in the future, and it will help me understand my accounting classes a little better."

Although it is early in the tax season, Lyle said few people have been seeking help. The volunteers have been available since the first week of February and will be at the library each week until April 11.

"It will start getting busier as the deadline for filing gets closer," Lyle said. "Most people haven't even stopped to think about their taxes yet."

Those seeking help should bring this year's tax package, wage and earning statements, W-2s, interest statements from banks, 1099s, and other relevant information about income and expenses.

Driver runs red light, passenger trains collide

By The Associated Press

LONDON — The driver of a passenger train said Sunday that he went through a red light before slamming into the rear of another train and killing five people, a British Rail official said.

But there was evidence that driver David Morgan tried to stop the train long before the red signal, said Gordon Pettitt, general manager of British Rail's Southern Region.

Morgan was among 94 people injured Saturday afternoon when two London-bound passenger trains traveling from southern England wound up on the same stretch of northbound track and collided.

Authorities said Morgan's train, traveling from Littlehampton, struck the rear of a train traveling from Horsham near Purley Station outside London.

The Horsham train was crossing from a slow track onto the main line when it was hit from behind by the other train, they said.

Thirty-one victims remained hospitalized Sunday, 10 in serious condition, Scotland Yard said.

Pettitt said there is no evidence of sabotage and no defects have been found in the signaling equipment near the location of the collision.

"Human error is certainly a factor in our investigation, among other things," he said.

Pettitt said Morgan "has told us that the signal at the end of the platform at Purley Station was red, yet he went through it."

"He has not been able to offer any explanation for that," Pettitt told a news conference.

He added that Morgan was hospitalized and "obviously injured and in shock.

"The safety of our signaling system does obviously depend on drivers stopping at red lights. It did not stop," Pettitt added. "We have a system of multiple signaling where a driver gets an indication of a red light three sections back."

"We have quite a lot of evidence that a severe brake application was made prior to the collision and long before the signal," Pettitt said.

Artistic director specializes in fights

By Todd Jenkins
Collegian Reporter

The 17th century play "The Rover," has many combat scenes that require hours of preparation by actors. The job of making these sequences look realistic belongs to John Robert Beardsley, artistic director and fight master in the Society of American Fight Directors.

"He is by far the most exciting artist ever to accept a residency here, and I personally learned more from him in two weeks than I have learned from so many others in two years," said Charlotte MacFarland, instructor of speech. "He doesn't just train fighters, he trains fighter-actors. I was always excited during the combat sequences, but never worried. I would recommend him without reservation to anyone."

Hired last year by MacFarland, Beardsley worked on the production of "Romeo and Juliet."

"Evidently they liked what they saw and they hired me back for 'The Rover,'" he said.

Beardsley lives in San Francisco and runs a company called "Touche Unlimited." He also has a school called "The Academy of The Sword."

"We teach a non-violent theatrical martial arts form that is rooted in the Western European culture," Beardsley said. "It has a lot to do with music and dance. We mix some slight of hand in it and some sensationalism like explosions and people falling."

Beardsley worked on seven fight scenes during his stay from Feb. 27 until Sunday for the production.

"The movement must be inherent in the body — if they (the actors) are thinking about which way to step, they can't act right," Beardsley said. "They work that daily over and over again, until they get it down and then we can change the timing and make them look dangerous."

The production's fight scenes will include a wide variety of different actions.

"They are using steel meshed glove and cloak, there is a lot of sword play, a lot of action, a lot of fisticuffs, people hitting people in the mouth and several large battles," Beardsley said.

The play "The Rover" by Aphra Behn will run April 6 through April 8, and April 12 through April 15 at Nichols Theatre.

Wall like prison, student says

West Germans accustomed to Berlin Wall, not theory

By Bryan Ackley
Collegian Reporter

Some West Germans may have become accustomed to the Berlin Wall, but it's not likely they will ever accept the ideology it represents, said Bernd Schroeder, graduate student in mathematics.

Schroeder lived in West Germany, less than 200 meters from the wall.

"I've been brought up with it," Schroeder said. "When I was a kid, I thought that all countries of the world were surrounded by a wall."

Schroeder said he remembers the speech by former President Ronald Reagan asking Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev to make a step toward peace between the United States and the Soviet Union by tearing down the Berlin Wall.

Individuals should not take Reagan's proposal too seriously, Schroeder said.

"People are always talking about tearing down the wall, but it will be, in the end, only a symbolic act of two large military blocks coming together," he said.

The United States and Soviet Union may benefit from the destruction of the wall, but this may not be the best course of action for reconciling the differences between East and West Germany because extreme political and lifestyle differences will continue to exist, Schroeder said.

"Everybody wants to reunite Germany," he said. "The Federal Republic (West Germany) would like to have all of Germany in the same system as the Federal Republic is right now, but the German Democratic Republic (East Germany) would also like the whole of Germany to be under the system of the GDR."

"When I was a kid, I thought that all countries of the world were surrounded by a wall."
—Bernd Schroeder graduate student in mathematics

Adrian Feich, graduate student in computer science, is a West German citizen born in Poland. He has lived in East Germany and has visited the Soviet Union.

Feich said that because East German people are poor and have little freedom, they are dependent on each other for survival.

In contrast, West Germans have freedoms similar to Americans, and a capitalist system makes individuals less caring about fellow citizens, he said.

"(The West German government) says the wall has to come down and the border has to be opened, but they don't do anything to achieve this goal," Feich said. "The East German government claims the only reason the wall is still up is because the West German government doesn't recognize East German citizenship.

It is more difficult to cross the border from East Germany to West Germany than it is from West Germany to East Germany, Feich said.

"The first time I saw the wall, I was very depressed. It's hard to imagine — it's like you're in prison," he said.

Within the past 10 years, the East German government has permitted more East Germans to travel to West Germany, but the government still imposes travel restrictions on its citizens, Feich said.

For example, if an East German family wants to travel to West Germany, at least one member of the family — a spouse or child — must stay in East Germany to ensure the travelers will return to the country.

Christof Ebert, freshman in computer science, said during the time he lived in West Germany, individuals who fled East Germany by climbing the Berlin Wall were usually either attacked by guard dogs or shot by the East German soldiers guarding the wall.

Schroeder and Feich estimated 100 to 150 escapees are shot each year by East German soldiers.

Ebert, Schroeder and Feich said relationships between East and West Germany tend to improve as U.S.-Soviet relations improve, but Europeans are more attentive to Gorbachev's decisions because he has the potential to retain his position longer than American presidents.

Most Europeans do not fear traveling to the Soviet Union, Ebert said.

"You hear stories and know that everyone you see might be (KGB)," he said. "You're a little bit scared, but I don't think it's a real jeopardy."

Schroeder said he would not fear KGB, the Soviet secret police, any more than he fears the CIA in the United States.

Ebert said he wished the wall had not been built because he considers East and West Germans to be "one people"; however, none of the three students expects the wall to be torn down.

Men sentenced for killing

By The Associated Press

CALTANISETTA, Italy — A court has sentenced three men to life imprisonment for the 1983 killing of an assistant state prosecutor who was investigating the Mafia.

One of them, Antonio Salvatore Minore, is a reputed Mafia figure who is a fugitive. He was convicted and sentenced Saturday for ordering the killing of Giangiacomo Ciaccio Montaldo.

The court sentenced two other men to 10- and 14-year prison terms for Mafia association. Three people were acquitted.

Montaldo was shot in his car on an isolated mountain road in western Sicily in January 1983.

He had collated a dossier on Mafia drug and money-laundering operations that vanished after his death, state television said.

Montaldo accused many politicians of working with criminals and was known for his outspoken attacks on them.

Company provides stock for annual competition

By Linda Kleiner
Collegian Reporter

Floyd Rumford Jr., a cowboy with silver-white hair, neatly trimmed mustache and silver-colored western hat, can be seen behind the bucking chutes pulling flank straps on the Rumford Rodeo Co. bucking stock.

This cowboy is more than just a rodeo lover involved with the weekend's events in Weber Arena — he has provided the stock for the K-State Rodeo for 32 of its 33 years of existence.

In 1956, "the first (K-State) rodeo was held out on a side hill," Rumford said.

The second year's rodeo was moved into Ahearn Field House.

During one of the rodeos, "it cost me several hundred dollars when a bull got out of Ahearn," Rumford said. "The bull went through an open door at a fraternity house close by.

"The house mother was in another room and heard all the ruckus. When she opened the door and saw that bull looking at her, she shut the door quick."

Although the bull did no damage, Rumford said, the pick-up man who followed the bull on horseback left horseshoe imprints in the fraternity's tile floor.

Rumford began his business 37 years ago after a tractor accident injured his leg and prevented him from rodeo competition.

"I wanted to stay connected in some way with rodeo," he said.

In the first rodeo he contracted, Rumford's cattle were used for bull riding, steer wrestling and roping, and his ranch horses were used as broncs.

Rumford's friends organized his first rodeo, which was in Sterling, because he was still recuperating from his accident, Rumford said.

"(My friends) thought I was coming in an ambulance to be there, but I knew I wasn't," he said.

The company has grown from contracting four rodeos during a summer to averaging 30 rodeos a year, Rumford said.

He has contracted with rodeos in 84 Kansas towns and has contributed to rodeos in 19 states, including the Professional Rodeo Cowboy Association's national finals.

"It is prestigious to get to go (to the PRCA finals)," Rumford said. "Several stock contractors don't even have animals there."

Rumford had 11 bucking horses and two bucking bulls at the national finals last year.

The stock company is a family one. His wife, Lola, their sons, Bronc and Tommy, and their families help care for the stock.

The Rumfords own 40 bucking bulls, 300 horned cattle, 100 roping calves and more than 100 horses, he said. In addition, they farm several hundred acres of land.

Rumford has no plans to retire. He has transferred some of the management responsibilities to his sons, but intends to remain active.

watching from the stands when he was thrown from his bull in the finals. She said she tries not to worry about him getting injured.

"I feel like he's good enough that he knows what he's doing," Harris said.

Because Kiefer's father is a professional rodeo competitor, he has been involved with rodeos all his life. He started riding bulls when he was 8.

"It was kind of scary then, but now it seems like I worry more about the competition than riding," Kiefer said. "You get to where you want to win so bad that there's nothing else on your mind."

Kiefer said at most rodeos, contestants must pay an entry fee and the 10 finalists collect cash prizes.

"It's always nice to win, especially if next month's rent is at stake," he said.

Kiefer, a senior in criminal justice, is president of Rodeo Club, the sponsor of the rodeo.

Merle Flinn, sponsor of the Rodeo Club, said about 5,000 spectators attended the rodeo throughout the weekend events.

"We always get the biggest crowd of all the rodeos in the region," Flinn said. "We were really pleased with the turnout, and it was a real good rodeo."

Of the six K-State students who reached the finals, only Mark Boor, senior in agricultural education, placed. He tied for first in the bull-riding competition.

During the finals on Sunday, Bobbie Ward, sophomore in home economics education, was crowned K-State Rodeo Queen. She will be eligible for the national competition in Boseman, Mont. in June.

Like Bakes, the union's negotiator expressed sympathy for airline passengers.

"We feel very bad and certainly apologize for inconvenience to the traveling public, but the president obviously is ignoring his responsibility," Charles Bryan, negotiator for the Machinists union, said Sunday.

New Lafene director appointed

Zweimiller to take on position

By Lance E. Schwulst
Collegian Reporter

Orlando "Lannie" Zweimiller, newly appointed director of Lafene Student Health Center, said dramatic increases in malpractice insurance rates have begun to drive Kansas-trained doctors to practice in other states.

"There has to be some relief for the physicians," Zweimiller said. "There has to be a change in the law so that the (malpractice) awards are not so astronomical."

Zweimiller was selected from a pool of 58 applicants for the position, which pays an annual $40,000, said Mike Lynch, vice-president for academic assistance and chair of the search committee for the position.

"There has to be some relief for the physicians."
—Orlando Zweimiller director-elect

He will begin his post March 27.

Lynch said the search committee was looking for a candidate with "strong fiscal management" skills.

"Zweimiller has had an extensive background in health care administration," he said. "He has the skills we were looking for in this position."

Prior to his position as administrator at Wamego City Hospital, Zweimiller was the administrator of the Kansas Institute in Olathe where he oversaw the private psychiatric hospital, Lynch said.

Zweimiller received a Masters of Hospital Administration in 1981 from the Universtity of Minnesota, and has had several other administrative positions in the medical field.

Zweimiller said he does not anticipate his new job as director of Lafene to be much different from his job at Wamego City Hospital.

"The small rural hospital is going through a lot of the same financial problems as Lafene," he said. "The medical malpractice premium problem is just as acute at Lafene as it is in Wamego."

Staff/Greg Vogel
Orlando "Lannie" Zweimiller, newly appointed director of Lafene Student Health Center, was selected from a pool of 58 applicants for the $40,000-a-year salaried position. He will begin work on March 27.

After the resignation of Lafene's director, Robert Tout, a new administrative structure utilizing a chief of staff and director was adopted.

"By splitting the responsibilities in two, we are getting the best of both worlds," Lynch said. "It will also save Lafene about $50,000 per year."

As director, Zweimiller will be responsible for the fiscal and managerial duties. Dr. Larry Moeller, Lafene chief of staff, will oversee the quality of medical care.

Although Wamego City Hospital does not have the same administrative structure as Lafene, Zweimiller said the system is not unfamiliar to him.

"I certainly do anticipate that Dr. Moeller and I will be able to work well together," he said.

"I'm really pleased he's coming aboard," Moeller said. "After spending one-on-one time with the final four candidates, Zweimiller became my first choice.

"Zweimiller comes to us with good managerial and fiscal skills. He's not only competent, but he has a lot of staying power."

K-State and Wamego are similar, Zweimiller said.

"Kansas State is a community just like Wamego," he said. "You have to find out what the needs are and meet those within the existing financial constraints."

Student Senate's decision to raise the health fee would alleviate many of the constraints at Lafene, Zweimiller said.

"(The fee increase) won't be enough for new programs, but it will maintain the existing programs and services," he said. "The K-State students showed a real committment to preserving student health services."

Zweimiller said he would like to be able to implement additional education and outreach programs through Lafene.

"The bottom line is that we are here for the student and how we can service the student better.

"I'm not running away from Wamego," Zweimiller said. "I've always enjoyed the academic community and I want to make a significant contribution to the K-State students."

Eastern Airlines halts operations due to walkout

By The Associated Press

Strike-crippled Eastern Airlines shut down nearly all operations Monday and idled 5,000 workers, saying it could not afford to maintain its business because pilots were honoring a 3-day-old Machinists walkout.

"We can cannot run an airline with unpredictability," Eastern spokesman Robin Matell said in Miami. "We cannot continue to inconvenience passengers. We cannot afford the steady financial drain."

He said its shuttle service in the Northeast would continue on a limited basis.

Earlier Monday, Eastern asked a federal judge in Miami to order pilots to return to work.

Eastern had canceled almost all flights Monday but had supervisors haul baggage and de-ice planes to keep its profitable Northeast shuttle flying some of its scheduled trips between New York, Boston and Washington despite a snowstorm.

Pilots nationwide planned a job action starting this morning that threatens to delay every flight on every airline.

Eastern pilots have honored a strike by 8,500 mechanics and ramp service workers that began Saturday after a 17-month labor dispute. The strike has grounded most flights, stranded thousands of passengers and pushed the nation's seventh-largest airline to the brink of collapse.

Matell said Eastern would continue three flights per week to Santiago, Chile, and Buenos Aires, Argentina.

He said the 5,000 idled employees were being notified immediately and the airline would pay them "a certain amount."

Proposed road affects children's playground

By Chris Koger
Staff Writer

A proposed road that will allow access from North Manhattan Avenue to Mid Campus Drive is causing concern among staff members and parents of children at the Hoeflin Stone House.

Tentative plans call for the road to intersect North Manhattan Avenue across from McCain Lane, access residence hall parking lots B-3 and B-16, then end on Mid Campus Drive across from the Pittman Building. In order to do this, the road will pass through the northern part of what is now the Hoeflin Stone House playground.

Lou West, director of the Stone House, said she was not aware of the proposed road until Monday or Tuesday of last week.

"I don't think anyone knew about this except those in the campus planning department," West said. "I realize this is progress, but I wish there were alternate plans."

Larry Garvin, director of facilities planning, said he plans to meet with Stone House faculty Wednesday to address their concerns about the road's placement.

"I'll listen to comments and criticisms and my hope is that we will eventually reach a consensus and develop a plan that reflects the concerns," Garvin said. "The plans are tentative; they are not set."

The road would be the first step in a long-range proposal to relocate the power plant and facilities management to the vicinity of Call and Weber Halls, he said. The University also intends to pave lots B-3 and B-13 as part of the long-range proposal.

None of these projects are in the five-year University plan, and are not yet funded, Garvin said.

Athletic fee discussion, campaign continue

Senators may declare vote invalid

By Alan Wilds
Staff Writer

Students may have to wait to vote on the proposed athletic fee.

Although Student Senate approved sending the proposed athletic fee to referendum Thursday, Student Body President Laurian Cuffy said too many problems exist in how the proposal was considered and he wants Senate to reconsider the issue.

A special session of Senate will convene at 8 tonight to discuss the merits of the athletic fee.

Cuffy said he didn't believe appropriate discussion occurred regarding the details of the KSU Athletic Department's request.

Thursday night's debate focused on whether the Senate should vote to pass the bill on a two-thirds majority vote or have the student body consider it in referendum, Cuffy said.

Questions about the athletic department's goals, handling of money within the department and justification for the amount of the fee are issues that should have been discussed, he said.

"They neglected to discuss whether or not an athletic fee was justified," Cuffy said. "The whole debate focused on procedural issues and not money issues."

Todd Johnson, Student Senate chairman, said although debate did focus on the procedure, ample opportunity existed for questions in the three previous meetings when athletic department officials were present to provide information.

Johnson also said much debate on the fee was done in committee.

Cuffy said questions about the details of the athletic department's request were only raised at about 3:30 a.m. Friday by Rattan Nath, graduate senator, after several hours of discussion on procedures.

"The senator engaged in something very close to a filibuster when another senator stood up and called for the orders of the day," Cuffy said.

He said this motion was placed on the floor, voted on and passed, preventing further discussion.

"The senator's intent was to prevent the discussion or filibuster, but what it did was remove the question from the floor," Cuffy said. "By passing this motion they didn't want to look further at the bill because of lack of focus due to lateness of the evening."

Johnson said the motion for orders of the day is a procedural mechanism used to run meetings and could have no bearing on the constitutionality of the bill.

Although the process of the motion was not handled correctly, the intent of the motion was understood by Senate and a ruling was made by the chairman. Because no one objected before the end of the meeting, the ruling stands, Johnson said.

Cuffy also questioned the constitutionality of the method by which the bill would become law.

The initial bill was written so that Senate must have a two-thirds majority vote to approve it. If passed, the issue would have been sent to referendum, where it would have had to be approved by a simple majority of the student body in order to become law.

"That is unconstitutional, because the (Student Governing Association) Constitution clearly states that Senate can vote and pass with two-thirds vote any particular fee or fee increase or that Senate can choose to pass by simple majority the intention to send the question to the student body for a referendum," Cuffy said. "But you can't do both."

According to the Constitution, the referendum requirement states if at least one-third of the entire student body votes, only a simple majority is needed to pass it. A two-thirds majority would be required to pass a bill if less than one-third of student body votes.

Cuffy said Senate cannot say it is going to pass a bill on a two-thirds majority vote, while also requiring a simple majority vote within the student body to enact a law.

Marketing plan focuses on students' awareness

By Alan Wilds
Staff Writer

Despite a delay in the approval of the athletic fee by Student Senate, the KSU Athletic Department is continuing a high-intensity marketing campaign to inform students of the fee, said Steve Miller, athletic director.

"Anything anybody wants to know, they will know," Miller said.

A step-by-step process has been designed for the campaign, said Chris Peterson, assistant athletic director in charge of marketing and sales.

"We want students to know what the fee will give them," Peterson said.

Miller said the athletic department plans to visit 35 or 40 living groups and present them with facts about the fee.

"We want students to know where the money is going," he said.

In a pamphlet distributed to students and senators, the department explains how revenue from the fee would be distributed. It reports that $170,000 of the fee will be allocated for a scholarship fund for non-revenue sports, $125,000 for football recruiting, $42,400 for basketball recruiting and travel, $47,011 for academic counseling, $42,535 for drug testing and $10,000 for club teams.

"Our ultimate goal is to present the facts and let the students decide," Peterson said.

Students have not been well-informed because the athletic department agreed with Student Senate not to conduct any public promotions on the fee until a referendum had been voted on in Senate, Miller said.

The athletic department is "selling investment facts and stressing that we do not want the athletic fee money to cover our deficit," Peterson said.

He said fact sheets will be distributed to give students an idea of the department's budget, statistics and

Britain suffers excess of rats

LONDON — Wintertime, and the living is easy in the kingdom of Rattus norvegicus, the common brown rat which has become uncommonly numerous around Britain.

Complaints about rats are up as much as 70 percent in parts of London, which has had just a touch of slush during a very mild winter. Similar increases have been reported in Bristol, Manchester and other large cities.

"I've never, never known such a year," said Stuart Slater, chief environmental services officer of Babergh District Council northeast of London. "I haven't had a Saturday off since the end of November."

Norman Foster, health officer for the Mid-Suffolk Council, said he received 1,323 rat complaints last winter. This year, he had matched that total by late December — before winter had officially begun.

Rentokil, one of Britain's largest exterminators, has doubled its sales of poisons this winter, said Peter Bateman, the company's director of public relations.

With the increase in rats, there has been a growing concern about Weil's disease, which is spread by rat urine in water. The ailment used to be seen mostly in miners and sewer workers, but cases have cropped up among water skiers and canoeists.

Soviets line up for rock music

MOSCOW — Hundreds of enthusiastic young Soviets lined up in a snowstorm outside record stores Monday to buy a new album by two dozen of the West's biggest rock stars, and authorities erected steel barricades and dispatched police to control the crowd.

The hoopla was especially great on Kalinin Prospekt outside the Melodiya store, where British rocker Peter Gabriel and Annie Lennox of Eurythmics autographed copies of "Breakthrough."

A police guard was posted at the door, and a steel barricade was set up on the sidewalk as Soviets wearing traditional Russian fur hats and Western-style ski caps massed.

Melodiya, the name of the state's record company as well as record stores, is notorious for small pressings of popular albums, especially rock, and the initial pressing of 500,000 copies of "Breakthrough" was likely to last just a couple of days — if not hours. Melodiya plans to release 3 million copies, as well as 500,000 cassettes, in this country of 285 million people.

Police fire on Tibetan rioters

BEIJING — Police opened fire on Tibetan protesters who marched through Lhasa and burned Chinese businesses Monday in a second straight day of violence. Four Tibetans were reported killed.

Security forces moved into the city's Tibetan section and pulled people from their homes, taking some away in jeeps, American tourists said. Chinese troops also beat Tibetans, said the travelers, who spoke on condition of anonymity for fear of police reprisal.

"One boy's face was completely bloodied," said a man from New Orleans. "He was no older than 10. Blood was coming from his ears, his eyes."

Kansas crime rate increases

TOPEKA — Sparked by a 4.5 percent increase in robberies, the state's violent crime rate rose by 1 percent between 1987 and 1988, the Kansas Bureau of Investigation reported Monday.

Decreases in murders, rapes and thefts made the state's overall crime rate drop by 1.4 percent.

Burglaries led the increases, up 4.9 percent for 1988, while robberies increased 4.5 percent and aggravated assaults rose 0.9 percent.

The statistics comparing the two years were compiled from reports filed by about 300 law enforcement agencies in Kansas, the KBI said.

The KBI makes public the crime statistics on a quarterly basis during the year. This report included the 12-month totals for 1988 and compared them to the 1987 totals.

The murder rate in Kansas dropped 20 percent in 1988, with 88 murders compared to 110 a year ago.

There were 755 reported cases of rape, a 4.2 decrease from 1987.

Among property crimes, thefts decreased 5.1 percent and motor vehicle thefts were down 1.5 percent.

The total number of crimes reported — both violent and those involving property — went down 1.4 percent, from 120,716 to 119,070.

State unemployment jumps

TOPEKA — Kansas' unemployment rate jumped to 5.2 percent in January, up from 4.8 percent in December, the state Department of Human Resources reported Monday.

The monthly report indicates that 66,313 people were unemployed in January, while 60,958 people were without jobs in December.

A year ago, in January 1988, there were 66,398 people searching for work in Kansas.

"January's labor force figures showed the effects of seasonal forces as winter curtailed outdoor activity," said Ray Siehndel, acting secretary of human resources.

"In addition, semester break at the state's colleges and universities also played a role in the reduced employment figures, as student workers left campus," he added.

The report showed 1,208,486 people on the job in January of this year, while 1,217,631 were working in December, and 1,203,597 in January 1988.

The report said there were seasonal losses in most major industries. In addition to construction and government, retail trade released temporary workers following the holiday season.

Mass celebrated in Latin

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — Roman Catholic traditionalists gathered Sunday for a Mass celebrated in Latin, with full approval of church authorities.

Several hundred worshippers, about evenly divided between younger and older people, attended the ceremony at St. Mary's-St. Anthony Catholic Church. It was celebrated by the Rev. Raymond Davern, pastor of the church. He said the Latin Tridentine Mass will be said every Sunday at 9:30 a.m. in the church, which will also continue to have Masses in English.

Mass was said in Latin for centuries until reforms made as a result of the Vatican II conference in 1962, which included a change to the vernacular language for the Catholic ceremony.

Parental consent bill passes Senate, moves on to House

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Senate passed a bill Monday that would require teen-age girls under 18 to obtain the consent of their parents or a judge before undergoing an abortion.

The so-called parental consent bill, which passed 32-8, now goes to the House.

The measure was approved after senators rejected two major attempts to amend the bill. One would have required only that parents be notified that their daughter was going to have an abortion, and another would have lowered the age from 18 to 16.

While requiring permission of at least one parent, a minor can circumvent her parents by seeking a court order to allow her to have the abortion. This judicial bypass is desgined for those pregnant girls who believe they cannot go to their parents.

Sen. Ed Reilly, R-Leavenworth, who carried the bill, said the measure would support families and put parents in a stronger position to assist their children.

"Sometimes I think the debate over the right of the parents to administer their families and govern their children gets mixed up with what abortion means," he said.

Physicians must have parental permission before performing almost any other medical procedure on children under 18, he said, except abortion. School nurses cannot even give an underage student aspirin without the consent of the student's parents, he added.

The bill would require any minor under 18 to obtain the written consent of at least one of her parents before she could undergo an abortion.

However, as an alternative, a girl could obtain a waiver of the consent requirement by petitioning in district court.

Soviet officials propose reducing troops, nuclear weapons in Europe

By The Associated Press

VIENNA, Austria — The Soviet Union proposed huge reductions in troops and armor and recommended Monday that the Warsaw Pact and NATO negotiate to eliminate all battlefield nuclear weapons from Europe.

Foreign Minister Eduard A. Shevarndadze's proposals went far beyond the reductions NATO plans to suggest at conventional arms talks that begin Thursday.

In a later speech, Secretary of State James A. Baker III told 35 foreign ministers gathered in a baroque palace that the West's goal, at least initially, is to reduce the Warsaw Pact's advantage in conventional forces.

"The Warsaw Pact's conventional military preponderance, especially in the spearheads of attack, is what makes an invasion possible," Baker said.

He urged Soviet President Mikhail S. Gorbachev to implement the "new thinking" that guides economic and political reform in the Soviet Union by renouncing the Brezhnev Doctrine "beyond any shadow of a doubt."

That doctrine permits military intervention in a Soviet bloc country in the event of a liberal insurrection. The late President Leonid I. Brezhnev enunciated it after the Red Army crushed the liberal "Prague Spring" of 1968 in Czechoslovakia.

"Those in the East should be free of the fear that armed Soviet intervention, justified by the Brezhnev Doctrine, would be used again to deny them choice," Baker said.

He also said Australia would organize a conference to prevent the spread of chemical weapons and the Bush administration was exploring ways to speed the removal of U.S. chemical weapons from West Germany.

Baker added, however: "Unilateral action is not enough. The Soviet Union has enormous stocks of chemical weapons threatening Europe. We therefore call on the Soviets to join us, to accelerate the destruction of their enormous stockpile of these frightening weapons."

In Bonn, Chancellor Helmut Kohl said: "I welcome this intention to explore ways for the early removal of chemical weapons from the Federal Republic."

Kohl's chief spokesman, Friedhelm Ost, said earlier Baker had telephoned the chancellor Sunday night and told him the aging U.S. chemical weapons would be withdrawn by 1992.

Shevardnadze countered a NATO proposal to retire at least 25,000 Warsaw Pact tanks, then reduce armor, artillery and personnel carriers on both sides by 5-10 percent, with a three-phase plan for radical cuts.

The foreign minister's arms reduction program went far beyond NATO's by adding missiles, combat aircraft and soldiers.

"Let me ask what kind of reductions are these if they do not affect the main component of armed forces — their personnel?" he said. "And surely airplanes and helicopters can be used for a surprise attack."

In the Soviet second phase, 500,000 men on each side would be demobilized.

According to the Union of Concerned Scientists, a private U.S. research group, the Warsaw Pact has 3.09 million soldiers and NATO more than 2.13 million. NATO spends about $300 billion a year to defend Western Europe, where 326,000 Americans are stationed.

As Shevardnadze explained it, the Soviet plan's progression would be:

- First phase, two to three years: Eliminate the imbalance in troops and arms, cutting 10 to 15 percent from the lowest numbers.
- Second, also two to three years: Reduce forces by another 25 percent and withdraw battlefield nuclear weapons to a safe distance from "the line of contact" between the military alliances. That would make much of West Germany, along with East Germany and Czechoslovakia, a nuclear-free zone.
- Third: Convert remaining forces to "a strictly defensive character."

While the reductions are made, Shevardnadze said, negotiations should be conducted on eliminating tactical nuclear weapons in Europe.

His proposal conflicts with the 40-year-old U.S. policy of deterring the Soviets with a mix of weaponry including battlefield nuclear arms, which have a maximum range of 300 miles.

Censorship bill gains House's approval

By Karen Allen
Staff Writer

The House's tentative approval Monday of a bill designed to limit public school officials' ability to censor student newspapers and yearbooks pleased local supporters of the legislation.

Rep. Sheila Hochhauser, D-Manhattan, said she believed the bill's approval was "in large part due to the well-spoken, articulate students who came from across the state to speak in favor of the bill."

"These students are bright enough to know what they are writing about," she said.

The bill, referred to as the Student Freedom of Expression Act, would prohibit principals and other administrators from censoring material simply because it deals with a political or controversial subject. It is a direct response to a 1988 U.S. Supreme Court ruling, in which the court upheld school officials' right to censor student publications.

The House voted 89-21 to advance the bill to a final vote, which is scheduled for today.

Dave Adams, executive secretary of the Journalism Education Association and director of Student Publications Inc., said the House's action was "typical of this populous spirit that is so much a part of Kansas politics."

Adams said that because the final tally shows a ratio of four representatives in favor for every one against, it reflects the idea that "we in Kansas are going to attempt to deal with it in our own way, despite what the Supreme Court said."

Rep. Katha Hurt, D-Manhattan, said she is confident the bill will pass and believes its passage "will curtail the movement of administrators" to restrict student publications.

In 1988, the Supreme Court ruled that students at a St. Louis (Hazelwood) high school did not have their First Amendment rights violated when their principal censored two pages of articles in 1983. One story dealt with students who had been pregnant, while another reported the effects of divorce on a student.

Hochhauser said the articles ruled on in the Hazelwood case were "topics that our high school students need to deal with."

"I'm pleased to see that it is bringing the pre-Hazelwood law back," she said.

Hurt said the problem with the Supreme Court's ruling is that constitutional law is subject to many interpretations, unlike statutory law.

"A statute is not so easily interpreted," she said.

Hochhauser said passing the Kansas statute "ensures (the students' rights) in a much more visible way."

The bill states, "The liberty of the press in student publications shall be protected. Material shall not be suppressed solely because it involves political or controversial subject matter."

The measure defines a student publication as a newspaper, yearbook or other materials published and distributed to students. The bill also says school officials can censor materials that are libelous, obscene or create a "material or substantial disruption of the normal school activity."

North's trial delays show flaws in character

Ollie North — hero or wuss? I've never been a big fan of the Lieutenant Colonel myself, but a few summers ago, as the nation was being swept off its feet by his nationally televised, gung-ho showdown with Congress, I wouldn't have thought him a sissy.

Even the more liberal observers of the whole affair grudgingly admired his boundless patriotism and courage. Although I found him offensive, disgusting and somewhat off his rocker, I had to admit that he was gusto personified; a true-to-life zealot ready to die for God and country at the drop of a hat.

Fortunately, these warm feelings for Ollie died off before Jerry Falwell could get a $25 check out of me for his Oliver North Defense Fund. I concluded that any display of patriotism and altruism as whopping as Ollie's had to be a put-on, that underneath the Marine uniform and the shiny medals was a real pansy, a bona fide candy ass.

And you know what? I was right.

North once claimed that the charges against him were a "badge of honor," but now that he's in federal court facing 12 criminal charges, he will stop at nothing to avoid them.

Last week, former National Security Adviser Robert McFarlane, the ultimate bureaucratic pencil-necked geek, accepted his badge of honor, his martyrdom, and pleaded guilty to the charges against him.

So what's with Ollie? Is he just too modest to accept his badges of honor? Or is there a yellow streak running down his backside?

Naturally, I wouldn't deny North the opportunity to defend himself in court. He's innocent until proven guilty. But the way North, with the aid of his lawyer, Brendan Sullivan, has chosen to defend himself can hardly be described as heroic.

North's main strategy can be most easily described as "graymail," which occurs when a defendant threatens to reveal government secrets in the course of a trial.

The 1980 Classified Information Procedures Act is intended to prevent such a coercive use of sensitive information. CIPA requires private hearings to determine the sensitivity of information before it is introduced as evidence.

North and Sullivan have managed to create huge delays in the trial by repeatedly bringing up documents which require a CIPA hearing, resulting in a sort of stop and go courtroom procedure which Judge Gerhard Gesell refers to as a "cuckoo clock trial."

The general outline of what went on during the whole Iran-Contra fiasco is now known. Aside from the arms deals with Iran and the diversion of funds from the sales to the Contras, the White House used secret money, arms and CIA services to bribe other countries into supporting the Contras.

Commentary

What needs to be ascertained at the North trial is the Lieutenant Colonel's role in all of the dealings, or, more specifically, whether he embezzled some $30 million from the government to finance the Contras.

Granted, embezzlement is a pretty lame crime for a great American zealot, but this is the '80s. North supposedly lied to Congress because information regarding his role in the dealings would have led to a dangerous breach of national security.

"If the information that the officer (of a covert operation) is trying to protect gets out," Brendan Sullivan told the jury during his opening argument, "it can result in enormous harm to individuals and governments."

Such solemn concern for national security, however, has now taken a back seat to saving Ollie's butt.

North and Sullivan seem bent on introducing enough classified information into the trial to drag it out immeasurably and force a mistrial. In other words, North is threatening to spill the beans about the whole Iran-Contra unpleasantness if the government doesn't drop charges.

If the charges against North are such a "badge of honor" because he earned them in his fight for national security, why is he now disclaiming his right to that honor and threatening to destroy national security?

Why has he subpoenaed Ronald Reagan and George Bush, the men to whom he once pledged undying loyalty? Why is the man who willingly faced death on his mission to Iran now mortally afraid of spending the next fifteen years making license plates?

Will the real Ollie North please stand up?

Ollie made a heap of bucks off of the G.I. Joe image he created at the Iran-Contra hearings. He traveled coast to coast making speeches at $50,000 a pop, while dazzling American Legion conventions and Bible college campuses with stories of crazed terrorists and cloak-and-dagger action.

But now that he's looking at some serious prison shower action, Ollie's gone and changed his tune. Nowadays he's clinging to his high dollar attorney for dear life, getting help from the American Civil Liberties Union, and hoping to get off on a technicality — the same sort of legal "technicality" North maliciously disregarded while he was at the White House.

It's nice to see my feelings confirmed about North, but I doubt the trial, which may drag on for five months, will change anybody's mind about North. Either you love him or you hate him.

Those of us who hate him will have our feelings confirmed. Those who have elevated North into the annals of right-wing mythology will always call him a "Great American Hero."

I prefer "pantywaist" myself.

Health fee alterations beneficial for students

Fees, fees, fees.

It seems that everyone on campus is talking about fees — health fees, athletic fees, engineering fees or just plain general tuition increases.

While each fee by itself doesn't seem that large, add all of these proposed or passed fees together and they will take a substantial bite out of the average student's budget.

The average student. It seems to be a dying breed, yet on many issues, it seems to be the only group taken into consideration.

It's the same mindset of never mind the part-time students, the grad students, the non-traditional students, or even the vet-med students. It's the average student who is catered to.

Or used to be catered to, until Student Senate finally showed Thursday night that it is willing to change its plans by accommodating a group which was possibly disadvantaged by the approved health fee bill.

Student Senate altered the original health fee bill which would have charged part-time students an initial fee and a user fee for using Lafene Student Health Center. Under the amended legislation, part-time students will be charged a one-time fee of $25 in 1989 and $30 in 1990.

Student senators based their decision in part on the realization that part-time students use the facility only a small percentage of the time. And even more rarely do these students use the after-hours feature, which would be the first to be affected by the reduced funding.

Student Senate should be applauded for taking the time to correct its initial oversight. While the original legislation was called discriminatory by some senators, the amended version should go a long way toward encouraging part-time students and health fee opponents.

In any case, it is just a little less money for these students to pay for a service they rarely use and allow them to put those funds toward other projects that actually affect them.

Other Perspectives

Student Senators resolved Wednesday to urge the North Carolina State administration to abolish common exams and to make major changes in the advising system.

The senators spent more than 30 minutes debating the anti-common exam bill which said NCSU should abolish common exams and replace them with exams prepared and administered by instructors.

... the majority of senators agreed that common exams did not always cover the material students were taught by their professors. Most senators also agreed that common exams threaten the professor's teaching creativity.

Free press begins in childhood

Sometimes we need to be reminded that we must stir the muddy river bed in order to purify the stream. Those of us involved in scholastic journalism believe this is what is happening in the wake of the January 1988 Hazelwood decision by the U.S. Supreme Court. Rather than to decry what it did to students' rights, we have worked to let it evolve into a plus.

That plus is the recent legislation, House Bill 2234. We feel especially positive about this legislation because it is evidence that administrators, members of school boards and teachers/advisers of scholastic journalism can work together toward a constructive goal.

As you are aware, from stories throughout the past week, a large group convened Feb. 27 before the House Education Committee to present oral hearings for this bill. Pat Baker, lobbyist for the Kansas Association of School Boards, presented arguments as well.

The past two days have been fruitful ones since both sides were willing to write compromise language that resulted in a bill now endorsed by both sides.

Editor's note: Jackie Engel is executive secretary of the Kansas Scholastic Press Association located at the University of Kansas.

One of the key points I made as executive secretary for this organization, the Kansas Scholastic Press Association, was that we are not enemies, but instead partners working together for a relevant school press that will offer viable opportunities to write on topics of concern to them as students of today and citizens of tomorrow.

Indeed, this would be a dangerous tool if these students did not have the guidance of a qualified adviser to advise them of the absolute necessity of printing the word accurately, responsibly, and at times with sensitivity as well as convincing them that school publications are not playthings but serious business.

Presently, we have in force a scare syndrome: the student is scared of the adviser, the adviser is scared of the principal, the principal is scared of the superintendent, the superintendent is scared of the school board, the school board is scared of the community that is composed largely of parents, who, in turn, are scared to death of their children.

Is there anything more lethal in a democracy than fear? When it is fostered in our schools it is especially frightening.

Media critic Ben Bagdikian has said, "If freedom of expression becomes merely an empty slogan in the minds of enough children, it will be dead by the time they become adults."

We would all agree that this prospect is frightening.

Please join with us in keeping this from happening by supporting the passage of House Bill 2234.

Road dangerous

Editor,

The Hoeflin Stonehouse Child Care Center is one of K-State's outstanding successes. It provides extremely high quality care for children of the K-State community.

It is difficult to understand, therefore, why the University would choose to compromise this facility by building an access road right through the playground of Stonehouse.

This is even more difficult to understand because there is access to this parking lot just to the south of Stonehouse. Why, then, is another road necessary just to the north of Stonehouse?

If this access road is part of the long-range planning to provide access for future constructions and absolutely no alternatives exist, why must this access road be completed now before provisions can be made to protect the children?

Why is such a road a secret until the day before it is surveyed?

Surely there are alternatives that would not compromise the safe and happy environment available at Stonehouse.

When high quality day care for our children is of critical importance to all members of the University community, and we have an ideal situation for at least some of our children, certainly a less destructive, better solution to the problem of parking lot access could be found.

Men's squad strong; women's healing

Staff/Greg Vogel

Ray Hill will enter the outdoor season with the distinction of being the conference's fastest man. Hill set Big Eight meet records in the 55 and 200 meters this season.

By Chris Hays
Sports Editor

The outdoor track season should look even more exciting to Coach John Capriotti after seeing what his men's and women's squads accomplished at the Big Eight Indoor Championships Feb 24-25.

K-State's men finished in a tie for second place, while the women placed fourth, just two points behind second-place Colorado. Capriotti said his outdoor squads could be even better, especially on the men's side.

Men's Outlook

"Our goal for the men is to win the conference outdoor meet," Capriotti said. "We are going to be very balanced. We're very good in the sprints and also in the field."

The latter is where Capriotti expects to catch indoor-champion Nebraska. With the addition of javelin and discus in the outdoor format, K-State looks to be a definite conference contender; leading the way will be all-American candidate Dan O'Mara.

O'Mara won the shot put title at the Big Eight Indoor and is the leading returnee among the conference's discus throwers.

"O'Mara may be an even better discus thrower than he is in the shot," Capriotti said. "We have Pat Allen returning in the javelin and O'Mara will also throw the javelin, so with the addition of those events in the outdoor season, it should really help us."

Two other events that will pick up with the outdoor season are the decathalon and the 3,000-meter steeplechase. K-State's decathletes are led by a pair of Wildcat basketball players, Steve Fritz and Steve Henson.

Fritz is a transfer from Hutchinson Community College where he won the junior college national decathalon title last year, compiling 7,015 points. Fritz and Henson, who scored 6,519 points at the Big Eight Outdoor last year, will be joined by Terry VanLaningham.

K-State returns the second- and fifth-place steeplechase athletes in the conference. Rob Hays took second at the Big Eight meet last year, while David Keller placed fifth.

Also returning for another outdoor season is the conference's defending high jump champion Brad Speer, who will team up with Chris Samuelson and R.D. Cogswell.

K-State's strongest area might be in the short sprints. The Wildcats boast three of the top five finishers in the 55-meter dash at the Big Eight Indoor. Ray Hill will enter the outdoor season with the distinction of being the conference's fastest man.

Hill set Big Eight Indoor records in the 55 and 200 meters this season. Right behind Hill were speedsters Darrell Wyatt and Charles Allen, giving K-State a solid sprint corps and a competitive 4x100-meter relay team.

In the longer sprints, the Wildcats will look strong with Sean Banks and Tyrone Watkins returning in the 400 meters. Both, along with Hill and Jeff Reynolds, were on K-State's record-breaking 4x400-meter relay team at the Big Eight Indoor. However, Reynolds does not have any outdoor eligibility left and will probably be replaced by Freshman Corey King.

In the distances, Pat Hessini and Brian Zwahlen will lead the Wildcats in the mile; David Warders and Jan Jonsson will be good bets in the 10,000 meters and Matt Vavala and Kevin Lashley will add depth in the steeplechase.

"Our goal for the men is to win the conference outdoor meet. We are going to be very balanced. We're very good in the sprints and also in the field."
—John Capriotti track coach

Hurdler Charles Armstead should provide the Wildcats with more point production. He was second in the 55-meter hurdles at the Big Eight Indoor. The conference's indoor long jump champion Clifton Etheridge also returns for K-State.

Women's Outlook

Capriotti will be looking for most of his distance corps to recover from off-season injuries. Distance runners Janet Haskin, Janet Treiber, Angie Barry and Laura Ostmeyer have been nursing injuries, as have sprinter Markeya Jones and multi-event athlete Marti Cisper.

"No. 1 we need to get back the majority of our injured people," Capriotti said. "We do that and we can compete for the top two or three spots at the conference meet.

"There are a lot of races that those people cover."

Only a few distance runners have not had injury problems and they include veterans Marge Eddy and Becky Ives.

The women's squad returns defending 100-meter hurdles champion Kim Kilpatrick, who will probably also be used in the sprint relays.

Freshman Latricia Joyner will combine with Markeya Jones, once recovered, to provide a strong sprint corps for the Wildcat women, along with Joy Jones and Rhonda Jackson. Markeya Jones, also a freshman, was the favorite to win the Big Eight Indoor 200 meters last month, but pulled a hamstring in the 55-meter finals and is questionable for this weekend's NCAA Indoor Championships.

In the field events, Angie Miller will lead the K-State women. Miller was third at the Big Eight Indoor in the shot put, while Capriotti said she may be a better discus thrower. Capriotti will also be counting on freshman Greta Semsroth to provide some big throws in the javelin.

Connie Teaberry and DeDe Henderson should give solid depth in the high jump and Carla Shannon is coming off a second-place finish in the long jump at the Big Eight Indoor.

"Our strength will be that we are very balanced," Capriotti said. "But the bottom line is that we need those people healthy."

Capriotti and the Wildcat track squads will open the season at UCLA March 18. K-State will play host to its own invitational April 1, at the R.V. Christian Track.

Wildcat tennis squad off to successful start

By Carolyn Holcroft
Sports Writer

This season could turn out to be the most successful in Wildcat tennis history.

After going up against some of the strongest teams around, the tennis team remains undefeated with a 4-0 dual match record, and has won both the KSU Doubles Invitational and the Southwest Missouri Quadrangular Tournament. Coach Steve Bietau is a happy man, but is cautious of becoming too confident.

"We've made good progress through the first weekends of competition. I'm pleased with where we are at this point, but I want to be careful not to get satisfied," Bietau said. "We're by no means where we need to be to reach our goals for the season."

As far as seasonal goals, the Wildcats are aiming high this year. Bietau said their ultimate goal is to win the Big Eight tournament in April.

"That's within our reach, but is something that's not going to be easy to accomplish," he said. "If we don't approach the season with the idea that we're out to win the championship, I think we're making a big mistake."

Although nationally ranked Oklahoma State will probably pose a formidable threat later in April, the Wildcats have what may be their toughest week during spring break. They will travel to Florida to compete in six matches in six days, against the first- and second-ranked teams in the nation.

Among the netters' strengths, Bietau lists their good team atmosphere, their ability to support and get along well with each other, and their desire to fight until the final point.

"We're really turning into a team that just battles you to the end on the court," Bietau said. "When they get into close matches and it comes down to one or two points deciding the thing, even after two or three hours on the court, they've done a great job."

Three of the team's new faces this year include freshmen Wendy Calta, Tracy Parker and transfer student from Barton County Community College, Sherla Bias. All three are competing for one of the lower positions; the race is tough as each has their own individual advantages.

"Sherla is becoming much more consistent and making fewer mistakes," Bietau said. "Tracy may be the best athlete and has developed a game where she can stay on the court a bit longer without making an error.

"Wendy likes to get in tough matches — what she lacks for in stroking ability she makes up for with her strong desire to do well."

Another newcomer this year is Sara Hancock from Midland (Texas) College, although it hasn't taken long for her to build an impressive record. Before coming to K-State, Hancock was the national runner-up at the No. 5 singles slot in 1987, the conference and regional champion and national runner-up at No. 4 singles in 1988, and claimed the national runner-up at the No. 1 doubles position.

As a Wildcat, Hancock was especially helpful against Arkansas and Iowa as she won two crucial matches at No. 3 singles. She chalked up another two points teamed with Thresa Burcham at No. 3 doubles. Bietau said the diversity of her game is probably Hancock's biggest weapon.

Finesse-type play to highlight 'Cats' spring baseball season

By Mike Goens
Sports Writer

With the loss of most of the offensive firepower that led the Wildcat baseball team to a 34-24 mark and 30 school records last year, K-State will have to count on speed and a veteran pitching staff this season.

The 'Cats finished sixth nationally in scoring with 10.6 runs a game last year and upped the club's home run record to 63. This season, however, K-State will probably feature a more finesse-type of ball team, as opposed to its powerful offensive lineup from a year ago.

"Last year we could wait for the big inning," Coach Mike Clark said. "This year we will have to use our speed to manufacture runs. We have to put the pressure on the defense."

Staff/Greg Vogel

Baseball coach Mike Clark

Leading the defensive charge will be senior lead-off man Sean Collins, an honorable mention all-conference choice as an infielder a year ago while hitting .353 and stealing 21 bases in 24 tries. He will make the move from second base to centerfield.

Joining Collins in the outfield will be Rusty Ringgenberg in leftfield and Bill Barnard in right. Ringgenberg, a Manhattan native, returns after a redshirt season last year. He and Collins should be able to cover a lot of ground on the left side of the outfield.

"Emotionally, he's really been a plus. He's been under control," Clark said of Ringgenberg's return. "He's a lot more mature. His speed is back and his hitting stroke is back."

Barnard was platooned at first base last year, hitting .366 with five homers and 30 runs-batted-in while playing in only 37 games.

With Collins and Barnard moving to the outfield, the lone familiar face will be that of Mike Rosenboom at first base. The senior from Omaha, Neb., hit .324 a year ago, with 16 doubles and 40 RBIs.

Junior college transfer Jeff Troll will be at second base for the Wildcats. Troll transferred from Barton County where he hit .400 and was an all-region selection as a sophomore.

"Jeff Troll makes all the plays," Clark said. "He was a very important recruit."

by Jeff Peterson and Jim McClellan.

Peterson, a fifth-year senior, was 7-3 in 18 games last year, starting 13 and completing five. McClellan went 5-1 last year with a 4.88 ERA and one save.

Bill Schafer is coming off a 5-5 season with two saves, and Jim Haller was 2-5 last year.

"Bill needs to be consistent," Clark said. "He's got the physical ability; he needs to stay aggressive."

Junior David Hierholzer, 3-1 last year, and freshman Chris Hmielewski will round out the starters.

Clark said he will need six starters and one or two relievers to come through for the 'Cats.

"We don't have any nine-inning pitchers," Clark said. "We plug in the right relief pitcher and go from there.

"Our pitchers will need to carry a big load for us, especially in the early going," Clark said. "We need them to perform better than they did a year ago, and all indications are that we will be better.

"We've got a lot of questions to

First-year golf coach Russ Bunker

Golf team's future 'looks good'

By Mike Rouse
Collegian Reporter

At the basement of the Big Eight Conference is where the K-State men's golf program has been since 1977, but new faces on the squad this year are expected to help first-year coach Russ Bunker turn things around.

Bunker, who took over last fall when former coach Rob Sedorcek resigned to concentrate on his pro career, said he believes the fall season was productive and the team is ready to start the spring season.

"I'm very optimistic. The guys worked hard over the winter season and are looking forward to getting started," Bunker said.

Two new players who Bunker believes will make an immediate impact are Brad Stephens, a freshman from Yukon, Okla., and Brett Vuillemin, a transfer last year from the University of Tulsa who will have four years of eligibility at K-State.

Vuillemin shot the low round for the squad last fall at the Texas Intercollegiate Tournament with a score of 67.

Bunker has four other members who are also transfers: Richard Laing from Cal-Santa Barbara; Chris Thompson from Old Dominion University; Bobby Donnellan from Cameron (Okla.) University; and Greg Roberts from Washburn. All four golfers, though, will have to sit out this semester due to transfer rules.

"We have four good transfers coming in, so the future of the team really looks good," Bunker said.

In addition, he will be looking to some upperclassmen for team leadership and help with the underclassmen's tournament play.

"Jeff Sedorcek is a leader. He has been a steady competitor the last couple of years. And Troy Keller is a dedicated player who is playing the best of anyone right now," he said.

After some nationally-ranked competition during a trip to the Hammond-Bell Pacific Coast Collegiate Golf Championship Feb. 27 and 28 in California, the squad has only six meets scheduled this semester.

"I'm very optimistic. The guys worked hard over the winter season and are looking forward to getting started."

—Russ Bunker golf coach

"In the long run, the trip put us up against competition we need to play because it doesn't help to play the little schools," Bunker said. "It is imperative to have one of these tournaments for recruiting purposes. To bring in a topnotch high school player, your team has to travel."

At the tournament, the Wildcat golfers finished 11th among a 20-team field that featured 15 teams ranked among the top 20 in the nation.

Sedorcek paced the squad with a three-round total of 224, which was good enough for an individual 12th place. Of the other four golfers traveling to Goleta, Calif., Keller shot 230, Vuillemin 234, Stephens 237 and John Shields 246.

With the squad's talent, Bunker said he believes his team can finish sixth or better at the Big Eight tournament in May.

"We can legitimately beat two or three teams in the league this year," he said.

Women's golf team lacking experience

By Mike Rouse
Collegian Reporter

A highlighted spring schedule will start for the women's golf team March 12 at the Northern Illinois Snowbird Intercollegiate in Florida.

The trip will be a new experience for some of the women on the squad who have never flown on a plane.

"The girls have never flown any place before, and we use to drive in the vans for 12 hours, but that isn't how it is done anymore," head coach Russ Bunker said.

The women's squad has only one senior and one junior with experience and will be looking to freshmen and sophomores to step up and contribute.

"We are really young. We need a couple of good players," Bunker said. "If we can get a couple of good recruits this year it can be an instant turnaround.

"The girls have worked hard, but we have a long way to go. We aren't where we want to be with tournament quality. It was almost like starting from scratch."

Sophomore Chris Adams enters the season with a team-low average of 86.3 from last year. Freshman Adena Hagedorn, Manhattan, will battle Adams for the top spot this spring.

"These two are the top two on the team," Bunker said. "With these two and a couple of others we should be able to place at least fourth in the Big Eight.

"Without question, you have Chris and Adena heads and tails above everyone else and that sometimes upsets the other players."

Bunker will be looking to junior Jill Zientara for added leadership. Zientara is a two-time lettermen and has the most collegiate experience on the team. She also took medalist honors at the KSU Classic last year.

Another player who could have an immediate impact this year is transfer Lonna Dale, from Garden City Community College.

The women's golf team also returns two more letter winners from a year ago in sophomore Cory Harlow and senior Lisa Lugar.

Bunker is mostly looking to the future with his women's squad and understandably so with just one senior on the team this year.

"We would like to move two spots in the Big Eight every year for the next couple of years," he said.

Collins ready for move to center

By Mike Goens
Sports Writer

Senior Sean Collins is probably looking forward to this baseball season more than any other, and for a good reason. The second baseman-turned-centerfielder will be a key part of a proposed high-geared running attack that will be put in motion by Wildcat baseball coach Mike Clark.

The Wildcats, who last season set several offensive team records with their powerful hitting lineup, will rely on speed this year to hang tallies on the scoreboard. And heading the list will be Collins, who will bat leadoff for the 'Cats.

"In the fall the ball coach let me run a little more," Collins said. "This year we'll be able to run. It makes it more enjoyable."

With K-State losing all three outfielders from a year ago and because of Collins' speed, he will be making the move from the middle infield to the outfield this season.

"He mainly played outfield in junior college," Clark said. "He's a good athlete. He should be a big plus for us. I hope he has a good season.

"He is an outstanding defensive outfielder. He enhances us defensively. He and Ringgenberg (left fielder Rusty) should get to about everything."

Collins transferred to K-State last year from Venice, Calif., where he attended El Camino Junior College.

He hit .353 while leading off and playing second base for the 'Cats last season. He was third on the team with 67 hits and second in the Big Eight in conference games with 35.

Collins also showed his speed last year, finishing second on the team with 64 runs scored and tying for the team lead in stolen bases with 21. He was thrown out only three times for a third place tie in conference games with 10 thefts.

Collins' move to centerfield should give the Wildcats one of the best and fastest outfields in the Big Eight. Collins will be flanked by Ringgenberg in left and Bill Barnard in right.

Staff/Christopher T. Assaf

Second baseman-turned-centerfielder Sean Collins will be a key part of Wildcat baseball coach Mike Clark's proposed high-geared running attack this season.

"I feel a lot better as far as confidence," Collins said of the move to center. "I don't mind the change, whatever helps the team."

Collins also hinted that he may not have been comfortable in the infield last season.

"At the start, no. It was my first full season at second base. But at the end of the season I started getting confident," he said.

"I just want to play consistent, make the plays, and throw some people out. The outfield is going to be strong this year.

"I've got confidence. My arm is not as strong as it can be. I've got to get to the ball quickly and try to be quick and accurate."

Collins led the California junior colleges with a team record 56 stolen bases in 62 tries in 1986 while playing at Santa Monica City College and earned rookie of the year honors. He could break K-State's single season records for runs scored and stolen bases this year.

Collins is the only full-time position player from a year ago returning for the Wildcats this season, putting him in a role as team leader. This is somewhat surprising considering he is a junior college transfer.

"I need to be a little more of a leader," he said. "Lead by example and concentrate on my play. Hopefully the young guys will follow that."

Collins said he would rather lead by example than pump the team up by screaming and hollering.

team is junior Helen Scheldknecht, who is also a transfer from Midland. Scheldknecht recently moved into the No. 1 singles spot and has adapted well. Bietau describes her as being an emotional player with a dominating type of game.

"She has the kind of game where she can hit every shot you've ever seen, then come up with a few that you haven't," he said. "When you see Helen play well, you realize that you're seeing something special."

One of the returning Wildcats is team captain Annika Emtell. Although Emtell has been sick and has been held back a little this season, Bietau said he counts on her to be a team leader.

"She can be anywhere in the lineup and regardless of where she is, I'll count on her to do a good job," he said.

Getting acquainted Snyder's top goal as drills approach

By Chris Wilhelm
Sports Writer

With less than a month before the start of spring drills, Wildcat football coach Bill Snyder is happy to have time to get to know his players and let the players get to know his coaching staff.

"We really won't start our spring drills until the last week of March," Snyder said. "Our out-of-season program includes weight lifting and agility drills, which focus on speed, balance, flexibility and change of direction.

"We're looking forward to the spring workouts, but we are taking things slow right now. We'll have 30 days to get 20 days of practice in, but we still need time now to work on other things."

"Other things" include developing good relations between the players and coaches, and a good team work ethic.

"What we're looking for now is what kind of team work ethic we have and what the overall attitude of the players is," Snyder said. "I've seen tremendous improvement, but we are not where we need to be by any stretch of the imagination.

"The young men in the program have to realize what is necessary for them to be successful. These are the types of things they are learning about."

Snyder said some players are making a great effort while others aren't making the commitments he believes are necessary to make the program successful.

"Some of (the players) have risen to a new plateau since the beginning of January," Snyder said. "They are finding out that they can do more and accomplish more. Others haven't improved as much as we would have liked. The work patterns and habits that these players have developed during their pasts isn't going to be changed easily.

"They are just beginning to realize what we expect of them and they are beginning to make the sacrifices and commitments to make this a better ball club."

Snyder is expecting to have all of the underclassmen back from last year with only one exception, and the one player who has transferred to another university didn't see any playing time last year.

"The situation looks a lot better than when I first took the job back in November," Snyder said. "At first, the indication was that more players would leave. Originally, 23 or 24 players asked to be transferred when the coaching change was made. At this point, only one player has transferred.

"As far as sheer physical ability is concerned, we have some players who show tremendous promise," Snyder said. "We have good team speed and good team quickness.

"I think that this group will have every chance to be successful. It is impossible to say in terms of wins or losses where a team will come out. I think success can be measured in terms of being a better football player, having a better football team and being a better person.

"If you can improve in any way, you have had some success."

Snyder will face a tough road in his first season as the 'Cats head coach, as but three of seven Big Eight Conference games will be played at KSU Stadium.

"(The lack of home conference games) will definitely make it tough for us," Snyder said. "The problem with scheduling is that it is so hard to come by. In the past, schedules were made up 15 and 20 years in advance. I think in the future there will be less long-term scheduling because it is impossible for a program to know how strong it will be that far down the road."

Since his hiring, Snyder has been able to recruit several promising prospects and has signed 21 new players. He said this has enabled the Wildcats to make strides in the strengthening of previous weaknesses.

"We have a group of young people who are fine students and fine athletes, and who truly want to be at Kansas State," he said. "Our primary objective was to support our need for defensive linemen, and we met that objective.

"We didn't fare as well (recruiting) in Kansas as I had hoped, but I'm not discouraged by that. I'm excited about spring drills and I'm excited now."

Burcham making impact

By Carolyn Holcroft
Sports Writer

What started out as little more than a hobby to pass the time during a summer vacation has become a major part of Thresa Burcham's life.

Burcham's tennis career began eight years ago at age 11, when her mother enrolled her in a summer tennis class. And she is now one of the most consistent players on the K-State women's tennis team.

"I quit for that school year, and the next summer my parents asked me if I wanted to take it again," she said. "I just got started from there and got more serious as I kept playing."

A couple of years later, her talents for the sport began to shine through as she accumulated an outstanding record throughout her high school career.

While in high school, Burcham went undefeated in all of her doubles matches and lost only two singles matches playing for McClellan High in Little Rock, Ark. Burcham compiled a 30-2 record at No. 1 singles and 35-0 record at No. 1 doubles while at McClellan.

"That was my goal," she said. "A lot of people asked me 'Are you going to turn pro?' and my first goal was to get a full scholarship and pay for my college education."

"I looked at a lot of different schools when I was being recruited, and this was my very last place to visit."

—Thresa Burcham K-State tennis player

She said one particular tournament from her high school career stands out in her mind. While she was a junior, she competed in the Southern Indoor in Louisville, Ky., and didn't hold one of the 16 seeds.

"I wasn't expected to do all that well in southerns or nationals," Burcham said. "I would just win two or three rounds, which was pretty good."

But she went on to beat the first and fourth seated players, and took second place in the tournament.

K-State's reputation for having a friendly atmosphere was a large part of the reason Burcham decided to play for the Wildcats. In fact, a last minute campus visit convinced her not to take an offer from Purdue.

"I looked at a lot of different schools when I was being recruited, and this was my very last place to visit," she said. "The people were so nice and the campus was so pretty. I just loved it here."

Staff/Brian Kratzer

K-State tennis player Thresa Burcham practices different types of returns in Ahearn Field House. Last year, Burcham was undefeated in No. 4 and No. 6 singles.

Burcham said she was also impressed with K-State's tennis program and its potential for improvement. The then promise of the new portable courts at Ahearn Field House was an additional attraction.

Burcham, a sophomore, started out as being primarily a backcourt player. She and Coach Steve Bietau agree that her biggest strengths are in her ground strokes. In her three semesters on the tennis squad, she has added a powerful serve to her list of assets and is working to improve her game at the net.

"In high school I never came up to the net, and I never played that much doubles," she said. "I'm learning more now to come to the net and be more aggressive."

Bietau is also working with her to vary her ground strokes.

"She's working so that they don't look at the same thing every time. And so, when what she likes to do isn't working, she's got something else to fall back on," he said.

Bietau said Burcham's future accomplishments are unlimited.

"She's learned so many things in the past year that nothing she would do would surprise me all that much," he said. "Because her basic game is so solid, you add one thing here and another there, and it opens up all kinds of possibilities."

Although her goals for the season include refining her own skills and improving her performance at the Big Eight tournament, she places the highest emphasis on being a team player.

"I just want to contribute as much as I can to the team. It really doesn't matter all that much where I play in the ladder," she said. "If I play at six all season, I just want to be able to win at that position, because a win at six counts the same as a win at one."

An apparel and textile marketing major, Burcham said she sometimes finds it hard to keep a balance between tennis and school.

"The hardest thing is managing my time, because I feel like I don't have time for anything at all," she said. "It's just sleep, eat, tennis and school. But it's worth the sacrifice."

The most enjoyable part of the season to her is the team atmosphere.

"All the girls really get along and I look forward to going away on the weekends," she said. "There's business to be taken care of through tennis, but it's almost like you're going away with a bunch of girlfriends for the weekend."

When not studying or playing tennis, she likes to both watch and participate in other athletics.

"I like going and watching the basketball games. And I love aerobics," Burcham said. "All summer when we're not playing tennis, one thing I do every day is aerobicize."

Despite her tremendous success at the college level, Burcham said she doesn't think she would like to continue as a professional tennis player. She wants to be the best player possible in school, but doesn't want to deal with the pressure and instability associated with playing as a pro.

Rugby members seek experience

By Janet Swanson
Editor

It may be a "rebuilding" year for the rugby club, but team members say any opposing club that tries to play its B-team against them is in for a surprise.

"No one can play their B-team against us and expect to win," said Kevin Wagner, fullback and senior in marketing.

The club won its season opener, 14-3, Saturday against Santa Fe Rugby Club with four tries and a conversion.

The club, which has about 50 members, can form two or three teams depending upon injuries, Wagner said.

"You have a lot of different injuries and then there are no shows, but we're tough no matter what," he said.

The club's members enrolled in college classes can play on the collegiate level in addition to the club level.

"We have a lot of older, more experienced guys, but they're not in school any more," Wagner said.

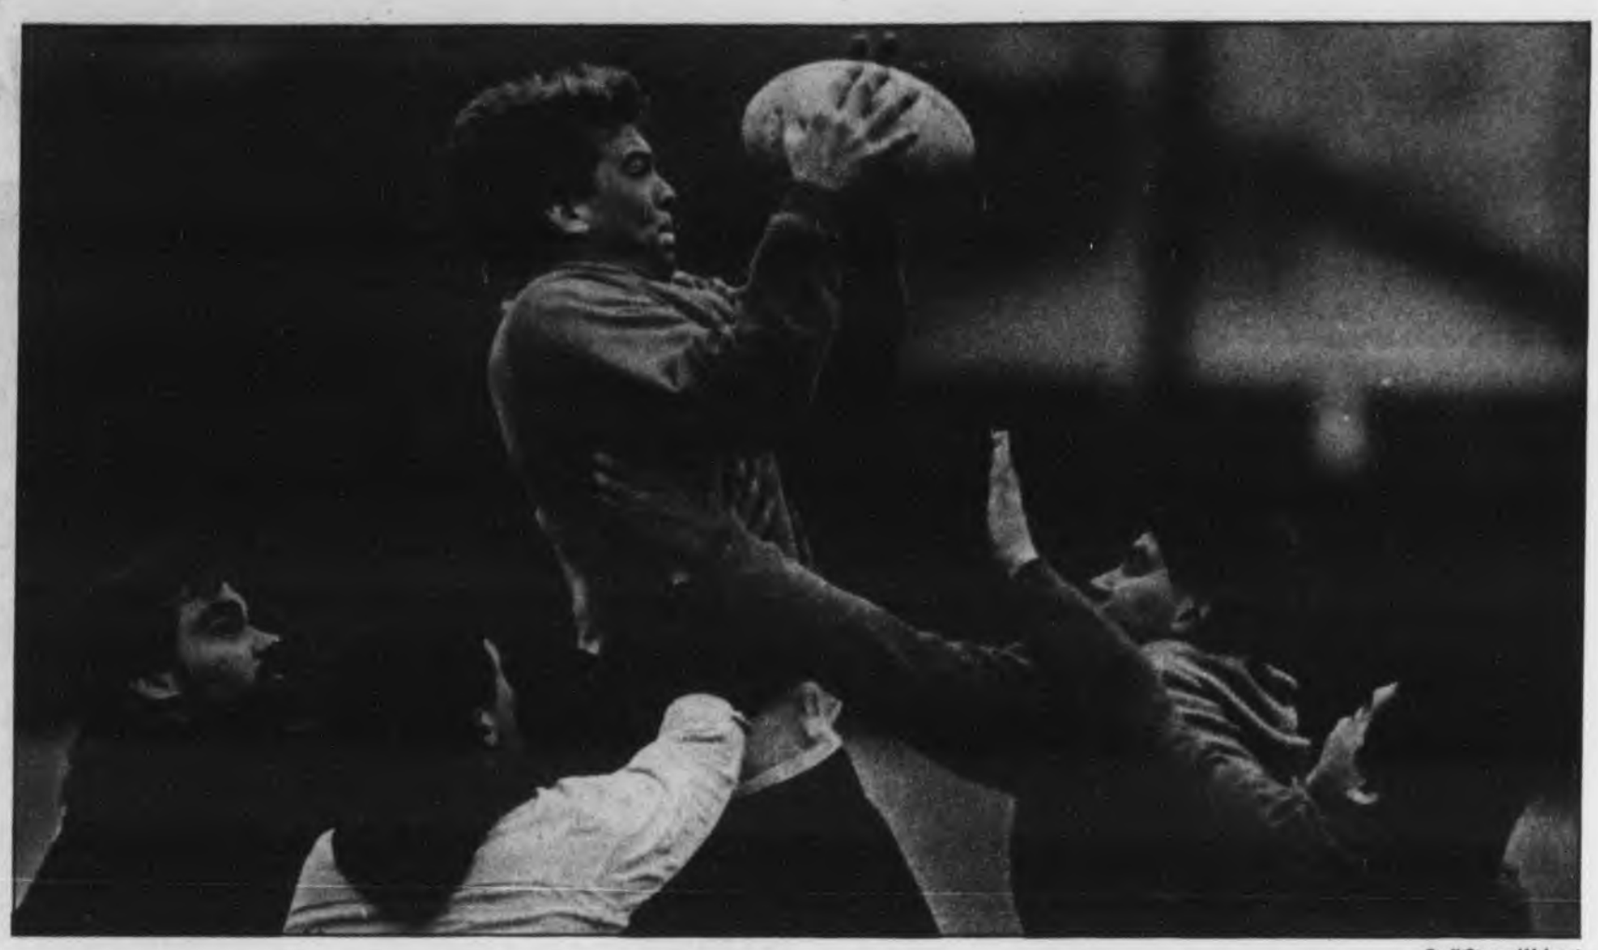
Having members who are younger than last semester's members shouldn't pose a problem, said Dave Farris, lock and senior in political science.

"We should do as well, if not better, than we have in the past," Farris said.

However, the members' experience that was lost will be more difficult to replace than the members themselves.

"We had a lot of guys graduate from last semester — and we're so young it's scary," Wagner said. "But we do have a lot of athletic ability; what we really are waiting for right now is experience."

Squad members are hoping to get that experience Saturday when they face the Topeka and Wichita rugby clubs in their second and third games this semester.



The squad, which has not been nationally ranked lower than 16th in the past eight years, is about third in the Big Eight with Colorado and Kansas leading the conference.

"KU is our main rival because the winner of our fall competition advances to the Western Collegiate Tournament in the spring," Wagner said.

The K-State club lost to KU in the fall, so KU will represent the Heart of America Rugby Football Union in the tournament this spring.

"It was close, but it always is between the two of us," he said.

The club won the Omaha Tournament last year and the collegiate team took third.

answer early," Clark said. "Our goal is to make the Big Eight tournament. Pretty soon we hope people will respect the program. But until we make the tournament, we've got some credibility to establish. I'll be disappointed if we don't compete pretty good in the Big Eight.

"I don't like to say we should do this or we should do that," Clark said. "I don't want to put pressure on the kids. The only thing they have to do is give me their best shot."

The home of the Wildcats, Frank Myers Field, has undergone renovations and will now seat 5,000 people.

"We hope the students come out and support us, especially when we compete in the Big Eight," Clark said. "When we improve the lights and the press box, it will be as good as any (facility) in the Midwest."

Clark will start a pair of freshmen on the left side of the infield. Craig Wilson will start at shortstop for the Wildcats, and Brad Ripplemeyer will play third base. Ripplemeyer can also play short.

"We have a lot of confidence in them. We'll have to wait and see if they're ready," Clark said of the newcomers. "They are very talented and we are happy with their defense. We're anxious to see how they perform under pressure.

"Even though we are young, I think our defense will be improved from last year," Clark said. "We have improved our team speed and the new kids are strong in the field."

Kevin Kaufman, a junior walk-on from Great Bend, will fill in at third and will also be used as a designated hitter.

Dan Skala will replace second team all-Big Eight catcher Jeff Hulse behind the plate.

Soccer Club hopes to meet goals

By Scott Paske
Collegian Reporter

Although keeping competitive teams on the field is still the main objective of Soccer Club presidents Robert and Shelly Healy, the siblings are hoping improvements to the soccer facilities will generate some added success.

"Funding for the soccer program is really hurting," said Rob, head coach of the men's soccer team. "We're hurting for money and we need new goals if we hope to continue playing at Memorial Stadium. Otherwise, we will have to move our home games to Frank Anneberg Park."

Men's Outlook

With or without satisfactory equipment, Rob's squad anticipates a successful spring. The team posted an 11-6-3 record last fall competing in the Midwest Collegiate Soccer League. The league consisted of teams from the Big Eight, Big Ten and Missouri Valley conferences. Among the team's highlights was a second-place finish in the Ed Chartrand Memorial Tournament.

Rob said about 30 men are expected to try out for the spring team, which will play a seven-game schedule and compete in a pair of tournaments. Although more than half of the men will be trying out for the first time, Rob said he isn't worried.

"We have a lot of good guys who I think can really help," Rob said. "All of them played in high school and have plenty of past experience."

The season highlight will be conducting the Big Eight Tournament on April 8 and 9. Each conference team will be represented.

"I think we have a good shot at winning it," Rob said. "KU will be among the top teams, because most of their players are from Kansas City and know each other from playing together in high school."

Women's Outlook

The women's team received a head start on the season by competing in the Husker Women's Indoor Soccer Tournament two weeks ago in Lincoln, Neb.

The club turned in an impressive second-place finish behind Nebraska, despite fielding a short-handed team for each match. The nine women who made the trip posted a 4-2 record, including three wins against Missouri. Sophomore center-halfback Gaby Hanek was selected to the all-tournament team.

"I was very impressed with our performance up there," said Shelly, who is in her second year as president for the women's club. "I think, based on our performance, it is possible for us to win the Big Eight title in April."

The women, who posted a 6-3 record during the fall, have a temporary schedule planned that includes more games than last semester. Shelly said the team is scheduled to play each weekend in April, including the Big Eight Tournament.

Cosmosphere highlights history of space program

By Scott Paske
Collegian Reporter

Enthusiasts of the national space program can satisfy their tastes right here in Kansas.

The Kansas Cosmosphere and Space Discovery Center, located in Hutchinson, is celebrating its 10th anniversary.

The museum houses a 7,000-piece collection devoted to the history of space development. The collection is arranged chronologically from the invention of Robert Goddard's first liquid fuel rocket to the most recent NASA space missions.

"The Cosmosphere is highlighted by a complete collection of restored spacecraft from the Mercury, Gemini and Apollo space missions," said John Nichols, publicity director for the Cosmosphere.

To his knowledge, the only other places that have similar collections are the Johnson Space Center and the Smithsonian Institution.

The space assortment was collected with the assistance of Max Ary, Cosmosphere executive director, becuase he was able to purchase the unused spacecraft at a much lower cost than its original value.

When government officials ordered NASA to dispose of the excessive accummulation of space mission remains in storage, Ary took any pieces not claimed by the representatives from the Johnson Center and the Smithsonian, who received first choice.

"There were 17 truckloads of NASA spacecraft," Nichols said. "Legend has it, we grabbed everything we could get our hands on."

The value of the space memorabilia hauled by Ary was more than $100 million, he said.

Because some of the spacecraft was disassembled, restoration crews were needed to rebuild the equipment. Most of the reconstruction was done in Hutchinson with the assistance of the original blueprints and photographs from NASA files, Nichols said.

In addition to the spacecraft collection, the Cosmosphere features Omnimax, the world's most sophisticated projection system.

Each movie is shown on a 44-foot, tilted, domed screen that covers 85 percent of the Omnimax theater and can accommodate 107 individuals.

"It's a really impressive system," said Larry Devault, sophomore in business administration. "One of the more fascinating things I've seen on it was a 3-D movie where the audience was placed inside a molecule."

The Cosmosphere features movies that allow the viewer to become a part of the action. "The Dream Is Alive" and "Hail Columbia!" are two space-related shows which featured in-depth footage of NASA space missions.

During March, a NASA Photo Exhibit will be featured.

Baseball bat improved

By Mary Ubel
Collegian Reporter

A baseball bat's sweet spot may have just become sweeter with the help of a patent by Larry Noble, head of the Department of Physical Education and Leisure Studies.

Noble's patent moved the traditional sweet spot, located about 10 to 12 inches from the barrel end on a 34-inch bat, to six inches from the barrel end.

"The sweet spot is the best location for the ball to hit the baseball bat to decrease vibration of the hands and to increase maximum velocity of the ball," Noble said.

Noble moved the sweet spot by changing the bat's weight distribution through interior loading of the bat. Any hollow-walled bat can be loaded by placing material inside the bat to equalize the weight distribution.

Through his research, Noble has proven that the bat moves the fastest six inches from the barrel end.

By loading the knob, or handle, of the bat 6.5 ounces, the velocity of the bat will be about 7 percent to 8 percent greater, which will increase the post-impact velocity of the ball by 5 percent, he said.

"By putting weight in the knob, it puts the power zone all the way to the end of the bat," Noble said.

He began formulating his design in 1981, then the KSU Research Foundation accepted Noble's patent in July, 1985. He received the patent in May, said John Walters, executive vice president for the research foundation.

The foundation committee evaluates the inventor's research project and files for the patent. If the project receives the rights, the committee notifies the inventor, Walters said.

"The inventor may sign the rights to the research foundation to receive rewards for the patent, but Noble will always retain ownership," he said.

The inventor receives 15 percent of the royalities, the lab 5 percent and the foundation 80 percent, Walters said.

Staff/Steve Wolgast
Larry Noble, head of the physical education and leisure studies department, patented a design for the "sweet spot" on a ball bat.

On July 1, Noble signed an exclusive two-year contract with Easton Aluminium Inc. in Van Nuys, Calif.

Walters worked with Noble during his negotiations with Easton.

Noble is preparing a 12-month plan with Easton to continue research in distribution and advertising.

The aluminum bat design will mainly be used for softball competition, Noble said.

Easton's vice presidents in engineering and marketing will visit him in Manhattan twice a year, then Noble will travel to California twice a year to discuss design and promotion.

Show to feature wind ensemble

By The Collegian Staff

The KSU Symphonic Wind Ensemble will present a free concert at 8 tonight in Forum Hall.

The group will perform five selections ranging from marches to 20th century contemporary pieces, said Stanley Finck, assistant professor of music and director of bands.

Included in the performance will be three selections the group performed at the Kansas Music Educator's Association convention Feb. 25 in Wichita. It was an honor for the ensemble to be selected to play at the convention, Finck said.

"We were quite pleased to be selected by a tape we sent (KMEA) last year," he said.

The ensemble is composed of students from a class that meets five days a week, said Ben Rohrer, assistant director of bands and instructor of music.

"(The ensemble) is a smaller version of a concert band," Rohrer said.

Forty-four students and faculty are members of the ensemble, Finck said.

"It's our concert band by audition only," he said. "The members of this group are the finest of the fine."

One of the pieces the ensemble will be playing, "And the Mountains Rising Nowhere," was a favorite of the audience at the KMEA convention, Finck said.

The selection is based on the Carol Adler poem, "Arioso," and features an amplified piano and a large battery of percussion.

According to "Band Music Notes," this piece was composed by Samuel Barber in the wartime spirit of 1943. It was first performed by the Army Air Corps Band at Atlantic City in 1943.

'Les Miserables' a 'must-see'

Musical story provides captivating entertainment

By Tom McLaughlin
Collegian Reviewer

It's been several years since the opening of "Les Miserables," and the show has built such a grandiose reputation that it has been promoted into a theatrical event, a "must-see" production like many others such as "Cats," "Starlight Express" and "Phantom of the Opera."

The production, by Alan Boublil and Claud-Michel Schonberg and based on Victor Hugo's novel, has a beautiful musical score. After listening to it a year and a half ago, I was overwhelmed, but questioned whether, in this time where many undeserving events create hype, this production could possibly live up to its "once-in-a-lifetime, must-see" reputation.

Review

It does.

The high energy and captivating musical's story centers around convict 24601, Jean Valjean, who, as the show begins, is being paroled after serving a noble 19 years in prison.

Valjean changes his name and enjoys a rise to power by becoming a successful businessman and the town mayor. But due to a strong moral fiber, he is forced to step down from this success, saving an innocent man from imprisonment by divulging his true identity.

Valjean becomes guardian to a dead factory worker's daughter and lives his life on the run and in quiet. Javert, an inspector driven to jail the parole breaker Valjean, follows him throughout his life much like the possessed Captain Ahab of "Moby Dick."

Valjean, the protective surrogate father, hides the truth from his daughter about her dead mother — a woman who had sold her possessions, hair, and inevitably herself before her death.

Cosette, the innocent daughter, grows up, falls in love with Marius, a student who is insistent on changing the aristocratic France, and organizes an insurrection.

As the students meet their peril, Valjean saves his daughter's true love. In the end, as Valjean is dying, Cosette and Marius, recently married, rush in and discover the noble past of Valjean and Cosette's mother, Fantine, the angel figure who ushers Valjean to heaven.

The production's technical elements, performances and music provided 3½ hours of captivating entertainment.

The performers had absolutely no problem projecting their feelings to the full house at Midland Theatre in Kansas City, Mo., or capturing the searing emotion which is present throughout the musical.

Avoiding melodrama, the cast took the audience through a gamut of emotions, including pain, joy, fear, and love.

As the curtain fell, sniffles pervaded the auditorium because the audience had just watched people whom they had come to know travel troublesome roads.

Technically the production was an extravaganza featuring split-second set, light and special effects changes. Slide projections to set the time and place were used masterfully.

As the slides faded, the ensemble was captured in tableau, creating fuzzy silhouettes of mentally branding images, almost still lifes of the period.

A turntable was also used brilliantly. The floor would turn in one direction as the characters walked in the opposite, creating a sense of laboring movement and passage of time and space.

The most boggling and impressive special effect centered around Javert, who commits suicide. Although the bridge is only two feet from the stage floor, his fall seemed to last two minutes as he was sucked into the lights which swirled like real water.

The impressive full stage, split-second scenic changes took the audience from the slums of Paris to a 30-foot barricade, from Valjean's garden to a French courtroom, and from a night with visible and brilliantly radiant stars to a bawdy inn.

In the last analysis, "Les Miserables" is indeed a theatrical time marker, a must-see production, a once-in-a-lifetime event. Audience members, are easily chained to the dramatic action and spectacle and are not given a chance to get bored.

"Les Miserables" will continue its run through the weekend at the Midland Theatre in Kansas City, Mo.

Mississippi's image marred, journalists say

By Brad Camp
Collegian Reporter

The 1960s was a period of change and social reform. For journalists in Mississippi, it was a time to experience racial strife and tensions firsthand.

Jimmie Gates, a reporter for the Jackson Daily News, Jackson, Miss., and Harry Marsh, professor of journalism and mass communications, discussed the similarities and differences of reporting in Mississippi during the 1960s and the 1980s Monday night at a buffet at Valentino's Pizza.

"The newspapers, journalists and people who were sympathetic to the civil rights movement were not the civil rights movement," said Marsh, who worked in Mississippi during the civil rights era. "The civil rights movement was a very successful non-violent means to social change, particularly in the southern states."

Gates said Mississippi is still battling an image from the era.

"Mississippi still has a negative image to people across the country. They see it as the way it used to be," he said.

Journalists during the movement had to be "brave" to get into Mississippi, one of the most hostile and violent states in the nation, Gates said.

"The journalists who reported on the civil rights movement paved the way for me to be here as a black journalist from Mississippi.

"These journalists were part of a catalyst of change in Mississippi," he said. "The true picture of Mississippi would have never been presented to a national audience ... progress would have been nonexistent."

Local papers in Mississippi contributed to the racist cause, Gates said.

Newspapers of the period fell into three categories, Marsh said. Moderate papers followed the laws and made the transition slowly and carefully; a middle group of papers wanted to ignore desegregation laws; and some were moderately pro-segregation.

"(Desegregation) caused a polarization of people opposed to this; people that were moderate about it and people in favor of it," he said.

Gates said when he started reporting in a predominantly white county, he felt the pressure of being black. The whites didn't trust him and blacks thought he was sent to cover the story because it didn't warrant a white reporter.

"It was really hard when I was just getting started," he said. "It wasn't always the whites putting roadblocks in my way."

Gates said hard work and determination have helped him gain success in reporting.

"Whether you are black or white it makes no difference," he said. "Whenever you go out to do a story, you tell yourself you are going to give the best effort.

"I consider myself a good reporter. It doesn't make a difference if you go out to cover the white community or the black community."

Robert Short, staff writer, contributed to this story.

Committee stalls drunk driving legal limit bill

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The drive to get the legal limit at which a driver is drunk under Kansas law reduced from .10 percent blood alcohol content to .05 percent appeared to have stalled Monday.

The Senate Judiciary Committee worked a handful of bills that must be reported to the Senate by today — in order to meet a debate deadline for bills in the house of origin — and the .05 bill was not among them.

"I've no idea if we'll get to it. It does not look positive right now," said Sen. Wint Winter Jr., R-Lawrence, chairman of the Judiciary Committee.

Winter said the committee is more likely to consider changing the law on presumption of guilt under the .10 statute than in reducing the legal limit to .05 percent.

The Rev. Richard Taylor, president of Kansans for Life at Its Best, who is pressing the issue this session, said he was disappointed by the committee's apparent lack of interest in cutting the legal limit of blood alcohol in half, but vowed to continue the fight.

Wednesday is the deadline for debating bills in the house of origin. The .05 bill would have to be endorsed by the Judiciary Committee by Monday to get on the Senate debate calendar for Wednesday, or to be kept alive it would have to be referred to another committee whose bills are exempt from the deadline. They are the Ways and Means and Federal and State Affairs panels.

The Judiciary Committee Monday sent two bills relating to criminal sentencing back to the Senate for referral to the Ways and Means Committee to keep them alive for this session, but did not exercise that option with the .05 bill.

"Lawmakers who want people to drink less before they drive will vote yes (on the bill), and those who want more than .05 in blood content will vote no; it's as simple as that," Taylor said.

"We'll put pressure on them to try to get it out of committee."

Two county attorneys testified against the bill Friday, saying it is unnecessary and there is no public support for it.

Winter said he believes the members of the Judiciary Committee were persuaded by the arguments of the county attorneys that a change in the presumption law might be more appropriate than lowering the blood content from .10 to .05.

Hessini, Reynolds qualify

NCAA meet to begin Friday

By Chris Hays
Sports Editor

Jeff Reynolds and Pat Hessini became the seventh and eighth K-State track members this season to qualify for the NCAA Indoor Championships Friday and Saturday at Indianapolis.

In the first open 400 meters Reynolds competed in this season, he ran a school-record 46.83 seconds in a last-chance qualifying meet at the University of Florida Saturday. Reynolds had been bothered by an illness early in the season, and did not see any competition until the Big Eight Indoor Championships Feb. 24-25.

At the Big Eight meet, Reynolds defended his title in the 600-yard dash and then helped the 4x400-meter relay to a first-place finish while setting a conference record. The men's relay team of Reynolds, Ray Hill, Sean Banks and Tyrone Watkins also qualified for nationals with the Big Eight victory.

Hessini may have somewhat of an advantage when he goes back to Indianapolis Friday. He recorded his qualifying mark in the mile run while breaking a school record there Saturday with a time of 4:03.03.

Besides qualifying with the 4x400-meter relay team, Hill and Banks also qualified for nationals in individual events. Hill was a double qualifier with victories at the Big Eight meet in the 55 and 200 meters, while Banks' third-place conference finish in the 400 meters was good enough to earn him a trip to Indianapolis.

Shot Putter Dan O'Mara, who took first at all but one indoor meet this season and only failed to surpass the qualifying mark once, will make the trip to nationals.

Freshman Markeya Jones qualified in the 200 meters earlier this season, but pulled a hamstring in the finals of the 55 meters at the Big Eight meet.

"She's doubtful," Coach John Capriotti said, "but it's definitely not as bad as we thought."

Two other women also qualified early this year. Kim Kilpatrick will compete in the 55-meter hurdles and Connie Teaberry in the high jump.

Renovations to facilities help non-revenue programs

By Tom Morris
Sports Writer

Life as a non-revenue sport coach or player at K-State has been anything but easy.

Coaches and players were hindered with scrambled practice times, locations and the lack of dressing rooms. To help make financial ends meet, non-revenue sports participants stage fundraisers, park cars or sell programs at major athletic events.

One Wildcat squad has even entered the construction business.

As coach of track and cross country teams from 1981-86, Athletic Director Steve Miller knows first hand of the hardships connected with leading a non-revenue sports program.

"It's like having a full-time job and a bunch of part-time jobs," Miller said. "It would be comparable to teachers leaving class 10 minutes early so they could go out to their part-time job and raise money to give their students books.

"I think we deserve better."

Since the basketball teams and the athletic department's administration vacated Ahearn Field House last summer (the men's basketball team has since moved its offices back to Ahearn) for Fred Bramlage Coliseum, there was one group looking forward to a new era beginning at Ahearn.

That group consisted of track and cross country coach John Capriotti, tennis coach Steve Bietau, volleyball coach Scott Nelson and baseball coach Mike Clark.

Thanks to major renovations in Ahearn and at Frank Myers Field, those four coaches boast of some of the finest surroundings in the Big Eight Conference, the Midwest — even the nation.

All of the lower level bleachers were moved from Ahearn to Myers Field, home of K-State's baseball team. The additional bleachers gives the 'Cats a seating capacity of 5,000, largest in the Big Eight. Also, 88 box seats have been installed, a new net backdrop replaced the chain-link fence and the back of the new bleachers will be surrounded by a 12-foot wooden wall to lend to a true stadium atmosphere.

What was truly unique about this project was that the work was done by the 45 players and the four coaches. Clark estimated that about 1,800 work hours were used to install the bleachers and the backdrop. What should have been a $250,000 project cost the University less than $25,000.

"It was a project that was needed. We had the lowest seating in the Big Eight Conference and probably the lowest in the Midwest," Clark said.

"This isn't an extra," he said. "It's bringing our program back to where everyone else is. We're not getting ahead; we're getting even. You have to realize that that stadium is going to be there for 20 years to come. Students coming here until the year 2010 can be proud of this."

With the bleachers removed from Ahearn, the way was cleared for a new track and field surface to be laid in the field house.

The Rekortan surface covers the entire floor, while the facility features a 200-meter track, sprint lanes in the infield, two long jump pits, a pole vault pit and seating for 5,000 fans.

Capriotti said the facility will enable K-State to bid on rights for several major events, including the Big Eight indoor championships.

The women's tennis team plays on three new portable courts constructed of Decoturf, the same surface used at the U.S. Open. Each court is made of six sections and can be quickly rolled out for competition, then rolled up once the match is completed.

Bietau said, as did the other non-revenue sport coaches, that the facility has helped in the team's practice schedule and in recruiting.

"I estimate we're a month ahead of where we were last year just because we've been able to get on the court," he said. "Before we could practice at Cottonwood (Racquet Club), but it was at six in the morning or an hour here or an hour there. They weren't very effective practices.

"In recruiting, I think it helps in a number of ways. First of all, the courts are first-class and I think that reflects on our program and our University.

"Secondly, our recruits look at our new facility and I think, philosophically, it sends a message to them that our administration is supportive of our program and that we can be competitive."

The volleyball team combined the old and the new to create its playing surface. The old Ahearn portable basketball floor was sanded, painted and cut to the size of a volleyball floor to provide the Wildcat spikers with a new home.

Besides the court, the volleyball team moved into a refurbished locker room formerly used by the Lady Cats' basketball team.

Nelson must have breathed a sigh of relief.

"We're not talking 'Cadillac' here with gold lining and silver chairs or stuff like that," Nelson said. "But beforehand we had to share a locker room with the track teams and any visiting basketball teams.

"It's nice to have a place with a chalkboard to talk about the upcoming match or practice without doing it in the hallway, or on the court, or wherever we could find," he said.

All in all, Miller said the improvements free non-revenue sport coaches from previous hassles they may have endured.

"There's no question," Miller said. "Because I was a non-revenue sport coach at one time, I know what those teams have gone through.

"The improvements have built a great working relationship between the coaches and the administration, and it makes me feel good about it."

Colorado wins conference tourney 98-92 in double-overtime thriller

By The Associated Press

SALINA — Crystal Ford scored four points in the second overtime, including a three-point play with 1:05 remaining, to lift ninth-ranked Colorado to a 98-92 victory over Oklahoma State in the championship of the Big Eight women's basketball tournament.

Ford was voted the tournament's most valuable player.

Colorado led by as many as nine points in the first half but was up by just two at halftime, 39-37.

The Lady Buffs appeared to have won the game won when Bridget Turner hit a pair of free throws with 10 seconds left for an 83-80 lead. But Althea Cox hit a 3-pointer with one second remaining to send the game into overtime.

The Cowgirls were up 90-85 in the first overtime before Colorado's Tracy Tripp hit a 3-pointer and a 15-footer from the baseline in the final 1:16 to send the game into double overtime.

With Colorado leading 93-92 in the second overtime, Ford scored on her three-point play and Tripp hit a field goal with 17 seconds left to give Colorado the victory.

Ford and Turner led Colorado with 22 points each, while Clinette Jordan scored 25 for Oklahoama State.

The victory was the 20th straight for the Lady Buffs, who improved their overall record to 27-3 and earned an automatic berth in the NCAA tournament.

Oklahoma State, 19-11, must rest its hopes on an at-large berth in the tournament.

Arizona remains atop poll

By The Associated Press

Arizona became the third team this season to hold the No. 1 spot for two consecutive weeks in The Associated Press college basketball poll. The Wildcats were an overwhelming choice as the top team Monday after a week that saw three of the top five teams lose a game.

The Wildcats, 24-3, received 61 first-place votes of the 66 cast by the nationwide panel of sportswriters and broadcasters and 1,315 points for their third week atop the rankings in a row.

Duke was the preseason No. 1 team and held the position for the first nine polls of the regular season. Oklahoma, second this week with four first-place votes and 1,236 points, held the No. 1 spot for the two weeks before Arizona started its modest streak. Illinois, Arizona and Oklahoma each were No. 1 for a week but fell from the top spot in the next week's voting.

Oklahoma, fourth last week, was followed by Georgetown, which dropped one spot after losing its regular-season finale 82-76 in overtime at Syracuse. The Hoyas, 23-4, received the last first-place vote and 1,104 points, 39 more than Illinois, 25-4, which jumped from eighth to fourth with its last-second 70-67 victory over Indiana on Sunday.

Syracuse, 25-6, which lost to Boston College before beating Georgetown, moved up one place from last week with 1,013 points, 11 more than Indiana, 24-6.

Duke, 22-6, went from ninth to seventh after handing out the third top-five defeat last week, an 88-86 victory at North Carolina. The Blue Devils had 895 points and were followed in the Top Ten by Michigan, North Carolina and Missouri.

Michigan, 23-6, had 864 points, 63 more than the Tar Heels, 24-7, while Missouri had 740 after splitting two games last week to fall to 24-7.

The poll was the next-to-last of the season. The final poll will be released after the conclusion of the conference tournaments and the announcement of the 64-team field for the NCAA tournament.

Big 8 Tournament boycotted for good reasons; KU tops list

Bleeding Purple

BRIAN HUMMELL
Sports Columnist

In the time-honored tradition of cliche sports columns, there are columns suggesting how to better support the team, why the coach shouldn't be fired, open letters to someone seemingly important and farewell articles (this serves a two-fold purpose as it can be written if the writer is fired or the coach is fired). Today, however, is my all-time favorite — the list column.

The list column is not a rip-off of David Letterman's Top 10 lists. In fact, it was invented long before Dave's gap-toothed grin graced late night television. I think it was Pulitzer or someone who wrote the first lis t column or maybe it was Ben Franklin. Anyway here's mine.

These are the reasons I am not attending and/or boycotting the men's Big Eight Basketball Tournament in Kansas City:

No. 5. I'll be in beautiful, sunny Southern California.

This is, quite obviously, a logistics problem. The championship game will be nationally televised, so I will see one game. There is also this little, glittery town down the road a stretch from California called Las Vegas, which could give the games more meaning than if I were actually there.

No. 4. I don't have tickets to the tournament.

This ranks higher on the list than being on the West Coast, because being the super fan that I am, I would delay or cancel my trip if I could have gotten tickets to the tourney. Anyway, this California thing is only to see my brother and the whole male bonding thing is overrated.

No. 3. The Oklahoma Sooners will have the audacity to show up.

These guys feed off hatred and repulsion — and I'd hate to do anything to help their cause. If crotch and cocky can be used in the same sentence, nothing more needs to be said.

No. 2. The Big Eight Conference is bound to send Big Eight referees to its own tournament.

That's right, the boys in stripes we've come to know and love will be there with new whistles around their necks. All the better to choke on.

After witnessing the regular season performances by these supposed purveyors of basketball truth and justice, one can only hope these gents won't incite a riot during their final gig of the season. If everyone leaves Kemper Arena alive each night, the officiating will probably be considered a success.

No. 1. The University of Kansas basketball team is being allowed to participate.

Last year's Cinderella darling is this year's down-and-out cheater. The probation handed to KU by the NCAA prohibits the Jayhawks from playing in the NCAA tournament this year, but the conference athletic directors in their unanimous wisdom decided to let KU play in the conference tournament.

It's a Big Eight rule that a school can't be punished by the NCAA and the conference, they explained as I cried in my spilt milk.

But, KU didn't play by the rules, why play by the rules with them?

The answer is, two wrongs don't make a right and seven other wishy-washy platitudes.

What these two wrongs would have really meant, is KU would not be allowed to wreak havoc at the tourney. The Big Eight's automatic berth to the NCAA tournament is up for grabs and KU, who can't use the free pass, will have a shot at it. Go figure.

This conference, which more than anything wants money, decides to play Russian Roulette with the big dance.

Johnny Orr's wild ravings aside, the Big Eight should have four teams in the NCAA tournament, but a couple of upsets in Kansas City and around the country could drop that number to three and, although unlikely, maybe two. Four teams means more money than three or two. Go figure.

Friday, K-State gets the first shot at KU.

Regardless of the experts and power rankings that say the Wildcats are a shoe-in for the NCAA tournament, a loss in the first round of the conference tournament doesn't score brownie points with the NCAA selection committee.

Hopefully KU will be put out of its misery and the Wildcats will save the day for all mankind and be the conference hero.

But, if the Jayhawks manage to find the glass slippers they left at Kemper last year, the conference will get kicked in its rapidly shrinking pocketbook once again.

Board approves 1990 budget for Aggieville maintenance

By The Collegian Staff

The Aggieville Business Improvement District Advisory Board approved its 1990 budget at the board's meeting Monday.

The budget, which will be presented to the Manhattan City Commission on May 15, is for the allocation of funds annually collected from Aggieville merchants.

The board members unanimously approved the 1990 budget of $14,450, which is $900 less than the 1989 budget.

"The 1990 budget is lower than this year's probably because revenues were not as high as we expected them to be," said Karen Davis of the Community Development Department.

Davis said members of the advisory board are appointed by the mayor and must represent an Aggieville business. Board members are responsible for setting an annual budget which appropriates the funds assessed annually from Aggieville merchants.

Advisory board member Jon Levin, co-owner of Varney's Book Store, said all businesses in the Aggieville shopping districts are assessed fees based on their square footage of business space. These range from $85 to $100 a year. The money is then used to pay for maintenance in the district, including trash pickup and snow removal.

Davis said the Aggieville assessments have been collected since 1981 and business owners in the shopping district have no choice whether to pay them. A similar assessment district exists in downtown Manhattan.

Board members also discussed the possibility of individuals paying to have their names engraved in granite blocks. These sidewalk blocks are part of the renovation planned for the streets and sidewalks of the Aggieville shopping district later this year.

Juli Salberg, executive director of the Aggieville Merchants Association, said the new sidewalks will include 1,600 granite squares and she thinks many individuals, including K-State students, would be interested in having their names become an almost permanent part of Aggieville.

"The granite bricks are just about indestructible," Salberg said. "They'll be here longer than any of us will be."

Davis said because the sidewalks are part of the public right of way any money-making connected with them would need the city commission's approval.

'Cousins' about romance in suburbia

By Stacy Sweazy
Collegian Reviewer

"Cousins" is a film about wholesome adultery in suburban America and is an amusing attempt to provoke hopeless romantics and doubting lovers into the mysteries of an illicit amour.

The film is a remake of the French comedy "Cousin, Cousine," written by Jean-Charles Tacchella in the mid-1970s. Helping to make it one of the best love stories since "Dr. Zhivago," the 1980s version is given a dash of robust Italian comedy with a sprinkling of romance. (With three weddings, "Cousins" could hardly avoid being mushy.)

Review

Maria (Isabella Rossellini) and Larry (Ted Danson) are cousins by marriage after her mother, Edie (Norma Aleandro) marries his uncle (George Coe). In a quest to gain revenge on their unfaithful spouses, Maria and Larry fall in love while Larry's wife, Tish (Sean Young), and Maria's husband, Tom (William Petersen), sink into a passion pit of lust.

Family reunions at weddings, funerals and other family affairs are the carousel of the movie and help bring the two couples together.

A revisited Brady Bunch wedding, a moon from the groom, a hearty Italian belch, and a toast to the happy couple is the first event to spark the affair between Tom, a lecherous hot-haired Subaru salesman, and Tish, a department store cosmetic consultant. The two take off for a "quickie" test drive in a BMW and come back a bit ruffled.

In the meantime their spouses, Larry, a ballroom dance instructor, and Maria, a legal secretary, find themselves in a platonic relationship that later buds into a bona fide romance.

Larry's widowed father, Vince (Lloyd Bridges), becomes the new Romeo in the picture for Edie after her new husband suddenly dies, leaving her with a fortune in the garbage business. He also serves as an unconventional grandfather to Larry's son Mitch (Keith Coogan), giving him girlie magazines and advice about women.

Mitch, who is a self-proclaimed multi-media mix designer, is a video hound at all the family gatherings. He successfully brings laughs to the screen by showing his concern for humanity while exploiting the entire family as gluttons in a home video showcase and mortifies Aunt Sophia (Gina de Angelis) with his radical views.

Aunt Sophia is the dotty nana of the family and is a mirror image of the fatuous grandfather in "Moon Struck." The entire movie seems to parallel "Moon Struck," but the synonymity is subtle, not redundant.

Danson's acting is spontaneous and Rossellini uses the inherited polish and elegance from her mother, Ingrid Bergman, to make her performance nothing less than sensational.

Petersen shows his talents in playing an oversexed adulterer and Young proves she can act intelligently aside from her beauty.

The direction of Joel Schumacher is fast paced and gives the actors freedom to express their feelings about love, freedom and relationships while letting them frolic in back yards and fantasy wedding park scenes. The cultural differences and the urban New York City setting of the new version makes the film more appealing to today's moviegoers.

Steven Metcalfe used good judgment in blending the scenes by mixing the sugar-coated love scenes with the salty ones. However, there are no cheap sex clips in "Cousins."

Fair warning to the single or married: "Cousins" makes viewers want to dance out of the theater on air-soled shoes and pursue a steamy spring romance.

age from 18 months to 5 years, who attend the Stone House, use the playground, West said.

"It's quite a shame that part of the playground might be affected, because it is one of the best in this part of Kansas," she said. "We get so much recognition for the playground and visitors have said how much they like it."

Jim Lindquist, who has two children at the Stone House, said he was concerned about safety during and after the road's construction.

"I didn't know about this until I read (the letter to the editor in Monday's Collegian), and I'm certainly concerned about the road being closed," Lindquist said. "That's a primary interest for all the parents."

Another concern expressed by the parents is the possibility of a dangerous intersection during the winter because North Manhattan Avenue is built on a slope. Also, no fence separating the playground and proposed road is included in the plans.

"I was surprised to learn there wasn't a plan for relocating the fence, which is a necessity," West said.

Garvin said the plans' absence of a fence doesn't mean the final plan won't include a fence.

"This is one of the needs that hasn't been addressed yet," he said. "We respect the needs of those who are concerned and I expect the plans will show that.

"This is progressing in as orderly a way as possible — we have revised the plans before and can do it again. We are proceeding on the basis of a plan that began a year ago; we are trying to see that all involved can reach an agreement."

"No matter how bad they are, Grandma loves to hear the latest jokes."

Kim Cohen · University of Wisconsin · Class of 1990

You miss her sparkling sense of humor. She misses you and your jokes. Even the bad ones. That's one good reason to call long distance. AT&T Long Distance Service is another good reason. Because it costs less than you think to hear your grandmother start to giggle before you even get to the punch line.

So whenever you miss her laughter, bring a smile to her face with AT&T. Reach out and touch someone.®

Debate

"Clearly, any time they depend on the student body, they have to fall back on the referendum requirements," he said. "You cannot use a simple majority of the student body to pass a law and that is what they were trying to do."

Johnson said the bill was written so that everyone would understand it.

"It was unclear in the Constitution what we could and could not do," he said.

Athletic Director Steve Miller said the athletic department has made every effort to answer all questions raised about the athletic fee.

"We have been guided by Senate committees and always supplied information," Miller said. "I find the whole process somewhat redundant and repetitive. I think the Senate and its committees need to be on the same page."

He said athletic department officials will be glad to answer questions tonight.

"We will meet until we are blue in the face," Miller said.

Johnson said the issue is reopened for debate.

"We may not change a thing, but if we need to hash things out, we will," he said.

Issues involving money are always sensitive, Miller said.

"We are in a situation where personalities are involved," he said, "It's a tough way to get to the end of the street."

Miller said he believes the fee will do well in spite of the delay. He perceives the 33-13 vote Thursday as "very encouraging."

advantages for students due to the athletic fee.

"Our student seating at sports events is one of the highest in the country, but our budget is the last in Big Eight," he said.

The situation and progress in the athletic department is not going to change, Peterson said.

Because of the delay in the proceedings, Miller said it may be difficult to educate students before the March 28 referendum.

If the Senate reinforces its decision to send the bill to a referendum, Miller said he would like to see a turnout of more than 6,000 students or one-third of the student body so a simple majority vote will determine its fate.

"I truly hope they will participate in this procedure," Miller said. "It would be unfortunate if apathy would determine the outcome of the vote."

He said it was decided Thursday that undergraduate and graduate students would vote as two separate bodies, but Student Body President Laurian Cuffy said it will be debated again in tonight's special session of Student Senate.

Witnesses testify to suppling Contras

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Two Air Force retirees who helped supply the Nicaraguan Contras testified Monday they also got involved in the Iran arms deals through an Oliver North associate, the first mention of Iran in North's month-old trial.

The testimony by Richard B. Gadd — and later by Robert Dutton — brought a quick reaction from U.S. District Judge Gerhard A. Gesell, who reminded lawyers in the case, "I asked you not to go into the hostage situation."

Charges involving diversion to the Contras of profits from the Iran arms deals were dropped earlier after the administration complained that too much damaging classified material would have to be disclosed in connection with those counts.

Fee referendum confirmed by 43-9 margin in Senate

By Nancy Prosser
Staff Writer

In a special session Tuesday night, Student Senate voted 43-9 to uphold a previous decision sending the athletic fee to a student referendum on March 27 and 28.

Senators voted to amend the original bill approved Thursday because of constitutional violations. With the amendment, the bill now requires that the issue be voted on by the K-State student body as a whole. Graduate and undergraduate schools will not vote separately.

Student Senate

"The Student Tribunal ruled Monday that a referendum before the KSU Student Governing Association must be voted on by all members of the KSU body," said Doug Holle, business senator.

Student Senate chairman Todd Johnson said Senate cannot let different segments of the student body vote separately.

Senate defeated another amendment that would have restricted the amount of money the athletic department could spend on advertising.

"I put a budget together for advertising because this body said we need to educate students about this bill."

—Chris Peterson assistant athletic director in charge of marketing

"I put a budget together for advertising because this body said we need to educate students about this bill," said Chris Peterson, assistant athletic director in charge of marketing.

Senate voted 33-7 to call the question and vote on the referendum legislation.

Student Body President Laurian Cuffy cited financial concerns and constitutionality questions as the reasons for calling the special meeting.

"We, as student leaders, have the responsibility to look at how the $15 fee would be spent by the athletic department," Cuffy said. "I am concerned as to whether checks exist to track the money and whether the goals and objectives of the athletic department can be met (with the revenue raised from the fee)."

The meeting was called to give senators the chance to look at information available to them as senators, but which may not be as accessible by the student body, he said.

"The intent of tonight's meeting," Cuffy said, "is to make this the best deal for students to vote on."

Cuffy said he was not in a position to answer whether he would veto the bill, adding that he is concerned the money issue has not been thoroughly debated.

Airport tower approved

User fees, taxes to cover costs

By Robert Short
Staff Writer

Any questions raised concerning the safety of the Manhattan Airport should be eliminated with the addition of the new control tower approved at Tuesday's Manhattan City Commission meeting, said Commissioner Kent Glasscock.

The commission agreed to enter into a service contract with Midwest Air Traffic Control Service Inc., providing the Manhattan Airport with a permanent control tower.

The first year of the control tower's operation will cost $102,000, said Mark Shaumleffel, vice president of sales and marketing for Midwest Air Traffic Control Service Inc. The service will cost $96,000 for four years following installation.

The one-year, renewable contract will extend payments for the control tower over a five-year period, Glasscock said. The tower will be funded by a combination of airport user fees and taxes.

"This is the first time we have had fully controlled airspace in Manhattan," Glasscock said.

Fort Riley has agreed to resume its services with the airport, he said. The 17-foot control tower will be operated a minimum of 10 hours daily by a three-person team.

In other action, the commission approved the first reading of an ordinance allowing approved advertising in Manhattan parks. The ordinance, however, does not allow any permanent advertising of alcoholic beverages or tobacco products.

Several Manhattan residents, including members of the Little Apple Task Force, expressed opposition to the commission regarding advertisements promoting alcohol or tobacco use.

Although most of the people playing softball are old enough to consume alcohol or use tobacco, most of the children who attend the events are under the legal age, said Erma Riley, chairman of the Little Apple Task Force.

"There is no such thing as responsible drinking by young people under the age of 21," Riley said.

City staff had recommended to the commission that all types of advertisements be allowed in the parks.

"The reason we solicit outside advertisers is to extend our budget so we can do more things," said Terry Deweese, director of parks and recreation.

Mayor Dave Fiser was the only member of the commission to oppose the limitation of alcohol and tobacco advertising.

"I don't believe changing the signage in the park is going to make ... an impact," Fiser said.

Also, the commission unanimously approved the 1989 Convention and Visitors Bureau and economic development contracts with the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce.

Eastern ticketholders face flight crisis

By Karen Allen
Staff Writer

Paige Gantz has her camera loaded — but she may be taking pictures of her apartment instead of the Bahamas unless the Eastern Airlines strike ends or her flight is cancelled in time for another airline to accept her on standby.

Gantz, senior in journalism and mass communications, is scheduled to leave Kansas City International Airport at 7 a.m. Saturday. Eastern has cancelled flights through Thursday, but Gantz said she would feel better if Eastern would cancel all its flights.

"They can't help us until they cancel," she said.

Once a flight is cancelled, passengers can turn to other airlines who may accept Eastern tickets. But even then, travelers must fly standby, which means they must wait until all other passengers board the plane before they can claim the remaining seats.

"It's hell to fly standby," Gantz said. "Everybody is wanting to go because it's spring break — nobody wants to take a refund."

According to an article in The Kansas City Star on Sunday, full-fare tickets are accepted by only some airlines: United, Delta, Northwest, Midway, Continental and American Airlines. But all discounted tickets must be endorsed by Eastern before they are accepted by other airlines, the article said.

As of Tuesday, officials from all airlines except Delta and United said they would accept the full-fare tickets "indefinitely." A Delta official said they would no longer accept tickets after 12:01 a.m. Wednesday.

An official from United said she could not promise the airline would accept Eastern tickets indefinitely, but that they would accept tickets today and Thursday.

Local travel agents said not many of their clients are in a bind because they have been discouraging travelers from flying with Eastern for the last few months.

Shirley Bramhall, a travel agent for Kansas State Travel, said they "steered (their customers) away from Eastern."

"We would tell them 'They have a strike pending March 4,' and then let them make up their minds," Bramhall said.

When a client did insist on flying Eastern, she said they would make other reservations to back up their travel plans.

Bramhall said only one client, who had planned to take his family to San Juan, Puerto Rico, may be in a bind. If their flight is cancelled, Eastern will refund the money. But they are also living on a day-to-day schedule as is Gantz.

Nancy Dailey, travel consultant for International Tours, said they have been "offering other airlines besides Eastern for quite some time because of the bad publicity the airline has received."

"It's a bad situation for everyone but it's the traveler who suffers the most," Dailey said.

There may have been more clients flying Eastern if the airline hadn't cut down their flight service from KCI last year, she said. All travelers first fly to Atlanta from KCI before

Airline faces bankruptcy if strike persists

By The Associated Press

MIAMI — A federal judge Tuesday refused to order Eastern Airlines pilots back to work, even though Eastern warned it couldn't otherwise survive the 4-day-old Machinists strike. A spin-off job action by pilots nationwide failed to clog airports as feared.

Eastern earlier sent 2,500 more non-union workers home, blaming pilots for leaving it with "no business on the books."

"If the pilots do not come back to work, Eastern Airlines is gone," company attorney David Ross said. He warned during a court hearing that Eastern was faced with bankruptcy without its 3,600 pilots, who have refused to cross picket lines the Machinists union set up Saturday.

U.S. District Judge Edward B. Davis denied Eastern's request for a temporary restraining order less than a half hour after the three-hour hearing.

Pilots union spokesman J.B. Stokes called the ruling "a victory of principle; a victory of ethics."

"We've obviously made our case. Basically what this means is that nothing's changed," Stokes said, adding pilots will continue to honor Machinists picket lines.

Ross said the company could have to file for federal bankruptcy protection and couldn't operate more than 48 to 72 hours more without the pilots. The airline did not immediately decide whether to appeal Davis' ruling, he said.

Eastern, the nation's seventh-largest airline, already has nearly shut down, saying its was forced to lay off a total of 9,500 workers this week because of the pilots' adherence to the strike in a 17-month-old contract dispute.

The airline wants $150 million in concessions; the Machinists want $50 million in raises. Eastern has said it lost more than $1 billion this decade and $1 million a day before the strike.

"Clearly that has gotten worse," Joe Leonard, Eastern executive vice president and chief operating officer, said at a briefing Tuesday announcing the layoffs of 2,500 more people.

The national pilots union had asked its 40,000 members at all airlines to follow rule books stringently starting Tuesday, and there were fears of havoc as delays piggybacked around the country. But while the union said 60 percent of its members followed the directive, delays were few.

Cronkite criticizes TV news

AUSTIN, Texas — Walter Cronkite thinks journalists may be better than ever, but the profession is endangered by tabloid-style TV news programs.

"I am concerned about the garbage that is masquerading as television these days," Cronkite said Monday. "Most of it is real scandal-tabloid journalism ... absolutely, totally useless stuff."

But, Cronkite said, "We have a more responsible press today in this country than we've ever had."

He said reporters are much more enterprising and conscientious than in the mid-1940s and several years after, when journalists practiced "reporting by handout."

Cronkite, who lives in New York, made his remarks during a news conference to pitch a local water pollution documentary he narrated. He signed off for the last time as anchor of "The CBS Evening News" eight years ago Monday.

Koch: Mother had abortions

NEW YORK — Mayor Edward I. Koch says in a new book that his mother underwent illegal abortions because of Depression-era poverty and tried to induce a miscarriage while pregnant with his sister.

In "His Eminence and Hizzoner," written with Cardinal John O'Connor, Koch describes his transformation from a Greenwich Village liberal to a man who shares views with many conservatives.

Koch says that a few years before his mother, Joyce Koch, died in 1961, "she told me that during her lifetime she'd had a number of abortions. ... Her reasons were economic."

When pregnant with Koch's younger sister, Pat, his mother "tried to induce a miscarriage by jumping off chairs and trunks. It didn't work," Koch says. "When she finally accepted that the child was going to be born, she worried that she might have injured the fetus.

"Personally, I don't think abortion on demand is a good idea," Koch writes. Nevertheless, Koch has consistently opposed outlawing abortion.

The book, published by William Morrow & Co., goes on sale next week.

Trump challenged to game

LAS VEGAS, Nev. — Casino owner Bob Stupak says he can beat real estate mogul Donald Trump at his own game, and the flamboyant bettor has wagered $1 million that he will prevail in a one-on-one match of TRUMP, The Game.

But Trump, whose casinos are in Atlantic City, N.J., doesn't want to play.

"It's always possible to lose, even for someone who's used to winning," he said.

The owner of Bob Stupak's Vegas World hotel and casino made his challenge in full-page ads Tuesday in the New York Post and The Atlantic City (N.J.) Press.

Trump said that since revenues from the board game go to charity, he said, "it would be foolish to possibly lose $1 million."

"I'm not asking for profits of the game," Stupak responded. He added, "I can't believe with Trump's billions he can't spare a million."

Mother kills self, children

COPAN, Okla. — A Copan woman and her two teen-age children died of carbon monoxide poisoning at their rural house Monday after the woman apparently backed a car into an attached garage and left the vehicle running, investigators said Tuesday.

Washington County Sheriff Larry Silver said investigators believe the woman meant to take her own life and the lives of the children.

Silver said Judy Kay Lemmons, 41, and her children, Tina Dawn, 16, and Gary Ray, 14, were found dead at 9 p.m. Monday when the woman's husband, Terry Lemmons, returned home from work.

The bodies of the children were found in their beds, indicating they were overcome Monday morning, Silver said. The children were home from school Monday because heavy snow forced cancellation of classes.

Silver said "written documents" found in the house leave little doubt that the woman intended to kill herself and the children.

Another son is in the Navy and was notified of the deaths Tuesday, officials said.

Lemmons had worked as a nurse at the Copan Clinic until Feb. 28, when the clinic closed. Her husband works at Jane Phillips Memorial Episcopal Medical Center in Bartlesville.

The sheriff said Lemmons apparently backed her car into the garage of the rural house early Monday and left it running. A door to the house was left open, allowing carbon monoxide to flow into the house, he said.

Murder suspects arrested

KANSAS CITY — A man and woman charged in connection with the stabbing death of a popular teen-age honor student at her Piper home last month were arrested Tuesday in Arizona.

FBI agents said Archie Owens Jr., 20, of Kansas City, Kan., had been in contact with a Kansas City FBI office on the phone and arranged to surrender about 3:15 p.m. at a fast-food restaurant in Tucson, Ariz., where Tambi Lewis, 18, of Kansas City, Kan., was working.

"I don't think she was expecting us," said Larry Bagley, supervisory senior residence agent in the Tucson FBI office.

The two were being held Tuesday night in the Pima County Jail in Tucson. Bond had not been set. They were scheduled to have their first court appearance on federal fugitive charges Wednesday afternoon.

Wyandotte County Undersheriff Jim Elrod said officials were waiting to see whether the two waived extradition back to Kansas.

Owens has been charged in Wyandotte County District Court with first-degree murder and felony theft in the death of Syndi Bierman, 17. Her body, beaten and stabbed, was found early Feb. 19 at her home at Piper in western Wyandotte County.

Lewis has been charged with aiding a felon.

Syndi Bierman's sister, Shari Lyn Bierman, 20, also was charged with the murder and is in custody at the Wyandotte County Jail.

Also charged was Conrad Joseph Hernandez, 24, of Kansas City, Kan., who surrendered to police in Oklahoma two weeks ago and has pleaded guilty to the murder.

Nations vow to protect ozone

Alternatives for harmful chemicals needed

By The Associated Press

LONDON — Industrialized nations committed themselves Tuesday to banning chemicals that are destroying the ozone layer, but they reacted coolly to Third World demands for money to find substitutes.

China, India and other populous developing nations embarking on mass production of consumer goods containing chlorofluorocarbons reason that because the West invented and produces most of the ozone-destroying chemicals, the West should pay to replace them.

Despite the split, the 123 countries at an international conference on the ozone layer agreed that pressure is on scientists and industry to find safe alternatives before more damage is done to the fragile atmospheric shield.

William Reilly, head of the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency, said the three-day conference that ended Tuesday sparked as much public discussion as any international environmental issue since the 1985 Chernobyl nuclear accident in the Soviet Union.

"We are all in this together," Reilly said. "We're all going to have to find ways to collaborate in cleaning this mess up. It affects us all."

Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher of Britain, the conference host, said all countries, including financially strapped Third World nations, must do their part to save the ozone layer.

"It is not a case of some countries asking other countries to act," Thatcher said. "It is a case of every country taking action. ... No one can opt out."

Chlorofluorocarbons are widely used in aerosol propellants, refrigerants, air conditioners, fast-food cartons and computer solvents.

They are stable and non-toxic when released into the atmosphere, but 10 to 100 years later, when they rise 15 to 20 miles to the stratosphere, their chemical bonds are broken apart. Scientists say their chlorine atoms destroy ozone, allowing more of the sun's ultraviolet rays to reach Earth, causing more skin cancer and eye cataracts, and suppressing human immune systems.

Related chemicals known as halons, used primarily in firefighting equipment, cause the same damage, but are 10 times as efficient at it.

"Even if all the chemicals which damage the ozone layer were banned tomorrow, ozone depletion would continue for more than a decade and it would take our planet something like 100 years to replenish the ozone already lost," said Thatcher, an Oxford University-educated chemist.

"We're all going to have to find ways to collaborate in cleaning this mess up."
—William Reilly, head of U.S. EPA

Chlorofluorocarbons also trap heat and warm global temperatures, a process known as the "Greenhouse Effect," which already is thought to be responsible for climate changes.

More than 1 million tons of the damaging substances are produced annually, mostly by the United States.

Several companies are working on substitutes, including the American chemical firm Du Pont, which is the world's largest manufacturer of chlorofluorocarbons, and Britain's Imperial Chemical Industries. Some are working together to complete toxicity tests and environmental assessments required by governments.

Du Pont says it has "candidate alternatives" for all major markets and hopes to market them by the mid-1990s. Reilly said American carmakers told him they plan to use substitutes in air-conditioning systems of their 1994 models.

The United States and the 12-nation European Community have promised to try to ban those chemicals by 1999 — surpassing the goals of the 1987 Montreal Protocol which requires they be halved by the turn of the century.

The protocol has been ratified by 33 countries. Another 20 countries told the conference they will sign up and 14 are thinking seriously about it, said Britain's Environment Secretary Nicholas Ridley.

Financial aid delays avoided by mailing statements early

By Deborah Dinges
Collegian Reporter

The best way to avoid delays in receiving need-based federal financial aid for next year is to apply before the priority deadline March 15, said Larry Viterna, director of student financial assistance.

"Students need to get their Family Financial Statement filled out and mailed to the American College Testing Service by the deadline date to get first consideration for the aid," Viterna said. "It helps to get processing done early and ensures the students that all the money won't be gone by the time their application gets in."

"Aid is based on the results of information sent to ACT."
—Larry Viterna, Director of student financial assistance

About 50 students are still awaiting their federal financial aid for this school year because they turned in their FFS late, Viterna said.

Another obstacle in receiving financial aid checks on time is the verification process, he said. Students who are selected for this process have conflicts in their submitted information. Documents such as tax forms or the institutional verification form are used to check information.

"Most of the students who got their forms in on time and were chosen for verification have their money or will be receiving it within the week," Viterna said.

Federal programs students can apply for include the Pell Grant, the Perkins Loan, college work study, the Supplemental Education Opportunity Grant, and the Stafford Loan, formerly the guaranteed student loan, he said.

"Anybody can apply," Viterna said. "Aid is based on the results of information sent to ACT."

Deadlines for the general scholarship application and Emergency Student Loans have already passed, Viterna said. An exception will be made on Emergency Student Loans for students who will be receiving aid, but who have not received it yet.

Students wishing to apply under the general scholarship application may still do so, he said.

Some scholarships in which the guidelines are specific may still be left from the first round of awards if there are no students who filled the qualifications, he said.

Students interested in aid for summer school must fill out a summer school financial aid application by April 10.

Iran breaks relations with Britain

By The Associated Press

NICOSIA, Cyprus — Iran broke relations with Britain on Tuesday because it refused to suppress "The Satanic Verses," whose author is under a death sentence by Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini for blaspheming Islam.

Khomeini's fundamentalist Shiite Moslem regime, which has put a price of $5.2 million on novelist Salman Rushdie's head, said it was determined to defended Islam against foreign insults.

Britain said the 88-year-old patriarch's order that his followers kill Rushdie, a British citizen, violated the principles of international relations and the diplomatic rupture was "entirely of Iran's making."

Iran decided Feb. 27 to sever diplomatic ties unless Britain met its demands, expressed as follows in a parliamentary resolution:

Moslems object to Rushdie's portrayal of the prophet Mohammed's wives as prostitutes and his implication that Mohammed wrote the holy Koran rather than receiving it from Allah. Rushdie says the novel, published last year, is a secular study of good and evil that is not meant to offend Moslems.

More than a dozen countries have banned the book, including Egypt, India, Pakistan and Iran. Riots it inspired in India and Pakistan have taken at least 19 lives.

Rushdie, 41, was born in Bombay, India, to Moslem parents but has said he no longer practices religion. He has been in hiding since Khomeini pronounced the death sentence and Iranian clerics offered the reward.

In London, the Foreign Office said Tuesday that British officials had not received formal notification from Iran, but learned of the action through news reports and a Tehran radio broadcast.

Hussein Musavi, the Iranian premier, said on Iran's state radio that Britain had made "a big mistake" and Moslem countries would not permit their beliefs to be insulted.

An Iranian statement accused Britain, which Khomeini's clerics consider their worst Western enemy after the "Great Satan" United States, of "being in the front line of plots and treachery against Moslems" for two centuries.

After Khomeini ordered Rushdie killed, Britain closed its embassy in Tehran and its 11 European Economic Community partners — along with Canada, Norway and Sweden — recalled their ambassadors to Iran.

The dispute arose as relations between Britain and Iran were returning to normal. In December, Britain re-opened its embassy in Tehran, which had been closed for eight years.

Standing room only for most Big 8 fans

Standing room only.

Students who want to see the men's Big Eight tournament in Kansas City this weekend can purchase a $20 ticket to do so — for a chance at standing room only.

However, not all of the 750 tickets for upper-level seating that went on sale Tuesday at the Ahearn Ticket Office have been sold. What has to be realized is that the simple act of buying one of these tickets for the K-State vs. University of Kansas game Friday night does not even ensure a seat.

"Standing room only" ticket holders will get the leftovers from those who purchased day-long seats, but left before the final bucket. That's all they'll get.

Now compare those chances to spending those $20 somewhere else while watching the action on a big screen TV with endless refreshments. The two fail to compare.

But it's not that the Big Eight Conference officials were unfair when doling out the tickets. Each university receives an equal number of tickets to sell.

K-State was given a mixture of 1,000 lower- and upper-level seats to sell at $80 a whack. They were sold to those who could afford them — the donors to the Mike Ahearn Scholarship Fund.

That's 1,750 tickets to the weekend's festivities that were readily available to K-State fans. By the time all eight universities receive an equal number, about 3,000 tickets remain for corporate sponsors.

Of course, those sponsors don't pay student fees to support the team during the season, but they do support the grand finale. And they get to enjoy it in the best seats in the house. Guaranteed. No standing-room-only treatment for them.

The number of seats dedicated to students dwindles each year as corporate money becomes more and more important. But a limit and freeze needs to be set before corporate sponsorship becomes another bail-out tool for the Big Eight's ailing budget and compromises university student participation.

Kansas illegal drugs hypocritically taxed

Taxes are imposed on the citizens of a state in order to generate money. At least, that is what they are supposed to do.

Recently, however, some of the state's leaders in the continuing fight against drugs in our society decided to create a drug tax.

Not a tax on drugs sold in a family pharmacy down the street, mind you, but a tax on drugs that are illegal in this country, such as marijuana, cocaine and heroine.

The tax requires drug holders to purchase stamps at prices which vary according to the type of drug. For example, the cost of a marijuana stamp is $99 per ounce; for cocaine or any drug sold by the gram it is $200 per gram; and for drugs sold by the pill, such as speed or amphetamines, it is $2,000 per unit.

It is hard to imagine that any drug user or dealer would go to a state agency to purchase a tax for an illegal substance (sure, they'll keep the information confidential), but this is what this legislation requires. In turn, if a person is busted for drug use without possession of this stamp, they can be prosecuted for a larger amount of money.

If the purpose of the drug tax is to generate more revenue, the government is saying that obtaining money is more important than adhering to the law. Imagine if such a concept were possible in this society.

On the other hand, if the purpose behind the tax is to make it less desirable to use and sell illegal drugs because the tax is so high, then the government is also saying it is too weak to address the drug problem head on.

Not only is the Kansas government taking a back-door approach to dealing with the problem of drugs in our society, it is also misusing its power to tax. It's time for Kansas to decide what exactly its stand is on the drug problem in our society and act accordingly.

A government that taxes what it also defines as illegal is a government of hypocrisy. In its own ironic, backward way, the Kansas government has declared drugs tolerable, even legal.

A few thoughts while trying to decide if there is any person I dislike more than Stanley Koplik of the Kansas Board of Regents ...

Do athletes actually graduate from the University of Oklahoma, or are they just transfered to maximum security?

Is undergraduate studies an actual degree program at OU?

Since we're talking about OU, shouldn't we ask what kind of school it is that would steal another school's fight song?

The OU fight song, "Boomer Sooner," is in fact "Boola Boola," Yale University's fight song. While the phrase Boola Boola is not much more intelligent than the phrase Boomer Sooner, at least Yale has given us presidents while OU has given us the Boz.

Speaking of stolen songs, the University of Kansas' alma mater, which K-Staters have dubbed "Far Above the Stagnant Waters," is in fact "Far Above Cayuga's Waters," which just happens to be Yale University's alma mater.

What is it about Yale that inspires such thievery?

Speaking of KU, did you know that Norris Coleman started in more professional basketball games his rookie year than Danny Manning played in?

Maybe the person I dislike the most is Billy Tubbs .... No, I guess he's not so bad.

What exactly is leisure studies? What does a leisure studies major study? What is the homework like? Does one get more credit for going to class or for lying around the house watching soaps?

Point of information: Where does the anthropology department get its human bones? Why did my lab instructor ask me to donate my skull to K-State? How soon do they want it?

Isn't it sad that "thirtysomething," "The Cosby Show" and Tiffany are current measures of American culture?

Since the University is suffering from a case of "Everything Fee-ver," why doesn't Student Senate push for an arts fee?

A fee of $5 a semester, multiplied by the number of students at K-State, would provide more than $150,000 in just one year for K-State's theatre, art and dance programs.

Students would be able to get into all such events by simply flashing their fee card. A fee like this would help promote the fine arts and help introduce students to different art forms. Meanwhile, it would show the rest of the nation that K-State excels in more than just basketball.

The football team went 0-11 on the season and the basketball team is supposedly on the NCAA bubble. Still, via the telefund, our alumni donated more than $500,000 to the University. What's that about sports affecting donations? Aren't the only donations affected by excellence in sports the ones made directly to the athletic department?

Why doesn't the National Rifle Association like me?

What is a "cosmopolitan liberal" anyway?

That's it! College basketball officials are worse than .... No, it has to be just one person, not a group.

The fight for selective admissions is going on once again. The regents want to ensure that students entering our fine establishment have gone through a selective high school curriculum and have an ACT score of 23 or above.

This is funny since the standardized tests have been repeatedly attacked as inaccurate. What if an essay exam was given instead? This would give students the chance not only to demonstrate what information they have learned in high school, but also the chance to prove that they know how to organize and relate that information to other bits of information.

Such a test would also reveal problems with the students' high schools by showing in what way they failed to educate them. This way both the student and the high school can be helped.

Well, I think I've finally found the person. I guess I have to dislike Pol Pot of the Khmer Rouge in Cambodia more than I dislike Stanley Koplik. Yes, Pol Pot wins by default.

By the way, why is there a peephole in the first stall of the men's room near the Catskellar?

Letters

Fans supportive

Editor,

After reading Mike Fiegel and Greg Morgan's letter to the editor March 1, as well as Tom Morris' column, I can't help but wonder which coliseum they're talking about.

It certainly isn't the same Bramlage Coliseum with which I'm familiar.

The coliseum where I attend K-State's home basketball games has one of the loudest, most lively, enthusiastic crowds I've ever seen. The non-reserved section I sit in is always filled to the bursting point and the students stand and yell for the entire game.

The general admission section consists of the first 24 rows of section 19 and the first 10 rows of section 20. It has been my experience that in order to get a seat anywhere near the front, one must stand in line outside Bramlage at least two hours before the game starts — and up to three or four hours for weekend games.

In fact, to even get a seat in the general admission section, I had to camp out more than 80 hours in weather that was, shall we say, less than warm. It has also been my experience that each row of seats, normally designated as being able to seat 20 people, usually holds about 25 to 30.

This, of course, does not include the students sitting on the rail or standing in the aisles.

I arrived late the night of the game against Oklahoma, which Morris believes was such a disappointment. As I entered the coliseum, I was nearly deafened by the crowd's noise. Unable to find a seat in the general admission section, I ended up having to squeeze in between two friends in the ICAT section.

I watched K-State play one of their best games of the season, staying within 10 points of the then top-ranked team in the nation.

I attended all of the games at Ahearn last year; I think the fans at Bramlage are every bit as lively and supportive as they have been in years past. Our victory against Missouri March 1 night merely emphasizes the point. I saw Missouri players haunted by the refrain "airball" and other unprintable refrains.

I saw students on their feet screaming until they were hoarse, then screaming some more. I saw fans yelling and screaming and running onto the court after the game.

Best of all, I saw the 'Cats spurred on to a victory against a bigger, tougher, seventh-ranked team after a discouraging 73-68 loss earlier this year on the Tigers' home court.

Go ahead, tell me the fans didn't make a difference; I won't buy it.

I don't know where your seat is, Morris, but from where I'm sitting (and I'm sure Festus would agree with me), you don't have a leg to stand on.

Health fee thanks

Editor,

I wish to express my thanks to the students and the Student Senate in particular for their support and approval of the health fee increase. This is needed to provide for the continuing services of the Lafene Student Health Center. It is money well spent.

I am retiring on March 17, and I have spent over 26 years of my professional life in student health, the last 11 being here at Lafene.

Over these 26 years, I have had the opportunity to visit many student health centers all over the United States, and I can honestly say that Lafene ranks up there with the best.

My biggest regret has been my inability to convince all of the students how fortunate they are to have the truly quality medical care available to them at Lafene.

That is very frustating, but I guess it just goes with the territory. In any community, the medical care objectives revolve around three main concerns, and these are: the availability of care, cost of that care, and the quality of the care. Lafene meets all three criteria, and for this the students should feel most grateful.

My 26 years in student health have been most rewarding to me and my family. Students are really a great group to work with. Having been in private practice, I can tell you student health is better.

Thank you all for being such an important part of my life.

Priority mail service in Dykstra available to students, faculty

By Paige Gantz
Collegian Reporter

Students, faculty and staff who want something to be mailed in a hurry have the option of using Student Priority Mail, a service available from the U.S. Postal Service in Dykstra Hall.

"Priority mail has always been ... available but no one has really been aware of it," said Greg Humbert, manager of Central Mail Services. "Priority mail is more efficient than first class and cheaper than express mail."

To use this service, patrons are provided with bright, eye-catching envelopes which are used in place of manila envelopes, Humbert said. Studies show that when these highly visible envelopes are used, they receive "priority" treatment when mixed with normal first class mail.

The material mailed has only the size restriction of fitting in the envelope and should reach its destination within two days, he said.

"Envelopes have been passed out to all the departments on campus," Humbert said. "I've sent out memos which explain the benefits of priority mail, especially stating that this service is cheap."

Departments on campus could save a lot of money if they would consider how much they spend on large manila envelopes alone, he said.

"The free envelopes have a minimum postage of $2.40," Humbert said. "This covers items mailed weighing two pounds or less, and items weighing over two pounds are charged accordingly.

"We send hundreds of packets each week that consistently weigh two pounds or more," Humbert said. "Priority mail envelopes would save people money."

Danielle Topliff, veterinarian technician in the anatomy and physiology department, said her boss, Frank Blecha, associate professor of anatomy and physiology, is on sabbatical in France which requires her to mail him items three to four times a week. She said by using the priority mail service, she hopes her envelopes will be delivered sooner.

"We want to provide this University with the best possible mail service," Humbert said. "We're always looking into ways to make mail more convenient and reducing postal costs. Priority mail is underrated and deserves attention."

Maryland youth captured after 140-mile car chase

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A Maryland juvenile who was driving a stolen car led police on a 140-mile chase that averaged 111 mph before the car ran out of gas and he was captured.

The youth was being held in a juvenile detention center in Topeka Tuesday afternoon pending the filing of charges.

The chase started about 12:15 a.m. in Saline County on Interstate 70 when a Missouri Highway Patrol officer saw a car going faster than 100 mph, said Sgt. Jim Watson of the patrol. A computer check showed that the car had been stolen in Maryland.

Watson said the car apparently belonged to the teen-ager's mother.

The car ran several roadblocks as the chase continued west on I-70. Officers from Independence, Blue Springs, Kansas City and the Jackson County Sheriff's office joined the chase when it reached the Lafayette-Jackson county border.

The 16-year-old lost control of the car and it spun around three times on the interstate in Kansas City, but he regained control and continued driving.

"In fact, the officer thought he had wrecked the car," Watson said. "They were pretty close at that time, but he just kept his foot on the gas and kept going west."

Kansas officials joined the chase at the state line and followed the youth until the car ran out of gas.

Travel differs for spring break '89

By Brad Camp
Collegian Reporter

Skiing down the slopes of Colorado or sunbathing on the warm sands of a tropical beach are on the minds of many students this week. In a few days they will be on the road to their spring break destinations.

According to a local travel agency, many students are going to places other than the usual tropical hotspots.

"A lot of students are going skiing in Colorado," said Shirley Bramhall, consultant for Kansas State Travel Inc.

About a third of the students contacting the agency are going to Colorado. Other students are going to the usual places like Padre Island and the Florida beaches, she said.

"The big thing is to go skiing," Bramhall said.

Mike Penner, program adviser for Union Program Council, said the UPC Travel Committee offered one trip to Panama City Beach, Fla.

Penner said the trip was "sold out" with 44 students enlisted for the seven-night excursion.

Panama City is not one of the big hotspots, but has the potential to be one, he said.

Penner is more comfortable with the Florida location because Padre "has too many accidents" during the spring break season.

"During spring break, you go down with an attitude and get crazy," said Steve Mize, graduate student in regional and community planning.

Mize said he would have liked to go to Jamaica for spring break if his finances would have allowed. Instead, he will spend his third spring break in South Padre, Texas.

"You get cheap Tequila shots, cheap cases of Coronas and you get to bargain with the Mexicans," he said.

Sietske Saunders, senior in architecture and anthropology, said she and eight of her friends will be heading west to the Grand Canyon.

"We decided last fall to go. It's a big opportunity," Saunders said.

Architecture shop uses antique machines

Students use saw, lathes

By Kevin Kramer
Staff Writer

Turn-of-the-century machinery in the interior architecture woodworking shop is still whirling and working, and Stephen Murphy, head of the Department of Interior Architecture, said the equipment and workshop are important links to the interior architecture program.

"Contempory ideas are made from the use of this old equipment," Murphy said.

Some pieces of equipment date their use back to the first half of K-State's 125-year history.

"We have a lot of vintage, early-1900s equipment in our woodworking shop," he said. "It is used more than 35 hours a week by about 70 students a semester.

"All of the wood lathes we have, except one, date back to 1929 and were built by industrial engineering students at Kansas State agricultural college. The quality of construction is outstanding for the period and technology available."

A lathe is a machine on which a piece of wood is spun and shaped by a cutting tool.

Jack Durgan, professor in interior architecture, said much of the equipment originated in the industrial engineering department. It was moved to the interior architecture department as the industrial arts program was phased out.

In 1967, the equipment was temporarily moved to create a computer center. The equipment was transferred from Seaton Court to the east side of Seaton Hall, which was formerly a coal bin.

The computer center was relocated several years later. The shop was returned to its original courtyard location and has since continued to serve the students and faculty, Durgan said.

"One table saw in the workshop is an antique," he said. "I would guess it was made around 1890. It is still operational and does an outstanding job."

The saw originally had a long, flat-belt drive from a two- to three-horsepower motor, Durgan said. The faculty revamped the cumbersome belt drive to a V-belt drive and a smaller motor to reduce the space needed to house the machine.

"Every bit of the original equipment, which has been in the department more than 20 years, is still in very fine working order," Murphy said. "But, we need to maintain it and keep up with the state-of-the-art technology."

The equipment's maintenance and the workshop's viability has fallen into the laps of the faculty and students within the department, he said. Because the machinery was made at the University, the faculty and physical plant personnel make the replacement parts if the equipment breaks.

"There is no way replacement parts can be bought," Durgan said.

Murphy said keeping the equipment in the best operating condition is vital to the students' safety.

"Our faculty has tried to keep abreast of safety measures and add safety features to the older equipment to prevent the likelihood of injury," Durgan said.

The older equipment does not have all the safety features the newer equipment has, but the newer equipment is more likely to break or cause injury, he said.

"We have been able to maintain this equipment by 'hook or crook' because we have only received minimal assistance in terms of financial help from the state," Durgan said.

Murphy said the age of the equipment does not limit the design opportunities in this program.

"Students can design any kind of object, form and project they want," he said. "The designs rely on the skill and creativeness of the instuctor and students.

"Our thrust is to try to develop problem solvers and designers."

The program offers students a challenge to adapt to available resources and explore new types of styles as opposed to designs historical in nature, Murphy said.

"From the very beginning, the purpose of this shop was to give students a place where their design concepts could materialize into full-scale reproduction, enabling them to check the physical and aesthetic qualities of their work," Durgan said.

The efforts of faculty and students involved with the interior design program has won K-State numerous awards.

Senate refuses proposal on Sunday beer sales

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Kansans who want to drink a beer in front of their televisions on Sunday still will have to buy their beer the day before.

The Senate rejected Tuesday a proposal that would have allowed gas stations and grocery and convenience stores to sell 3.2 percent beer, or cereal malt beverage, on Sunday.

With a 23-9 vote, the Senate refused to advance a bill that would have permitted municipal governing bodies and county boards of commissioners to pass resolutions allowing such Sunday sales.

The bill would not have affected liquor stores, which sell full-strength beer, along with wine and liquor, and are not allowed to sell 3.2 percent beer.

Supporters said present state law is hypocritical because it allows people to drink strong liquor in restaurants on Sundays but does not allow people to buy weak beer at stores to drink at home.

Opponents contended the change would increase the number of illegal sales to minors, since most of such purchases are made at grocery stores and convenience shops. The measure drew opposition from wholesale liquor dealers and retail liquor store owners.

Economic reform begun before Gorbachev

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — Soviet reformers began planning their economic program two years before Mikhail S. Gorbachev came to power in 1985, Premier Nikolai I. Ryzhkov said Tuesday, and he implied that they molded communist ideology to fit.

"We had to find theoretical foundations for all the actions that we wanted to pursue afterward," Ryzhkov said.

"We have to have a lot of patience to implement what we have decided, because the scale of the country is so vast," he told 33 women journalists gathered in ornate St. Catherine's Hall of the Grand Kremlin Palace on the eve of International Women's Day.

Ryzhkov said planning for perestroika — Gorbachev's program of economic and social reforms — began two years before Gorbachev was elected head of the Communist Party. That would be in 1983, about the time former KGB chief Yuri Andropov came to power.

"Even at that time, we had forces who understood that everything was not healthy in our economy," Ryzhkov said.

For the first two years after Gorbachev took over in 1985, they worked on theory that would support their ideas, he said.

Gorbachev has rejected many long-standing Soviet principles in his effort to revive a sickly economy. He is trying to do away with a system in which Moscow bureaucrats decide what is produced throughout the country, and trying to transform the word "profit" from the height of capitalist evil to a measurement of socialist success.

Ryzhkov also promised to reveal the long-secret Soviet defense budget in 12 to 18 months, after accountants have arranged it in a form comparable to U.S. figures, apparently for use in arms negotiations.

As part of the plan to shift Soviet spending "from swords to plowshares," defense factories that produce 60 percent military hardware and 40 percent consumer goods will move to a 50-50 ratio by 1991.

Lady Cats hope for bid

By Chris Hays
Sports Editor

The 1988-89 basketball season may not be over just yet for the Lady Cats and Coach Matilda Mossman.

"I have been in contact with some people and I guess we are in consideration for the NIT," Mossman said.

The Lady Cats' hopes of receiving an at-large berth in the 48-team NCAA tournament were jilted Sunday when they lost to Oklahoma State in the semifinals of the Big Eight women's tournament. Mossman, though, is hoping K-State will receive an invitation from the National Invitational Tournament when the bids are handed out Sunday.

The NIT selection committee will pick eight teams to represent their respective schools in Amarillo, Texas, March 23-25. The committee will make its selections after the NCAA releases its invitations Sunday afternoon.

Mossman said last week that she felt the Lady Cats needed to win the Big Eight tourney in order to receive a berth in the NCAA tournament.

"I don't think the (NCAA) committee would consider a team with 11 losses," she said.

K-State, 18-11 overall, saw its possible NCAA tournament invitation slip away during the latter part of the season. The Lady Cats' chances were looking good at midseason with a 16-5 record and a five-game winning streak. But they lost five of their last six regular season games and dropped to 17-10, all but erasing any postseason hopes.

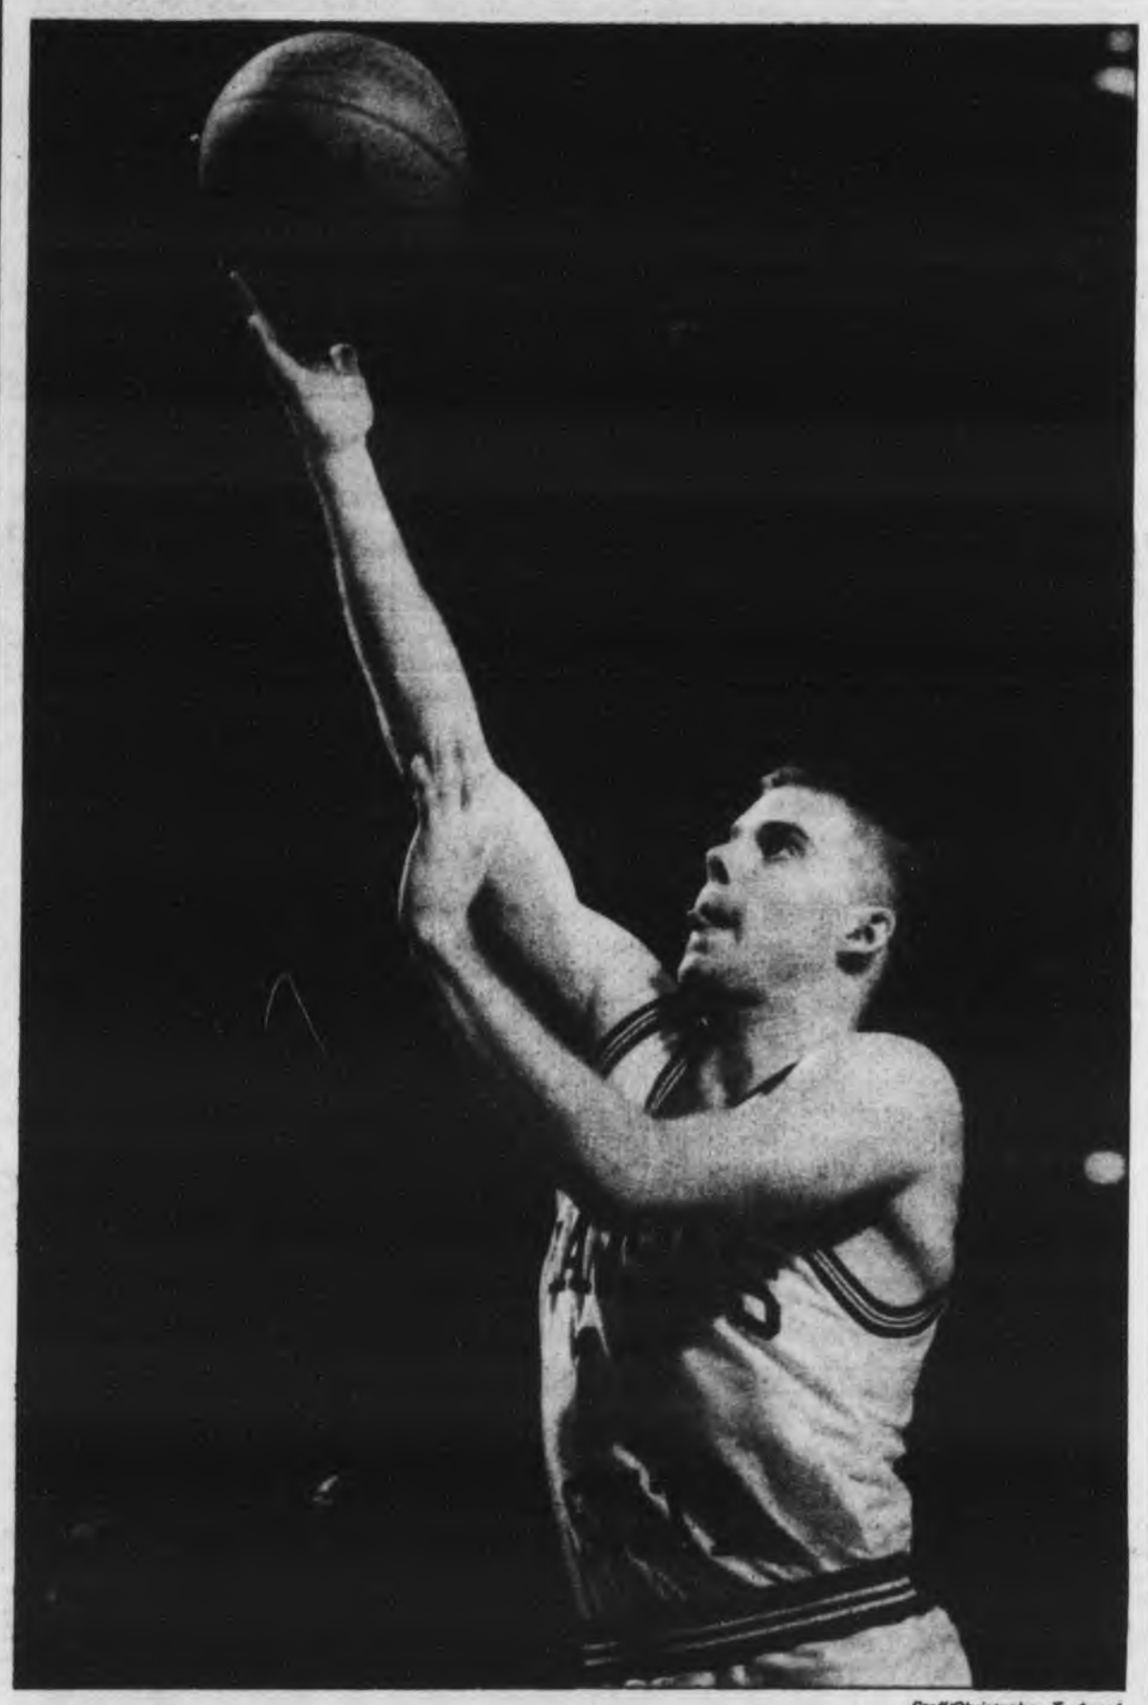
K-State won its first game in the Big Eight tourney against Nebraska, 74-59, but lost to Oklahoma State, 65-52, to further dampen its tourney hopes. But chances of being invited to the NIT are still pretty good.

"By virtue of the people we've played and then looking at our non-conference losses, I think we deserve consideration," Mossman said. "I really don't know for sure how good our chances are, but I think we have a shot at it. It just depends on how many other teams are left with nine or 10 losses and then how our schedule rates."

K-State's schedule should rate fairly high. Conference losses to Colorado and Oklahoma State should not hurt the Lady Cats' schedule rating. The Lady Buffs won 27 games, while the Cowgirls had 19.

The Lady Cats' non-conference victory over Montana could loom big since the Lady Grizzlies lost just three games this season. Losses to Radford and Florida International may also help K-State's schedule strength because each of those teams lost just four games this year.

The NIT is sponsored by the Amarillo Chamber of Commerce and will take place at the Amarillo Civic Center. The eight-team tourney will feature a consolation bracket and each team will play three games.



The Lady Cats will take this week off, resuming practice only if they have been extended an NIT invitation.

K-State guard Steve Henson was selected to the All-Big Eight team Tuesday. Henson missed being a unanimous first-team choice among a panel of sportswriters and sportscasters by only one ballot.

Henson tabbed all-Big 8

'Cat guard near unanimous pick

By Mike Goens
Sports Writer

This season's hard-nosed play of K-State guard Steve Henson has been recognized by a panel of sportswriters and sportscasters, who Tuesday named him to The Associated Press All-Big Eight basketball first team.

Henson, who last year was named to the second team in a player poll conducted by the Kansas City Star-Times, missed being a unanimous selection by just one vote.

"It's great to see Steve rewarded for his effort, leadership and play on the season," Coach Lon Kruger said. "It's a reflection not only on Steve, but also his teammates and the squad."

Henson is sixth in the Big Eight in scoring with an average of 18 points a game for the Wildcats. Against Missouri two weeks ago, he scored 23 points to become the 17th player in K-State history to score 1,000 points in their career.

Henson reached his career-scoring high in the Wildcats' loss at Iowa State Saturday. He scored 33 points on 14-25 field goal shooting in the 101-89 loss.

Henson, a junior from McPherson, had to pick up this season from where four senior starters left off last year. A year ago, Henson was basically a playmaker, but this year he has been called on to score more due to the graduation of four starters whose combined efforts totalled nearly 50 points a game. Last year he averaged just more than nine points and shot an average of six field goals per game.

"I'd say if you had Mookie Blaylock and Steve Henson on the same team, you'd have the best two guards in the country," Oklahoma Sooners' Coach Billy Tubbs said earlier this season.

Henson may be on his way to becoming possibly the best free-throw shooter in college history. He led the nation as a sophomore at 92.5 percent.

In two games last week, Henson regained the season lead as the nation's top free-throw shooter. He is now 80 of 86 for the year at 93 percent, and is at 90 percent for his career.

If he does win the national free-throw shooting title, he would be only the fourth player ever to do so two years in a row. Henson would then have his senior year to become the only player to do it three consecutive years.

Henson is fourth in the conference with five assists a game and fifth with 1.6 steals a game. He is also fourth in three-point field goal percentage at 45 percent. The McPherson native is quite an iron man as well, averaging 39 minutes a game in Big Eight play.

He has scored in double figures in 17 straight games for the 'Cats and led the scoring in 12. In the two games Henson was kept in single digits, against Oregon State and Southwest Missouri State, the

All-University semis tonight at Rec Center

By The Collegian Staff

The residence hall division intramural basketball champion Moore 7 will play independent division winner Last Chance at 7 tonight at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex for the right to advance to Thursday's All-University title game.

In the other semifinal, 6-foot-and-under champion Dat Boys II will take on fraternity division winner Theta Xi at 9 p.m.

In other action tonight, Spika Dunka Xi plays Louisburg Five for the Co-Rec championship at 7, while the Spikers and Hoopsters match up for the women's division title at 8.

Dat Boys II won the 6-foot-and-under title by defeating the X's, 70-62, Tuesday night, while Theta Xi took the fraternity title over Pi Kappa Alpha, 65-37; Last Chance won the independent crown, 67-53, against Cali and Moore 7 defeated Haymaker 3 for the residence hall championship, 44-39.

The All-University title game is slated for 7 p.m. Thursday.

Intramural Note — The entry deadline for softball teams is 5 p.m. Thursday in the Rec Services office. A managers meeting is scheduled for 4 p.m. today in the Union Forum Hall.

Tabler lifts KC to victory

By The Associated Press

HAINES CITY, Fla. — Pat Tabler singled in a pair of runs with the bases loaded in the fifth inning Tuesday as the Kansas City Royals beat the Chicago White Sox 8-3.

Tabler, a career .579 hitter with the bases loaded, was 8-for-9 with 20 runs batted in with the bases full last year. With one out in the fifth, he drilled the first pitch from Tom McCarthy to right field, scoring Gary Thurman and Willie Wilson.

The Royals were leading 3-2 going into the fifth, but broke it open with five runs. After Tabler's hit, Frank White drove in two runs with a double and Bob Boone singled in another run.

SMU starts rebuilding process

By The Associated Press

DALLAS — The spring football healing process for Southern Methodist's national shame began on a snow-fringed field Tuesday with Coach Forrest Gregg promising that the school will restore its former glory without cheating.

"Nothing that has happened is going to take away from what this place is all about, and we'll be back — the right way," said Gregg, a star tackle at SMU in the 1950s.

Tight end David Bearden wore a T-shirt, saying "Do You Believe In The Second Coming?"

"I do," Gregg said. "I believe SMU will be back in the Cotton Bowl some day."

It's been two years on the sidelines serving hard time for SMU because of a slush fund that reached the highest offices at the proud university.

Bill Clements, now the governor of Texas, was among those involved in the fund while he was chairman of the SMU Board of Regents.

A new school president, a new athletic director and a new head coach were brought aboard in the fallout of the NCAA's first death penalty.

On Sept. 2, SMU plays Rice in a stadium that will be familiar only to those who followed Mustangs football in the 1940s and early 1950s.

SMU won't be playing in 65,000-seat Texas Stadium where Eric Dickerson and Craig James lit up the scoreboard. Instead, the Mustangs will compete in their red and blue on campus in musty old Ownby Stadium, which is undergoing a $1.5 million facelift.

SMU's thin team worked out this fall, but spring has brought an air of optimism to "The Hilltop" because players, students, and alumni can see the looming schedule.

"We're nervous today," said senior safety Norbert Osborn, a letterman on SMU's 1986 team which was the school's last. "We're a little tight and feel the pressure."

The intersectional schedule includes Connecticut, North Texas, and a November trip into the land of the national champions, Notre Dame.

Athletic Director Doug Single said he didn't try to get out of the contract with Notre Dame because "I wanted our student-athletes to thrill at the experience of playing in South Bend."

It should be fun until the kickoff for the young Mustangs.

"That game will be interesting," Osborn said. "Maybe that's why coach Gregg has us running six miles a day."

KC may get minor league hockey

DENVER — Denver Rangers co-owner Richard Gerry has acknowledged that he has talked to Kansas City officials about possibly moving the franchise to that city's Kemper Arena next season.

Gerry, who owns the franchise along with Sidney Shlenker and United Cable Co., met with Kansas City officials last week to discuss the possible move.

While Gerry on Monday called the discussions "nothing more than preliminary," he claimed the team's average attendance of 2,000 is only half of what he needs to break even.

Gerry also said the team's rent climbs from $800 a game this year for use of the Denver Coliseum to $1,500 in 1989-1990, then to $1,750 during the last two years of the agreement.

Dean Bonham, a Rangers' marketing official, said the franchise spent $100,000 in programs and advertising during the first half of this season, but did not see satisfactory results at the gate.

Blaylock, King, Irvin head all-conference team

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Stacey King and Mookie Blaylock, who sparked Oklahoma to its fourth conference championship in six years, and Missouri guard Byron Irvin are unanimous choices for The Associated Press All-Big Eight basketball team for 1988-89.

Guard Steve Henson of K-State missed being a unanimous first-team choice by only one ballot among a panel of sportswriters and sportscasters who regularly cover the Big Eight.

Joining those four on the first team was Victor Alexander, Iowa State's sophomore center whose steady development coincided with the Cyclones' late-season surge.

There is not one repeater from last year's all-Big Eight team, comprised of five seniors who were all first-round draft selections by the NBA.

"People who thought the Big Eight was going to suffer a let-down this year should take a look at the top players we have this season," said Iowa State Coach Johnny Orr. "With the possible exception of Colorado, every team has gotten better this year, I believe. We may not have a lot of well-established players, but there's a pool of very talented young players coming up in the Big Eight."

King, a 6-11 senior, led the Big Eight in both scoring and rebounding and was described by Nevada-Las Vegas Coach Jerry Tarkanian as the best offensive center in the country. He averaged 26.2 points and 10.4 rebounds and set a Thomas and Mack Center record with 48 points this year at UNLV.

"We had to go to a zone because we couldn't guard him," Tarkanian said. "We didn't have anybody big enough or strong enough to handle him. I'm just glad he's graduating."

Opposing coaches will also be happy to wave bye-bye to Blaylock. The 6-2 senior guard has made his mark as one of the greatest defensive players in Big Eight history. He averaged more than 20 points and four rebounds this year, but even more eye-catching were his 208 assists and 117 steals. This made him the first player in NCAA history to record more than 200 assists and 100 steals in back-to-back seasons.

Irvin, the other senior on the first team, is a 6-6 do-everything guard for a Missouri team whose season was rocked by the illness of 22-year coach Norm Stewart. Stewart's cancer surgery last month left assistant coach Rich Daly in charge, and the Tigers finished runnerup to Oklahoma in the regular season race and ranked No. 10 in the nation.

Heading the second team is Richard Dumas, a 6-7 sophomore for Oklahoma State who averaged almost 16 points and eight rebounds. Also on the second unit are Kevin Pritchard, 6-4, and Milt Newton, 6-5, of Kansas; Fred McCoy, 6-7, of K-State, and Shaun Vandiver, a 6-10 sophomore who provided last-place Colorado with one of the few bright spots in an otherwise demoralizing season. Vandiver, a transfer from Hutchinson Community College, averaged 18.3 points and 10.3 rebounds, the only player in the league besides King to have double figures in both categories.

State Supreme Court rules drug tax law to be constitutional

By Gary Lytle
Collegian Reporter

The Kansas Supreme Court ruled Friday the marijuana and controlled substances tax act is constitutional and does not violate a dealer's protection from self-incrimination guaranteed by the Fifth Amendment.

In two separate prior cases, the law had been ruled unconstitutional because it violated the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination. The charges alleging violations of the drug tax act were dismissed in both cases.

"We had been confident that it would be ruled constitutional," said Sam Van Leeuwen, Department of Revenue spokesman.

Because the Kansas law had been based on a similar Minnesota statute ruled constitutional by the Minnesota Supreme Court, the department expected a favorable ruling, said Van Leeuwen.

"I think it's great," said Bill Kennedy, Riley County Attorney, regarding the Court's ruling on the law. He said the law will be a valuable tool for prosecuting major drug cases in the county.

According to the Court's written decision on the case, the justices viewed the main question to be "whether the drug tax act as written, or as we may construe it within the intent of the legislature, grants sufficient immunity from self-incrimination to provide the Fifth Amendment protections of the Constitution."

Two specific passages from the law which the Supreme Court cited as proof the statute would not require self-incrimination said, "any person may purchase any such stamp, label or other indicia without disclosing such person's identity."

The second passage stated, "neither the director of taxation nor a public employee may reveal facts contained in a report or return required by this act, nor can any information contained in such a report or return be used against the dealer in any criminal proceeding, unless independently obtained, except in connection with a proceeding involving taxes due under this act from the taxpayer making the return."

In the final summary of the decision, the justices said, "we conclude that the Kansas drug tax act as construed herein does not violate the Fifth Amendment prohibition against self-incrimination and is not unconstitutional on such grounds."

Attorney William K. Rork, who argued on behalf of the appellees in both cases, said he was dissatisfied with the Court's decision because of its failure to address the question of whether possession of drug tax stamps could be viewed as self-incriminating.

Rork's main concern is that juries will view the possession of a drug tax stamp as an indication of the person's intent to sell drugs and not simply compliance with state laws.

Because possession of an illegal drug with intent to sell carries a greater penalty than simple possession of the drug, Rork said requiring persons to buy the stamps would cause them to incriminate themselves.

The next step in the case is to file a petition with the Kansas Supreme Court for a rehearing, which must be done within 20 days, he said. If the petition for a rehearing fails, the cases could be petitioned to the U.S. Supreme Court.

Rork said he is sure the cases would "go to the (U.S.) Supreme Court."

"The only question is whether they will hear the case," he said.

Because the constitutionality of the law has been in question, the Department of Revenue has gone no further than filing assessments against people caught in possession of illegal drugs without the proper tax stamps, Van Leeuwen said.

The assessment can be appealed within 15 days of the date it is issued, said Cleo Murphy, bureau chief for the Business Tax Bureau, part of the Department of Revenue.

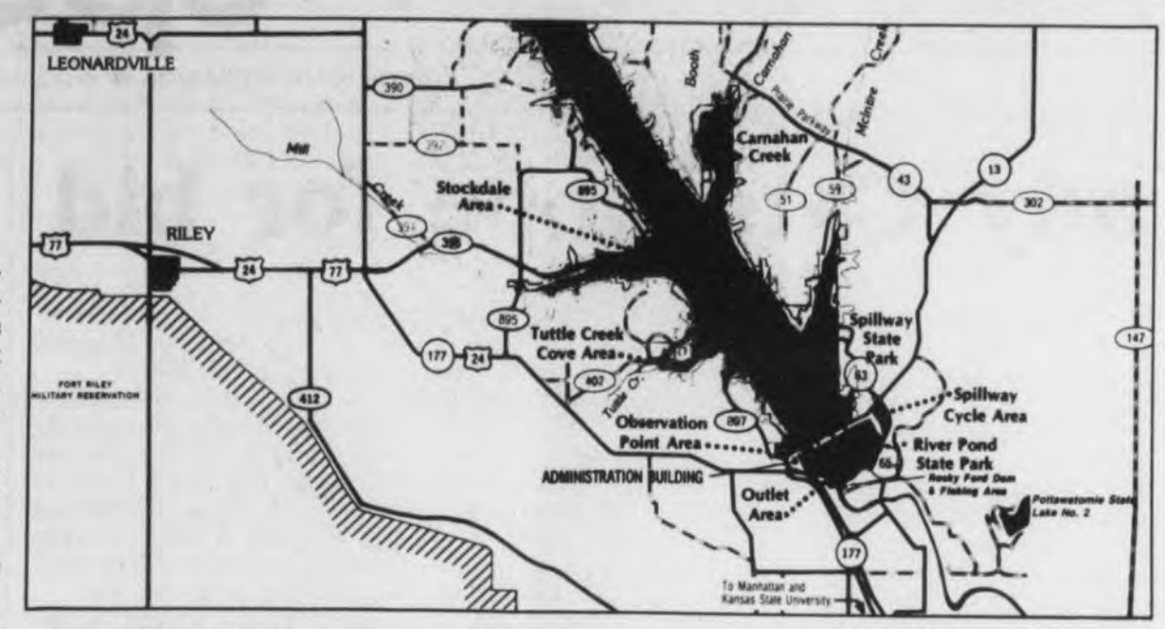
Now that the law has been ruled constitutional, the department can proceed with issuing tax warrants to be served by the sheriff of the county where the person named in the warrant lives, Murphy said.

The warrant is not for the arrests of the people named, instead it is a lean on any property they may possess, she said.

Tuttle area options sought

Army corps may close Stockdale

By Mary Ubel
Collegian Reporter



The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers is considering cutback alternatives to closing the Stockdale Recreation Area at Tuttle Creek Reservoir, said George Hanley, chief of public affairs for the Kansas City district of the Corps.

Although no deadline has been set, Larry Krump, Corps public affairs specialist, said Corps officials in Washington will make final decisions on park closures by the end of March or early April.

"Initially, Washington selected area parks in all Corps districts to be partially or totally closed to cut spending for fiscal year 1990."

—Larry Krump U.S. Army Corps of Engineers

"Right now everything is up in the air, but the re-evaluation (of Corps spending) came about because of questions from both the public and Congress," he said. "The possibility of closure has had a lot of response."

Hanley said the possible closure has been the "single issue in this district that has generated public opposition."

He said opponents range from elected officials to commercial operators on the lakes.

Rep. Jim Slattery, D-2nd District, said he would like to see the Corps look for ways to trim costs and save taxpayers' money, but he is not in favor of closing the lake area.

"I don't think it's appropriate to reduce maintenance, especially of reservoirs that were sold to the public, not only because the reservoirs provide water to local communities but because residents were promised recreational use at the reservoirs to begin with," Slattery said.

He said he is glad to see the Corps of Engineers is backing away from the first proposal and is being encouraged to look at other areas to make cutbacks.

The Stockdale Recreation Area was to be closed by order of Robert Page, assistant secretary of the Army for civil works. Use of the park at Stockdale is intended for campers and offers boat ramp services, picnic areas, toilets, showers and sewage disposal, Hanley said.

The park area has not been shut down, but it is closed for the winter.

"Initially, Washington selected area parks in all Corps districts to be partially or totally closed to cut spending for fiscal year 1990," Krump said.

He said Page wants the districts to develop other options to cut spending instead of closing area parks.

Out of the 11 park areas at Tuttle Creek, Stockdale was the only area selected to be closed, Krump said.

All 35 Corps districts in the country were initially required to cut spending in operations and maintenance of recreation areas, he said.

The Kansas City district — which covers Kansas, Missouri, a lake in Harlan County, Nebraska, and a small area of Iowa — is planning to save about $1.8 million in fiscal 1989.

About $100,000 would be saved if Stockdale were closed, Hanley said.

Fact Sheet on the Student Athletic Fee

I. The Athletic Department pays the University over $1 million/year in tuition, fees, room & board.

II. Kansas State University has one of the HIGHEST student seating allocations in Division IA basketball (48.1%).

III. The current prices of student season basketball and football tickets are among the LOWEST in Division IA Athletics nationwide.

IV. Both Wichita State and Kansas University have athletic fees. Other Big Eight Schools with fees are Colorado, Iowa State and Oklahoma State.

V. Kansas State is currently operating with the LOWEST athletic budget in the Big Eight, $1.5 million less than the seventh highest and less than half of the highest.

VI. The Student Athletic Fee is only ONE part of a FIVE part plan to increase the athletic budget.

VII. A portion of the monies collected from the fee will be given to NCAA sanctioned club sports, gymnastics and soccer, and crew will also be included in this allocation.

VIII. If the fee passes the students are GUARANTEED the following:

1. Free admission to all non-revenue NCAA athletic events held on the KSU campus.

2. A price cap placed on student season basketball and football tickets at $3.50/game and $5.00/game respectively, for a three-year period.

3. A guarantee that student season football and basketball tickets will not be combined for a period of three years.

4. A guarantee that students will receive a minimum of 6,000 seats in Bramlage Coliseum.

IX. At the conclusion of 3 years, a select student committee will evaluate the fee, how it has been allocated, and how it has impacted the Department and the University.

Replacements surpass punk; album on verge of pop scene

By Doug Fall
Collegian Reviewer

The Replacements have been accused of selling out by their fans while "Musician" magazine calls them "the last, best band of the '80s." Regardless of what they are called, The Replacements' new album, "Don't Tell a Soul," is definitely a daring step.

The Replacements have emerged from their punk days into a band along the lines of R.E.M., and like it, have begun to rise above the college, alternative scene, teetering on the brink of pop stardom.

Their first single, "I'll Be You" is certainly turned down in volume more than the songs on previous albums, like "Pleased to Meet Me" and "Tim." But it is premature to dismiss them as another of the growing number of bands who have sold out their sound to make money. Beneath a calm front and almost new wave hair is the same band with the same message.

Review

"Anywhere's Better Than Here," the first song on side two, is the closest The Replacements come to sounding like their punkish, unfinished earlier days, except perhaps in the song, "I Won't."

This album is, more than in the past, an album — the songs have a connecting thread of compatibility, with true artistic work filling in the cracks.

What strikes listeners is the structure many of these songs have. Songs like "We'll Inherit the Earth" and "They're Blind" have lilting melodies and smooth instrumentation. Paul Westerberg, the lead singer, has obviously matured and taken The Replacements' music more seriously. Faster is replaced by better, or at least more careful.

While not every song is a work of Westerberg genius, there are a few gems that only The Replacements could manage. "Darlin' One" is a sweet love song with an edge and turns out to be one of the better songs on the album. Westerberg's ragged voice matches the tone of the song perfectly as he wailfully mourns a lost friend.

"Rock 'n' Roll Ghost" is a quiet reflective piece that sums up possibly the band's most pervasive theme — fear. Whether it is rejection or, in this case, becoming obsolete, The Replacements' albums always seem to have a sense of fear beneath them.

Besides the song's meandering tempo, it is downright mournful — definitely a new step for the band. Westerberg even admits that the song has made him break down several times while performing it — something that makes him very uncomfortable.

A song that earns the group all the comparisons to R.E.M. is "Achin' To Be." If this song had been slipped onto one of R.E.M.'s albums, it would be hard to pick out as phony. As The Replacements prove, though, that is not their style and they explore new territory in the other tunes.

The most autobiographical song on the whole album, as well as one of the few without an apostrophe in the title, is the first one, "Talent Show." This song sums up The Replacements' whole intent with the new album. "Got an offer you might refuse/ Tonight, tonight we're gonna take a stab." As the name implies, it is about their shot at success, which is what this album is.

So while some may be dismayed at this turn in direction by The Replacements, it is sure to win a few more fans. The Replacements may say "Don't Tell a Soul," but I say "Tell everyone, The Replacements are here."

Genetics discussed

Too many researchers, too few genes

By Bryan Ackley
Collegian Reporter

Genetically engineered microorganisms are useful tools for scientists but can only be used to solve a limited set of problems because too many researchers are chasing too few genes, said James Tiedje, professor of microbial ecology at Michigan State University.

Tiedje spoke Tuesday evening to about 100 people attending the sixth-annual Roscoe Ellis Jr. Lectureship at Throckmorton Hall.

Scientists throughout the country are integrating new genes into the chromosomes of plants and other organisms, Tiedje said.

Through genetic engineering, researchers are attempting to increase the organisms' resistance to frost, viruses, herbicides, insects, hazardous waste and other environmental conditions that could inhibit growth or reproduction, he said.

Although the public may benefit from genetically engineered organisms, scientists only know how to alter or manipulate part of an organisms' genetic structure, which is not enough to justify the use of this procedure on a wide scale, Tiedje said.

The testing of genetically engineered wild plants poses a greater threat to the environment than testing on plants such as corn because wild plants reproduce naturally, whereas corn cannot reproduce without human intervention, he said.

Potentially dangerous wild plants created by genetic engineering could infiltrate an ecosystem faster than non-reproductive plants, which are easier to control, Tiedje said.

Although the study of genetic-engineering is only beginning to produce measurable results, Tiedje said he is surprised that a large portion of the American public understands and supports researchers working in the field.

A 1987 Harris Poll reported that 66 percent of the American public basically understands the concept of genetic engineering and believes it will improve the quality of human life.

Tiedje said additional research has shown that the American public supports allowing researchers, rather than the government, to establish guidelines for the testing and regulation of genetic engineering.

The genetic engineering industry is now regulated by agencies, such as the Food and Drug Administration, the U.S. Department of Agriculture and the Environmental Protection Agency.

Researchers are not satisfied with government guidelines because it wants to use existing laws to govern genetic engineering, he said.

The government has not adequately researched recent advances in the field in order to establish a new system of regulations, Tiedje said.

Companies producing genetically engineered organisms prefer regulation by the industry because they fear new laws would seriously restrict their ability to produce and distribute new products, he said.

"Review requirements (for genetically engineered products) are more stringent than the level of risk," Tiedje said.

Tiedje is chairman of the EPA Science Advisory panel, EPA Biotechnology Science Advisory Committee and is a member of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration Committee on Planetary Biology and Chemical Evolution.

Slattery says Bush's 'budget shenanigans' lack spending details

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Details. Fine print.

Those are the operative words these days from lawmakers like Kansas Rep. Jim Slattery, who serve on congressional committees digging their way through President Bush's budget.

Slattery, a Topeka Democrat, says he's disturbed by several of Bush's recommendations, what he calls "budget shenanigans," and the lack of detail on where the president would make spending cuts or pay for proposed spending increases on some programs.

Bush outlined his new initiatives in a speech to Congress last month but Slattery and other Budget Committee lawmakers are still awaiting the particulars.

"The bottom line is that the president is really playing out his political strategy," said Slattery, the only Kansan serving on either of the House or Senate Budget committees.

"He learned very well from President Reagan that it's easy and makes for good presidential politics to give the American people the good news and then set back and wait for the Congress to give the American people the bad news."

Having said that, however, Slattery isn't writing off Bush yet or predicting an end to the spirit of bipartisan cooperation between Congress and the White House, which Bush has cultivated in his first weeks in office.

"I am not prepared to say the honeymoon is over on the budget issue," Slattery said.

He said he hopes the administration will flesh out its proposals in the next few weeks as agency officials troop to Capitol Hill to testify on their 1990 budget plans.

But he warns, "If the president isn't forthcoming ... I think he's going to come under sharp congressional criticism for not really providing the leadership we need on this issue."

Ultimately, Slattery wants the White House and congressional leaders to agree to an "economic summit" and negotiate a compromise blueprint for federal spending over the next two years.

"From a political standpoint, dealing with the deficit is a net loser unless you really deal with it," Slattery said.

"We're in a bit of a box. The only way we can break out of this jam we're in is for the president and congressional leaders to sit down ... with everything on the table and come up with an agreement."

So far, Slattery said he doesn't like Bush's proposals for:

■ Cutting agriculture spending by about 19 percent, the same as recommended by President Reagan. "I don't see anything in the Bush budget for rural America," he said.

■ Roughly $5 billion in cuts in Medicare, which pays for medical care for the elderly and disabled. He said the cuts would hurt rural hospitals in states like Kansas.

■ Lowering the capital gains tax rate. Bush contends that cutting the tax rate would result in about $4.8 billion in additional revenue by stimulating the economy. Slattery doubts that revenue would be raised, calling the proposal "smoke and mirrors nonsense."

Reagan has drawn praise for calling for about $441 million in additional spending on education programs, but Slattery complains that Bush has incorporated Reagan's proposals as the foundation for his education budget. Reagan recommended abolishing two dozen education programs.

Results of child care survey tallied

By Mindy Robert
Collegian Reporter

The KSU Child Development Center will not extend its hours to include evening care, said Nancy Bolsen, center director.

A survey conducted by the center showed faculty and staff are not interested in evening care for their children, Bolsen said. The survey was mailed to 4,300 faculty and staff, and 80 surveys were returned. Twenty-five respondents said they would like a variety of care, including evening care and preschool play experience, to be offered at the center.

Because only 18 respondents indicated an interest in evening care, "(The center is) not looking toward evening care at this time," she said.

The survey tried to determine the number of parents who would use the service from 4 to 10:30 p.m. The center offers care from 7 a.m. to 5:30 p.m.

"I was not surprised about the information," Bolsen said. "Based on our own families, I did not expect a groundswell of interest in evening care (from faculty and staff)."

A survey of families with children already enrolled at the center was conducted in December to determine if there was an interest in evening care, she said. Forty-five percent of the families responded and, of those, 80 percent were not interested in evening care.

Mike Steinle, student senator and graduate in business administration, suggested in November that the center conduct the surveys.

"I thought they should (conduct the surveys) since student government helps fund it," Steinle said. "It is important to get input into what students want."

For the center to begin looking at providing evening care, 30 full-time slots would need to be filled, Bolsen said.

"(The center) would need to have two or three classrooms full to make evening care worthwhile," Bolsen said. "At another time, this survey may show us the need for evening care."

Interest in evening care could change if there is an increase in the number of evening classes taught, she said.

"Families try to work schedules so that one parent or an older sibling is at home (in the evenings) and therefore would not need evening care," Bolsen said.

No child-care center in Manhattan offers evening hours, said Sharon Wolff, of the environmental health division of Riley County Health Department. Most centers close by 6 p.m.

Evening care is available in some registered day care homes, licensed day care homes and group day care homes in Manhattan, Wolff said.

Before the KSU Child Development Center could extend its hours to include evening care, the center's license would have to be changed, Bolsen said.

Requirements for a center with nighttime care include separate sleeping areas for boys and girls over six years old, movable screens, and specific numbers of meals and snacks, Wolff said.

Eastern

reboarding for their destinations.

Braniff took over Eastern's nonstop service to many of the warmer climates, such as Phoenix, when the airline stopped servicing those areas a few years ago, Dailey said.

International Tours only had three clients affected by the strike, but Dailey said all three have chosen to "wait and see" what happens.

Dailey urged spring break travelers not to "hit the panic button."

"Other airlines are trying to pick up the slack. It will be inconvenient but have patience and you'll get there and get home," she said.

An agent with Creative Travel Inc., who asked not to be identified, said they had a mix of students and non-students who had booked flights with Eastern.

"We're not booking on Eastern until (the strike) is resolved," she said.

Gantz said she purchased her trip as a package through Classic Travel and Tours. It was a "Get Yourself to Fort Lauderdale" tour, where travelers board a ship for a cruise to the Bahamas from Ft. Lauderdale. Gantz said she had the choice of flying or riding a bus. When she purchased her tickets, Gantz said she "had no idea" Eastern would go on strike.

Bruce Slimmer, an agent with Classic Travel and Tours, said the agency "doesn't book flights directly, but tries to help people" get airline accomodations.

To book flights directly, an agency must have a special number, which can't be issued until the business has been open for two years, Slimmer said. Classic Travel has been open for a little over a year and books airline flights through other agencies.

"We work more in organizing tours than in individual travel," he said.

Slimmer said the agency had "only a couple" clients affected by the strike and those were students going on spring break trips who waited until later to make their travel plans.

Gantz said she did call late to make her plans and took the flight because she was "looking for a fare that would get us there by Sunday afternoon."

Whether or not her trip works out, she said she has decided Eastern is not the airline for her.

"Who wants to fly with a stupid flim-flam? I know I'll never fly with Eastern," Gantz said.

Wildcats lost. He has passed the 20-point mark 10 times this year.

In addition, he may lead the Big Eight in floor burns, a result of diving after loose balls. It was this trait that prompted Kansas Coach Roy Williams to say of Henson, "He is as tough a competitor as I have ever had a team play against."

Wildcat center Fred McCoy was selected to the AP's second team. McCoy is K-State's second leading scorer this season with 17 points a game and the Wildcats' leader in rebounds with 7 per contest.

Construction of road planned

Questions of location's safety raised

By Chris Koger
Staff Writer

Personnel representing the Facilities Planning Office met Wednesday with faculty from the College of Human Ecology and the Hoeflin Stone House Child Care Center to discuss concerns about the construction of a new road near the center.

Plans call for the road to intersect North Manhattan Avenue across from McCain Lane and continue past residence hall parking lots B-3 and B-16, ending at Mid-Campus Drive across from Pittman Hall.

If the road is constructed according to current plans, it will pass through the northern part of the center's playground and within 150 feet of the center itself.

Susan Wanska, director of child care programs in the Department of Human Development and Family Studies, said the main issues addressed at the meeting were the safety of the Stone House children and the future of the playground.

"Our primary concern is the safety of the children," Wanska said. "This road is being planned on a hill, and the intersection at that point would be very close to the building.

"Having seen the plans today, I would say it is going to be a fairly major intersection, and we are looking at the safety aspects of the road."

Director of Facilities Planning Larry Garvin said he is looking at possible "modest relocations" of the road, based on the issues discussed at the meeting.

"They asked me questions about the road placement, and I'm going to respond by looking at alternatives," he said.

A decision between the two groups may be reached within a week, but if an agreement is not reached, the project will be delayed, Garvin said.

"I sense there's potential for an agreement," he said. "By the end of spring break we should know if it is a go or no-go situation."

George Miller, vice president for administration and finance, said the road is part of a long-range plan that was drawn up in 1977 to relocate the power plant and facilities management offices near Call and Weber halls.

"The emphasis here is not on what was planned in terms of the past, but what can be done currently," Miller said. "This is something we need to deal with soon."

Trial confirmation of Tower proposed

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Senate Republican Leader Bob Dole, struggling to stave off rejection of John Tower's nomination as defense secretary, proposed Wednesday night an extraordinary six-month trial confirmation period so senators could judge whether Tower lived up to his no-drinking pledge.

Senate Democratic Leader George Mitchell expressed "immediate serious concerns" over the proposal, but promised to consider it overnight.

Dole made his dramatic bid to salvage the nomination at the end of the fifth day of a draining Senate debate, and after conceding it would "take a miracle to win confirmation."

Under Dole's proposal, Tower would be confirmed, but would submit a letter of resignation to President Bush dated Oct. 1, 1989. If Tower's performance were satisfactory, there "probably" would be no need to reconfirm him, Dole said. Otherwise, "he probably wouldn't be the nominee."

Dole said he offered his proposal after discussing it with Tower. It came as the Senate neared a climax in its bitter struggle over the nomination.

Lloyd Bentsen of Texas became the third Democrat to endorse Tower's confirmation, but his speech was bracketed by declarations of opposition from Claiborne Pell of Rhode Island, Bennett Johnston of Louisiana, Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut and Charles Robb of Virginia — Democrats who had been lobbied hard by the Bush administration as potential pro-Tower votes.

Striking machinists lose in court

By The Associated Press

Machinists striking Eastern Airlines failed to win appellate court permission Wednesday to shut down commuter railroads in the New York City area, an effort apparently aimed at forcing federal intervention in the 5-day-old walkout.

Eastern, in a desperate attempt to lure back customers to its shuttle service, said it will slash one-way fares to $12 on weekends, down from $69-$99, and $49 weekdays, down from $99. And pilots at other airlines continued strictly adhering to safety rules, but for a second day there was little evidence of a backup on runways.

The dispute rested Wednesday with courts in New York and Philadelphia, and Eastern was expected to go to court in Atlanta to appeal a judge's refusal to order pilots back to the cockpits.

Eastern contends it is near collapse, losing at least $2 million a day. Its lawyer said in court Tuesday that the nation's seventh-largest carrier cannot survive the week if its pilots maintain their support for the Machinists.

The airline is running just 4 percent of its flights and says it will consider bankruptcy court, though as a last resort. It sent 9,500 workers home this week and has just a skeleton staff of 1,500 remaining.

The 8,500-member Machinists union walked out Saturday, and with the support of pilots and flight attendants soon nearly shut down Eastern. Eastern is seeking $125 million in concessions; the union wants $50 million in raises.

The Machinists also threatened to disrupt commuter rail traffic with secondary boycotts, which it contends are legal under the 1926 Railway Labor Act. But the union held off when a federal judge in New York over the weekend temporarily barred rail workers from honoring Machinists' picket lines.

Among developments:

■ The Machinists have asked Trans World Airlines Chairman Carl C. Icahn to seek control of the carrier, and he said he is willing to talk with them.

"I would be willing to speak to the unions only if Eastern permits me to, because I do not want to be accused by Eastern of interfering with the collective bargaining process," Icahn said in a statement. Icahn had considered a bid for Eastern a few months ago, when its boss, Texas Air Corp. Chairman Frank Lorenzo, was considering selling. But Icahn and the unions couldn't agree on terms for a worker stake in a merger of TWA and Eastern, and talks broke off.

Eastern had no comment. Charles E. Bryan, president of Machinists District 100, would not comment on Icahn's statement but said in Miami: "If there is willingness (by Eastern) to sell, there are certainly interested parties. ... It would be a tremendous opportunity to see the phoenix rise from the ashes."

■ In Miami, Eastern said its reduced shuttle fare is a move to raise money. George Brennan, vice president for marketing, said, "We have to breathe the life of passenger revenues into that operation," and denied it was a move to protect the pending $365 million sale of the shuttle service to New York developer Donald Trump.

■ In New York City, the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals refused to allow commuter rail workers in the New York area to honor any Machinists' picket lines. But the judges said they expect the dispute to go to the U.S. Supreme Court.

■ The Air Lines Pilots Association, whose contract with Eastern expired in June, said the airline has asked to set up talks. Union spokesman J.B. Stokes said a meeting was set for Thursday.

Temperatures to remain close to yearly average

By The Collegian Staff

Students seeking fun in the sun spring break may find the weather cooperating during at least the first part of the week. The extended forecast for the rest of this week and the first part of next is clear and warm, according to the National Weather Service.

"We're going to have a continuing of this trend of warming spreading from the West to the East," said Steve Schurr of the National Weather Service in Topeka.

Temperatures in the western third of the nation should be normal for this time of year for the rest of this week and into the next, Schurr said. The West Coast is the only region of the country that might experience precipitation during the period of the extended forecast.

The central part of the nation should experience above-normal temperatures with little chance of rain in the next week, he said. The high temperatures for Friday and Saturday in Kansas should be in the upper 70s, cooling to the lower 70s Sunday and the first part of next week.

Committee approves raise in minimum wages

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee approved legislation Wednesday to gradually raise the minimum wage $1.30 an hour to $4.65 after rejecting a Bush administration plan for a smaller increase coupled with a reduced "training wage."

President Bush has said he would veto legislation raising the minimum wage above $4.25 an hour and told GOP leaders Wednesday that, in the words of press secretary Marlin Fitzwater, his proposal "is fair and firm and his last offer."

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, the Labor committee chairman, said he was hopeful "we can reach a compromise that is fairer to the working poor and that President Bush will sign."

Kennedy, a Massachusetts Democrat, said the full Senate could consider the measure next week. "We're all set to go to the floor right away," he said. "I think we'll have strong support."

The minimum wage, now $3.35 an hour, has not been raised in eight years.

Kennedy said he is "glad to listen" to Republican calls for a subminimum wage, but only if it is coupled with specific requirements for training and education.

Kennedy predicted a veto would be overridden.

The committee approved the $1.30 increase on an 11-5 vote, with Republican Sens. David Durenberger of Minnesota and James Jeffords of Vermont voting with the panel's nine Democrats. The approval came after Democrats, joined by Durenberger, rejected the White House proposal to raise the hourly minimum 30 cents each year for three years, to $4.25.

A House committee is preparing to consider legislation later this week that is similar to the plan Kennedy's panel approved.

Bush's proposal, long opposed by Democrats and organized labor, would establish a "training wage" of $3.35 an hour, the current minimum for all workers, and allow employers to pay newly hired workers at that rate for their first six months on the job.

Kennedy, while noting the administration's threatened veto, agreed that Bush's call for an increase in the minimum wage had boosted chances that some increase will soon be approved.

"This administration has been more forthcoming than the previous eight years," the senator said.

The committee approved three amendments to the bill Kennedy introduced.

The first mirrors a provision in the White House plan to raise the level at which small businesses are exempted from minimum wage provisions from gross annual sales of $362,000 to $500,000.

Another proposal, also supported by Bush, would raise from 40 percent to 50 percent the credit toward the minimum wage that employers are allowed to count.

The committee also accepted a proposal to extend federal minimum wage standards to Puerto Rico.

Chinese react to rioting

CHENGDU, China — Security forces dragged Tibetans from their houses Wednesday as thousands of Chinese troops took up posts around Lhasa after three days of anti-Chinese riots, travelers said.

By official count, 12 people had been killed and more than 100 wounded in violence since Sunday when Tibetans marched in Lhasa demanding an end to nearly four decades of communist rule and the return of their spiritual leader, the Dalai Lama. Travelers quoted Tibetans as saying the actual death toll was much higher.

The Dalai Lama's government-in-exile in India offered to hold talks with China to discuss the future of Tibet. The Chinese Embassy in New Delhi refused comment.

There were no reports of further demonstrations or gunfire on Wednesday, but Westerners in Lhasa said troops filled the streets.

Beginning at midnight, trucks with loudspeakers drove through the city of 70,000 announcing the martial law imposed Tuesday and ordering Tibetans to stay inside, said foreign travelers, most of whom spoke on condition of anonymity.

Actor charged with assault

VANCOUVER, Canada — Johnny Depp, who plays a young undercover police officer in the Fox TV series "21 Jump Street," was charged with assault and mischief after police were called to a noisy party early Wednesday, authorities said.

Depp, 25, was released from custody a couple of hours later, a spokesman said.

Leanne Muldoon, publicity co-ordinator for the locally produced "21 Jump Street," wouldn't comment on the charges or say if Depp was on the set Wednesday.

Armenians sentenced to jail

MOSCOW — Armenia's Supreme Court sentenced two Armenians to 18 months in jail for organizing the storming of an airport in a violent campaign for control of the Nagorno-Karabakh region, the Moscow News reported.

Albrik Gevoyan, 37, and Artur Pogosyan, 30, were convicted of organizing "group actions violating public order" that led to a shutdown of Zvarnots Airport at the Armenian capital, Yerevan.

Several thousand Armenians stormed the airport July 4-5 to try to get aviation workers to join a strike. Troops shot and killed one demonstrator and at least 36 people were injured.

The ethnic disturbances disrupted 65 flights and cost $3.2 million, authorities said.

Armenians began striking and demonstrating last year to demand control of Nagorno-Karabakh, a mostly Armenian area of the neighboring republic of Azerbaijan. Moscow refused the demand, but placed the region temporarily under its direct control.

Love motivates comedian

LAS VEGAS — George Burns says the love he receives from audiences is what keeps him going at age 93.

Burns opens this week at Caesars Palace and has a best-selling book, "Gracie: A Love Story." Gracie Allen, Burns' wife, was his partner from 1923 until her retirement in 1959. She died in 1964.

Burns, puffing on his ever-present cigar, said Tuesday he's still going strong "because of the love that comes over the footlights. That's what gives you the vitality."

Burns, who has vowed to play the Palladium at age 100, has a long-term contract with Caesars. "Gracie" is the seventh book he's written.

Ford 'grateful' to ex-Marine

SAN FRANCISCO — Former President Ford has written a letter to friends of Oliver Sipple, saying he would "forever be grateful" to the ex-Marine who saved him from an assassin's bullet.

Sipple, 47, was found dead of natural causes Feb. 2 in his apartment. In 1975, Sipple grabbed Sara Jane Moore's gun hand when she tried to shoot Ford outside a hotel, causing the shot to go astray and hit a building.

Sipple had shunned the publicity and was anguished that it brought to light his homosexuality.

Ford's letter was addressed to "the friends of Oliver Sipple." It hangs on the wall of the New Belle Saloon, Sipple's favorite bar.

"I will forever be grateful for Oliver's action on my behalf at the time of the assassination attempt by Sara Jane Moore in San Francisco," the letter says.

Moore pleaded guilty and is serving a life term in prison.

Producer pleads innocent

NEW YORK — Broadway producer Adela Holzer stood alone Wednesday as she pleaded innocent to charges of swindling investors of $1.2 million.

A prosecutor said she had not paid her lawyers.

Holzer, 54, who produced or provided financial backing for such Broadway shows as "Sleuth," "Lenny," "The Ritz" and "Hair," was arraigned on charges of larceny and fraud. If convicted, she faces up to 15 years in prison.

Assistant District Attorney J. Christopher Prather said one of Holzer's lawyers told him they would not appear in court "basically because they hadn't been paid."

Holzer was accused of defrauding investors in a bogus oil and minerals scheme. She allegedly claimed to be married to banker David Rockefeller and promised profits of up to 82 percent in as little as 90 days.

Rockefeller does not know Holzer, Prather said.

She served two years in prison for swindling investors in scams involving Toyota dealerships in Indonesia and land deals in Spain.

Lawrence officials deny mall

LAWRENCE — City officials acted within their rights to preserve the downtown area by denying rezoning for a suburban mall, a federal judge has ruled.

U.S. District Judge Dale E. Saffels threw out a lawsuit filed by Cleveland developer Jacobs, Visconsi and Jacobs, and property owners Richard A. Armstrong and Betty J. Grisham.

They filed suit after the Lawrence City Commission declined to rezone a 61-acre site in downtown Lawrence, which is now zoned for single-family use.

"The city has a legitimate interest in supporting existing business and preserving the vitality of its downtown area," the judge said in his opinion, which was filed late Monday.

"Moreover, a city can rationally decide to control growth and land use in its boundaries. This segregation of land uses is the very purpose of zoning ordinances," he said.

Attacker suspected in 4 cases

SPRINGFIELD, Mo. — A man who was shot after he attacked a television anchorwoman in her home could be a suspect in at least four sexual attacks in the Springfield area in the last decade, authorities said Wednesday.

Gregory Rader, a 30-year-old Baptist church deacon, was killed March 1 after he attacked KYTV anchorwoman Leanne Gregg. Gregg's friend, Charles Paris, shot Rader three times as he tried to run from the apartment.

The shooting was justifiable homicide, Greene County Prosecutor Tom Mountjoy said Wednesday.

"(Gregg) was the victim of someone breaking into her apartment and attacking her in a physical and violent way," Mountjoy said. "She was precisely the victim. Yes, Rader was the victim also, but unfortunately he was the victim of the situation he put himself into and he paid the consequence for it."

Professor stresses teaching principles of architecture

By Brad Camp
Collegian Reporter

Primary issues facing design education are how and what should be taught to future architects, said Peter Schneider, professor of architecture at Louisiana Tech University.

Schneider, who is also head of Louisiana Tech's department of architecture, is the third of six candidates being considered for the position of dean of the College of Architecture and Design.

Schneider spoke Tuesday in the Union to about 30 students and faculty from the college.

The process of professional education in design is what makes it different from other forms of education, Schneider said.

"Architects think by design .... We need to teach them to think like architects," Schneider said.

The trend for architecture is to be more of a business than a profession, he said.

"The topic of change is a hot topic in the architecture society," Schneider said. "I am a traditionalist, I believe in the old-fashioned architecture. Architecture is a profession, not a business, and we have an obligation to society."

Schneider said committees requiring student participation exist for students to have a voice in the college.

"The role of a dean is as an agent of provocation of discussion to get the students and faculty talking," Schneider said. "A (dean) needs to be creative, not necessarily impose ideas but to have ideas.

"The role of the administration is to be able to think through the options and think about different ways to solve problems."

Schneider said it is important to teach the principles of architecture rather than just the particulars.

Teaching of particulars is the "justification" of the principles, he said, adding that the particulars change often and knowing the principles "equips you to deal with changes."

Schneider earned his bachelor of architecture degree from a six-year program at the University of Cape Town in South Africa. He is also a doctoral candidate at the University of Witwatersrand, South Africa.

Schneider has worked for various firms and was a project architect for three firms in South Africa.

His professional expertise is in the architectural and design practice, architectural history and theory.

Bill Miller, professor of architecture and a member of the dean search committee, said all of the candidates have strong administrative experience. He said Schneider comes from a background of strong practice experience in teaching and administration.

Senate to consider increase in fees

By Darren Keller
Collegian Reporter

Student Senate tonight will consider a 20-cent increase for full-time students' membership fee, a part of tuition which supports the Associated Students of Kansas.

Changes in the campaign regulations and expenditure report requirements will also be considered, as well as a special allocation request for the K-State Men's Glee Club.

If passed, the ASK increase would be added to the student activity fee. All K-State students are members of ASK and pay a 60-cent membership fee.

The ASK state board of directors and staff determined the increase was needed because dues have not been increased to adjust for rising inflation rate.

"To continue as members of ASK, we must adhere to the revenue increase," said Todd Johnson, Senate chairman.

The part-time fee would not be increased.

Due to problems last semester with Student Governing Association election procedures, a bill regarding campaign regulations and expenditures involving students running for an SGA office was previously submitted to Senate. The bill was sent back to committee for further clarification and will be reconsidered by Senate.

The legislation would require candidates to turn in two expenditure reports on the day of the election.

Senate will also vote on a $1,417.50 special allocation to the K-State Men's Glee Club. The allocation would help cover the cost of food and lodging for the group to attend the Intercollegiate Male Chorus Convention at Loyola-Marymount University in Los Angeles.

Seven organizations will give allocation presentations: Coalition for Human Rights, FONE Crisis Center, Legal Services, Students Against Driving Drunk, International Coordinating Council, Mexican American Council of Students, and Brothers for Progress.

Pope summons 35 bishops for meeting

By The Associated Press

VATICAN CITY — Pope John Paul II encouraged U.S. Roman Catholic bishops Wednesday to proclaim church teaching even if it is unpopular. They responded that authoritarianism does not convince Americans.

The views were voiced at the start of a special four-day conference of 35 American bishops whom the pontiff summoned to Rome.

Dissent from church teaching in the United States has raised concern in the Vatican, which considers the 52 million-member American church critical because of its size, wealth and potential to set worldwide trends.

John Paul described the bishops as "pillars" who give the church strength, and the bishop's role is expected to dominate the 12 hours of discussions with top Vatican officials through Saturday.

He spoke briefly in English to the prelates, who were gathered with Vatican officials in the Old Synod Hall. The meeting was closed but his remarks were made public.

"I wish to encourage you in your ministry," John Paul said.

New census figures show heavy toll on Kansas farmers

By The Associated Press

WICHITA — New figures from the Census Bureau confirm the farm crisis took a heavy toll on Kansas farmers, although less than what some experts had expected earlier.

The 1987 Census of Agriculture shows that Kansas lost 5,167 farms — about 11 percent of the total — between 1982 and 1987, a period when high debt and collapsing land values drove many farmers into bankruptcy or foreclosure.

The census also shows the trend toward larger farms continues unabated. In the same five-year period, the average size of Kansas farms jumped by 90 acres to 1,002.

Small farms suffered most. Census takers found a fourth of Kansas farms of 50 to 179 acres disappeared during those five years, as did 19 percent of the farms of 180 to 499 acres.

"The fact that it was a financially stressful period, it's not surprising. It's taken a larger farm operation to support a family, so it's bound to go in that direction," said John Schlender, a K-State farm management economist.

Only two categories of farms grew from 1982 to 1987 — the "hobby farms" of one to nine acres, and farms of more than 1,000 acres.

Based on the census, the farm attrition rate was a little more than 2 percent a year, about half of what many farm economists and crisis-center counselors were estimating at the depths of the farm crisis.

Stan Ward, director of the state's farm crisis hot line service, said he doesn't argue with the bureau's numbers. But he said the figures don't reflect the number of people who still do some farming — and therefore are included in the farm count — but who now get their primary income off the farm.

Ward discounted the census finding that 80 percent of farm operators list farming as their primary occupation.

"The fact that it was a financially stressful period, it's not surprising. It's taken a larger farm operation to support a family, so it's bound to go in that direction."
—John Schlender K-State farm economist

"It's how they describe themselves, it's their identity. It doesn't have anything to do with how they earn their living," said Ward, director of the Farmers Assistance, Counseling and Training Service.

Although the bureau's figures on farm attrition and farm size include farms with sales of as little as $10,000, such a figure does not approach the level of sales necessary to sustain a commercial, or "family," farm.

K-State farm economists generally agree a farm needs at least $150,000 in gross sales a year to support a family, Schlender said.

Airport control tower would aid Manhattan

At last the skies over Manhattan are becoming friendlier.

The City Commission decided Tuesday night to work with Midwest Air Traffic Control Service Inc. to establish a permanent 17-foot control tower at the Manhattan Municipal Airport.

The proposed tower will be operated for a minimum of 10 hours per day by a three-person team. This will be the first time a fully operative control tower has been in place at the Manhattan airport.

Despite the first-year price tag of $102,000, this is a much better alternative than the previous system of having an advisory service that was located in the terminal and had only a limited view of the runway.

The previous service also gave only weather and altimeter readings. There was no actual air traffic control except that provided by the other pilots using the same radio frequency.

Also, operators of the service did not have to be licensed by the Federal Aviation Administration, so there was no particular training program for the advisory service.

The City Commission should be commended for taking this step, not only for ensuring the safety of pilots who use the airport, but also for showing that the city of Manhattan is willing to make a commitment to the airport.

Already, Fort Riley has agreed to resume its services with the Manhattan airport. And this could be only the beginning.

With the Manhattan airport being one of the largest in Kansas, the added control tower will make it easier to expand the facility in the future and may attract other airlines to the area.

If this were to be the case, the increased access to Manhattan could only help the local economy.

It is this sort of commitment to community safety and growth that will benefit not only the pilots and Manhattan, but K-State as well.

Other Perspectives

A decision by the U.S. Supreme Court to hear a Missouri abortion case could result in the most important ruling on the issue since Roe vs. Wade in 1973. And it is an opportunity for the court to reinstate the constitutional rights of the unborn, a right that never should have been taken away.

Pro-choice advocates argue that a woman has the right to do what she wants with her body, but if a fetus is granted protection under the Constitution, then having a fetus aborted violates its rights and must be deemed illegal.

Those who think that overturning Roe vs. Wade takes away a woman's given right see only half the picture. By eliminating legal abortions, the Supreme Court would be reinstating the rights of the unborn, who soon will become human beings. And the unborn, too, must have full rights under the law.

Selective admissions promotes elitism

Proposed policy detrimental

Commentary

Barbara Baker
Collegian Columnist

Admission to K-State is granted to any individual who has graduated from an accredited Kansas high school.

This is the open admissions philosophy that can be found in the pages of K-State's College Catalogue Bulletin.

But selective admissions, or maybe a better term — educational elitism, may be set as a new policy for Kansas universities. Under the selective admissions policy, Kansas high school seniors would be required to meet certain course stipulations and academic criteria.

But in practice, does selective admissions actually support the theory that it brings better prepared, college-oriented students to universities? Or rather, does selective admissions support the elitist reputation of a university?

There is no doubt selective admissions is linked to prestige. People need only mention that they have been to Yale or Harvard and the red carpet is pulled out. The philosophy is that selective admissions offers high quality technology and research for well-prepared, analytical students.

But where do student development and excellence come into this philosophy? Just because students have a strong math and science background or a high ACT score doesn't mean they have reached overall educational excellence.

Alexander Astin, a University of California-Los Angeles educator, believes in a Student Talent Development Model. This theory is based on the notion that students should be developed according to the talent level at which they enter college.

In order words, the students' learning process is more enhanced by the amount of energy they put into college both physically and psychologically.

This model also supports the philosophy that students only develop when they are completely engulfed — academically, socially and politically — by the college culture.

To give an example of Astin's Student Talent Development Model, it would be better for a student to be a residence hall adviser or a student senator than to spend every waking hour shut up in a dorm room studying.

Being a student senator or residence hall adviser can develop leadership and communication skills that can carry over to the student's vocational pursuits.

Also, according to Astin, selective admissions causes minority students to lose educational opportunities because they are the most likely to be categorized as unprepared and disadvantaged.

I will also be honest and offer personal testimony against selective admissions. My math and science background was not strong, nor was my ACT score. If there would have been a selective admissions policy at K-State, I would not be in graduate school today.

College helped me to develop self-confidence. It helped me to discover my talents and potential. Open admissions gave me a chance not to be judged according to face value criteria. How many Kansas high school students need the same chance?

This is not to say that academic achievement is not important, but improvement policies need to be implemented at the elementary and secondary school levels. It is unfair to punish high school students for secondary educational inadequacies.

Priorities skewed

Editor,

Continued efforts by the KSU Athletic Department to secure a fee from the students again reveal the skewed priorities that emanate from University activities that are quite public and attract attention outside the University environment (athletics), and those activities that rarely are reported on the front page and which involve primarily internal priorities (academics).

Athletics have a number of attractions, but are not essential to the function of a university. Indeed, many excellent universities have no basketball or football teams.

Furthermore, K-State teams are already competitive on the national level in several sports.

How competitive are we in academic areas? A recent report from a computer consulting consortium indicates that even with a substantial increase in support, K-State's computing facilities would only fall behind at a slower rate than if more support was not forthcoming.

Our library currently has seating equal to only 20 percent to 40 percent (depending on the criterion used) of that which is recommended for university libraries, while another basketball arena was recently constructed to yield just 2,000 additional seats for fans.

The library was recently forced to cut subscriptions to 1,630 journals — 25 percent of its total — and does not qualify for membership in the Association of Research Libraries, an indication of its academic weaknesses.

Furthermore, K-State does not even have some facilities for the fine arts, such as an art museum — the only university in the Big Eight in such a condition.

Wouldn't it be more appropriate for students, faculty, administrators, and regents to support those academic activities and facilities that are essential to the function of a university, rather than extracurricular activities which are less directly associated with the quality of education and research at K-State?

associate professor, Division of Biology

Sports fee needed

Editor,

Let's ignore the fact that K-State's tuition, being third from lowest in the Big Eight, is only $680 per semester, compared to the highest at $930 a semester.

Ignore the fact that Colorado, Iowa State, Oklahoma State and Kansas already have comparable athletic fees, while we all know Oklahoma, Nebraska and Missouri don't need 'em.

Ignore the fact that Oklahoma's total athletic budget tops out at over $13 million, while even Oklahoma State, in seventh place among Big Eight schools, totals nearly $2 million more than we do!

So, then, let's just ignore the fact that K-State is the poverty pocket of the Big Eight sports programs.

Let's just talk a little about the fact that a $15 athletic fee (or about 9 cents for each school day) would represent an investment in the future. Universities, right or wrong, are frequently and informally identified and categorized by their sports programs.

A successful sports program helps every college, school and department recruit new students and to grow.

Everyone wants to be identified with a successful effort; everyone wants a sense of pride.

While several other K-State programs are certainly worthy of more financial support, we're going to have to work together and take it one step at a time.

At the KSU Athletic Department, a new business manager along with, for the first time, a marketing director and research teams, is working every day to help turn the program around. New strategies, new programs and new ideas deserve our support and the chance to succeed.

Again, right or wrong, the sports program is the most easily visible, and often the most commonly held, image of the school.

While your 9 cents a day cannot guarantee a Big Eight championship next year, cannot guarantee an extra 500 new students next year and cannot guarantee any direct impact on your special interest program, your 9 cents and mine could represent the opportunity to support the entire University throught the most efficient channel — the sports program.

Hayden to examine effects of drought on various counties

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Gov. Mike Hayden will visit Leavenworth, Atchison and Saline Counties next Monday to examine effects of the state's drought.

The governor will look at conditions on the Missouri River, visit a community experiencing municipal water problems and discuss the impact of the drought with a farmer and a grain elevator owner.

"It is very important to have a first-hand look at the drought conditions in our state."
—Mike Hayden
Kansas governor

"It is very important to have a first-hand look at the drought conditions in our state and to visit with farmers, local officials and others impacted by the drought," Hayden said in a statement released by his office on Wednesday.

State Agriculture Secretary Sam Brownback, Secretary of Health and Environment Stanley Grant and several members of the governor's Drought Response Team will accompany Hayden on the tour.

The governor will fly to Atchison where he will meet with officials from the Atchison County Farmer's Co-op and discuss water conditions on the Missouri River and barge shipping.

He will then travel to Easton, a small community in Leavenworth County that has had a well go dry and had to haul water until a hookup could be made to a rural water district.

The governor will then fly to Saline County, where he will visit the Chuck Johnson grain elevator located near both Mentor and Assaria, then visit the farm of Byron Johnson about 13 miles north of Salina.

Migrating birds signal spring

By Paul Branson
Science Writer

Staff/Steve Wolgast
Birds, like this robin, are returning from the south following winter migrations. The migration season begins in late February. Robins from the north spend winters here, while Kansas robins move farther south.

Although the Jayhawks have left Manhattan for the season and won't return until fall, several other colorful species of birds are migrating into the area and announcing that spring is in the air.

Bird migrations are a sign of a change of seasons. Long wavering V-shaped flocks of geese flying south to warmer weather is one of the first signs of cold autumn weather, and the sight of orioles and mourning doves signal the beginning of warm spring days.

"The real harbinger of spring is the migration of the pintail duck from the gulf coast," said John Zimmerman, professor of biology. "They're the earliest migrating bird seen in this area."

The migrating season begins in late February and continues until late May.

"The birds we see in Riley County come from as far away as Tierra del Fuego at the southern tip of South America to as close as Oklahoma," he said.

During the end of March, the mourning dove will return from the South, while grackles and purple martins migrate into the area in early April, Zimmerman said.

House wrens arrive in mid-April, but the orioles will not migrate from Central America until the end of April, he said.

Robins, cardinals and blue jays remain in the area all year, but in March they begin establishing their territories in preparation for nesting.

"Now, the birds begin to sing and their juices begin to flow," Zimmerman said. "The hormonal regulation in the males is controlled by the length of light during the day. As the days get longer, the testosterone in males is released, and they begin singing."

Although red-breasted robin migration may be associated with the arrival of spring, they can be seen during much of the year in this area, he said.

"Robins that are here during the summer just go a little farther south for the winter while robins farther north come here in the winter," Zimmerman said. "They just go where the food is."

Other birds will migrate out of the area. A large number of water fowl who have spent the winter here will prepare to head north as soon as water thaws in Nebraska, he said.

Birds coming from the south do not necessarily migrate later in the season than birds from more northern territories, Zimmerman said.

"The determining factor of when a bird migrates depends on when the habitat they intend to breed in becomes suitable," he said.

Writer Patrick Cooke stated in an article in Science magazine that ornithologists have proven that birds orient themselves with the help of the sun, stars and magnetic fields in their migration patterns.

Cooke said birds use geographical features and sounds to help them identify their location.

Zimmerman said: "They often use whatever is available at the time."

Although some species spend the summer in the Midwest, "I would say most of the birds which appear here in the spring are just passing through to northern breeding grounds," he said.

One of the best areas to observe migratory birds is the River Pond Area at Tuttle Creek Reservoir, Zimmerman said. The area has a mix of marsh, river and tree vegetation that attracts a large variety of species.

He said the Blue River is attracting a large number of waterfowl and a good population of eagles.

Former bank manager loses suit against 'jerk'

By The Associated Press

ATLANTA — There's no law against being a jerk, a court has determined.

The Georgia Court of Appeals ruled that a former bank manager had no grounds to collect damages from her boss or an allegedly obnoxious co-worker, even if the co-worker was the boorish, obnoxious prankster that she claimed he was.

"Alleged tasteless and rude social conduct ... is not actionable," the court declared after listening to a litany of the co-worker's alleged affronts.

Nita Mundy of Jonesboro, who was branch manager of the Anchor Savings Bank in suburban Hapeville, had charged in her lawsuit that H. Street Kornegay, a public relations officer, subjected her to humiliating pranks because of his feeling that a woman should not manage a bank.

Mundy said Kornegay's behavior finally drove her from her job and landed her in therapy. She said Wednesday she has not worked since 1985 and still is being treated for the distress she said was caused by Kornegay.

Among other things, Mundy alleged that over a six-month period Kornegay made comments about her hair color in front of colleagues, interrupted her while she was talking to customers, and swept objects off her desk while she was on the telephone.

New program helps low-income students plan their education

By Alan Wilds
Staff Writer

Emporia Talent Search, a program helping low-income students plan their education, has opened an extension office as part of K-State's Educational Supportive Services.

Funded through the U.S. Department of Education, the program administers a grant to Emporia State University, which has cooperates with other universities where the program is in operation, said Lance Rutledge, director of Emporia State's educational services.

"One might think they know everything there is to know about education and financial aid, but there is quite a bit of misinformation out there."
—Lance Rutledge director of Emporia State University's educational services

Rutledge said the college received an allocation increase this year which allowed it to open the K-State branch. Emporia and St. Joseph have had Emporia Talent Search offices for about three years.

The amount of this year's grant allowed Rutledge to consider neighboring counties that may benefit from the program.

"We discovered there is a high need for this service in Manhattan due to the large percentage of people who fall below the poverty level," he said.

Todd Ervin, counselor of the K-State program, said the Manhattan-Junction City area has the potential to benefit more from this service than any other area in the state.

Helping people from these areas get into post-secondary education will benefit the University, he said.

"About one-half of the people I have talked to so far have expressed interest in going here," Ervin said. "Many of them, however, do not know how to go about it."

He said K-State and the Manhattan Area Vocational Technical School are the prospective institutions students can attend.

The Manhattan extension will serve Dickinson, Geary and Riley counties, Ervin said. About 250 to 400 individuals a year who are interested in going to school will be counseled.

Rutledge said K-State seemed a good location because it would allow resources to be shared between universities and no other programs of this type exist in the area.

Talent Search helps low-income students make choices about their education, he said.

"One might think they know everything there is to know about education and financial aid, but there is quite a bit of misinformation out there," Rutledge said.

The program encourages students to stay in school at the high school level and teaches decision-making skills that will help students complete their education, he said.

"We match education with ability and motivation," Rutledge said. "We try to find out what kinds of programs are of interest to students."

Job placement is done informally by Talent Search by providing technical training and interviews.

"We have them look at careers in different fields and learn from experience," Rutledge said.

North quoted as willing to 'lie'

Witness tells of impassioned pleas

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Oliver North made impassioned pleas about the Nicaraguan Contras to well-heeled contributors who came through later with large checks, a witness told the North jury Wednesday. He described one contribution that exceeded $1 million in stocks.

North, who is charged with lying to Congress about his activities on behalf of the Contras, was also quoted by the witness as saying he was willing to risk jail and didn't "care if I have to lie to Congress about this."

Once, testified conservative fundraiser Carl R. Channell, North met Nelson Bunker Hunt in Dallas' fancy Petroleum Club and went through a pitch about what North said was a need for $5 million to $6 million for planes, missiles and other aid to keep the rebels going.

"The only thing that sticks in my mind is that Bunker said, "What are you going to do? Do you mind getting into trouble?" Channell testified. He said North replied:

"I don't care if I have to go to jail for this; I don't care if I have to lie to Congress about this." Hunt, Channell said, "didn't laugh, but he chortled."

North himself did not take the checks, Channell said, and at the end of the meeting with Hunt he left, saying "something like 'You all are going to talk about money and I can't take any money.'"

At the time, North was a lieutenant colonel in the Marine Corps and assigned to the National Security Council in the White House. During the congressional Iran-Contra hearings two years ago, he testified, "I do not recall ever asking a single, solitary American citizen for money" although "I showed a lot of munitions lists."

Channell had set up a charitable foundation, the National Endowment for the Preservation of Liberty, to receive money for aid to the Contras at a time when Congress had forbidden any official U.S. help. Because the organization was a tax-exempt foundation, donors were able to take tax deductions.

One of the 12 criminal charges against North is that he conspired to defraud the Treasury of tax revenue because the donations were for an improper purpose — military aid for the rebels. Six of the charges accuse North of making false statements and obstructing Congress by attempting to hide his efforts on behalf of the Contras.

On Sept. 11, 1985, Channell said, North flew from Washington to Dallas on a Channell-arranged aircraft for the Hunt briefing — one of many such money-raising affairs Channell arranged.

Hunt contributed $237,500 to the foundation and also made a $237,500 loan to it.

Channell pleaded guilty on April 29, 1987, to depriving the government of tax revenue by using the foundation to solicit contributions for military equipment.

Levi's ad pulled from school's news show

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — A Levi's jeans commercial has been pulled from Channel One, the daily news show launched this week in six schools, because Detroit school officials found it sexually suggestive, program creators said Wednesday.

The decision to pull the ad comes as the project begins a 25-show test amid complaints from some child advocates and educators that it is inappropriate to allow television advertisements in the classrooms.

The 30-second Levi's ad, which previously was on commercial television, showed a montage of scenes with young people, including a boys' choir, several youngsters dancing and a couple walking away afterwards.

Robin Oden, principal at Mumford High School in Detroit, said four of the eight people who reviewed the program before it was aired Monday in classrooms believed the Levi's ad was sexually suggestive.

Oden said although he had the choice of not running the program, he ran it anyway because it was the first day of the test and a big media contingent was on hand to write about it.

But he said he told officials of Whittle Communications Ltd., the Knoxville, Tenn.-based media concern that developed Channel One, he wouldn't air the ad any more.

Bill Gubbins, a Whittle official who was in Detroit that day, said he assured Oden the ad would not be repeated.

"This is a test and one of the things we are learning about is how broad or how narrow the sensitivities are going to be in the individual schools," he said. "We wanted to make sure they felt their concerns were being addressed."

Dan Chew, marketing manager at Levi Strauss & Co. in San Francisco, said Wednesday his company and its ad agency were notified there was a problem with the ad. He said it is one of four commercials the company planned to rotate through shows during the test.

"We have made no changes to that plan. We've heard nothing from anyone about it, and until that request comes in formally, we will stick with our schedule," he said.

Levi Strauss is one of eight advertisers signed up for the test. Other brands are Procter & Gamble's Head & Shoulders shampoo, Wrigley's gum, Warner-Lambert's breath mints and Gillette shaving products.

'Hawks returning to Kemper

KU's showing could affect NCAA seeding

By Mike Goens
Sports Writer

Everyone knows about the "Cinderella" season the Kansas Jayhawks experienced last season and its big conclusion in Kemper Arena in Kansas City, Mo., with an 83-79 upset of Oklahoma in the national championship game.

The big question this week, though, is should the Jayhawks be allowed to return to Kemper Friday for the Big Eight Conference's postseason tournament? After all, KU is on probation and can't defend its national title.

"It's a moot point since it never was voted on," said K-State coach Lon Kruger Wednesday at his weekly press conference.

"It is in the bylaws of the Big Eight — we have no control over it. It's simply the way it was."

Big Eight athletic directors decided to let KU participate in the tournament because of a little-known conference rule which states that a school punished by the NCAA cannot be punished further by the conference.

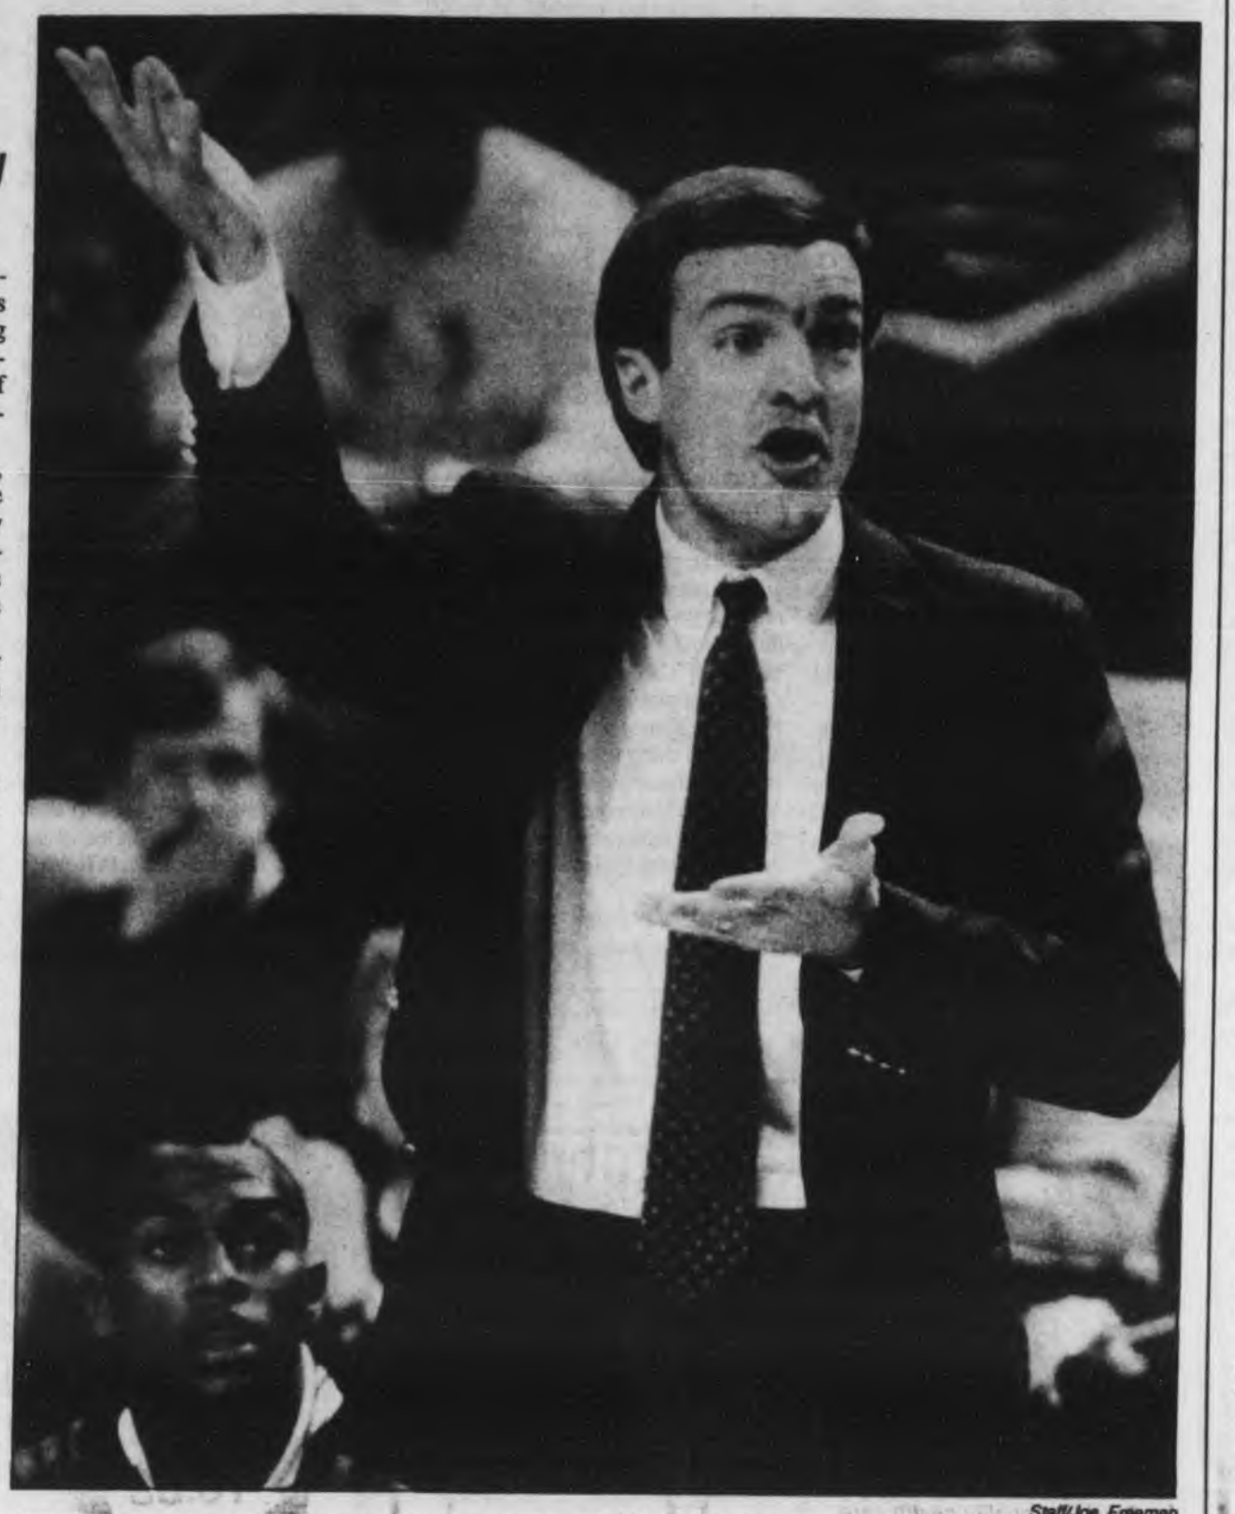
Kruger did say, however, that he would like to see those rules changed. Kruger is reminded of a situation two years ago when Memphis State won the Metro Conference tournament while on probation. The NCAA's tournament selection committee chose to snub the Metro Conference, despite the presence of defending national champion Louisville.

In addition, KU's participation could affect the Wildcats' NCAA tournament seeding. Should K-State lose to Kansas in the first round, the selection committee may decide to pass the 'Cats by until the lower seeds.

A USA Today poll projected K-State as a sixth seed.

"Seeding is very important. You would like to not play a Top 20 or 15 team in the first or second round," Kruger said. "You would obviously like as high a seed as possible. The sixth seed is a fair assessment. Mid 20s is a fair projection. It would boost (our position) quite a bit if we would win the tournament."

The Big Eight's first- and second-place finsihers are a shoo-in for NCAA invitations. Regular-season champion Oklahoma, the No. 2-ranked team in the country, has a shot at one of the top seeds in the four regionals. Runner-up Missouri could possibly get a second seed. Beyond that, K-State would seem to be in, followed by Oklahoma State and possibly Iowa State.



"I don't understand how people on probation can be allowed to play in the tournament or share in the proceeds — and I'm not just talking about Kansas," Kruger said.

"There is not really anything we can do about it, just go out and play hard," added 'Cat guard Steve Henson. "They are putting a lot of emphasis on this tournament, but I don't think a loss would cost us a tournament bid."

The Wildcats have a postseason record of 16-10 with a 9-8 mark in Kansas City. In the Big Eight's 11-year tournament history, K-State has made it to the title game five times. In 1977, the 'Cats beat Missouri in the first Big Eight tournament. Last year's championship game was the first one for the 'Cats since 1981.

K-State beat KU, 69-54, in the semifinals last year to reach the championship game against Oklahoma.

However, several things will be missing from the Jayhawks' return trip to Kemper for the conference tournament this year. Larry Brown is now head coach of the NBA's San Antonio Spurs, and Danny Manning is a non-playing member of the Los Angeles Clippers. Manning is out with a knee injury.

K-State coach Lon Kruger and his 'Cats will face the University of Kansas Jayhawks in the first round of the Big Eight Tournament Friday in Kansas City. This is the third meeting for the pair this season.

Coaching honor given to Tubbs

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Billy Tubbs, who has kept his bold promise of 1981, was named Big Eight Coach of the Year by The Associated Press Wednesday.

It's the second year in a row that Tubbs' Oklahoma basketball team has captured the regular season title, and the second straight year the AP media panel judged him top coach.

Tubbs drew 12 votes from the panel, while K-State's Lon Kruger and Iowa State's Johnny Orr got two each.

"It a nice recognition, but what it means is the team is doing well," Tubbs said. "You're not going to be a coach of the year without having a team that plays as hard as it can for you."

In rolling to a 26-4 regular season record, the Sooners wrapped up their fourth Big Eight title in six years with a 12-2 mark, two games ahead of Missouri, and even made school history with their first appearance at No. 1 in the nation.

Seeded first in this weekend's Big Eight Tournament, the Sooners finished the season No. 2 in the AP Top Twenty and expect to be a No. 1 seed when the NCAA field is announced on Sunday.

What Bud Wilkinson did for Oklahoma football, Tubbs has done for basketball. But if anyone listened closely when he was hired in 1981, they heard the cocky coach vow to do exactly that.

"I don't think that a lot of people thought this would happen," Tubbs said. "But if you go back to our first press conference, all this was pretty much predicted. Or maybe I would call it projected."

Basketball at Oklahoma was hardly more than an afterthought until Tubbs arrived from Lamar University full of brash promise. His first team was 9-18, causing nary a stir among football-happy Sooners accustomed to getting their sports fix in the fall.

But then he recruited a big kid from Tulsa with an infectious grin and an unstoppable move to the basket. Wayman Tisdale, a three-time all-American, was the booster rocket that launched Oklahoma into a new basketball era.

Since that first year, the fewest victories Tubbs has had in a season has been 22. Moreover, he wins with style, fielding squads that for five straight years have ranked among the top five scoring teams in the nation.

"What makes it rewarding is the fact we've accomplished a lot of the goals we set out to accomplish," Tubbs said. "But nothing that happened at our program has been an accident. It's been a lot of man hours from our staff and our players."

Tubbs got tantalizingly near a national championship last year and was favored to beat Danny Manning's Kansas team in the NCAA title game. But it was the Jayhawks who finished on top of an 83-79 verdict.

"It's been everything ... almost everything we could want," Tubbs said. "We still have other goals, room for improvement. But I do like the way the program has been moving."

People in Arizona are also impressed, according to published reports. Tubbs' name has been linked to the job at Arizona State, and he is said to be the leading candidate.

"It's always been my policy that if people are interested in me, in some job, and they want to talk, I'm going to listen," Tubbs said.

Sooner guard Blaylock suspended for one game

By The Associated Press

NORMAN, Okla. — Oklahoma officials suspended starting guard Mookie Blaylock for one game Wednesday after reviewing details surrounding his arrest by Norman police early Sunday.

Hours before the suspension was announced, Blaylock entered a no contest plea to an amended charge of disturbing the peace. He originally was arrested on a complaint of public intoxication after police answered a call from a convenience store clerk about an argument.

Police said they arrested Blaylock and a woman after an argument between the two was resumed outside the store.

"This type of conduct will not be condoned," interim president David Swank and athletic director Donnie Duncan said in a joint statement. The missed game will be the second-ranked Sooners' first in the Big Eight Conference postseason tournament at Kansas City on Friday.

"Despite being suspended for the Colorado game, I have confidence in Mookie Blaylock both as a person and a player," Coach Billy Tubbs said in a statement released by the sports information department. "Mookie Blaylock is a good person and I am proud that he has been at the University of Oklahoma. He is still a member of our basketball family and, even though everyone concerned has learned a valuable lesson, we support him fully."

Municipal Judge Ted Roberts imposed a six-month deferred sentence for Blaylock and ordered him to pay a $50 administrative fee and $19 in court costs. Blaylock paid the fines immediately after the court appearance.

J.W. Coyle, Blaylock's lawyer, said the deferred sentence "in essence, means that in six months the charge against him will be dismissed."

Under a deferred sentence, the charge can be wiped off Blaylock's record if he is not convicted of any other violations within the next six months.

"You shouldn't have put yourself in this position," the judge told Blaylock. "I don't know what happened out there, but right or wrong you should comply."

Wildcats add depth by signing 3 players

From Staff and Wire Reports

K-State's new volleyball facility didn't exactly pay off on the court last season. The Wildcats finished a disappointing 15-13 overall, 4-3 in conference play, and weren't one of the four teams invited to the Big Eight's postseason tournament.

But coach Scott Nelson said the new portable court with a seating capacity of 4,000 had a good deal to do with his signing of three high school athletes to national letters of intent.

Julie James of Houston, Melanie Scott of Eldon, Mo., and Angie McKee of Goodland have all signed with the Wildcats. The signings were announced Wednesday.

For the first time in Nelson's nine years at K-State, he brought in recruits during the season.

"Because of the facility, we brought in several of our top prospects during the regular season whereas before we didn't start talking to them until January or February," Nelson said. "We felt it was important for them to see the environment and the good crowd."

Assistant coach Michael Denardo said the recruits have made an effort to be good players.

"We also feel like we have signed good people," Denardo said. "They were sold on the University, from the administration to the atmosphere and commitment to volleyball."

James attends Bellaire Episcopal High School in Houston and was a varsity starter for four years. As an outside hitter, James earned all-conference honors and helped her team to a second-place finish at the state championships last season.

Scott, a 6-foot middle hitter, attends Eldon (Mo.) High School. She earned several postseason honors, including all-conference, all-district, state sectional and all-state teams.

As captain of her high school team, Scott led Eldon High to second-, third- and fourth-place finishes in the Missouri State Championships.

McKee attended Goodland High School where she played middle and outside hitter. Goodland won the state volleyball championship her senior year.

McKee, who earned all-state honors her senior year, was also named the 1988 Kansas Player of the Year and the Class 4A Player of the Year. She gained all-league honors three years in a row.

The three players have also competed in the nation's juniors program.

"With their play in the juniors program, these players have accumulated a vast amount of experience to be incoming freshmen," Nelson said.

Kruger, Mossman should be coaches of the year

Svoboda on Sports

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Columnist

Lon Kruger and Matilda Mossman are the season's best basketball coaches in the Big Eight Conference.

Sure, The Associated Press snubbed both in its annual postseason voting for the league's elite, but the duo selected over K-State's coaches — Oklahoma's Billy Tubbs and Colorado's Ceal Barry — really did nothing more with their teams than what they were expected to do going into the season.

On the men's side, Oklahoma entered the season a heavy favorite to take the conference title. They did just that — to virtually no one's surprise.

With players like Stacey King and Mookie Blaylock returning, Tubbs had a loaded gun ready to fire. And with bullets like those two all-America candidates in the chamber, Tubbs entered the competition with a machine gun while several other conference coaches appeared to be carrying nothing more than water pistols.

The argument here, as is the case with Barry's choice on the women's side, is that Tubbs entered the year with the most talent, a recent tradition of dominance, and really did nothing more than he should have. The only thing he did, in reality, was keep from screwing up a good thing.

Oklahoma should have won the men's title — and it did. Colorado should have won the women's title — and it did. The awards given out aren't for the league's "Winner" of the Year, they're for the league's "Coach" of the Year. That should be remembered, but recently hasn't been.

Tubbs and Barry, it can't be denied, are great coaches and great recruiters. They deserve a lion's share of praise for the work they did in leading their teams to the top in 1988-89. But what about Kruger and Mossman, who were both playing at decided disadvantages prior to the year — at least so the critics thought.

Kruger's men's squad was left reeling following its "Cinderella" 1987-88 season by the loss of four starters to graduation. Gone were probable NBA Rookie of the Year Mitch Richmond, Will Scott, Charles Bledsoe and Ron Meyer. Of the K-State starters, only Steve Henson returned.

Fred McCoy, who split time with Meyer as the starter at center last season, was also back, but beyond those two proven commodities and a strong bench player in Mark Dobbins, Kruger wasn't exactly looking at all aces when he checked his hand prior to the season.

But, as Kruger has proven in each of his three seasons at K-State, he's a master game player. He shuffled the deck early and often, coming up with a combination that made several of his lineup changes in late-season look like line changes in pro hockey.

Take out Dobbins, McCoy and Lance Simmons and put in Billy Ray Smith, Tony Massop and Reggie Britt. Put McCoy and Massop both on the floor at the same time. Use junior college players to bridge the gap. Do whatever it takes to win.

Kruger's team finished the year 18-9 overall and 8-6 in Big Eight play, good enough for a third-place finish most predictors thought would be improbable prior in the year.

Kruger, his peers and opposing players often admit, is the league's best bench coach, and was the league's best coach this season. But his team didn't win the title, so he didn't win the award.

For that same reason, Mossman was snubbed.

Here's a coach whose team finished a dismal 8-20 in 1987-88 for the first losing season in 20 years of Lady Cat basketball. The Lady Cats were picked by most observers to have an extended stay in the cellar, with the 1988-89 season predicted to be little better than the one prior.

Wrong.

The Lady Cats used a strong 16-5 start before somewhat limping down the stretch to finish third in the conference. At stake still for the team is a possible berth in the NIT women's tourney. K-State will find out its fate in that regard Sunday.

Mossman should have roses, carnations and every other kind of flower you can think of tossed at her feet for the job she did this season.

The Lady Cat starting lineup for most of the year contained a freshman, three sophomores and a junior. There was but one senior on the entire roster, and yet the team won 10 more games than it did one year earlier, including a heart-stopping thriller against Montana in the finals of the McCall Pattern Classic — the best game played in Bramlage all year, men's or women's.

Mossman deserves credit for taking her team to heights no one, possibly even she, expected.

Kruger deserves the same recognition. They're getting it here. Too bad they didn't get it somewhere else.

It is still the "Coach" of the Year award, isn't it?

Student fights park's forest fires

Long days, poor facilities accompany job

By Carrie Law
Collegian Reporter

As the fires spread through Yellowstone National Park and other parts of the West during the summer, Greg Taylor, senior in fisheries and wildlife biology, battled the blazes as a member of the Kern Valley hotshot crew.

The first week of his summer was spent in a 40-hour training course. He soon learned his firefighting skills on the job.

In the life of a forest firefighter, no day was typical, Taylor said. Days for the hotshot crew began about 4 a.m., lasting until 8 p.m. or later.

If the crews were lucky, they had a campsite complete with sleeping bags and catering trucks. But sometimes they weren't so lucky, he said.

During one of the biggest fires in Yellowstone that Taylor fought, his crew hiked 14 miles to the location.

"We set up what is called a spike camp," Taylor said. "We stayed there for four or five days. They had to fly food in to us by helicopter and drop it down to us on parachutes. The first few nights we were there we didn't have sleeping bags or anything .... We just had to curl up on the ground."

During this fire, Taylor's crew was assigned to cutting trees so they fall away from the power lines.

"We were up on this ridge and the main fire was coming," Taylor said. "Our job was to stop spot fires, which are caused by embers flying out ahead (of the fire).

"The flames that day were unreal. I've never seen anything like it. They estimated (the fires) were 300 feet high. It looked like a science fiction movie.

"The smoke that the fire put off was unbelievable. It was around two in the afternoon and it was completely black ... like midnight. It was so dark that bats were out flying around."

Taylor said by keeping a safety zone they were usually able to avoid allowing the fire to surround them. If they did leave the area they were protecting, they would escape to a fire break or a burned area.

"As a last-ditch sort of thing, we had fire shelters that we carried with us," Taylor said. "They look like they're made of aluminum foil. They fold up into a little pouch about six by 12 inches. When it folds out, it looks like a pup tent. If you get under it, the fire can actually come over you."

The fire shelter is made of material which deflects heat.

"We never had to rely on (fire shelters)," Taylor said. "We had a pretty good record as far as safety is concerned."

Several crew members suffered from smoke inhalation, cuts from tools and a few minor burns, he said.

Occasionally, a fire would begin burning beyond the control of the fire crews, Taylor said.

"A lot of times we'd call in planes if the fire was getting away from us, or if it jumped the fire line," he said. "The planes were just old cargo planes or old military bombers. They'd fly in and drop slurry (a flame retardant) ... it's kind of a pinkish liquid.

"Slurry is about the consistency of Jell-O that hasn't jelled yet. It's slimy stuff."

The crew usually had warning that the slurry was dropping and would try to avoid getting hit. However, it was unavoidable sometimes, he said.

"It was pretty scary because the slurry would hit so hard that it would knock snags from the trees down," Taylor said.

Techniques used by the crews to fight fires included creating a fire line, which involves burning vegetation before the fire reaches a particular point, and creating a back fire, which involves burning an area away from the fire line created by the crew and burning toward the forest fire that is approaching.

"The flames that day were unreal. I've never seen anything like it. They estimated (the fires) were 300 feet high. It looked like a science fiction movie."
—Greg Taylor
Senior in fisheries and wildlife biology

"Sometimes back firing is effective. ... If the wind changes, it just blows embers right over your fire line," Taylor said. "When that happens, you have to go back behind your line and start over again."

The width of a fire break is determined by the canopy or tree height, he said. For example, if the trees are 30 feet tall, an area needs to be cut 30 feet wide so anything falling won't go across the fire break.

To battle the blazes and create fire breaks, three types of fire crews fight the fires from the ground. Of the 56 fire crews, the 20 members of each of the type one crews, known as the hotshots, have the most training. They do not use water to put out fires; rather, they remove the fuel from the edge of the fire to prevent spreading.

"We had to carry a lot of gear. The packs we carried weighed 35 to 40 pounds. You have to work with these packs on. Everyone carries fuel for the saws ... two bottles of gas and a bottle of oil. Also, you have to carry your own water."

The three individuals who clear the path ahead of the group are also required to carry a chainsaw, which is an additional 25 to 35 pounds.

Type two crews had less training and equipment as well as poorer facilities, and type three crews consisted of convicts who worked for $1 per day. For each day they fought fires, one day was reduced from their sentence.

Taylor said his experience as a hotshot crew member was something he is ready to do again.

"(Firefighting) kind of grows on you, I guess," he said. "I'm pretty ready to go back. I've had a couple of months off and been able to sleep in a bed with sheets.

"It was probably the hardest thing I've ever done, but it was worth it. The good thing about it was it made you appreciate the little things in life. You come to appreciate having water to drink or being able to take a shower once a week or getting a good meal at night."

Taylor will return for work May 17 in Bakersfield, Calif.

FBI wary of threats, Iranian students

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Thousands of "zealous" Iranian students in the United States pose the greatest threat of violence against publishers and others over the controversial novel, "The Satanic Verses," an FBI official told Congress Wednesday.

As if to underline the impact of the threats of retribution coming from Iran's Ayatollah Khomeini, a representative of the U.S. publisher of the book, Viking-Penguin, declined to appear at the hearing.

A committee source said the company had cited security concerns in refusing the invitation. Calls to the publisher were not immediately returned.

"There are a large number (of students) here, both legally and illegally, who are zealous adherents to the Khomeini rhetoric ... and pursuit of violence," said Oliver "Buck" Revell, the executive assistant investigations director of the FBI.

Some 30,000 Iranian citizens are in the United States on student visas, and at least that many more are in the country illegally, he said. Some 10,000 to 15,000 are activists with sympathies for Khomeini's fundamentalist Shiite regime, he said, and many receive government money to help them stay in the United States or are affiliated with the Iranian Revolutionary Guard Corps.

Those Iranians, most of them students, represent a greater threat than the 200 or so foreign nationals in the United States who have known links to Iranian terrorist and intelligence networks and are routinely tracked by the bureau, Revell told the Senate Foreign Relations subcommittee on terrorism.

They are "more dangerous than any sort of infrastructure or organizational activity" because they cannot be monitored, he said, and because the State Department's standards for issuing visas are lax.

Khomeini's blanket threat with its promise of martyrdom should a follower die attempting retribution for the book, and his government's offer of a reward of up to $5.2 million for the death of author Salman Rushdie, escalate the terrorist threat beyond those normally faced by the FBI, he said.

Revell said the FBI so far knows of 178 threats to booksellers by telephone and by letter, received in cities from New York to San Francisco to Houston. While the bureau has no authority to offer protection, it has immediately responded to each threat and investigated, he said.

An official of one company that has been the target of threats, the Waldenbooks chain, also declined to appear at the hearing but complained in a statement that the government was slow to come to the defense of booksellers.

Judge sets bond for 2 in teen's death

By The Associated Press

TUCSON, Ariz. — A judge Wednesday set bail at $100,000 each for a man and woman wanted in the bludgeoning and stabbing death of a Kansas teen-ager.

Archie Owens Jr., 20, and Tambi Lewis, 18, of Kansas City, Kan., were jailed in lieu of bond, Pima County jail officials said. They were arrested together Tuesday afternoon.

Judge Robert Fleming of the county Justice Court also scheduled an April 7 review hearing for the pair. But court officials said it was expected that Owens and Lewis would be returned to Kansas before then for trial in the Feb. 19 slaying of Syndi S. Bierman, 17, of Piper.

Larry Bagley, FBI special agent in charge in Tucson, said Owens arranged in a telephone call to Kansas City FBI agents to surrender at the Tucson fast-food restaurant where Lewis was working.

Owens is one of three people, including Syndi older sister, Shari Lyn Bierman, charged in Wyandotte County, Kan. District Court with murder. Lewis has been charged with aiding a felon.

Shari, 20, is being kept in the Wyandotte County Jail on $100,000 bond. Conrad Joseph Hernandez, 24, of Kansas City, Kan., who surrendered in Oklahoma two weeks ago, has pleaded guilty and agreed to testify against the others.

Shari was taken into custody shortly after the killing.

An Associated Press survey found 51 Democrats and Republican Sen. Larry Pressler of South Dakota either solidly opposed or leaning against confirmation with 41 Republicans and three Democrats either supporting or leaning in favor of the nomination.

Democrats hold a 55-45 edge in the Senate.

Dole made his extraordinary proposal to deal with Senate concerns over Tower's history of drinking. "I think we ought to give him a second chance that many of us have had," said Dole, who was seriously wounded during World War II but has risen to a position of power and prominence in the Senate.

"It gives this Senate a second opportunity. It addresses the concerns raised by the chairman and the majority leader and by others at the same time it gives President Bush his choice for secretary of defense," Dole said.

Earlier, Dole suggested Tower be permitted to come to the Senate and answer the allegations against him, but did not immediately press the issue when Mitchell objected.

There was little doubt that Dole's maneuverings were his final bid to save the nomination. Earlier, he conceded it would "take a miracle" to do so, and Johnston's speech seemed to deflate Republican hopes.

"In the nuclear age we can't afford to take a chance on the man who holds the future in his hands," Johnston said on the Senate floor.

The Louisiana Democrat said he was troubled by Tower's drinking habits and that alcohol altered the former senator's judgment. "There seems to be a personality change that occurs in Senator Tower," Johnston said.

Earlier, Bentsen became the third Democrat to support the embattled nomination, saying, "I hope that when I get the next chance to talk with John Tower about the tough job of keeping this country strong, it will be while he's in his new office at the Pentagon."

"I'm both honored to have his prestigious support, and grateful for his humane understanding of what my family has endured," Tower said.

Despite Bentsen's decision, Mitchell repeated his claim the Senate will reject the nomination, and he led a chorus of Democrats who called for a quick vote.

Mitchell said he was ready to vote "as soon as possible. A reasonable time would be tomorrow."

Tower, who served in the Senate from 1961 to 1984, has been dogged by allegations of excessive drinking and womanizing as well as questions about his lucrative defense consulting contracts since retirement from government service.

slightly higher than normal by the weekend after a surface system moves out in the next two days, Schurr said. The Gulf Coast should also be clear and warm well into next week.

Padre Island, one of the nation's most popular spring break spots, will have highs in the 80s and lows in the 50s to 60s during this weekend and into next week, according to the National Weather Service in Brownsville, Texas. The water temperature off Padre Island Wednesday was 56 degrees.

The outlook for Daytona Beach, Fla., calls for a slight chance of rain during the rest of this week, but clearing with highs in the 60s by the weekend, according to the National Weather Service there. Surf temperature off Daytona Beach Wednesday was 62 degrees.

Fact Sheet on the Student Athletic Fee

I. The ATHLETIC DEPARTMENT pays the UNIVERSITY over $1 MILLION/YEAR in tuition, fees, room & board.

II. Kansas State University has one of the HIGHEST student seating allocations in Division IA basketball (48.1%).

III. The current prices of student season basketball and football tickets are among the LOWEST in Division IA Athletics nationwide.

IV. Both WICHITA STATE and KANSAS UNIVERSITY have athletic fees. Other Big Eight Schools with fees are Colorado, Iowa State and Oklahoma State.

V. KANSAS STATE is currently operating with the LOWEST athletic budget in the Big Eight, $1.5 million less than the seventh highest and less than half of the highest.

VI. The Student Athletic Fee is only ONE part of a FIVE part plan to increase the athletic budget.

VII. A portion of the monies collected from the fee will be given to NCAA sanctioned club sports, gymnastics and soccer, and crew will also be included in this allocation.

VIII. If the fee passes the students are GUARANTEED the following:

1. FREE ADMISSION to all non-revenue NCAA athletic events held on the KSU campus.

2. A PRICE CAP placed on student season basketball and football tickets at $3.50/game and $5.00/game respectively, for a three-year period.

3. A GUARANTEE that student season football and basketball tickets WILL NOT be combined for a period of three years.

4. A GUARANTEE that students will receive a minimum of 6,000 SEATS in Bramlage Coliseum.

IX. At the conclusion of 3 years, a select student committee will evaluate the fee, how it has been allocated, and how it has impacted the Department and the University.

Regulations changed for campaigns

By Nancy Prosser
Staff Writer

Student Senate voted Thursday to modify campaign regulations, after tabling the bill for the last two weeks, and sending it back to the committee for revisions.

The pages of the Kansas State Collegian that contain candidate's pictures and responses to questions will no longer be allowed within 50 feet of polling places on election day.

"By having these things within view of the voter, we enhance the Collegian's ability to bias the voter," said Travis Stumpff, arts and sciences senator.

Senate rejected an amendment that would have required candidates to include T-shirts and sweatshirts as campaign expenditures. In the past, only the screen was included as an expenditure.

"If we do this, it will make it hard for a candidate with a small amount of money to get shirts," said Michael Stenstrom, arts and sciences senator.

Senate also passed a bill that will increase the amount of membership dues by 20 cents for full-time students to support the state level of Associated Students of Kansas. The dues will increase from 60 cents to 80 cents.

Dues for part-time students will not increase.

"We are trying to keep fees at a level where we don't penalize part-time students for being part-time students," said Lauren O'Connor, finance chairwoman.

Eastern files for bankruptcy

Paralyzed airline blames pilots for crisis

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Eastern Airlines filed for protection from creditors in bankruptcy court Thursday, the sixth day of a Machinists strike, blaming pilots for a "cash crisis" that paralyzed the nation's seventh-largest airline.

The move came a day after Eastern insisted such a step remained a last resort in the airline's effort to endure the strike, which had strong support from pilots and flight attendants and was costing Eastern an estimated $4 million a day.

The filing under Chapter 11 in U.S. Bankruptcy Court in New York is designed to give Eastern a reprieve from debts while it tries to restructure and extricate itself from the worst crisis in its 60-year history.

Eastern boss Frank Lorenzo blamed "the damage that has been caused by the pilots union." He and Eastern President Phil Bakes insisted they intend to restore the airline in bankruptcy court, though in a smaller form.

"We tried mightily to keep Eastern from bankruptcy," Bakes said at a news conference. "We intend to operate our airline: make no mistake about that."

Bakes said Eastern faces a "cash crisis that can only be averted and stabilized by" turning to the bankruptcy court.

Union leaders lashed out at Lorenzo as a "robber baron." Machinists called for a public boycott of Eastern's sister airline, Continental, and said they would oppose Eastern's reorganization plan and any sale of assets.

Lorenzo and Bakes pledged that all creditors would be paid in full; shareholders would receive "fair value"; passengers would be protected; and as many employees as possible would return to work. Eastern had 31,200 employees before the strike.

John Peterpaul, a Machinists vice president, said Eastern filed for bankruptcy on payday "in a spiteful attempt to deny Eastern workers their last paycheck earned before the strike." Paychecks were frozen by the move.

John Bavis, head of the Eastern pilots union, said management continued calling pilots at home in hopes some will return to work. He said the effort would fail.

Henry Duffy, president of the Air Line Pilots Association, said he hoped the move meant Lorenzo is "finished" at Eastern.

Holton renovation still on schedule

By Kevin Kramer
Staff Writer

Workers are walking around and over each other completing tasks to meet the deadline of the $1.69 million renovation of Holton Hall, as it enters its final phase of construction.

"As of the end of February, we were 87 percent finished with the Holton hall project," said Jay Rapp, job superintendent for Rapp and Gaines Construction Inc., general contractor for the renovation. "We are looking to be done about the first week in May."

Workers inside are putting the finishing touches to the building; installing an elevator, setting ceramic tile in the bathrooms and cutting wood trim, Rapp said. The plan is to have all the finishing work done before carpet is laid down in three weeks.

"Before renovation, Holton Hall's ventilation caused havoc between the smokers and nonsmokers because of the lack of proper ventilation."

—Larry Garvin, Director of facilities planning

"The renovation of Holton Hall, which began in July of 1988, is progressing on schedule," said Larry Garvin, director of facilities planning. "The estimated cost of the renovation, $1.69 million, is still within the budget set for the project.

"Several large expenses that were not budgeted in the original renovation bid have occured during construction," Garvin said. "They have exhausted the contingency funds established for the renovation. But the plan is to finish the building within the budgeted funds, and on time."

The contingency fund is an additional budget assigned to a renovation project and consists of about 4 percent of the total project budget, he said. It is used to pay for additional and hidden problems that occur during construction.

The largest portion of the additional expenses were caused by the replacement of a portion of a collapsed steam tunnel and loose plaster on the exterior walls, Garvin said.

"The overall structure of Holton Hall has been beefed up," Rapp said. "It will have about 20,000 square feet of finished space and about 4,000 square feet of additional storage space in the attic when the project is complete."

The square footage has not changed significantly, Garvin said.

"The heating, cooling and electrical are all new," he said. "The new air conditioning system provides fresh air ventilation. Before renovation, Holton Hall's ventilation caused havoc between the smokers and nonsmokers because of the lack of proper ventilation."

Holton will be fully accessible to the handicapped, Garvin said. A new elevator and handicapped restrooms, drinking fountains and telephones have been installed.

Additional changes to Holton include more private office space and adequate reception areas, he said. The offices and hallways have higher ceilings and use more indirect and task lighting.

"Because of the growing use of computers in the offices, a greater reliance has been focused on the use of the indirect lighting," Garvin said. "Indirect lighting is better on the eyes when using a cathode-ray tube."

Holton has also received new exterior windows and trim, he said. The double-paned and air-tight windows will add significantly to the efficiency of the building's heating and cooling system.

"The new heat exchanger and cooling system will provide a heating

Bush loses conflict; Tower denied

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Senate on Thursday rejected the nomination of John Tower as defense secretary, 53-47, handing President Bush a major defeat in his first high-stakes showdown with the Democratic-controlled Congress.

The White House said Bush would act swiftly to submit a replacement nomination to the Senate.

Tower was scuttled by concerns about his drinking habits coupled with senatorial unhappiness that he had left his government post as arms negotiator and quickly began earning hundreds of thousands of dollars as a defense industry consultant.

The vote was the culmination of a tumultuous six-day Senate debate and closely followed party lines. Howell Heflin of Alabama, Lloyd Bentsen of Texas and Christopher Dodd of Connecticut were the only Democrats to support the nomination. One Republican — Nancy Kassebaum of Kansas — voted against.

Tower, in a statement he delivered at the Pentagon moments after the vote, said, "I will be recorded as the first Cabinet nominee in the history of the republic to be rejected in the first 90 days of a presidency and perhaps be harshly judged.

"But I depart from this place at peace with myself, knowing that I have given a full measure of devotion to my country."

Tower said no other public figure "has been subjected to such a far-reaching and thorough investigation nor had his human weaknesses bared to such intensive and demeaning public scrutiny."

"And yet, there is no finding that I have ever breached established legal and ethical standards nor been derelict in my duty," he said.

The Senate rendered its verdict in an atmosphere of unusual formality. Vice President Dan Quayle presided over the session, practically all senators remained in their chairs during the roll call and the gallery was packed with spectators.

"We ought to hang our heads after what we've done to this good man," Senate Republican Leader Bob Dole of Kansas said in a final defiant speech of support before the roll was called.

"America has lost a good public servant. The president has won because he stood by his man."

Majority Leader George Mitchell, summing up the view for the opponents by said that Tower's experience and competence on defense issues weren't at issue. But "serious

Vote may increase party differences, professor says

Senate's vote denying John Tower the position of Secretary of Defense may increase political party differences and make them less able to work with each other, according to a K-State professor of political science.

"It may make the Republicans feel resentful ... and leave a sour taste in the mouths of the senators," said Assistant Professor Margery Ambrosius.

She said questions have been raised about Tower's ability to perform as Secretary of Defense since he was first considered by Reagan for the position in 1980.

"It is unfortunate because it does get the administration off on a bad foot," Ambrosius said. "It certainly isn't going to give the Democrats in Congress a lot of confidence in Bush's programs."

Those who are Republicans may commend Bush for sticking by Tower, Ambrosius said. Others who are not Republicans may question

Tibetan tourists expelled

BEIJING — Foreign tourists were expelled from Lhasa on Thursday, and Chinese troops began rounding up Tibetans in the city and hauling them away in trucks, a Tibetan woman said.

Chinese officials said four more people had died after suffering injuries earlier this week in the Tibetan capital during bloody protests of Chinese communist rule in the remote mountain region.

The report brought the official death toll to 16. Western travelers have quoted Tibetans as saying that many more have died. Most Tibetans reportedly put the figure at between 20 and 30.

Some Western tourists accused Chinese troops of atrocities, a charge denied by a Foreign Ministry spokesman.

"They're grabbing everyone," said the Tibetan woman, interviewed late Thursday by telephone from Beijing. "Soldiers are all over the place and they're grabbing everyone."

Several foreigners who work in Lhasa have been allowed to remain, but foreign tourists, estimated at 140, were ordered to leave by Thursday — the eve of the 30th anniversary of a rebellion in Tibet.

Van Allen honored by award

STOCKHOLM, Sweden — American space researcher James A. Van Allen was named the winner Wednesday of the 1989 Crafoord Prize for his discovery 31 years ago of the radiation belts surrounding the Earth.

The Royal Academy of Sciences also cited the professor emeritus at the University of Iowa for providing the first instruments ever carried to another planet, those taken on the 1963 mission to Venus by Mariner II.

His work with the Explorer I satellite led to the discovery in 1958 of the Earth's radiation belts, now called the Van Allen belts.

The prize, which includes a $252,000 cash award, is given annually by the Royal Academy, which also awards Nobel Prizes.

Honoraria study released

WASHINGTON — Rep. Pat Roberts, a Dodge City Republican, has kept more speaking fees for personal use during the past five years than any other Kansas congressman, according to a study released Thursday by a government watchdog group.

Roberts pocketed $50,750 in "honoraria" from 1983 through 1987, said Common Cause, a non-partisan lobbying group that advocates an end to the practice of lawmakers receiving fees for speeches and appearances at seminars and conferences.

Next in the Kansas delegation was Rep. Jim Slattery, a Topeka Democrat, who retained $36,200 in speaking fees for personal use during the same period.

Rep. Dan Glickman, a Wichita Democrat, pocketed $22,930 and Rep. Bob Whittaker, an Augusta Republican, kept $16,000.

Rep. Jan Meyers, an Overland Park Republican, has kept $4,150 since 1985, her first year in Congress.

Common Cause found that 52 members of the House have pocketed more than $100,000 in speaking fees since 1983. The top recipients were the Democratic and Republican leaders. House Speaker Jim Wright, D-Texas, has pocketed $127,985 and House Minority Leader Robert Michel, R-Ill., has kept $127,188 during the five-year period.

Carson back due to weather

BURBANK, Calif. — Johnny Carson, host of "The Tonight Show" for 26 years, says he'll be back for at least one more season — because of the weather.

Carson said Wednesday he recently had lunch with Brandon Tartikoff, president of NBC entertainment and signed on for another year.

"Last year I said to him — I made a foolish mistake — I said I'll do another year when it snows in Malibu. And it snowed in Malibu so here we are," Carson said.

A rare snowstorm struck earlier this winter at the seaside community that is home to Carson and many other celebrities.

Soviet attache expelled

WASHINGTON — A Soviet military attache was ordered home Thursday by the State Department after being caught receiving classified documents from an American employee of a U.S. firm with government contracts, a spokesman said.

Lt. Col. Yuriy Nikolayevich Pakhtusov, who arrived here last June, received documents dealing with how the U.S. government protects classified and other sensitive information in computer systems, State Department press officer Dennis Harter said.

The FBI said Pakhtusov was arrested Wednesday. It was not disclosed how long he is being given to leave the United States.

Harter said the Soviet Embassy was informed that Pakhtusov was being expelled for "engaging in activities incompatible with his diplomatic status."

The name of the company whose documents Pakhtusov sought was not disclosed.

Harter said Pakhtusov approached the American last August and asked about the possibility of acquiring the secret documents. The American, whose identity was not disclosed, reported the contact to the FBI, which began monitoring contacts between the two.

KU to distribute condoms

LAWRENCE — The University of Kansas Student Senate has voted to distribute 10,000 condoms on campus as part of "Condom Sense Week."

The Senate voted Tuesday to allocate $3,330 to pay for the condoms.

Brochures will also be distributed April 24-28 to educate students about AIDS.

Ottawa policeman suspended

OTTAWA — An Ottawa police officer has been suspended indefinitely pending results of a KBI investigation into allegations of improper computer use at the Department of Public Safety.

Jeff Herrman, director of the DPS, said Thursday that the administrative suspension was with pay. He would not identify the officer who was suspended.

The suspension stems from criminal background checks run in February on Matt Whiteford, an Ottawa City Commission candidate. Franklin County Attorney Wendell Barker asked the KBI earlier to investigate the criminal history checks on Whiteford.

Herrman said the background checks on Whiteford were not part of a departmental investigation, but he would not say if the officer involved was acting on his own.

"No members of the Department of Public Safety are authorized to engage in political campaigns or activities under the colors of their jobs," Herrman said. "And, I mean on the hours of their employment."

Research improves universities' image, dean candidate says

By Joe Kennedy
Collegian Reporter

Having a strong research base at a university can only improve the academic image of the university, said Anthony Coelho, candidate for vice provost for research and dean of the graduate school, in his speech to an open forum Thursday.

"The goal of sponsored research is to meet the need of the sponsor," Coelho said. "It is an integral part of many institutions."

There is a realization that funded research will be sponsored by business and industry, he said. The funding usually comes from the government.

"Receiving funding from the business community is easy if the community views the university as an institution of excellence," Coelho said.

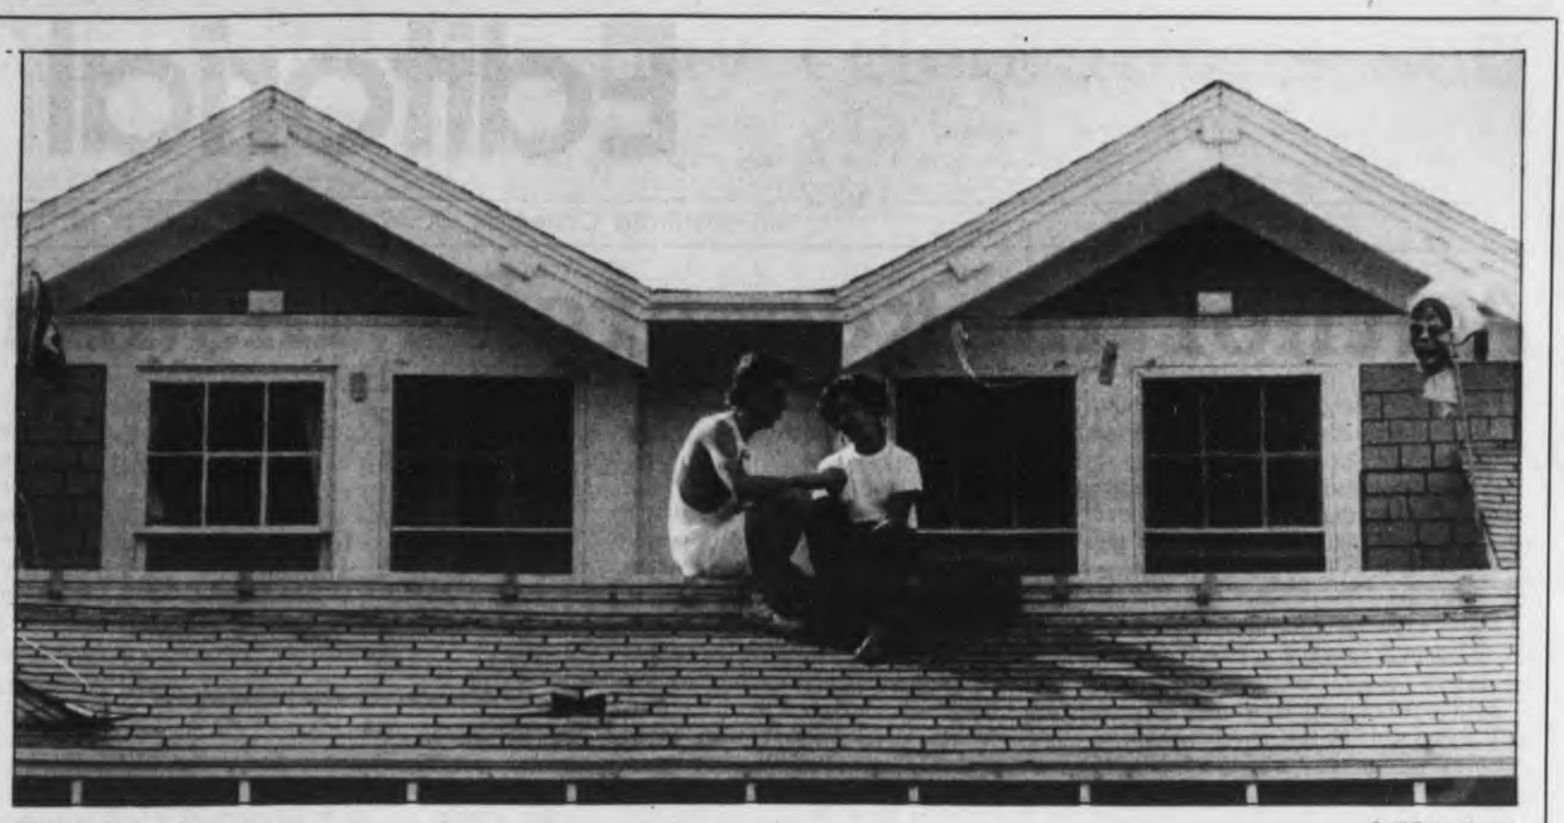
For a university to attract sponsors, it must have individuals who are established in the fields, but it must also have support scientists to complete the research, he said. The key individuals who can develop new ideas to solve problems are also important in attracting sponsors.

Because K-State is ready to make changes to its existing situation, Coelho said he is excited about the situation here.

Developing a strong research base begins by building upon the University's established strengths, he said. Developing a core focus of excellence will help bring funding for other areas of the University.

Because of a need for training individuals in research, apprentice scientists must be able to take the place of the master scientists when they retire, Coelho said.

"I'd like to see an increasing number of research programs, not just increasing the size of existing programs," he said.



Coelho is the head of research at Southwest Foundation for Biomedical Research, San Antonio. He earned his Bachelor of Science in Social Sciences from Western Connecticut State University, and earned his master's and doctoral degrees at the University of Texas, Austin.

Elizabeth Unger, chairwoman of the search committee, said if hired, Coelho will be responsible for the development of University research and the administration of sponsored research.

"He was very impressive in terms of his knowledge and he was articulate on issues involved in sponsored research at a university," Unger said.

If the University receives extra funds through science research, it will have extra funds to support research for the arts and humanities, she said.

"I would like to see K-State become an excellent comprehensive University so the undergraduates have a broad spectrum of areas for them to choose," Unger said. "We have that now, but we can get better."

Shifting of library's stacks finished

By Gary Lytle
Collegian Reporter

In about half the time expected, the Farrell Library staff has rearranged books to ease the load on the floor of Room 216.

Larry Garvin, director of facilities and planning, and other facilities personnel determined Farrell 216 was supporting about 124 pounds per square foot when it was built to support 60 pounds per square foot.

The staff then decided to move books from the room to other areas, allowing about two weeks for the task to be completed, said Virginia Quiring, associate dean of library development.

Although two weeks were allotted for the move, the staff rearranged the books and updated the stack guide in about one week, Quiring said.

"We have reduced the load to an acceptable level," she said.

Garvin said the staff has been conservative, leaving 60 pounds per square foot of books in the room.

Considering the room contained about 124 pounds of books per square foot for the last six years with no damage occurring, he said a load of 60 pounds per square foot was well within the limits for a safe structural load.

Although the immediate problem of overloading Room 216 has been dealt with, the problem of library overcrowding continues to worsen, Quiring said.

During the rearranging process, a large portion of library study space on the fourth floor had to be eliminated, she said.

"The thing that (rearranging the books) causes, is that it fills up the space in the reading rooms," Quiring said.

In the coming years, the trend of eliminating study space to make room for books will definitely continue to worsen, she said.

The educational materials, social studies materials and art materials in the room were moved to the fourth floor, Quiring said, along with the children's literature and oversized book collections.

The music collection was moved to fifth floor so it would be closer to the audio-visual department. To alleviate confusion resulting from the rearrangement, temporary signs have been located in rooms where materials have been moved to or from, she said.

The company, which has a staggering $2.5 billion in debt, has admitted it was taken by surprise when most of the 3,600 Eastern pilots honored Machinists' picket lines, forcing Miami-based Eastern to shut down nearly all operations Monday and lay off 9,500 non-union employees.

Union leaders long have said they believe Lorenzo wants to break them and tear Eastern apart. But Lorenzo would have a tougher time imposing lower wages at Eastern than he did when he reorganized Continental in 1983. Congress amended bankruptcy law in 1984 to require bankrupt companies to negotiate with unions and prove economic necessity before abrogating contracts.

Lorenzo stressed the filing covered only Eastern and not its parent Texas Air Corp., of which he is chairman. But on Thursday, Sen. Howard Metzenbaum, D-Ohio, filed a bill to allow Eastern creditors to collect from the parent company.

"This bill would prevent Frank Lorenzo and any other airline buccaneers from using bankruptcy to escape their creditors and destroy their workers," Metzenbaum said.

Author makes profit insulting Mohammed

After reading three articles in the Collegian about the much disputed book "The Satanic Verses," I believe it is my responsibility to remove the curtain and reveal the truth that the previous guest columnists either did not have the knowledge of or at least did not include in their columns.

I talked with one of the three columnists, who is a graduate student in sociology from Bangladesh, about his article. As a Pakistani, I wanted to tell him that he was not accurate on his analysis of Pakistan, and that he misrepresented the people who demonstrated against the book.

He tried to imply that it was a political scheme against the government, but that is not the truth. His column did not solve or calm anything, it just made the matter worse.

He has succeeded in making this topic more sensitive and brought less understanding for the Moslem community on campus.

The other two columnists kept us in the dark. They tried to portray that it is a "freedom of speech" or "freedom of expression" issue.

I am in favor of these freedoms, but I also feel that we have to respect the society we live in. This so-called civilized society preaches to us about love, friendship, respect, kindness, and understanding. This book does not promote these things.

Instead, it ignited a fire, and that fire is burning strongly. I do not understand the motives of the other two columnists. Did they write to promote peace and understanding of the issues, or did they want to throw more gas on the fire?

Now I will return to the real issue of this column: why this issue has received so much negative attention from the Moslem people and so much ignorance from the rest of the world.

For those of you who are not familiar with the Koran, let me quote Greg Easterbrook of the Los Angeles Times and Washington Post News Service.

Easterbrook, who lived in Pakistan for one year, wrote an article titled "Western ignorance of Islam feeds anger," which appeared in The Wichita Eagle-Beacon on Feb. 26.

He wrote: "It's replete with reverential references to Abraham, Moses, Jacob, Isaac, and Jesus Christ. It admonishes men and women to be honest, live modestly, harm no one and share their material possessions with the poor. It puts forth the concept that there is but one God who loves all people of all nations equally. It praises this God as beneficient and merciful, as a knower and healer. It is not the Bible. It's the Koran. And the similarities between those works are part of two underlying dynamics at play in the furor over reaction to the novel, 'The Satanic Verses,' by Salman Rushdie."

This book is not only offensive to myself and Islam, but the Roman Catholic Church has announced that it's a very offensive book to the Moslem people and appeals to its congregation not to read the book.

Commentary

Toquir Ahmad
Guest Columnist

They also feel even though a person has a right to express his opinion, he should not do it at the expense of hurting the dignity of other people.

Sir Geoffrey Howe, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs of Great Britain, who in the beginning favored the book, now acknowledges that it is very offensive to Moslems and is blasphemous.

Rushdie, although born to Moslem parents, does not believe in any religion, and he does not believe in God. He believes in the communistic view.

Moslems have respect for Christianity and Judaism. Rushdie does not give respect. If a Moslem says that he doesn't believe in Moses, Jesus or other prophets, then he is not a Moslem and he is out of Islam. For Moslems, according to their faith, their lives have less importance, and they have more respect toward Mohammed (peace be upon him) and other Prophets of God.

Why are Moslems so offended and so angry about this book?

That question Westerners don't seem to understand. I would like to explain one of those reasons to try to clear up some of the confusion among the people who have been misled by irresponsible authors.

The main difference is cultural background. People need to understand that the values are different.

Look at this short example: When there is a weekend in the West, people go to clubs, drink and dance. In Moslem countries, there is only one day for the weekend, and that day is used for prayers and worship of God, for making a promise to themselves to follow the described path of life, and for remembrance of the Prophet Mohammed (peace be upon him).

Rushdie tried to humiliate all Moslems. He tried to make all the world laugh at them, but more importantly, he made fun of Islam.

I would like to quote from George Thompson in USA Today, "Salmon Rushdie is either a damn fool or a shrewd seller of books."

Rushdie has a history of making money through controversial material. One example is when he wrote a book called "Midnight's Children," which caused Indian Prime Minister Indira Gandhi to take him to court where he and his publisher were forced to apologize and agree to remove the offensive section from the book.

In "The Satanic Verses," Rushdie insults and libels more than a billion people. He uses the most obscene language. He incites racial and religious feelings against Moslems by scandalizing the Prophet Mohammed (peace be upon him) and his respected family.

Unfortunately, this comes at a time when there is a greater need for dialogue among the three Abrahamic faiths.

Does any author have the right to hide behind the words "freedom of speech" or "freedom of expression" while he defiles and insults a society? Does any author have the right to create such hatred among people and not be expected to pay for it? I think not.

I am not in favor of the bounty that has been set on his head, but I do feel that he should pay for what he has done. This is not the first offensive thing that he has written. He was completely aware of what he was doing.

I strongly condemn this book and the author. I encourage other people to try to understand the viewpoints of the Moslems, and discourage the publishing of books and other materials that hurt the people in our world for the use of making money.

Let us promise to each other that we will work together to promote peace, love and understanding and will condemn those minority units who promote hate and mistrust among us.

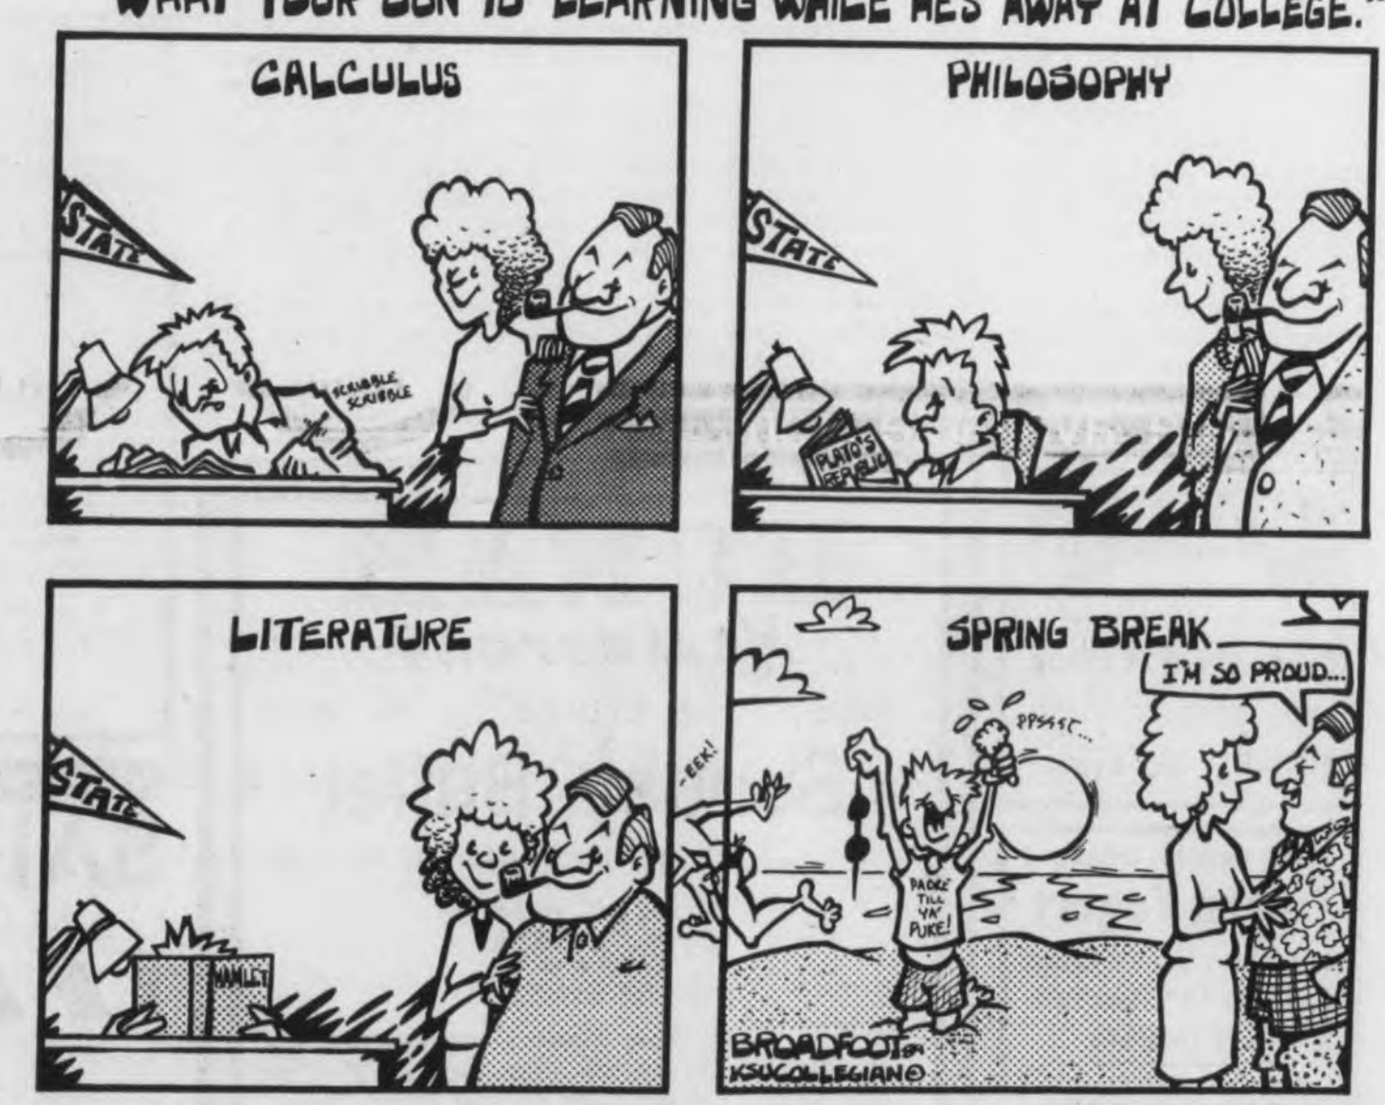
Respecting crosswalks could reduce accidents

Warm weather is approaching, and as it does, more people will be walking to campus. As pedestrian traffic increases, so does the opportunity for accidents.

One of the simplest ways to avoid pedestrian accidents is to use the crosswalks that are strategically located at the ends of many campus sidewalks. Unfortunately, crosswalks are rarely used by walkers, and usually ignored by motorists.

According to the law, a motorist must stop when a crosswalk is occupied. Period. According to the K-State Police, a crosswalk is occupied when a pedestrian is either waiting to cross, or is already on the street.

Given the numbers of accidents involving pedestrians on our campus, it is time to start paying more attention to crosswalks. Accidents result both from pedestrians not crossing at crosswalks and from drivers failing to stop.



Motorists need to become more aware of crosswalks, and respect pedestrians who are trying to use them. Whether simply out of ignorance or a "let-the-next-guy-stop" attitude, many drivers recklessly plow through crosswalks occupied by pedestrians.

Probably the most blatant of these is when a car from one direction is stopped, the pedestrian is halfway across the street, and a car from the opposite direction barrels right on through the crosswalk. Not only is this illegal, it is incredibly dangerous.

Equally important is the need for campus police to treat running through a crosswalk as a violation and issue citations to violators. It may not be as profitable as handing out parking tickets, but in terms of safety, it will be time well spent.

Finally, pedestrians should make an effort to use the crosswalks. A lone student darting across the middle of the street makes a likely target for a speeding car.

Our campus is a pedestrian campus, and planners are working to make it more so. In view of this, we should all take just a little extra care to prevent unnecessary accidents.

Options available for fun break

Commentary

Doug Folk
Collegian Columnist

Those of you who are actually still around to read this probably have some nasty old professor who scheduled a test for 3:30 this afternoon. But that's OK, because a couple of days from now you'll be kickin' back on a beach towel, worshiping the great sun god with a Schaffer Light in one hand and a gorgeous babe/hunk in the other, right?

Well, if you fit that spring break stereotype, I'm darn happy for you and I've only got two little bits of advice: 1) If you're planning on going to a wet T-shirt contest, arrive early; and 2) Don't try to jump across any balconies. People die that way. Trust me, there are better ways to get out of finals.

If, however, you are in the majority of K-State students who won't be leaving our fair state for sunny beaches or snowy slopes, then take heart. No, you won't have to spend the entire break watching "Three's Company" re-runs.

Just for you, here's a list of action-packed ways to have just as much fun as those bums in Padre, but at a mere fraction of the cost:

■ Conduct a test of the quality and delivery times of all local pizza joints. Then the next time somebody says, "Hey, let's order some pizza," you can be the authority you've always wanted to be.

■ Visit the zoo.

Sure, most of the animals are still inside for the winter, but just to hear that camel make those noises and hang its slobbery, long tongue down always seems to make the trip worthwhile for me.

■ Go to Aggieville.

Oh sure, you go to Aggieville all the time, but how often do you get the chance to walk into Kite's Bar Grille or Brothers Tavern at 11 p.m. on a Saturday night and have your pick of seats? I mean, who wants all those people in the way when you go out anyway, right?

■ Get some exercise.

Just think, you'll be the envy of all your friends when they come back from break after drinking all that beer to find you're in prime physical condition. They'll be embarrassed to admit all they did was lie around on the beach every day.

■ Write that book you've always wanted to write.

I know you've probably never really wanted to write a book, but that's what they always say in articles like this.

■ Teach your roommate's parrot to say rude things about his girlfriend.

■ Grab a pal and road trip to Topeka. Catch a Sizzlers game, then party in Washburn area bars. This won't be that exciting in and of itself, but Manhattan will seem a heck-uva lot more fun afterwards.

■ Take that three-year-old moldy green glob from the back of your refrigerator onto campus and look at it under a microscope. Be sure to wear protective clothing.

■ Cruise the mall. Check out the babes/hunks.

OK, those are some of the ideal ways to spend your break. Unfortunately, many of you will choose to ignore my advice, go home for break and have a miserable time. Here's what you're likely to do:

■ Sit around with a few old friends and talk about how great high school was.

■ Sit around with a few old friends and talk about how much you hated high school.

■ Go to the pool hall, drink red beers and play snooker.

■ Watch Oprah, Phil, Sally and Geraldo.

■ Visit grandparents, aunts, uncles, cousins, etc. Standard answers you will give them will be "fine," "yeah, they're pretty hard," "no, I stopped dating him/her," and "I sure am."

■ Eat way too much.

■ Try to explain to your parents that you're flunking biology, but it's not because you go to Aggieville every other night, even though you do.

■ Help your dad clean the garage. ("What's in these boxes anyway? Can't we get rid of this junk?")

■ Help your mom clean the house. ("What's in that closet anyway? Can't we get rid of that junk?")

■ Drive by your old haunts to see if they still look the same.

■ Hope it's raining in South Padre Island. Yeah, me too.

Ceramic art show to contain pieces of students' work

By Steve Logback
Collegian Reporter

Four undergraduate and four graduate students are among nearly 2,000 participants displaying their ceramic works at the 23rd annual National Council for Education in the Ceramic Arts conference in Kansas City, Mo., which ends Saturday.

Several students participated in a six-state regional show earlier in the year, said Yoshiro Ikeda, associate professor of art.

K-State was selected as one of six universities to represent the region at the NCECA conference after this event.

The number of student representatives from each university to display work at the conference was limited to eight.

The burden of deciding who would represent the University was shouldered by Ikeda and Angelo Garzio, professor of art.

"Professor Garzio and myself simply determined what work was the best," Ikeda said. "First, we judged the works on craftsmanship and originality, then we made sure (the works) represented Kansas State University well enough."

Ikeda said the event will attract major gallery personnel and participants from a variety of places.

"The title says it's a national conference, but actually there will also be people there from such places as Canada and Japan," he said.

The NCECA conference is traditionally one of the largest conferences of the year, Ikeda said. The opportunity to display works there can often prove profitable to students' careers.

"A lot of professional people, museum people and gallery people will be at the conference," he said. "This gives students a chance to exploit their works and even catch someone's eye ... they get good publicity and possibly a good future."

Ikeda said the conference is especially lucrative for students because of the University's location.

"This is a good opportunity for Kansas State students because the closest gallery is Kansas City and that is a lousy place to sell (ceramic works)," he said. "If you want to market (works), you have to do it on the East or West coasts, but now those people are coming (to Kansas City)."

Jeaneane Johnson, graduate student in fine arts, said she is excited that her work was selected for the conference.

"It's like a stepping stone and it's also an honor to be selected out of a six-state area," Johnson said. "Not only to be one of the few schools selected, but also one of only eight persons (selected) from K-State."

Ikeda said this is the first time since 1980 that K-Staters have been invited to the conference.

"This is probably the best recruitment tool we have received for the last eight years," he said.

Other students selected for the show are: Frances Johnson, graduate student in fine arts; Joseph Cook, graduate student in fine arts; Surojana Sethabutra, graduate student in fine arts; Gary Andolina, senior in fine arts; Sadami Hua, sophomore in fine arts; Laura Fatemi, junior in fine arts and William Yung, senior in fine arts.

St. Patrick's day celebrations set

By Craig Hamrick
Collegian Reporter

With a bit of Irish luck and good weather on March 18, the 11th annual St. Patrick's Day celebration will present a parade in Aggieville, a 10-kilometer St. Pat's Road Race and a two-mile "Shamrock Fun Run."

The events will be followed by an awards ceremony and a barbecue, said Juli Salberg, executive director of the Aggieville Merchants Association.

The parade, which begins at noon, will feature the Big Red One Marching Band from Ft. Riley. Salberg said anyone can participate and a $100 prize will be awarded to the largest group. Participants must register with Salberg by March 17.

The St. Pat's 10-kilometer Road Race, beginning at 2 p.m., will cross through campus.

The Shamrock Two-Mile Fun Run will begin at 1 p.m. for men and 1:30 p.m. for women. The race's route circles Manhattan City Park.

Each race will have 15 groups divided according to age and a wheelchair division. Medals, trophies or ribbons will be awarded to the top 10 finishers in each division. The awards ceremony will be at 3 p.m.

The number of race participants varies according to the weather, but usually about 1,000 runners attend the event, said Dianna Welliver, a race official.

"Last year we only had about 850 runners because it was so cold, but in years past, we've had as many as 1,200," Welliver said.

The entry fee for each race is $7 until Monday and $10 after that date. Participants will receive a St. Pat's '89 T-shirt and free entrance to the St. Pat's Bar-B-Que at 4 p.m.

Welliver said runners can register at the race headquarters before the start of each race. Headquarters will be at the intersection of 12th and Laramie streets. Race participants can also sign up in advance at the race sponsors: Ballard Sporting Goods, KMKF radio station or Kansas State Bank.

Body chemical could prevent cold sniffles

By The Associated Press

BOSTON — A newly discovered body chemical may be able to lure the common cold virus away from its targets inside the nose, offering the possibility of the first medicine to prevent the sniffles, scientists said Thursday.

The research helps unravel the strategy used by rhinoviruses — the culprits in about half of all colds — to get into the cells that line the nose and begin the all-too-familiar bouts of hacking, sneezing and sniffling.

While the research provides tantalizing clues for developing ways to prevent the common cold, scientists caution that such treatments are still years away. Even if they prove effective, they will only work against the rhinoviruses, not other cold viruses, and probably won't cure colds once they start.

"This is not a cure. It is a scientific step," said Dr. Michael E. Kamarck of Molecular Therapeutics, one of two research groups that simultaneously made the discovery.

The two teams provided the first detailed descriptions of the rhinovirus receptor, the minuscule spots on cells where rhinoviruses attach themselves.

Researchers speculate that by flooding the nose with synthetic copies of this natural molecule, it should be possible to hopelessly confuse attacking viruses, luring them away from susceptible cells. A similar strategy is being tested against AIDS.

Scientists said the approach to preventing cold infections succeeds in the test tube but has not been tried on people.

"If it works, it would be very exciting," said Dr. Richard Crowell, a virus researcher at Hahnemann University School of Medicine in Philadelphia.

Reports on the two teams' conclusions was published in today's issue of the journal Cell.

'Cats open with KU

By Mike Goens
Sports Writer

K-State will face one of its toughest tests in the first round of the Big Eight tournament against Kansas at 8:20 tonight in Kansas City. It will be the third matchup between the two teams this season and the seventh in the past two years.

Although the Jayhawks are on probation and will not see postseason action past this weekend, don't think they won't have any incentive to make a good showing in Kemper Arena, known by some as "Allen Field House East."

"The Kansas-Kansas State game is always significant, there are a lot of reasons it is important to us," Coach Lon Kruger said of the tournament affecting K-State's NCAA seed. "The matchup with Kansas adds to that, it doesn't matter if it is a conference game or a Big Eight tournament game.

"It's a one-game season for them. I don't know whether that gives them more or less pressure. They look at the opportunity to cause a little turmoil in the post-season tournament."

K-State, 18-9, is seeded third in the tournament and KU, 19-11, is seeded sixth. The Wildcats are coming off a loss against Iowa State last Saturday, where the Cyclones completely controlled the second half on the way to a 101-89 victory, despite a career-high 33 points from Steve Henson.

Earlier in the week, the Wildcats had upset the seventh-ranked Missouri Tigers, 76-75, on Tony Massop's tip-in at the buzzer. The K-State squad finished the regular season by winning six of its last eight games.

After losing eight straight, Kansas won three in a row with wins at home against Colorado and Nebraska, and then knocking off Oklahoma State, 79-78, Saturday in Stillwater. The Cowboys were previously unbeaten at home.

"They have shown the capability of making whatever adjustments are necessary," Kruger said. "They did a good job of taking away Oklahoma State's inside game."

The teams split the two regular season meetings this season, with each team winning on the other's homecourt for the second straight year.

In Manhattan, in the first conference game for both teams, KU handed the Wildcats their first loss in Bramlage Coliseum with a 75-74 overtime win.

K-State relied on a strong second half to come back and beat the Jayhawks 71-70 in Lawrence. Lincoln Minor gave Kansas a 37-27 halftime lead with a three-pointer just before halftime, but K-State came back to lead by as many as 10 points in the second half.

Kansas made it close with four three-pointers in the final minute, but the 'Cats hit several key free throws down the stretch to seal the victory. Fred McCoy led the Wildcats with 22 points, and Henson added 18. Mike Maddox led KU with 21.

"Those were two awfully intense ballgames typical of KU-K-State: close, down to the wire," Kruger said. "We have got a lot of respect for their ballclub."

"There are a lot of things riding on it for us," Henson said. "It's definitely something we get excited about, definitely something to play for. It's another chance to line up and get at it again.

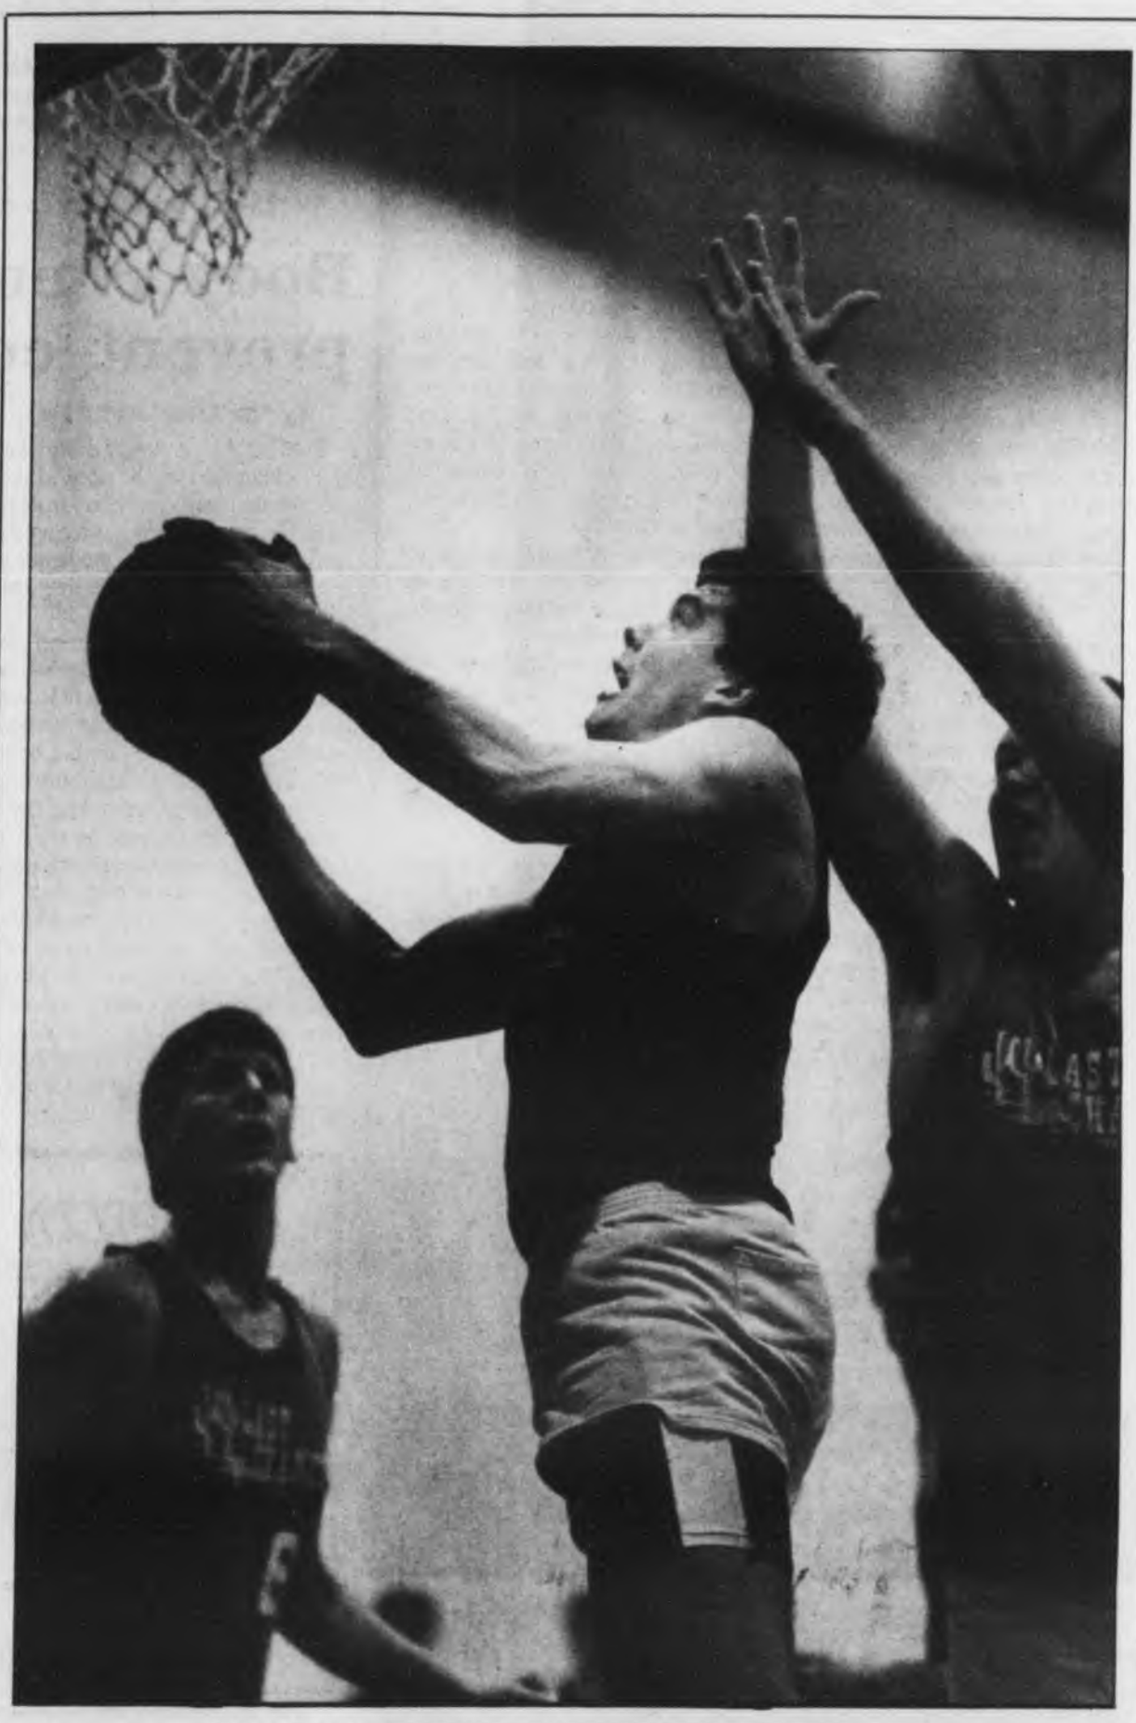
"They don't throw a whole lot of new things at us, we know what to expect. We know it's going to be a tough ballgame. We've got to put it all on the line, play hard and fired up."

The Wildcats have a 5-3 edge over the Jayhawks in Big Eight postseason tournament play, including a 69-54 win in the semi-finals last year.

This is the third first-round meeting between the teams. K-State won in 1982, 74-62 in Manhattan, and Kansas won 74-51 in 1986 in Kemper. Both met in the finals two consecutive years, with K-State winning in 1980 and KU in 1981.

In the afternoon games, Oklahoma State will meet Iowa State at 12:10, and Oklahoma plays Colorado at 2:20. In the other game tonight, Missouri matches up with Nebraska at 6:10.

The semi-finals will be Saturday at 1:10 p.m and 3:20 p.m., with the championship game Sunday at 3:10 p.m.



Oklahoma is the top seed in the tournament by virtue of its regular season championship, and Missouri is second. The two are considered the favorites to advance to Sunday's finals.

"I think without any question Oklahoma has earned that tag," Kruger said.

The No. 1 seed has won seven of the previous 12 tournaments and four in a row. The top seed has reached the finals in each of the last seven years.

Wildcats in Fresno tourney

By The Collegian Staff

K-State's baseball team will be on a little spring break of its own starting today and continuing into next week when the Wildcats head for the West Coast to meet Big West Conference member San Jose State.

The 'Cats will follow that with a game Saturday at San Francisco, a member of the West Coast Athletic Conference. The Dons' record is 2-13 for the season.

K-State will then move on to the Best of the West Tournament in Fresno, Calif., Monday. Seven teams will compete in the tournament, including host Fresno State from the Big West Conference; North Carolina from the Atlantic Coast Conference; Virginia Tech from the Metro Conference; Liberty University from Lynchburg, Va; U.S. International, located in San Diego; and Washington State from the Pacific Ten Conference.

The tournament is split up into two divisions. Washington State, U.S. International, North Carolina and K-State constitute one division with Fresno State, Virginia Tech and Liberty in the other. The teams will meet in intradivision play Monday through Wednesday.

The 'Cats will play the 2-2 Washington State Cougars on Monday at 1 p.m. "Collegiate Baseball" magazine ranked the Cougars 25th in the nation.

On Tuesday, K-State will meet U.S. International, which has an 8-12 record entering the tourney. The 'Cats will face North Carolina Wednesday, the Tar Heels record stands at 5-2 going in.

Interdivision play begins on Thursday and concludes with the championship game Saturday. Fresno State, with a 12-7 record, appears to be the best team outside of K-State's division. The team is ranked 21st by Collegiate Baseball.

Tennis squad begins Sunshine state tour

By Carolyn Holcroft
Sports Writer

Some K-Staters will be traveling to Florida for spring break this year to bask in the sun on warm ... tennis courts. But it won't be all play for the women's tennis squad as the members begin what is probably their most intense week of the season.

The tour opens Sunday morning against Jacksonville, defeated last year by the Wildcats in a 5-4 match. Continuing Sunday afternoon, the squad will play Memphis State, who lost to the 'Cats 5-4 a year ago.

"We have pretty close competition with those two teams and I expect them both to be good," K-State coach Steve Bietau said. "Given the fact that we're playing two in one day, I think it's a real tough way to start off the trip."

The 'Cats will take Monday off, and resume play Tuesday against the NAIA defending national champion, Flagler University. Although schools in smaller divisions are usually considered less challenging, Bietau realizes that isn't the case with Flagler.

"When you play a school like Flagler, you can throw out what division they're from," Bietau said, "because they're better than a lot of Division 1 schools."

The team travels to Tallahassee, Fla., to face Florida State Thursday. They were not originally on the schedule and are replacing Florida A&M in the lineup. Bietau said K-State dropped the weakest team from the schedule and added one that may end up the strongest competition of the tour.

Friday, the netters return to Jacksonville, Fla., to face North Florida on its home court. North Florida took second place in the NAIA last year.

"I haven't seen their lineup yet this year, but they're (in the) top three every year," he said. "You just know that you're getting into good competition."

It may seem K-State has booked almost too much strong opposition for a single week. However, Bietau said he hopes it will be a chance to build confidence, while also dismissing any uncertainties individual players might have about their game. Given that almost one-third of the season will be completed during the tour, it is an important opportunity to make progress — and the last chance the squad will have to make any drastic changes before Big Eight play begins April 2 at Missouri.

"I think they've earned the right to play good teams," Bietau said. "Their record has shown that they're capable."

The team is looking to defend a 10-game winning streak, but realizes it has to go into the week with the proper attitude.

"It's an opportunity to hopefully continue the success we've had," he said.

Golfers travel to Florida

By The Collegian Staff

The women's golf squad will finally get to venture out of dreary Brandeberry Indoor Complex, where it has been practicing for most of the semester.

Monday and Tuesday, Coach Russ Bunker and five K-State women will be at the Spring Lake Country Club in Sebring, Fla., for the Northern Illinois Snowbird Classic.

The Wildcat women did take advantage of Wednesday and Thurday's unseasonably warm weather to get in a few practice rounds, but Bunker said they could have used a lot more course work.

"We got out today (Thursday) and yesterday," Bunker said. "But I really can't expect much, although maybe the two days outdoors will work to our advantage."

Most of the other squads in the eight-team tourney have also been practicing indoors and have been unable to get any course work in due to the weather. All of the teams are from the Midwest.

Track team hopes for title

By Chris Hays
Sports Editor

All of the perennial track and field powers will converge on Indianapolis and the NCAA Indoor Championships today. Some of them, however, may get a big surprise from the men clad in purple and white.

"If everyone runs well, we'll be right in there," K-State track coach John Capriotti said. "I definitely think we can finish in the top 10 if we have a good day."

Last year, Arkansas won its fifth straight men's title, edging out Illinois 34-29. That 34-point total is not such a lofty number and if that's what it takes to win the title this year, K-State could be right in the thick of things.

The Wildcats, entering six men in seven events today, have several first-place aspirations.

Ray Hill will lead the K-State title quest. Hill, only a sophomore, came out of the Big Eight Conference indoor meet as the league's fastest man, breaking the conference record in the 55- and 200-meter dashes with times of 6.15 and 21.29 seconds respectively.

Hill goes in with the third fastest time in the 55 meters and Capriotti thinks he has a good chance of winning it.

"Ray is right in there," he said. "He'll be running to win it and he has a shot at it.

Hill will also be competing in the 200 meters.

"I think he has like the eighth or ninth fastest time, but that is very deceiving," Capriotti said. "Most of the other guys qualified on banked tracks, which gives them better times because they can go into the turns full speed. Ray ran his qualifying time on a flat track, so it should be interesting."

Jeff Reynolds may have a shot at winning the 400 meters. Reynolds, whose brother Butch set the world record in the 400 last year, qualified last week at Florida in his first 400-meter race of the season. He was bothered by an illness earlier in the year and did not compete until the Big Eight Indoor two weeks ago.

Reynolds' qualifying time of 46.80 is just .42 seconds slower than the 46.38 qualifying time of Manhattan (N.Y.) University's Bruce Phillip. Phillip is the top returnee from a year ago, when he took third at the NCAA meet in Oklahoma City.

"It's a very, very tough field," Capriotti said, "but Jeff has been there before, he's competed in Europe and he definitely has the bloodlines."

Reynolds will be joined in the 400 by teammate Sean Banks, who was somewhat of a surprise qualifier at the Big Eight meet. Banks was an academic casualty last season, but Capriotti said he has been working hard this year.

K-State's 4x400-meter relay team will have some pretty stiff competition, but Capriotti said the Wildcat quartet of Banks-to-Tyrone Watkins-to-Hill-to-Reynolds should not be overlooked.

"I'd like to see them win it," he said. "There are only seven teams that made the qualifying mark and we are the only team to qualify on a flat track, so we'll be right in there."

The Wildcats' second-leg runner, Watkins, like Reynolds, had been ill early on, but turned in a personal best time at the Big Eight meet and Capriotti said he could have also qualified in the 400 at the conference meet had he been healthy.

Shot putter Dan O'Mara enters competition as one of the top three putters in the country. His best put is 62-5, the best in the conference this season by 3 feet.

O'Mara, a product of Hayden High School in Topeka, was the prep state champion for two straight years, but most schools did not recruit him because of his 205-pound frame — a size that is considered small for a weight man.

"He's come a helluva long way," Capriotti said. "Everyone said he was way too little, too small, not a big-time athlete — everybody but us. Now he goes in as one of the top throwers.

K-State miler Pat Hessini has also qualified for the national meet and may have a big advantage over some of the other milers because he ran on the Hoosier Dome track just last Saturday and set a K-State record with a time of 4:03:03.

On the women's side, K-State will have three entries. One entry, Mark-

In other business, Senate voted to allocate $1,417.50 to the KSU Men's Glee Club to help cover the cost of food and lodging for the group. Men's glee will be attending the Intercollegiate Male Chorus Convention in Los Angeles in April.

The money for this allocation will be taken from the Reserves for Contingencies Account.

A film on South Africa was presented to Senate by the Investment Ad Hoc Committee.

Senate also heard five-minute presentations from seven groups. The purpose of the presentations was to inform the senators of the groups purposes before the allocation process begins on March 30.

problems exist" with conflict of interest and "character integrity," he said.

He said, "I emphasize my strongly held belief that this should not be interpreted as a vote to harm the president," but acknowledged that others saw it that way.

The rejection of Tower marked only the ninth time in history that the Senate has turned down a president's Cabinet nominee, and the first such decision since 1959 when the Senate voted against confirming President Eisenhower's nominee for secretary of commerce, Lewis L. Strauss.

Bush dodged reporters' questions as he departed for a trip to New York, but his press secretary, Marlin Fitzwater, said, "If necessary, we'll come up with a (new) candidate very rapidly."

Names most frequently mentioned in White House speculation as a replacement candidate included Sen. John Warner, R-Va., the ranking GOP member of the Senate Armed Services Committee and a former secretary of the Navy; former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld; former Rep. Jack Edwards, R-Ala.

Brent Scowcroft, the national security adviser, also was mentioned but told reporters "no," he was not in line for the post.

The debate drew to an end with the last handful of uncommitted senators declaring their intentions.

Kassebaum was the only Republican to break ranks with her party.

Area travelers not affected

From Staff and Wire Reports

The Chapter 11 federal bankruptcy filing by Eastern Airlines will not affect many Manhattan residents planning to fly in the near future, according to area travel agencies.

Under the Federal Bankruptcy Act, companies are shielded from creditors while they continue to operate and reorganize their finances. Any reorganization plan is subject to approval by the bankruptcy court and creditors.

In response to Eastern's uncertain future, agents at four Manhattan travel agencies said they have discouraged clients from buying Eastern tickets, and no one has purchased them since Saturday, when the strike began.

"If we had a lot of people with Eastern tickets, it would be worse, but no one has been buying Eastern," said Shirley Bramhall, a travel agent for Kansas State Travel.

"When Braniff went (bankrupt), it was devastating because a lot of people were holding Braniff tickets," Bramhall said. "We don't have that problem this time."

Bramhall said some airlines will honor refundable tickets, but clients with non-refundable tickets and no backup reservations on other airlines will have problems using their tickets.

Bruce Slimmer, an agent with Classic Travel and Tours, said the bankruptcy "doesn't change a lot for us."

"When we organize flights, we protect clients by getting them backup flights on other airlines," Slimmer said. "Right now, we won't run anything with Eastern until this is straightened out."

"This is making the other airlines full because Eastern customers are going elsewhere to fly," he said.

An agent for Creative Travel, who asked not to be indentified, said the agency "has already handled the situation by protecting clients with other flights."

"At this point, we're not offering Eastern tickets and have not sold any since the strike." the agent said.

Although it has filed for bankruptcy, Eastern is allowed to operate and offer flights; however, agents said the company's future is uncertain.

"As far as we're concerned, there is no Eastern Airlines — we have been instructed not to book any more Eastern flights," Bramhall said.

"When something like this happens, it's very confusing for the clients because different agencies and airlines have different policies," she said.

Nancy Dailey, an agent for International Tours of Manhattan, said the agency has been diverting customers to other airlines.

"We have received word (Thursday) that Eastern is still offering flights, but we haven't been selling its tickets since the strike," Dailey said.

"Basically, this is up in the air until we find out about the future of Eastern," Slimmer said.

Two-time Big Eight 55-meter hurdles champion Kim Kilpatrick probably has the best shot of the other two K-State entries. She enters competition with a Big Eight record time of 7.67.

"I think she has the second or third fastest time going in," Capriotti said. "She'll be trying to win it and she should place high. She's hurdling really well right now. She's come a long way out of Junction City high school."

Freshman high jumper Connie Teaberry will also make the trip to Indianapolis and Capriotti, using this trip as experience for the freshman more than any thing else, is looking for her to show well.

"I'd like to see her get in there and become an all-American," Athletes receive all-American status if they place sixth or above in their respective events.

Bush's judgement on extending the campaign.

"The wise strategy for the Democrats was to play down the question of Tower's drinking and play up the question of the conflicts of interest," she said.

The effects of the defeat could fall two ways, Ambrosius said.

"On one hand, it may make (Congress) take a good hard look at (Bush's programs), and on the other hand, there may be some inclination to make amends. It is possible that there will be an attempt to make amends," she said.

Ambrosius said she didn't think Tower's name should have been put foward.

T. Alden Williams, professor of political science, said the defeat of the nomination was not a "crippling defeat" to the Bush administration.

Williams, who was opposed to the nomination, said the controversy was "a shame for the legislative process."

Speculation has named Sen. John Warner, R-Va., as a possible candidate for the nomination of Secretary of Defense.

Tower's rejection is the ninth time the Senate has turned down a president's Cabinet nominee.

Helicopter crash kills 22 Marines, injures 15

By The Associated Press

SEOUL, South Korea — A U.S. Marine helicopter carrying 37 Marines on maneuvers crashed in an isolated mountain region on South Korea's southeast coast early Monday and 22 were killed, U.S. authorities said.

Fifteen Marines were injured, some critically, when the Sikorsky Sea Stallion crashed shortly before 7 a.m. (5 p.m. EST Sunday) in a rugged mountainous area south of the industrial port city of Pohang, 250 miles southeast of Seoul, a Marine Corps spokesman said.

The most seriously injured were evacuated to an amphibious assault ship off the Korean coast, the USS Belleau Wood, and the rest were flown to Seoul, the spokesman said. Officials said earlier that 34 people were aboard.

No one on the ground was hurt, he said.

Yonhap, the South Korean news agency, said in a report citing South Korean military officials that the helicopter exploded and burst into flames before slamming into the ground. The report said the explosion appeared to have been caused by an engine defect.

It was the second fatal crash involving a Marine helicopter in four days. All four Marines were killed Friday when their CH-46 helicopter crashed in a rice paddy on the east coast.

Marine officials said there was explanation for either crash.

Both helicopters were participating in the annual joint U.S.-South Korea military "Team Spirit" maneuvers which includes 60,000 U.S. troops.

A U.S. military statement said the Sea Stallion, a CH-53D troop transporter, was assigned to the 1st Marine Air Wing, Futenma Marine Corps Air Station, in Okinawa, Japan. It carried a crew of four and 33 military passengers.

Committee stalls on beer sales bill

By Gary Lytle
Collegian Reporter

Senate bill 93, which would allow grocery and convenience stores to sell beer which contains 5 percent alcohol by volume or less, may never make it out of the Federal and State Affairs committee.

"We have had the hearings on (Senate bill 93), it is in committee and no one is making any actions to get it out of there," said Lynn McVay, an aide to Sen. Edward Reilly who is the chairman of the Federal and State Affairs committee.

If the bill is not out of committee by April 9, the end of the legislative session, it will be carried over to next year. Then, if no action is taken, it will be dropped from the agenda, McVay said.

Since the bill could hurt liquor stores' business, there is a good chance it will die in committee, McVay said.

"We think it will probably run us out of business," said Pat Oppitz, president of the Kansas Retail Liquor Dealers. "The big grocery stores can buy (beer) in such large quantities that they can price us out of business."

Under state laws, liquor stores cannot sell their products below cost, but the grocery stores would be able to price beer below cost, Oppitz said.

"We would have two sets of rules for the same products, which is completely unfair," he said.

"Consumers should have a choice as to where to buy beer," said Frances Kastner, lobbyist for the Kansas Food Dealers Association.

"We are not trying to keep liquor stores from selling any product they now sell," Kastner said.

The public and Legislature are misguided about the difference between cereal malt beverages sold in grocery and convenience stores — containing 3.2 percent alcohol by volume or less — and beer sold in liquor stores, Kastner said.

Kastner cited a 1986 Kansas Bureau of Investigations survey of the alcoholic content of cereal malt beverages and liquor store beer as proof that almost no significant difference exists between the two types.

The survey showed Bud Light sold in groceries and convenience stores contains 2.8 percent alcohol and Bud Light sold in liquor stores contains 3.5 percent. Busch beer sold in grocery stores contains 3.2 percent alcohol whereas Busch beer sold in liquor stores contains 3.9 percent. The alcoholic content of Coors beer sold in groceries is 3.2 percent and the same brand sold in liquor stores is 3.8 percent.

Another problem for liquor store owners is that the bill allows the grocery and convenience stores that sell beer to come under the jurisdiction and licensing of local authorities, Oppitz said.

Liquor stores in Kansas are under the jurisdiction of the Alcoholic Beverage Control division of the Department of Revenue.

"They did not wish to be monitored by the state and they did not wish to be licensed by the state. They wanted to sell the stronger beer, but they wanted to buy their license locally and be under the jurisdiction of local police," Oppitz said.

Many liquor store clerks have been fined and the store they work for temporarily shut down for violating liquor laws, especially laws prohibiting selling liquor to minors, she said.

However, Oppitz knew of no grocery or convenience stores that had been shut down for selling beer to minors.

"It makes no difference to us if we come under the jurisdiction from the ABC or local authorities," Kastner said. "I think our grocers are very good about checking identification."

Violence marks election of El Salvador's president

By The Associated Press

SAN SALVADOR, El Salvador — Right-wing candidate Alfredo Cristiana said late Sunday he is winning El Salvador's presidential election. A boycott by leftist rebels and sporadic gunfights between guerrillas and troops trimmed the voter turnout.

Six soldiers and 23 rebels were killed in scattered battles, according to Col. Emilio Ponce, head of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Two Salvadoran journalists and a Dutch television cameraman also were reported killed — one during a firefight at a rebel-held town and the others at military checkpoints.

Cristiani, the candidate of the Republican Nationalist Alliance, or Arena, told a news conference, "At this point we have obtained 54 percent of the vote in the elections throughout the country."

He said that according to computer projections his party would receive 75 percent of the vote.

"This means that if the trend is maintained we will win in the first round," he said.

San Salvador's Channel 12 television station said unofficial results from 56 percent of San Salvador's ballot boxes gave Cristiani 62 percent of the vote in the capital.

Pre-election polls had indicated Cristiani would defeat Fidel Chavez Mena, the candidate of the incumbent Christian Democrats.

If no candidate wins more than 50 percent of the vote, the top two will be in a runoff election in April.

Polls closed at 5 p.m. and election officials said initial official results were expected early today.

There was no official word on voter turnout, but a spot check by The Associated Press at several polling places in downtown San Salvador showed between 55-65 percent of those registered had cast ballots.

Nineteen towns in the north did not set up voting stations because election officials deemed those rebel-held zones too dangerous.

Ricardo Perdomo, chairman of the Central Elections Council, said preliminary results would be available early today. Rebel sabotage to telephone lines and electricity, which has cut or restricted power to 80 percent of the country, were likely to slow the vote count.

The rebels called a boycott of the election and last week declared a transport ban that has paralyzed bus and truck traffic in most of the country.

In San Sebastian, 30 miles east of the capital, turnout was light.

Early voter turnout appeared diminished by the combat and a rebel-imposed transport ban. But Roman Catholic churches were crowded with Palm Sunday worshipers, at least some of whom planned to vote later. By midday, there were long lines at the downtown polling stations.

"With these problems, it's better to stay home," said Jose Carlos Ortiz, 23. He spoke in front of his home in the capital as guerrillas retreated from an assault on a military post three blocks away.

Sporadic rifle fire echoed from the slope of the Guazapa volcano north of the capital, a guerrilla stronghold, as troops from the army's elite Bracamonte battalion pursued the insurgents. Two air force helicopters raced toward the volcano and fired rockets into the mountainside.

Guerrillas of the Farabundo Marti National Liberation Front are waging a 9-year-old war against the U.S-backed government.

Senate members visit capitol to voice students' concerns

By Nancy Hill
City Editor

While many students spent spring break skiing or sunning, Student Body President Laurian Cuffy and Student Senate Chairman Todd Johnson were visiting Kansas legislators and the Office of National Service in Washington, D.C.

Cuffy and Johnson were part of a 14-member Associated Students of Kansas delegation lobbying for concerns such as the growing gap between the increase in tuition and the lack of financial assistance for students, Cuffy said.

"Federal, state and institution financial aid has increased 23 percent between 1980-1986," Johnson said. "During that same time at K-State our consumer price index has increased 34.4 percent and tuition has increased close to 100 percent.

"The people we talked to agreed financial aid was not the place to cut. The general opinion is that funding will remain about the same, but money may shift (to different programs)."

Cuffy said the effects of the lobbying efforts may not produce immediate results.

"We wanted them (legislators) to know what students are grappling with and some of the innovative programs they are working on," he said.

Cuffy and Johnson met with representatives Jim Slattery, Pat Roberts and Dan Glickman. They also met with administrative aides in the offices of senators Nancy Landon Kassebaum and Bob Dole and representatives Jan Meyers and Bob Whittaker.

Cuffy met members of President Bush's staff in the Office of National Service.

One of the programs ASK delegates were trying to promote was the Youth Education Service. The YES program gives a college student the chance to earn money for higher education by helping tutor and guide "at-risk" students in Kansas school districts.

A college student participating in the program would receive a stipend of approximately $60 a week for tutoring or being a mentor to a youth who may have difficulties learning because of external problems, such as a bad home environment.

"(Legislators) responded really well to the YES program which was instigated by Associated Students of Kansas," Johnson said. "It kills two birds with one stone — placing college students in schools to work with at-risk students and at the same time providing an opportunity for that college student to get a feel for community service and to make money for their education."

Cuffy said the most productive meeting concerning the YES program was with the Office of National Service, where a file for correspondence with K-State was established.

"We got a lot of things started. I think all of our points were heard, but you never know," Johnson said. "Everyone understood the concerns of college students and encouraged us to continue writing our legislators."

Cuffy said he also felt the similarities between the national government structure and the student government structure were "remarkable."

"Students need to get involved in SGA — it is so similiar to what happens in the real world," Cuffy said.

Moderate quake hits Alaska

WASHINGTON — A moderate earthquake measured at 5.3 on the Richter scale shook a large area of Alaska on Sunday, the U.S. Geological Survey reported.

The tremor was centered in southern Alaska just west of Cook Inlet about 170 miles southwest of Anchorage, said Geological Survey spokesman Don Finley.

Geological Survey earthquake monitors in Golden, Colo., recorded the quake at a preliminary magnitude of 5.3 on the Richter scale. Finley said the tremor was reported felt in Anchorage, Palmer, Kodiak, Eagle River and Soldotna.

The earthquake occurred at 4:07 p.m. Alaska Standard Time, or 8:07 p.m. EST.

No information on damage was immediately available, Finley said.

Average price of gas up

LOS ANGELES — The average price of gasoline topped off over the dollar mark for the second time this month, an industry analyst said Sunday.

On Friday, the national average price of gasoline for the past two weeks was 100.37 cents a gallon, including all grades, types of service and taxes, said Analyst Trilby Lundberg.

The jump reflects a month-long trend in increases at the pump and the result of rising wholesale prices. According to the recent nationwide survey, the retail price of gasoline was up 1.05 cents a gallon since March 3, Lundberg said.

A rise in both crude oil and refined products caused wholesalers to raise prices, which in turn caused retailers to pass the increase on to customers, she added.

Self-service prices on Friday were 90.09 cents per gallon for regular unleaded, 106.24 for premium unleaded, and 87.72 for regular leaded.

Full-service prices were 118.72 cents per gallon for regular unleaded, 130.08 for premium unleaded and 115.13 for regular leaded.

Mission causes minor damage

EDWARDS AIR FORCE BASE, Calif. — Discovery returned from its five-day mission in what appeared to be the best condition of any space shuttle, with only minor damage to its protective tiles, NASA officials said Sunday.

A preliminary examination indicated only 10 thermal protection tiles will need to be replaced, in contrast to the last shuttle flight in December when nearly 200 tiles were severely damaged. In addition, the tires, brakes and engines that troubled some previous missions performed well.

"We need to go back and look (at mission records) but I doubt if we could even find one that looks this good," said Discovery Flow Director Tip Talone, who coordinates processing of the orbiter for each flight.

A day after landing, Discovery underwent processing at the National Aeronautics and Space Administration's facility as 28 mph winds, with gusts over 43 mph, churned dust clouds across Rogers Dry Lake, slightly hampering work on the shuttle.

Talone, however, expected Discovery to leave on time for its ferry flight to Florida Friday morning.

Fires, explosions hit oil rigs

NEW ORLEANS — Fires and explosions hit two oil drilling platforms off the southeast Louisiana coast Sunday night, and 25 to 20 crewmen were evacuated, the Coast Guard said.

Lt. Bob Carson, a Coast Guard spokesman at New Orleans, said there were "preliminary reports of some injuries, but no immediate reports of any fatalities."

Coast Guard and civilian helicopters joined in evacuating the crewmen, he said.

Both rigs are in the Gulf of Mexico about four miles south of the mouth of the Mississippi River or about 100 miles southeast of New Orleans.

Soviets threaten strike

MOSCOW — Thousands of Soviets took to the streets Sunday to accuse the Communist Party of sabotaging Boris N. Yeltsin's election campaign and to threaten a general strike if the maverick reformer fails to win office.

The march through downtown Moscow by 3,000 Soviets chanting "Hands off Yeltsin!" was an extraordinary outburst of passions aroused by Sunday's election for a new national parliament, the Congress of People's Deputies.

Police and KGB agents along the route channeled the marchers, but made no attempt to halt them, even though their protest violated Moscow city regulations that require seven days' notice of any demonstration.

Yeltsin, 58, is running to represent the Soviet capital, where he headed the local party apparatus for almost two years before President Mikhail S. Gorbachev fired him.

Suspect found in bombing

LONDON — A British weekly reported Sunday that the man who made the bomb that blew up Pan Am Flight 103 and plotted the attack is a Libyan known to international security officials as "The Professor" because of his experience with explosives.

The Sunday Express attributed its information to unidentified detectives. It did not identify the suspect by name.

The Express also said a Lebanese student, 21-year-old Khalid Jaafar, of Dearborn, Mich., unwittingly carried the bomb onto the flight in a radio-cassette player given to him as a gift, but it did not say who gave it to him.

Investigators have said the bomb that blew up Flight 103 over Lockerbie, Scotland on Dec. 21, killing 270 people while flying from London to New York, was hidden in a radio-cassette player.

Earlier news reports in the United States and London have quoted unidentified sources as saying Jaafar may have carried the bomb aboard without knowing it when he boarded Flight 103 in Frankfurt, West Germany. The FBI has questioned his father, Nazir, who has denied those reports.

The flight originated in Frankfurt, then changed planes in London for the flight to New York.

The Sunday Express said the "Professor" flew to Bonn, West Germany from Greece on Dec. 13, eight days before the bombing.

The report said the "Professor" trained as a member of an elite squad in the Libyan army in the 1960s.

Eastern Airlines begins search for replacements

By The Associated Press

MIAMI — Eastern Airlines went shopping Sunday for the new pilots it needs to survive a crippling strike now in its third week.

"We've waited patiently for the pilots union to come to its senses," Eastern spokesman Robin Matell said as an advertisement was run in Sunday's Miami Herald appealing for pilots to "be part of the new Eastern."

The ads will begin running Tuesday in other major newspapers across the country, Matell said.

The ads promise an "outstanding opportunity for the very best," and try to put the best light on the strike, telling pilots to "also understand that this is an unprecedented opportunity for growth and success."

Matell said Eastern is not lowering its requirements for experience and is offering the same wages and benefits that pilots have been getting under Eastern's contract with the Air Line Pilots Association.

Only about 200 of 3,600 Eastern pilots have crossed picket lines in the Machinists union strike that began March 4, and Eastern acknowledged earlier it will live or die on its number of pilots. Eastern is operating under 10 percent of its pre-strike schedule of 1,040 daily flights.

It takes at least six weeks to train a pilot who is new to an airline, and Eastern — whose daily losses are in the millions — may run out of cash within a few months. On March 9, the airline filed for protection from creditors under Chapter 11 of federal bankruptcy law, and insists it will keep flying with a smaller, cost-effective operation.

Pilots union spokesman J.B. Stokes said the advertisements are aimed as much at picketing pilots as at new hires.

"It's twofold," Stokes said. "They want to test the marketplace, and they also want to try to frighten our pilots into thinking they're being replaced. They should have learned by now that intimidation isn't going to work."

"They're going to be disappointed," Stokes predicted. "There isn't a pool of pilots out there."

Stokes said other major carriers are hiring pilots and offer better working conditions and long-term stability.

Matell said Stokes was engaging in "ALPA propaganda." He said Eastern had received more than 100 unsolicited resumes from qualified pilots before the ads began running.

Eastern reported light loads on its Northeast shuttle flights Saturday and Sunday. Fares were back to the normal $69 weekend rate after the previous weekend's promotional $12 fare helped Eastern pack about 62 flights daily between New York, Boston and Washington. Some passengers got stranded at airports last weekend because return flights were sold out.

Matell said Eastern was encouraged by last week's weekday shuttle service — offered at a discount $49 a ride — because it attracted many of the business people who most frequently use the shuttle. The weekday rates return to their normal $99 this week.

Matell added that Eastern's Latin American routes are seeing steadily increasing loads.

He declined to comment on a threat Saturday by Teamsters union leader William F. Genoese to organize a sympathy walkout at Pan American World Airways concentrating on the Pan Am Northeast shuttle.

Custodians' actions reviewed

By Deborah Dinges
Collegian Reporter

A complaint about Throckmorton Hall being unclean and custodial workers sleeping at work prompted Alvin Seely, custodial manager, to review the actions of custodial workers assigned to the building.

Michael Champoux, graduate student in agronomy, complained to facilities management that Throckmorton was not being cleaned adequately and workers were sleeping on the job in lobbies, custodial closets and the student lounge.

"Unswept floors aren't the biggest crime in the world, but it's the sleeping," Champoux said. "It's incredible the amount of time they spend sleeping. I can't believe they accept pay."

After checking into several complaints concerning the building's cleanliness, Seely said he found considerable improvement needed. Two training assistants worked three workdays to catch up on the cleaning.

The backlog of cleaning was due to a shortage of custodial workers in the four-building complex, he said.

"Somebody made the decision to shortchange those people," said Jack Watson, assistant director of facilities maintenance.

Since Champoux's complaint, one person was added to the complex staff and one employee who was sick is back working, Watson said.

"I don't want to throw a bad light on Seely," Champoux said. "I was pleased with his response. (Throckmorton) is more clean."

Champoux said he is displeased with the problem of workers sleeping on the job.

"The sleeping has not changed," he said.

Watson said he is not aware of the sleeping.

Seely said that since Feb. 20, when he became custodial manager, he has received one complaint about workers sleeping at work and has been observing the situation closely.

"I've observed nothing of that behavior," Seely said, adding that workers can sleep on their breaks but he hasn't noticed that either.

"Anybody who spends time in this building knows about it," Champoux said.

Two other building users, who did not want to be identified, said custodial workers sleeping at work is a common occurrence.

In evaluating this complaint, Seely has asked other building users if they have similar complaints, Watson said. They did not report sleeping on the job.

In further efforts, Seely has periodically checked Throckmorton at the beginning of the day and after the worker's lunch break to see if all employees were working.

"Everybody was present and accounted for," Watson said.

Throckmorton was one of the complexes to be affected by the custodial workers' schedule change, Seely said. Employees are now coming to work at 4 a.m., two hours earlier than before.

"There are profound changes when you move shifts around," Seely said.

Facilities management is reviewing the schedule change. Seely said he hopes to make a recommendation concerning the schedule to Watson by next week.

The complaints were brought to Seely's attention Feb. 20 when he began the position. From Oct. 24 through January, Reba Snavely held the position.

Snavely said the custodial area is always understaffed because of high turnover rates. She could not recall any complaints concerning sleeping on the job or the building being unclean during her time in the department.

Throckmorton does not have a break room for custodial workers, said Walter Cole, custodial worker. A small room with a desk on second floor comes closest to being a break room, Seely said. There is a break room in Ackert hall for the custodial workers.

Cole said he has the right to take one or all of his three breaks anywhere in the building.

"That's our business," Cole said.

If workers are busy with a project at the prescribed break time, they can take their break at other times, he said.

"If they're sitting down and supposed to be working, then it's a different story," Cole said.

Foundation breaks contributions record by $3 million

By Angie Smith
Collegian Reporter

The KSU Foundation received a record total of more than $12.5 million in cash gifts for fiscal 1988 which exceeds 1987's total by $3 million, said Les Longberg, Foundation controller.

"It was a fantastic year," Longberg said. "In 1988 we received the largest contributions in the history of contributions. In 1988, $2.3 million went to students in scholarships and other student awards."

According to figures in the Foundation's annual report, more than 25 percent of the alumni made donations, totaling more than $5 million. Other contributions came from corporations, foundations, estates and other groups.

"We are proud of K-State's high percent of alumni support," Longberg said. "Friendships that develop with professors and other students at K-State last forever."

The entire University benefits from the contributions, he said. More than 95 percent are designated for specific colleges or scholarship funds.

"We wish that more donations were not designated," Longberg said. "Donations not designated go to scholarships for students, special requests which arise during the year such as a library's request for special books, improvements in K-State's art collection, and money to support operations of the Foundation."

Art Loub, Foundation president, said the financial support gives K-State statewide visibility.

"We enjoy the support from our alumni and believe that this support is a reflection on how well K-State is doing," Loub said.

Included in the contributions was a bequest in the will of Eddie Coleman, a K-State graduate in the College of Veterinary Medicine. Coleman became a plant manager for General Electric in Phoenix, Ariz. In 1983, he returned to K-State to work as a volunteer for veterinary medicine research.

Coleman emphasized charitable giving by donating time and money to the college, Longberg said. The bequest created a $1 million professorship for the College of Veterinary Medicine, which provides income to finance salary and research funding for a professor.

The Walter and Evan Jones Trust Fund in Emporia also provided a professorship endowment of $3,000 to the college.

"The trust was developed in honor of two deceased ranchers about 10 years ago, but this was their first major contribution to K-State," Longberg said.

A gift in honor of K-State alumni Charles and Nona Frankenhoff provided a $500,000 professorship to the College of Engineering, a $250,000 donation to the Frankenhoff scholarship benefiting students in the College of Engineering, and a $25,000 contribution in support of an outstanding faculty award.

Longberg said the increase in donations is carrying over to this year.

"We already received some significant donations for fiscal year 1989 and are on a pace to equal 1988's total," he said. "The support is amazing."

People from Kansas afraid to merge

Commentary

Chad L. Sanborn
Collegian Columnist

"People from Kansas are afraid to merge."

The cab driver, an Irish donkey, says this to me as he takes me on the scenic route from the airport through Boston. I light a cigarette and realize I'm not sure what he means.

He babbles on about Wade Boggs and some bimbo, but I can't concentrate on his words, just as he seems unable to concentrate on driving. All I can think about, over and over, is what he said: "People from Kansas are afraid to merge."

It's about 90 minutes later and I'm in one of the city's newer, hipper clubs wearing somebody else's clothes because the airline lost my luggage. But I look good and the drinks are strong, so everything is OK.

The DJ is providing seamless mixes between industrial and hip-hop. I feel like I'm in a bad Twilight Zone episode — I can't tell when one song ends and another begins. I just don't know when or how to stop dancing.

Now I'm talking to this girl. I can't remember her name, but I buy her a screwdriver, anyway. She is an economics major at some lesbian private school. I wonder what she looks like without her clothes on. Probably just naked.

We're dancing now to a remake or remix of an old Joy Division song. She moves OK, but I'm better. At least I believe I'm better. Suddenly she starts doing a variation of the three-toed Mexican-hat dance, a rapid succession of steps that, when done correctly, form a crucifix. She doesn't make the crucifix, but she does fall down. I leave, unable to deal with it.

It's early morning, and I wake up sweating from a dream. It had something to do with me, about 4 years old, and my family sitting around the dinner table. I tell everybody to shut their eyes and do what I say. They shut their eyes and I say, "OK, everybody bleed," and they do. The blood squirts out of their eyes and ears, all over the steaming meatloaf. They won't stop bleeding and they can't see or hear me crying because the blood is clogging up their orifices.

It's over. I'm awake now. I search the medicine cabinet for some Valium, but Kelly — my friend whose couch I'm crashing on — is fresh out. I smoke a cigarette and go back to sleep.

Later, after Kelly leaves for work, I get up, eat some Chilean grapes and get dressed. He lives in the Italian north end of Boston, so I eat lunch at a Chinese restaurant because it seems like the thing to do. I order some wormy, chow mein gunk, but don't eat much of it.

I just sit there in the corner of the restaurant wearing my sunglasses, chain smoking cigarettes, watching these strange people and thinking: "People from Kansas are afraid to merge."

Now I'm sitting in my first of several job interviews. I arrived early but the human resources recruiter interviewing me made me wait more than half an hour, so I'm not in the best frame of mind.

I know I don't want to work at this multi-layered corporation, so I leave my sunglasses on for the duration. The interview is worthless, except for experience purposes.

I look at the interviewer and realize I need a cigarette. She is short, with brown, curly hair and soft, dark eyes. I'm thinking that underneath all her clothes she is probably naked. But I realize that I am too. Everyone is. I leave.

Walking to the subway, a bum accosts me for 25 cents. I keep my head down and ignore him. After I pass by, he makes a curt comment, something about my mother being a Labrador.

I turn around laughing, ready to give him money, but I stop once I see he is wearing shoes exactly like mine, only different. They are old and scuffed and have dried blood on them. I turn around and walk away, because I just don't know when or how to stop dancing.

The whole episode reminds me of another bum encounter.

Kelly and I were at an ATM late one night, and two bums were holed up in there. This one bum is being really funny, while the other one is just staring out the window. I ask the funny one his name and he says "John Wayne." I tell him I'm Ronald Reagan and he says, "Don't say that. My friend over there is Michael Dukakis." At which point the other bum looks away from the window and at me, and says, deadpan, "I haven't been the same since I lost the election."

I'm at some college dive now, listening to a terrible band play an unflattering cover of Todd Rundgren's "Bang the Drum" and I'm talking to a Boston native:

"Whay ya from?" he says.

"Kansas," I reply, lighting a cigarette, naked underneath my clothes.

"Whay? Kansas? Do you know Doorathy and that dog, uh, Mojo?" he says, laughing until he takes a drink of his Guiness and starts to choke.

"You're so witty," I say, blowing smoke in his face.

The week goes much the same: interviews, parties and cigarettes. Too bad it's over so soon. Time to click my heels three times and think, "There's no place like home."

I'm in a cab on the way to the airport now, leaving town. I'm reflecting on the high and low points of the week and dreading getting back to Kansas. Up ahead, I see a little boy standing alone on the corner, crying. I start to feel sorry for him. As the cab passes by the boy, he sees me looking at him. Defiantly, he sticks his tongue out at me.

"People from Kansas are afraid to merge."

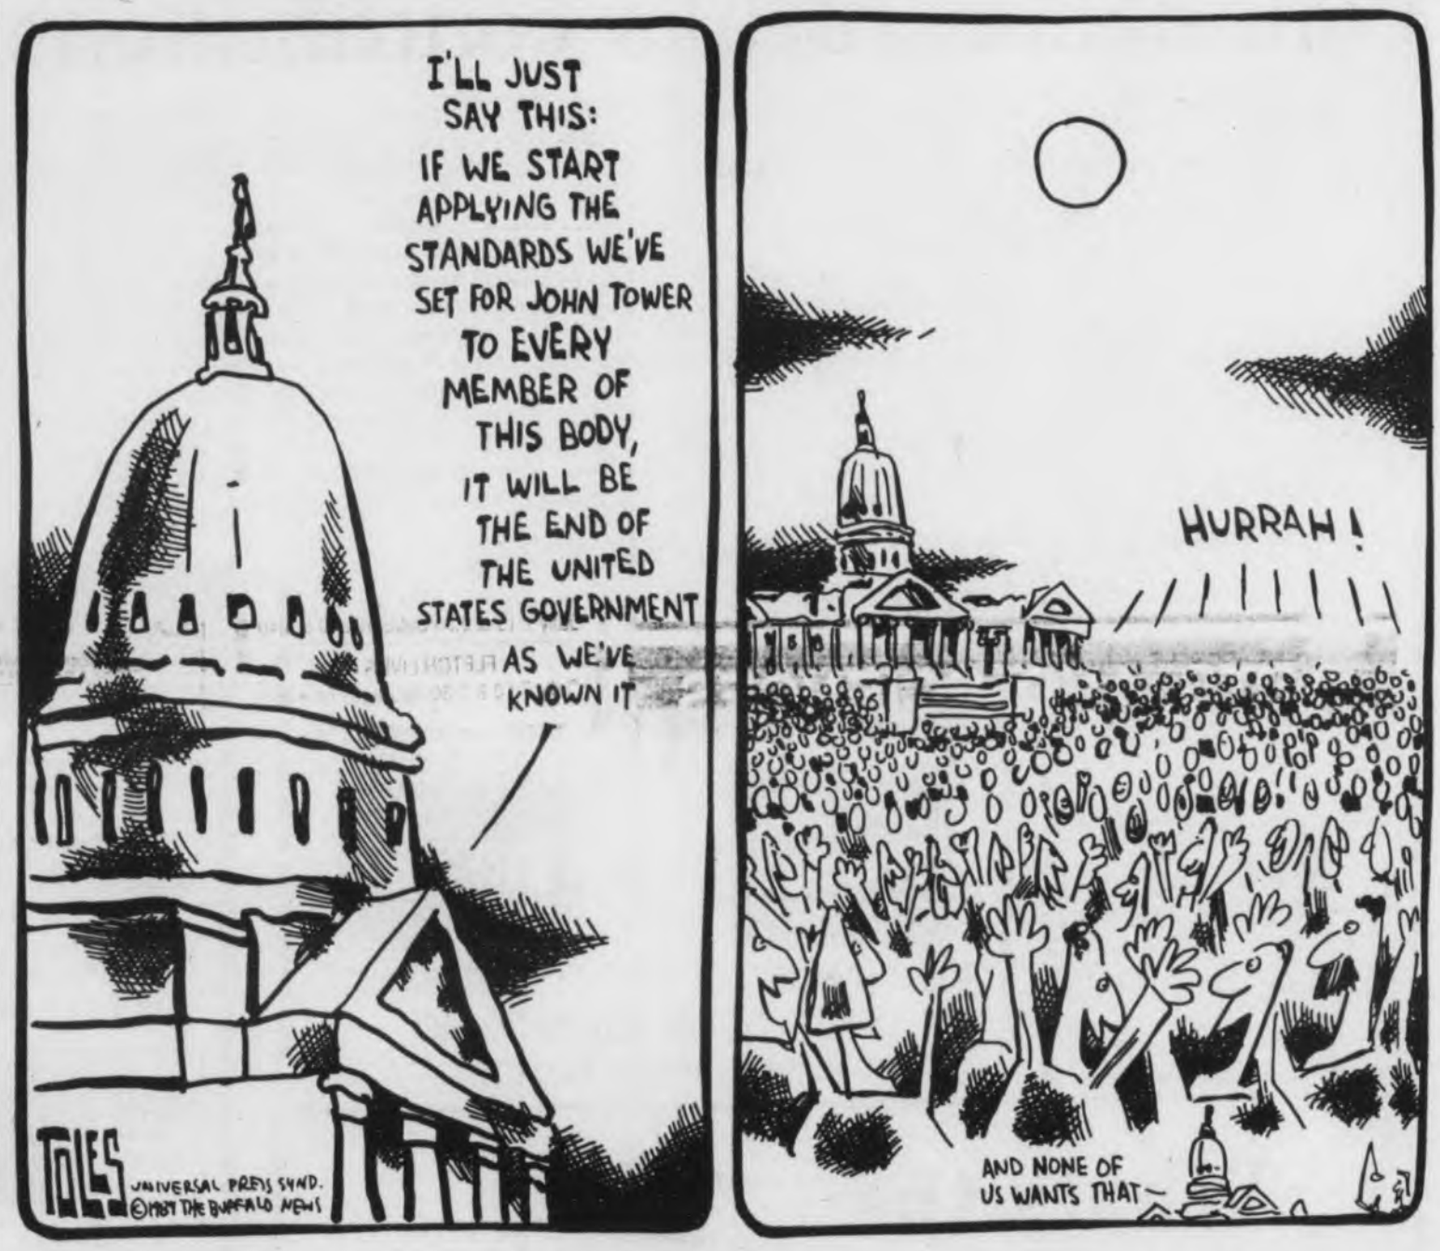
Cheney's confirmation ends Senate debate

In the finest tradition of P. T. Barnum, the entire nation has been tantalized and teased with glimpses of the Secretary of Defense-designate.

Never ones to let the show get stale, the committee members constantly entertained the bright-eyed, concerned constituents with tales of boozing and horrified them with accounts of the nominee's womanizing.

Yet despite the show being held over for six weeks of madcap debate, finally enough was enough, and the show ended its extended run by finally ushering John Tower from the wings of the stage of Secretary of Defense.

It's about time, but it's also quite a let-down.



However, the show must go on, and without even missing a beat, the new star of the show, Dick Cheney, has stepped in to fill his shoes.

But a very boring star he is.

In only a week he has already gained the support of the Armed Services Committee, and without even a decent scandal to attract public interest and boost his ratings.

The speed at which Cheney has been confirmed for the position seems anti-climatic after the stormy Tower debate. If Cheney is such an excellent nominee, as he certainly seems to be, one has to wonder why he wasn't chosen in the first place instead of Tower so that Bush's administration could get on with its duties of running the country. Instead, Bush has faced a public defeat at the hands of Congress, as well as creating a national spectacle.

Nevertheless, despite the past controversy and confusion, the nation can only welcome the final act of the Secretary of Defense show. A show which cost the nation unknown amounts in time and money, as well as compromising the authority of the new president.

Bailout heist

Editor,

Cost of the savings and loan bailout is now estimated at $126.2 billion and climbing. Greed, corruption and mismanagement are blamed for 70 percent to 80 percent of the savings and loan failures.

But under the Reagan-Bush administration, the Justice department delayed investigation of white-collar crimes until the FBI now has a backlog of more than 3,000 bank fraud cases. Most are years old and will never come to court.

Even when a conviction is obtained, the penalties are absurdly light. One New York banker, convicted of embezzling $6 million, was sentenced to 42 months of probation and fined $100,000. That looks to me like a profit of $5.9 million for the crook.

Why not finance the bailout by recovering the stolen assets? We confiscate the property of drug dealers — cars, houses, boats, jewelry, cash, etc.

To allow stolen wealth to remain in the hands of white-collar crooks while the taxpayer makes up the losses is the same as agreeing to a massive re-distribution of wealth into the hands of the rich.

Anyone who proposed handing $126.2 billion in cash to the poor would be branded a communist. What do we call the reverse? Fascism (the Nazi system) holds that only an elite is fit to govern. Re-distributing the wealth into the hands of the elite helps consolidate their power while the ordinary citizen is distracted by a shell game of fear and hatred for minorities, crime, drugs, AIDS, communists, or whatever triggers his panic button.

Wake up, America! The bailout is the biggest heist in history, and in September, when the Omnibus Drug Law goes into effect, police will be granted Gestapo-like powers. A Nazi elite class could hire a lot of Gestapo muscle for $126.2 billion.

Bloodmobile thanks

Editor,

On behalf of the American Red Cross, I would like to express my sincere appreciation and thanks to the many K-State students, faculty, staff and community volunteers who participated in the recent K-State Bloodmobile drive Feb. 21-24.

Through the generous efforts of these individuals, 1,200 units of blood were collected that will make a substantial contribution to blood collections in the Wichita region.

K-State can be proud that it remains the leader in the blood collection drives in the entire state of Kansas and northern Oklahoma.

For this I thank each and every one of you.

Bar discriminates

Editor,

I am a 1985 graduate of K-State and currently reside in Kansas City. I came home to visit my family and friends in Junction City this past weekend and decided to make the rounds of Aggieville on Saturday night. I had not been to Manhattan in quite a while and was looking forward to it.

To my surprise, I found many things have changed. Not just physical changes, but attitudes as well.

I have always considered Manhattan and K-State conservative and a little prejudiced, but I hadn't realized how much until now.

Upon entering Brother's Tavern, the doorman informed my brother, friends and myself that we couldn't enter without a student ID. It was bad enough that those with me couldn't get in, but I am a K-State alumnus!

I am sure there's probably some kind of loophole that says they have the right to refuse service to anyone, but regardless of who they can and can't allow in legally, I felt very angry and disgusted. Being a white male, I don't encounter prejudice and discrimination very often, and it was quite a humbling experience.

I don't think I will be returning to Aggieville any time soon.

Research on fat content begins; tailored meat products to result

By Linda Kleiner
Collegian Reporter

The animal sciences and industry department has begun research on developing meat products tailored to a public demand for lower fat content in meat.

Fat plays an important role in the taste and texture of any food, whether it is bread or meat, said Melvin Hunt, professor of animal science and industry.

"Most calories in food come from the fat content," he said.

The reason for adding so much fat to hamburger is "historically, it has been done for many years," Hunt said. "People like the flavor, and 20 years ago people could use those calories because they were burning them up."

"Now, everybody is health conscious," Suzanne Hurt, graduate student in meat science. "The consumer is scared to eat fat."

Hurt is researching ground beef, and Jim Claus, graduate student in food science, is researching sausage, attempting to lower the fat content while maintaining the flavor, color, and texture at an economical price, Hunt said.

The National Livestock and Meat Board is funding the project with $20,980, which is provided by the beef check-off dollars program, Hunt said.

The beef check-off allows beef owners to contribute $1 per head of livestock marketed, he said. The money collected is used for research and promotion of beef products.

Researchers will analyze the precooking and microwave heating effects of meats with lower fat content, Hunt said.

Removing fat from hamburger changes the texture and sensorial properties of the product, he said.

"When taking fat out of hamburger, it gets tough, rubbery, dry and is much easier to overcook," Hunt said.

Different processing techniques, such as grinding and flaking, are some of the techniques being researched to alter the texture of the product, Hurt said.

Another approach to change the meat texture is adding a food-approved textural modifying agent —potato chips, rice or a low calorie fat replacer, Hunt said.

The modifying agent provides fewer calories than fat but adds similar texture to the product, Hurt said.

By adding agents to ground beef products, the public can benefit from a product with dietary fiber and low calories, Hunt said.

"Lean meat with very little fat still contains cholesterol because it is an inherent part of the structural components of the cell," he said.

"No matter whether it is swine, lamb, beef or fish, the cholesterol is there," Hurt said.

Many people think poultry has less cholesterol. In fact, chicken eaten with the skin is higher in cholesterol than beef, lamb or pork products, Hunt said.

To test the beef products' palatability with different levels of fat, the products will be presented before a taste panel of professionals from the meat science department and the foods and nutrition department, followed by a presentation to a consumer taste panel, Hurt said.

The meat specialists will evaluate the characteristics of the meat, while the consumer panel will judge which low-fat level meat it prefers, she said.

As part of the evaluation, a mechanical sheer force test will be performed to determine tenderness of the product, Hurt said.

In this test, the meat products are twisted, turned and broken to mechanically record the structural changes in the meat, Hunt said.

Hurt and Hunt will relate the test results to the information collected from the consumer taste panel.

Currently, U.S. Food and Drug Administration regulations allow a maximum of 30 percent fat in fresh-ground hamburger, Hunt said.

Forest Service officials to discuss image problem

By The Associated Press

DENVER — Dozens of U.S. Forest Service public affairs officers, district rangers, forest supervisors and other managers in the Rocky Mountain region are meeting this week to discuss what they say is an image problem.

Forest Service officials worry the agency is perceived as a nameless, faceless and uncaring bureaucracy. They also want to discuss how the Forest Service can handle crises such as last summer's fires at Yellowstone National Park.

The meeting begins Monday in Fort Collins and continues for three days.

The Forest Service has invited the Wilderness Society, a major critic, to join in the discussions.

"We're looking at our image. Obviously we don't know what crisis is going to come, but we know we're certainly going to have some," said Lynn Young, spokesman for the Forest Service's Rocky Mountain region office in Denver.

The Rocky Mountain region covers 22 million acres in Kansas, Colorado, Wyoming, South Dakota and Nebraska. The 1,600 full-time employees manage the land for timber cutting, fishing, hunting, skiing and other uses.

Darrell Knuffke, the central Rockies regional director for the Wilderness Society, will address the gathering in Fort Collins and said he will warn Forest Service officials against "self-censorship."

"It's logical for the manager, particularly at the higher levels, to begin to anticipate the response they will get in Washington," Knuffke said. "So they try to tailor decisions and behavior to stay out of trouble."

The Wilderness Society issues an annual report criticizing the Forest Service for deficit timber sales, overbuilding of roads and underpriced grazing.

K-State guards Steve Henson and LaKeith Humphrey sit on the bench following the 'Cats' 86-75 loss to Minnesota Thursday afternoon in Greensboro, N.C. Henson missed the last free throw he took, which knocked him out of contention for the free throw title this season. If he would have made the free throw, Henson would have had held consecutive titles.

Minnesota ends season for 'Cats

By Tom Morris
Sports Writer

GREENSBORO, N.C. — Every year in the NCAA Postseason Tournament, there is a Richmond, Arkansas-Little Rock or a Pennsylvania.

You know the type — the proverbial underdog, the "dark horse" that isn't supposed to win but ultimately makes a big splash in the field of 64.

Minnesota, making its third appearance ever in the NCAA Tournament, upset the Wildcats, 86-75, Thursday in a first-round East Regional game at the Greensboro Coliseum.

The Golden Gophers entered the game seeded 11th in the East and eventually advanced to the "Sweet 16" with an 80-67 victory Saturday against Siena (N.Y.), which had advanced to the second round by knocking off third-seeded Stanford, 80-78, Thursday.

Minnesota, which had defeated K-State, 72-67, earlier this year at Minneapolis, entered the contest as 4½ -point underdogs.

The Golden Gophers did not arrive in Greensboro until Wednesday afternoon because of a snowstorm in Minneapolis, and were facing a K-State squad that was making its third straight appearance in the NCAAs.

Add to that the fact that Minnesota had won only two games on the road this season.

Were the Golden Gophers intimidated?

Nope.

"We proved to a lot of people that we are a legitimate team," Minnesota coach Clem Haskins said. "Like I said earlier, we didn't come here just to play. We came here to win."

Added Golden Gopher forward Walter Bond, "We got here and I wondered what all the hype was all about. Then when we got on the court, I realized this was just another game. The court was still 50 feet wide by 94 feet long and the basket was still just 10 feet high."

K-State led just twice in the contest, at 2-0 and 4-2, but the Wildcats quickly found themselves trailing by 14, 28-14, with 8:40 left in the first half.

"We proved to a lot of people that we are a legitimate team. Like I said earlier, we didn't come here just to play. We came here to win."
— Clem Haskins
Minnesota coach

"Minnesota controlled and dictated things right from the start," K-State coach Lon Kruger said. "Minnesota was just sharper than we were and got control of things early."

The Golden Gophers led 41-31 at the half after Willie Burton nailed a three-point field goal from the top of the key.

Burton was almost unstoppable, scoring 18 points in the first half. In the earlier matchup against K-State, Burton had just 15 for the entire contest. For the game, the 6-foot-7 junior forward from Detroit had 29 points and was 11-11 from the free throw line.

"We just couldn't handle him," Kruger said.

"He was awesome," Haskins added.

Any chance K-State had of recovering was erased early in the second half, when Minnesota built its lead to 15, 55-40, with 11:59 remaining in the game. The 'Cats mounted a comeback and pulled to within 5, 67-62, with 4:39 left, but Melvin Newbern scored the Golden Gophers' next five points and increased the Minnesota lead to 72-62 with 3:40 remaining. Minnesota's lead dipped to single digits only once from there.

For the game, K-State shot 41.7 percent from the floor (28-67) and made only six of 29 3-point attempts.

Especially sluggish was 'Cat guard Steve Henson. He led K-State with 24 points, but he didn't score until almost 13 minutes had ticked off the clock and was just 8 of 23 from the floor and five of 15 from beyond the arc.

And, like pouring salt in the wound, after missing his final free throw attempt of the day, Henson dropped the NCAA free-throw shooting title to Brigham Young's Michael Smith. Henson finished the season at 92 percent (92-100), while Smith ended at 92.5 (160-173).

"It seemed like I never did get into any kind of rhythm," Henson said. "If I was open from 15 feet, I was shooting the ball 16."

K-State finished the season at 19-11 and the loss marks the first time the Wildcats have ever lost a first round NCAA game.

Late shot big blow in loss

By Tom Morris
Sports Writer

GREENSBORO, N.C. — Any chance K-State had of extending its NCAA postseason hopes disappeared with 4:01 left in its first-round East Regional game against Minnesota.

The Wildcats, who trailed by as many as 15 points earlier in the game, were able to cut the Golden Gophers' lead to 5 points, 67-62, thanks largely to a pressure defense that was extended the full length of the court.

On the ensuing inbounds play, Minnesota's Ray Gaffney fell while trying to receive the pass and the ball went downcourt under K-State's basket. Gaffney got up and retrieved the ball, but an official ruled it as a backcourt violation.

While the 'Cats' faithful were relishing the thought of K-State trailing by only 2 or 3 points, the ominous coach-referee huddle occurred, signaling a controversial decision.

When the smoke cleared, Minnesota had regained possession of the ball. The officials ruled that the ball was not touched, so Minnesota could throw it past halfcourt on the inbounds play. Less than 15 seconds later, Golden Gopher Melvin Newbern nailed a three-point shot. Minnesota led by 8 and the game was over.

Following the game, K-State coach Lon Kruger didn't dispute the call.

"I think the official made the right call as far as backcourt was concerned," Kruger said. "The ball wasn't controlled in the frontcourt, so there was no backcourt violation."

What did have Kruger wondering was why the shot clock did not start until Minnesota took the ball out following the controversy.

"They inbounded the ball with 12 seconds on the clock. I presume the shot clock started when the ball was touched, but (the officials) told me no. It starts when the ball is controlled," Kruger said. "I don't know what the rule on that one is."

'Cats guard Steve Henson knows how much the three-point shot can shatter a team's dreams. Newbern's basket wasn't as unplanned as the long shot Henson hit against Kansas to spark the 'Cats past the Jayhawks in the first round of the Big Eight Conference tournament, but it stung just as badly — probably worse.

"We fought so hard to get back in it," Henson said. "Being down five is a lot different than being down eight. It changed things a great deal."

Reynolds, Kilpatrick, relay pick up all-America honors

From Staff and Wire Reports

K-State track athletes Jeff Reynolds and Kim Kilpatrick claimed all-American honors at the NCAA Indoor Track and Field Championships March 10-11.

Reynolds placed third in the 400-meter dash with a time of 46.67 seconds, claiming the highest finish by a K-State athlete in a sprint event since Mike Bradley placed third in the 600 yards in 1982.

Kilpatrick finished fifth in the 55-meter hurdles with a time of 7.78.

Also earning the tag of all-American was the K-State men's 4x400-meter relay team of Sean Banks, Corey King, Tyrone Watkins and Reynolds. The quartet finished third with a time of 3:09.89.

The rest of the news for Wildcat coach John Capriotti at the NCAA meet was not so good.

Sprinter Ray Hill, the Big Eight Conference's fastest man, made it into the finals of the 55 meters with the fourth-fastest time going in at 6.20, but he strained a hamstring during the preliminaries and was withheld from his remaining events. Hill, who was also entered in the 200, was replaced by King on the relay team.

Other K-State athletes competing at nationals were: Pat Hessini, sixth in his preliminary heat in the mile run with a time of 4:08.09; Connie Teaberry, tied for 11th in the high jump with a leap of 5-8; Dan O'Mara, ninth in the shot put with a throw of 58-0¼ ; and Banks, finished third in his preliminary heat of the 400.

Golf team struggles early

From Staff and Wire Reports

Experience and the lack of outdoor course work due to the weather were golf coach Russ Bunker's main concerns as his women's squad entered the eight-team tourney at the Northern Illinois Snowbird Classic in Sebring, Fla.

Bunker said last week that he did not expect much from his women's squad as it prepared to open the season at the Spring Lake Country Club.

Bunker was more concerned with just getting in some competition, but this competition proved to be a bit tough for the Wildcats, as they finished eighth with a two-day total of 699.

And, as Bunker found out, he had reason to be concerned. He got a first-hand look at what kind of an effect not being able to play outdoors will have on a golf team. The short game around the green is what golfers are not able to work on when they have to play indoors, and Bunker said that is what hurt the K-State women.

"A lot of our problems are on the greens," Bunker said. "It's frustrating to add so many strokes on the short game. It's certainly something we need to work on."

Sophomore Chris Adams made a run at second place individually on the last day, but saw her chances slip away when she shot a nine on a par five. Adams finished sixth overall with a two-day total of 159.

"(Chris) honestly played real well," Bunker said. "She could have gotten second and really had a chance to win it. She had a good tourney. Unfortunately, she was our only bright spot."

Bunker was pleased to see his other four golfers nearly reach the goal they had set of improving their first-round totals.

"They all set goals to reach after the first day and they made a good run at it, but it just wasn't a good tournament," he said. "I was very proud of their effort the second day, though."

Adena Hagedorn, Jill Zientara and Lonna Dale all shot 180 for the tourney, while Cory Harlow had a 192.

Tennis team 3-3 in Florida

By Carolyn Holcroft
Sports Writer

Facing what proved to be some of its toughest competition of the season, the women's tennis squad ended its Florida tour last week with a 3-3 dual record. The three losses were the Wildcats' first of the season.

K-State opened the tour with a 7-0 win against Jacksonville and a 7-2 win against Memphis State March 12 in Jacksonville, Fla.

At St. Augustine, Fla., NAIA champion Flagler University handed the Wildcats team its first loss of the season Tuesday with a 6-3 victory in which it dominated the singles matches. Play continued Wednesday with a solid 9-0 win against Illinois State, but the week concluded with a 2-7 loss to Florida State and a 4-5 loss to North Florida.

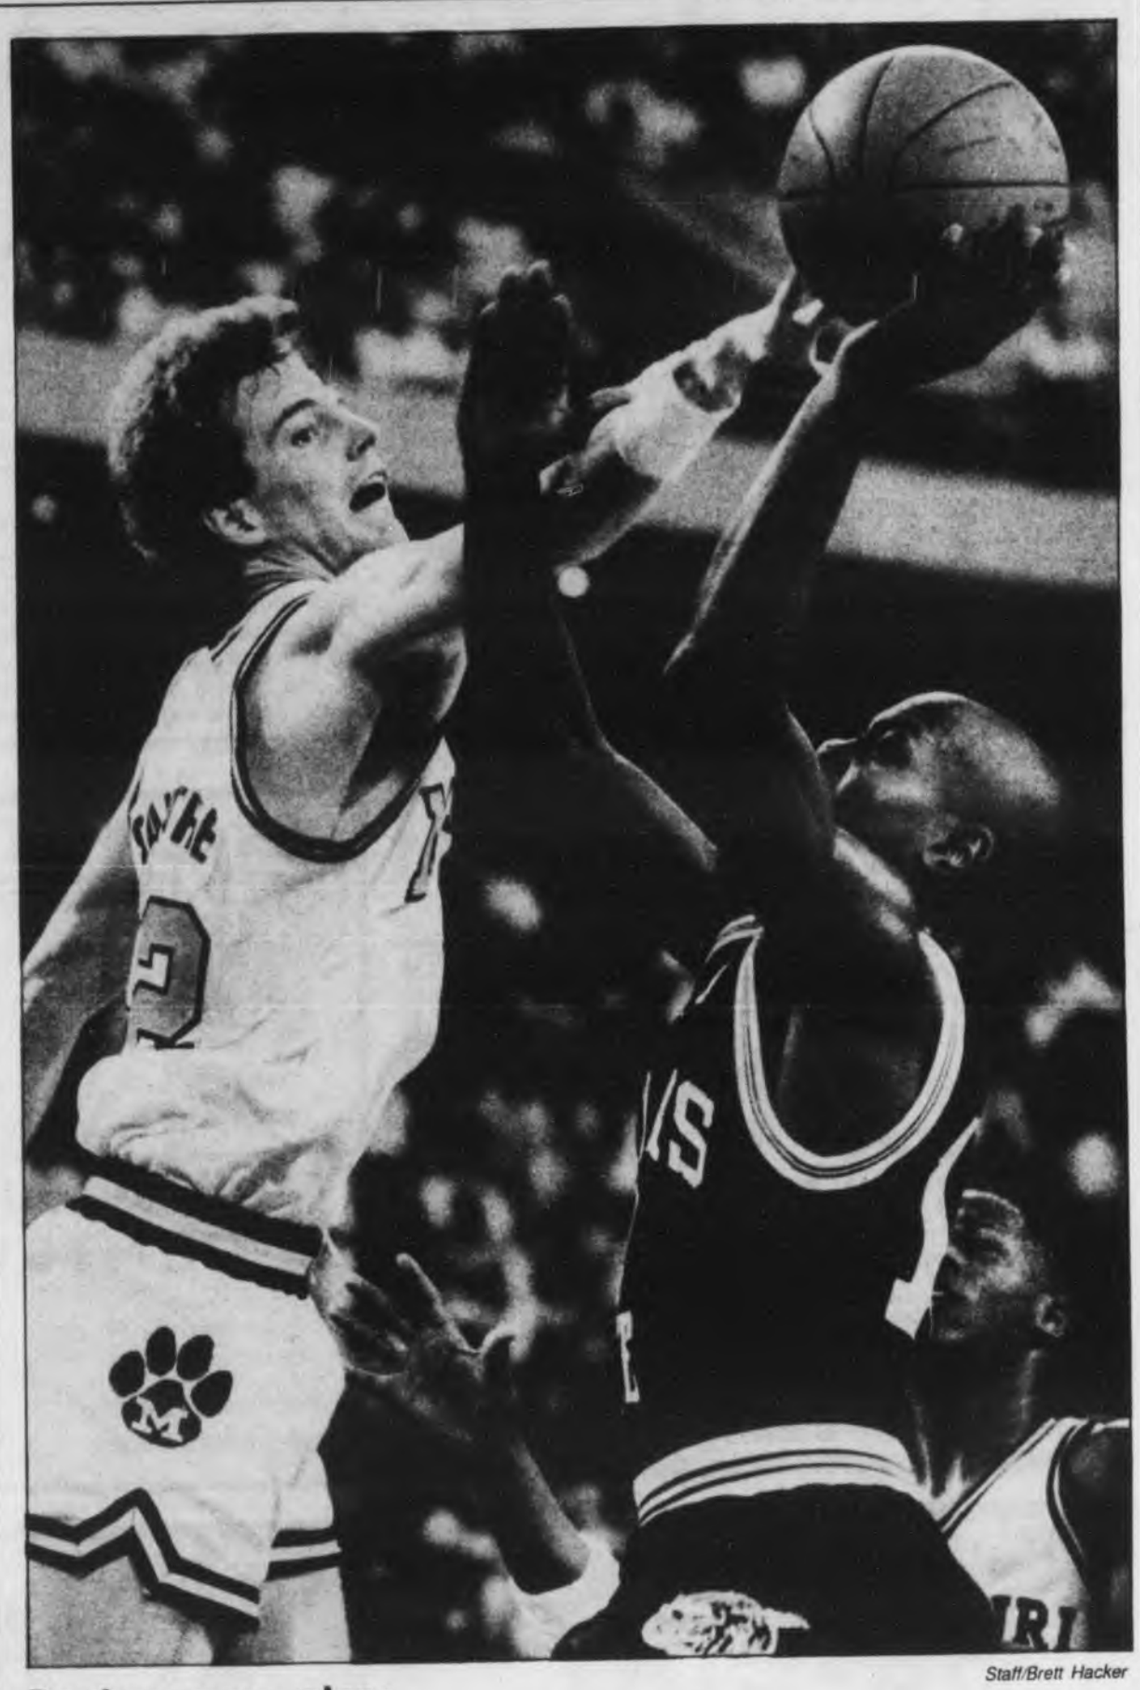
Tennis coach Steve Bietau said he was displeased with the way the week went overall.

"They just didn't lift the level of their game to a level that could get the job done," he said. "Teamwise, we didn't have the effort that we needed."

However, Bietau was pleased with the progress made in some areas. The doubles team of Valerie Rive and Marijke Nel went undefeated for the tour, and Bietau said Rive played the best doubles he has seen her play.

He was also encouraged by the performances turned in by Helen Schildknecht.

"She tends to be a little bit inconsistent," Bietau said, "but she did a good job of keeping things together this week."



Bietau decided early in the week to try some different combinations of doubles teams, to compensate for what he described as "overkill" at the No. 3 spot, and some struggling at No. 1. Schildknecht and Sara Hancock ended up at No. 1, while Annika Emtell was moved to No. 3 with Thresa Burcham.

"I felt like we had a better combination of three teams than we've ever had," Bietau said. "I'm not sure yet what will happen at No. 3."

Emtell, with an overall record of 5-1, went nearly unblemished in singles. Her only loss was to Florida State. The Wildcats went undefeated at No. 2 doubles for the week.

The K-State women will now have two weeks to fix the "bad habits" that Bietau said may have developed in the past week. The next dual is the Big Eight opener against Missouri on April 2.

"After playing that many matches in a row, we need to get back in practice," Bietau said. "We need to clean up our game and smooth them out again."

Crew teams surprise

By The Collegian Staff

The success achieved by the crew squads during spring break surpasses previous years' efforts, said K-State coach Don Rose.

The teams, which medaled in six out of eight entries, competed Saturday in Austin at the 7th Annual Heart of Texas Regatta.

"I can't remember in recent years when we've had such success. This bodes well for the future of our rowing programs," Rose said.

The men's varsity crew was defeated by a third of a length by the defending champions, University of Kansas, and placed second in the field of seven.

"I know that had we staged the ending like we had planned it would have been even closer at the end," Rose said.

Seven of the squad's nine members were competing in their first varsity row.

Kansas finished in 3:39.5,

Baseball squad 5-3 on road trip

From Staff and Wire Reports

FRESNO, Calif. — Virginia Tech scored three quick runs in the top of the first inning en route to a 6-3 win over K-State Saturday in the third-place game of the Pepsi/Me and Ed's Classic baseball tournament.

K-State finished its eight-game, nine-day trip to California 5-3, with the highlight of the trip being a win against 12th ranked San Jose State. The Wildcats are now 9-3 overall.

In Saturday's action, the Wildcats immediately fell behind as starting pitcher Jim Haller allowed a walk and back-to-back doubles, and the Hokies were up 3-0 before K-State had recorded an out.

Tech added single runs in the second, sixth and ninth innings with the final on a Casey Waller home run. Waller's homer ended a string of 10 scoreless innings that had been thrown by K-State reliever Mike Hedrick.

K-State's offensive attack sputtered until the ninth inning. Before the final frame, K-State shortstop Craig Wilson had driven in the only Wildcat tally with a sixth-inning double.

In the ninth, Sean Collins had an RBI single which brought Rusty Ringgenberg to the plate representing the tying run, but Ringgenberg struck out. Ron Bradshaw scored on a wild pitch after that and Mike Rosenboom walked to load the bases for David Amaro. Hokie reliever Tim Finn, however, got Amaro to fly out to left to end the 'Cats rally.

"We're real pleased with how we performed on the trip," K-State coach Mike Clark said.

On their first stop, the Wildcats split with San Jose, winning 4-3 and losing 2-0. They then entered tournament play against No. 25 Washington State, which downed the Wildcats 5-3.

From there, K-State went on a four-game winning streak, stopping U.S. International, 7-4; North Carolina, 7-6; Liberty (Va.) University, 6-4; and Missouri, 6-5, to put them in the third-place game with Virginia Tech.

Although the 'Cats placed fourth in the tourney because of tie-breaking procedures, they actually had the second best record overall at 4-2. Host Fresno State captured the title with a 5-1 mark. Fresno's only loss was to Missouri.

Ringgenberg, the Wildcat centerfielder, hit .476 for the tourney and was named to the all-tournament team. Reliever Bill Schafer set a tournament record with three saves in three appearances.

Late video tapes cause revenue losses

New movies difficult to retrieve

By Bryan Ackley
Collegian Reporter

Although the incidence of lost or stolen videos and videocassette recorders is low among Manhattan video stores, some local store managers are having trouble getting some of their customers to return tapes on time, said Joe Johns, owner and manager of National Video.

"(National Video) can't afford to have tapes sitting on somebody's television for four or five days when other (customers) want to watch them," he said.

Johns said that five years ago his store's success was dependent on customers renting many older movies, but now people want a constant supply of new movies from which to choose.

Tapes which are returned late during the first six weeks after being released on video result in critical revenue losses for the store, he said.

Johns calls customers if they don't return tapes on time because it's easy for customers to forget about returning tapes. If they don't return them within a week of the due date, he hires a collection agency to retrieve them and collect the late charge.

He said he prefers using collection agencies because he's had more success in retrieving tapes and equipment through them than on previous occasions when he's turned matters over to police.

Johns said National Video has implemented a new policy which allows people who return tapes late to be billed for the late charge; however, they can't rent any additional tapes until the late charge is paid.

Diane Heinly, manager of Video Exchange, said her biggest problem is tracking down college students who are late in returning tapes. She said students are hard to locate because they move so often.

To combat this problem, she requires students to give their permanent address when they apply for a membership card.

"We have a terrible time with (students at) fraternities and sororities when we call them to let them know their tapes are late," Heinly said. "Our messages never seem to get passed along."

She said many times she calls customers because they haven't returned tapes on time and the customers insist they already returned them.

Heinly said when this happens she tries to avoid putting the customer in an embarrassing situation, but finds it neccesary to suggest that maybe they accidentally returned the tapes to the wrong store or left them under the seat in their car.

Usually the customer calls back and says they've found the tape, she said.

Debbie Ubel, manager of the Video Department at the Westloop Dillon's Store, said problems occur when people lose their driver's licenses or IDs and don't report it to police.

Often someone will find their license and use it to check out video equipment with no intention of returning it, and the person who lost the license doesn't realize the extent of the problem until they get a phone call or letter from a Dillon's employee who inquires about the equipment, she said.

Johns, Heinly and Ubel said customers generally don't treat rental VCRs very well. They don't worry about VCR repairs much because new machines can be purchased for about $200 or less.

The Video Exchange was the only store within the past year to report two missing VCRs to police. Neither has been recovered.

They expressed little concern about the amount of merchandise lost through customers not returning tapes or VCRs because they manage to retrieve most of their merchandise at some point. However, they are concerned about revenues lost as a result of late tape returns, and they agree there is no immediate solution to that problem.

Surrounded by a mob of supporters, Cristiani voted Sunday morning on the capital's central Roosevelt Avenue.

"I hope the United States realizes that (Salvadorans) want democracy, with this effort they're making to vote. We don't want any more bombs," he said.

President Jose Napoleon Duarte's five-year term ends June 1. Duarte, barred by law from running for re-election, is Washington's staunchest ally in the Western Hemisphere. He is dying of liver cancer.

The centrist Christian Democrats contend Arena has not changed much since it was founded in 1981 by individuals allegedly linked to death squads.

Arena denies links to death squads. Cristiani says the party's ideology is similar to that of the U.S. Republican Party.

The leftist Democratic Convergence, whose leaders maintain formal links with the guerrillas, is running third in the election, according to polls.

Rally participants to discuss need for more school funding

By Kevin Kramer
Staff Writer

More than 700 school board members, teachers and parents from around the state are expected to attend a pro-education rally in Topeka today.

The rally, Support Our $chools, will begin in the morning at the state capital with participants talking to their state representatives and senators about the need for increased funding for elementary and secondary education.

"Funding is our primary concern," said Dean Stramel, president of the Manhattan National Education Association. "We know our local legislators are supportive of education, but we need their commitment to it. This is very important considering all the other projects that are seeking funding through the Legislature this year."

Carolyn Schmitt, president of Kansas-NEA, said education needs to be the primary issue during this legislative session.

"We must work together to ensure that our public schools are adequately funded," she said. "It is our responsibility to assure the best possible educational opportunities for our students. We believe now is the time for the Legislature to face, and deal with, the funding crisis in Kansas schools."

The Support Our $chools rally is sponsored by the Kansas-NEA, with the support of the Kansas Association of School Boards.

"The day is designed to focus attention on the needs of our students and the needs of our schools," Schmitt said. "We hope the Legislature will join us in our quest for improved education for all Kansas students."

Participants and legislators have been invited to continue discussions at a noon luncheon at Heritage Hall in the Kansas Expocentre.

"With more than $300 million in the state's balances, we believe this year provides an opportunity for lawmakers to demostrate that education is their primary concern," Schmitt said. "The future of our state is in our classrooms today, and to meet the needs of these children, we must have adequate funding for our public education system."

Following the luncheon, rally participants will be organizing a walk around the capital building at 2:30 p.m.

Siege ends with suicide

By The Associated Press

SPRINGFIELD, Ill. — An armed man killed his girlfriend and himself Sunday after an almost two-day siege in which he held the woman and her daughter and sister hostage, authorities said.

The sister was shot in the head and was in critical condition after surgery, officials said.

Douglas "Dougie" Thomas, 20, had holed up with his hostages in their one-story home Friday night. The incident ended 42 hours later, at 5:40 p.m. Sunday, when police fired tear gas into the home and entered it.

Thomas and Karen Lambert, both 20, were dead of gunshot wounds when they arrived at St. John's Hospital after the siege, said Sangamon County Coroner Norman Richter and hospital spokeswoman Aggie Hayner.

Richter said Thomas suffered a gunshot wound to the abdomen. His girlfriend was shot in the chest.

Lambert's 14-year-old sister, Nicole Lambert, was in surgery for her head wound, the coroner said.

Earlier Sunday, Thomas released Katrina Lambert, the 4-year-old daughter of his girlfriend, after police cut off electricity and gas to the house, according to police Cmdr. Dave Searcy.

"At about 6:15 a.m. the door opened and the little girl walked out," Searcy said. He said she "was very tired and very hungry," but otherwise unharmed.

Thomas, reportedly armed with a handgun, had threatened to kill himself and the hostages throughout the confrontation.

Neighbors screamed and ran from the site after police fired tear gas at the house, and television station WICS in Springfield reported a fight broke out after bystanders learned of the deaths.

One man at the scene, James Kerr, 47, was taken to St. John's with chest pains and was reported in fair condition.

Another hostage, the 2½-month-old daughter of Thomas and his girlfriend, was released at 8:30 a.m. Saturday.

Thomas made "no demands whatsoever," Searcy said. He said he thought Thomas went to the home because of a dispute with the girlfriend and refused to come out because "he knows he's probably going to go to jail."

K-State in 3:41.2 and Skidmore (N.Y.) College rounded out the top three with a 3:44.8 finish. The first and seventh crew finished within 24 seconds of each other.

"It was very close and a very exciting event," Rose said.

The women's varsity competed in a short, tough field, he said.

Kansas won the event taking not only first, but also second. K-State finished fifth.

"KU's freshmen women won the region last year, and that experience is showing on the varsity team," Rose said.

One of the team's medals was won by a Manhattan High School crew that is sponsored by K-State Crew. The crew competes with college freshman squads and placed third.

Committee to hear admissions testimony

By Susan L'Ecuyer
Managing Editor

The Kansas House Education Committee will hear testimony today on a bill that would set selective admissions policies for the three largest regents institutions.

Earlier this month, the Senate Education Committee heard testimony on a companion bill proposed by the state Board of Regents. The bill would require Kansas high school students who seek automatic admission to one of the regents institution to either:

- Complete a specified curriculum,
- Score at least a 23 composite on American Collegiate Testing Program tests, or
- Rank in the upper one-third of their class.

Under the Senate version of the bill, automatic admissions would also be granted to those 21 years of age or older and to those who score at least 54 on the General Education Diploma test.

Exempted from those requirements would be 15 percent of the approximately 20,000 freshmen who enter regents institutions each year. Those exempted would have to demonstrate special academic talents.

Senator Lana Oleen, R.-Manhattan, said arguments were heard on the Senate version of the bill last week, but that not enough interest existed in the Senate to bring it out of committee.

"The (Senate) bill, in essence, is dead," she said. "They didn't bring it out of committee because there wasn't enough support for it to pass."

The House version of the bill, which waives the foreign language requirement called for in the Senate version, requires that these policies only apply to the University of Kansas, K-State and The Wichita State University rather than to all regents institutions.

Wayne Nafziger, chairman of the Faculty Senate Academic Affairs Committee, said Faculty Senate indicated opposition to selective admissions unless certain questions were addressed.

"One question has to do with what the effect would be on the number of faculty positions," he said. "Would the formula (to decide the number) remain the same?"

Nafziger said Faculty Senate was concerned with the administrative costs of implementing a selective admissions policy.

Provost James Coffman said the administration's position is that of the Board of Regents, in support of the bill, despite projections of a temporary decrease in enrollment at K-State and faculty concerns.

He said changes in the admissions policy would be "resource neutral" because of a safeguard provided by a funding corridor. With the corridor, enrollment would have to decrease by at least 2½ percent before a loss in resources is experienced.

"We don't see the change in enrollment affecting the University's resources, generally, and the faculty positions, specifically," he said.

Charlene Nichols, director of communications for the Associated Students of Kansas, said "ASK has a kind of non-position on open admissions."

"Basically, the schools can't come to a consensus," she said. "I don't know that there is an (official) position at K-State. I know students adamantly for open admissions who say 'We need to educate the masses.' And then there are students who say 'Yes, but we need to be competitive with other land grant universities.'"

Regent Charles Hostetler, Manhattan, said he does not totally support the proposed admissions policy changes. He described his position on qualified admissions as "somewhat in the middle of the road."

"I don't see any real need (to implement the admissions proposal) until all the regents schools are full and until the high schools place the necessary courses in their curricula," Hostetler said.

Although not necessarily opposed to selective admissions, he said he saw no great urgency for implementing the proposal.

Hostetler said the differences in the House version of the bill do not change his initial perception of the

Students convicted of drug violations will lose federal aid

By Robert Short
Staff Writer

Students convicted of a drug law violation run the risk of losing any Title IV federal financial aid they may be receiving or expect to receive in the future, according to a law passed by Congress last year.

The law, which went into effect March 18, includes all Title IV aid, including student loans and grants, said Jerry Craft, training officer for the Department of Education office of student financial assistance.

"If there has been a conviction for distribution or possession (of a controlled substance) ... Title IV aid will be suspended," Craft said.

The Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988 was signed into law Nov. 18 as part of the omnibus drug legislation of 1988. It includes the Drug-Free Workplace Act affecting employees of the University.

The primary programs included under the Title IV program are Pell Grants, supplemental grants, college work-study, Perkins loans, Stafford loans, supplemental loans and the parent loan for undergraduate student program.

Institutions offering federal financial aid will receive more information on exactly how the new drug laws will affect students, according to a letter from the National Association of Student Financial Aid Administrators, based in Washington, D.C.

"(NASFAA) anticipates that the Department of Education will issue further guidance on this topic through some means, such as a Dear Colleague letter," according to the letter.

Institutions involved with distributing federal financial aid should be receiving detailed information about the new drug laws "any time now," Craft said.

"The schools will be getting a letter that is quite detailed in its explanation of the laws," he said.

Although K-State does not yet have a written policy outlining its position concerning drug abuse by a student receiving federal financial aid, in most cases the result will be suspension of funds, said Larry Viterna, director of student financial assistance.

"If there is a drug connection (to a student) or we are aware of drug usage by students receiving federal financial aid, (the financial aid) would have to be taken away," Viterna said. "They would also become ineligible for aid in the future."

Craft said the suspension of federal financial aid will be included in the sentencing of a person once the person is convicted of a drug law violation.

"We are not going to actively review student records to look for a drug connection," Viterna said. "If there is a drug arrest reported in the newspaper and we come across a student's name who is receiving financial aid, we would then contact that person."

Lynette Woods, an officer with the Riley County Police Department, said numbers of drug arrests for Manhattan and Riley County were not broken down by age or student status.

Position created to help obtain more funds

By Craig Hamrick
Collegian Reporter

K-State received $29 million in funding for research projects ranging from cancer research to hazardous waste management in 1988. Since October, a 13-member faculty committee has been searching for someone to fill the newly created position of vice provost, in hopes of obtaining even more money.

Elizabeth Unger, chairwoman of the search committee, said the provost is the chief academic official of the University. The provost is responsible for all academic and research projects, including the administration of funds obtained from outside the University. The vice provost will assist the provost and will also be responsible for finding more funds.

Unger, professor of computer and information science, said the position of vice provost has been needed for some time but has recently gained attention as part of President Jon Wefald's long-term goals for the University.

"I think the need was recognized recently," she said. "President Wefald has an initiative to create a strategic plan for the University and ... it was recognized that there was a gap in research coordination."

Unger said most of the funding obtained in previous years was raised by individual researchers and research groups. The addition of a vice provost should allow the researchers to focus their attention on their research.

"Universities that have an individual like (the vice provost) are able to tap into (sources) in Washington, D.C.," Unger said. "They need to be able to know what the agencies are thinking about and what types of projects they might be thinking about providing funding for."

Kurt Feltner, associate director of the Agricultural Experiment Station and member of the search committee, said it would not be easy to find all the desired qualities in one applicant.

"I'm looking for a good communicator and organizer," he said. "I'd like to see someone who has been in the trenches and knows the trials and tribulations of doing research and is familiar with the Washington grant scene."

Provost James Coffman said the new vice provost will be appointed in mid-April, and should be at the University in July or early August. The Candidate: Research important

By Darren Keller
Collegian Reporter

The role of research is to advance knowledge and prepare graduates at their specific levels in communicating what their area of study demands, said Marla Peterson Monday in the Union.

Peterson is one of six candidates for the newly created position of vice provost for research and dean of the graduate school.

Peterson spoke to about 25 people in an open forum for students, faculty and staff.

She said the role of the vice provost is to "marshall resources to support graduate and research studies, help maintain quality in graduate programs and provide services to all graduate programs."

"I plan to help figure out strategies to help get to where you want to go in appropriation to K-State," she said.

Provost James Coffman will be making the final decision on the candidate after the six applicants are screened by a selection committee of 15 University officials.

"We're looking for someone who can devote full attention to the graduate program and research coordination and facilitation," he said.

"He or she will need to have enhancing grantsmanship skills (ability to acquire extramural funding), which will spawn opportunities and ability to take advantage of these opportunities, specifically in mass research and graduate education.

"Strong skills in developing critical mass in graduate and research coordination through collaboration and interdisciplinary work will also

Detainees escape hospital

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — Four black detainees on a hunger strike escaped Monday from a Johannesburg hospital, fled 38 miles to Pretoria and sought refuge at the West German Embassy there, officials said.

The four men, who have been held without charge for between 10 months and 23 months, demanded the South African government guarantee they and all other political detainees will be freed.

"We have committed no crime," the escapees said in a statement. "We have been kept in detention for so long that we felt we had to embark on a life-and-death hunger strike to dramatize our plight in detention and to ultimately secure our immediate release."

West Germany's Foreign Ministry said the four are in "administrative custody." The embassy in Pretoria said no decision has been made about them.

The men said through the Detainees Aid Center that they belong to organizations affiliated with the banned United Democratic Front, the country's largest anti-apartheid coalition.

They escaped from Hillbrow Hospital in Johannesburg, where they had spent five weeks being treated for fasting, according to the South African government and their statement.

Hundreds of detainees have taken part in hunger strikes since January, demanding their freedom or to stand trial.

China opens legislature

BEIJING — Premier Li Peng opened the annual legislative session Monday with a somber speech on China's economic crisis that stressed centralized control and the need to halt political reforms.

China's senior leader, 84-year-old Deng Xiaoping, did not attend the session of the National People's Congress as he did last year. A Foreign Affairs Ministry official said only that Deng "asked for leave."

Li's speech to the 2,768 legislators in the cavernous Great Hall of the People marked the consolidation of a policy of economic and political retrenchment that began in September.

Whereas Congress last year called for democracy and bold attempts to free China's economy from rigid central planning, Li's speech called for control.

"Experience has proved time and again that without the necessary centralization and unity, without strict organization and discipline, it would be absolutely impossible to readjust the economy and overcome difficulties," he said.

Li also appeared to level veiled but pointed criticism at Communist Party chief Zhao Ziyang, who as premier in 1987 launched China on an ambitious reform program.

Court to hear drug case

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court agreed Monday to decide whether taking a hallucinogenic drug as a religious practice can be made a crime.

The justices voted to review a ruling that Oregon officials violated religious freedom by denying unemployment compensation to two men fired for using peyote at religious ceremonies.

In their decision, expected sometime next year, the justices necessarily must resolve whether any state may criminally prosecute someone for the religious use of peyote.

The Oregon Supreme Court last year ruled that its state's criminal law makes no exception for the religious use of peyote, a cactus "button" containing the hallucinogen mescaline.

Police break robbery ring

NEOSHO, Mo. — Authorities say they have cracked a southwest Missouri ring that burglarized homes while owners were at church on Sunday mornings.

Newton County Sheriff Ron Doerge said the ring was responsible for 50 break-ins in his county, and authorities believe they committed at least 70 burglaries in the area in the last eight or nine months.

"It was unusual in the fact that they were going into church parking lots, getting into cars and getting addresses and telephone numbers. Then they would go out and burglarize that home," Doerge said.

He said a number of burglaries also occurred in the northern part of Joplin in neighboring Jasper County, where there are large churches and parking lots. "They would go from car to car, especially expensive cars, find an address nearby and burglarize the house either then or the next Sunday," Doerge said.

Items taken included weapons, video recorders, computers and jewelry. Many of the stolen items were taken to other states to be sold.

Doerge said he could not estimate the value of the stolen property but said it would be "a very substantial amount."

Court may review KC schools

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Attorneys for the Kansas City School District and the plaintiffs in a school desegregation case have filed briefs urging the U.S. Supreme Court not to review the district's desegregation plan.

The briefs, filed Friday, say such scrutiny would only "delay and destabilize" the district's effort to desegregate city schools.

The state of Missouri has asked the high court to review the desegregation plan, including the magnet school concept and a multimillion-dollar building improvement program.

U.S. District Judge Russell G. Clark ordered the plan, which is in the third of five years.

The state also wants the court to review a property tax increase Clark ordered to pay for the desegregation.

The high court could decide by next month whether to hear the case during its fall session.

The district's brief contends that the issues raised by the state have been resolved in other Missouri desegregation cases, or in the Kansas City case itself.

Recourse set for reappraisal

TOPEKA — Kansans who think valuations placed on their property under statewide reappraisal are too high have recourse in trying to get them lowered, but they need considerably more than their word that they can't get that much if they want to sell the property.

"You need evidence, some documentation," said George Donatello, state director of the reappraisal program.

The best evidence a property owner can present is a sales contract showing he purchased the property within the past two years.

"Nothing is as valid as a sales contract from an arms-length transaction between buyer and seller within the last two years," said Donatello.

However, other evidence and information can be valid when owners of residential and commercial property challenge their valuations, Donatello said. These include recent professional appraisals, comparative sales of similar property and evidence of problems the appraisers couldn't have been aware of that would make the property less valuable.

In 34 larger counties, there is a five-step process for appealing valuations placed on property, a process that began for property owners in late February and early March when new valuations went into the mail.

Senate to discuss title change

A proposed change in the title of some teaching faculty members to "lecturer" will be the major issue discussed at today's Faculty Senate meeting, said Cornelia Flora, Faculty Senate president.

The meeting will take place at 3:30 p.m. in the Union Big Eight room.

"The title of Lecturer shall be used for the members of the teaching faculty who are appointed on a nonpermanent basis. Such appointments may be full-time or part-time. Lecturers are subject to evaluation, are eligible for merit salary increases, and are to be accorded all perquisites available to the faculty in permanent ranks," according to the agenda for the meeting.

Other issues on the agenda that will be discussed at the meeting are the course and curriculum changes for level 599 and below which were approved by the College of Education Jan. 24, a report by the Faculty Senate Committee on University planning and changes in graduation lists.

Tax changes bring good news

Lower rates, easier forms benefit taxpayers

By Alan Wilds
Staff Writer

As income tax deadlines are approaching, the Internal Revenue Service says although traditional problems will occur, most of the changes in forms and procedures will bring good news to taxpayers.

IRS Public Affairs Specialist Janice Lawrence said tax rates are lower than last year's figures and there has been an increase in exemption reductions.

The final deadline for tax forms is April 17. Lawrence said this is a two-day extension from last year.

IRS Public Affairs Officer James Manuszak said he is pleased to notice people may not be pushing the filing deadline this year. He said reports from the IRS service centers show the number of tax forms received and processed is up from last year.

"Compared with past years, there are no major complications in this year's forms," Manuszak said.

He said one area of confusion has been the earned-income credit, a special benefit allowing working families with incomes under $18,576 to qualify for a tax refund even if they don't owe any taxes.

In general, he said, the credit is available to any worker who received wages, tips, fees or any other earned income in 1988.

"This is basically free money for those who qualify," Manuszak said.

People who are eligible for this refund are not claiming it due to the false assumption that they will not receive a refund if they do not owe taxes, he said.

"People are also claiming (the refund) that don't have it coming," Manuszak said. "The main problem is people not going through the worksheet to determine their status."

He said earned-income credit errors account for over 37 percent of all tax errors.

"Compared with past years, there are no major complications in this year's forms."

—James Manuszak
IRS Public Affairs Officer

Raising the standard deduction is a new change this year to reduce the chance of errors and increase personal exemption, Lawrence said.

"Reports say 18 percent of errors involve the standard deduction," Manuszak said. "The increase may be good in terms of tax refunds but bad in terms of errors."

Manuszak said raising the deduction will enable millions of people to use the short form, the 1040A, instead of the longer form 1040. This will make processing the forms cheaper for the IRS to complete.

According to IRS reports, thousands of taxpayers who do not itemize their deductions write down the wrong standard deduction.

In 1986, the tax overhaul complicated the process by limiting the standard deduction for taxpayers who can be claimed as a dependent by someone else. The law also complicated deductions for those who are blind or over age 65.

"Any dependent will have to use a special worksheet to figure standard deductions," Manuszak said.

Most errors involving standard deductions will be corrected by IRS computers, but Manuszak said errors will delay any refund for the taxpayer.

Due to new regulations passed by Congress, Manuszak said the confusion surrounding the rules for deducting interest on home mortgages has "settled down" since last year.

In general, a person may deduct interest on as much as $1 million borrowed to buy, build or improve a principal home and second home and an additional $100,000 for a home-equity loan whose proceeds may be used for any purpose.

Gil Gillispie, owner of the H&R Block district office in Manhattan, said mortgage interest is of little concern to most people in the Manhattan area because they do not spend much money on their homes.

Gillispie said the majority of the problems dealt with in his office are differing amounts of standard deductions, tax building on pensions and retirement funds, and sales of mutual funds.

He said the Kansas returns may be easier to understand than last year and the federal returns are about the same with a few simplifications.

The H&R Block district office has processed about 2,200 tax forms thus far. Gillispie said they should process around 3,000 tax forms this year, which is about average.

Manuszak said people should not be as bothered by the changes made this year as opposed to last year since there is nothing to cause major problems.

"We are looking for a fairly smooth year," he said.

Manuszak said the IRS is encouraging people not to make major purchases or plan vacations with their tax money until they actually have the check in their hand.

"There are many instances where people have made major errors on their tax forms and not received what they planned on receiving," he said.

Students to receive health fee refund of $60 due to error

By The Collegian Staff

About 35 international students will receive refunds from K-State because of an error in the 1988-89 K-State General Catalog which required the students to pay a $60 health fee.

The error is on page 17 of the catalog, which lists the breakdown of fees.

The listing for the student health fee is qualified by an asterisk. The qualifier states that students enrolled in six or fewer hours for the spring and fall semesters have the option of not paying the health fee.

The qualifier also states that international students are exempt from the option and are required to pay the $60 fee.

"The mistake was not discovered until this semester," said Donna Davis, director of the International Student Center. "There weren't any (international) students who complained during the fall semester."

Davis said international students are required to carry health insurance either from a private company or the student Blue Cross Blue Shield plan.

If a private company is used, the students are not required to pay the health fee and are not afforded Lafene privileges. If the Kansas Blue Cross Blue Shield student plan is used, the students are required to pay the health fee.

"The health fee and the student Blue Cross plan work hand in hand," said Dr. Robert Tout, former director of Lafene. "The health fees help subsidize the insurance plan."

Davis said: "We knew about the error but the students were still required to pay the fee. We had to wait until it was proven that there was a mistake before we could refund any money.

"The main group of people who were affected were a few of last semester's seniors, GTAs, and students who are at the research level."

Registrar Don Foster informed the students by letter that they could qualify for a refund.

"We have had 32 students who have come in for refunds," Foster said. "Just because the students paid the fee does not mean they were overcharged. Some of them wanted the (Lafene) service.

"This was an error that we will have corrected."

Airlines warned of more bomb devices

By The Associated Press

LONDON — The Transport Department told airlines and airports Monday there is a "high and continuing risk" of more devices like the bomb in a radio-cassette player that destroyed Pan Am Flight 103, killing 270 people.

The department said it sent a telex as a reminder of its previous warnings, which have been the subject of controversy, and to suggest new safety measures. Transport officials would not elaborate on the statement.

Pressure grew for the government to explain whether the Flight 103 disaster on Dec. 21 could have been averted with better dissemination of warnings and information about bombing equipment found before the explosion over Lockerbie, Scotland.

Opposition politicians have demanded Transport Secretary Paul Channon resign because of how he handled events before the bombing, which killed all 259 people on the Boeing 747 and 11 on the ground.

The Evening Standard newspaper said police believe the bomb contained only one or two pounds of explosives.

Inspector Tom McCullough of the Lockerbie police, who are conducting the investigation, refused comment.

Selective admissions not perfect solution

Today the Kansas House Education Committee will discuss the selective admissions bill again. The proposal, which threatens Kansas' status as the only state with an open admissions policy, would set requirements for students wishing to attend Kansas' regents universities.

Those who are for the bill argue that by requiring selective admissions, Kansas colleges will be able to rid themselves of remedial courses and concentrate on giving their students a "quality" Kansas education.

Others believe that a clause allowing students to "prove" they can survive in a university atmosphere addresses arguments against selective admissions. They kid themselves by trusting that the clause gives potential college students a second chance to prove they have a serious scholastic attitude although they might not have serious grades or test scores.

Selective admissions is a backhanded attempt to improve Kansas high schools. By not addressing the actual issues — teaching stratagies and low funding — legislators believe that these serious problems will somehow correct themselves. Proposals of stiffer graduation requirements and course work aimed at college bound students are swell, but they seem to ignore one simple fact — not every student plans to go on to college.

Turning Kansas high schools into prep schools for Kansas regents universities won't alleviate the flow of high school students who graduate without solid writing, reading or math skills.

Concentration on improving high school curricula, teaching standards and establishing steady funding for high school students should be today's topic of discussion. This would ensure future high school graduates the necessary skills, whether they plan to attend college or not.

Ban on machine guns has little real impact

The nation's inner-city drug wars are being fought with semi-automatic machine guns like the UZI, AK-47 and M-16. It therefore seems logical that if we want to win the war on drugs, something should be done about the guns.

Drug Czar William Bennett's recent call for a ban on the importation of semi-automatic machine guns looks like a step in the right direction. But it is only meant to look that way.

In reality, more than three-quarters of semi-automatic machine guns are domestic made, so the import ban will only affect one-quarter of the current orders for semi-automatics.

Of that one-quarter, the ban is even more worthless when we consider the drastic increase in orders for the guns during the last few months. In 1986, 1987 and 1988 combined, 80,000 orders were placed for imported semi-automatic machine guns. In the first 80 days of 1989, more than 114,000 orders were placed.

Thus, despite the ban, more semi-automatic machine guns will be brought into this country this year than in the past three years combined, and Bennett has cautioned that the ban will be only "temporary."

Needless to say, the NRA members have been up in arms about this purported violation of their Second Amendment rights, and the Bush administration has been very sensitive to their complaints.

The Reagan-Bush war on drugs has been full of all sorts of questionable civil rights violations. Its "zero-tolerance" measure, now stressed by Bennett, takes private property away from individuals possessing so much as a marijuana seed. Protections against unreasonable searches and seizures and invasions of privacy have been greatly relaxed to facilitate drug enforcement.

But as soon as the right to shoot ducks and clay targets at 40 rounds per minute is in the least bit threatened, the Bush administration and Attorney General Richard Thornburgh are quick to back the NRA.

For Thornburgh and the White House, it is apparently more important to protect the right of drug dealers to buy UZIs than it is to protect a small-time drug user from arbitrary police intrusion.

This is a shameful set of priorities for any democratic government to have, especially for a government committed to fighting a war against drug kingpins.

Better understanding of world views needed

Blasphemy popular item

Commentary

Mark Schmeller
Collegian Columnist

Blasphemy seems to be a hot commodity these days. From the furor about Salman Rushdie's "The Satanic Verses" to the "Like a Prayer" music video by that world-renowned intellectual provocateur Madonna, all sorts of religious sensibilities are being offended.

The offenses are being answered with good religious remedies such as using censorship and sending Rushdie to meet his maker.

Numerous guest columns have graced the pages of the Collegian during the past few weeks, most of them explaining why "The Satanic Verses" offends Moslems. This needs to be done, the columnists have argued, because most Americans fail to understand what Islam is all about.

No argument here. Much of the Western world is painfully ethnocentric, and many Americans unfairly regard Islam as an anti-Christian religion for kooks, radicals and draft dodgers. It is understandably disheartening to many Moslems that the greatest exposure many people in the West will have to Islam will be through the fantastic dream sequences and magic realism of Rushdie's novel.

But all the talk about the ignorance of the Western world obscures a more important aspect of the Rushdie controversy: the failure of Moslems to understand the West.

After all, it is the Moslem world, with its threats upon Rushdie and Western publishers, that is trying to impose its values upon the West. Nobody is forcing people in Moslem countries to read "The Satanic Verses," nor is anyone attempting to ban books offensive to Christianity or Judaism within Moslem countries.

For one, Rushdie's book is written in a Western literary style akin to such authors as Gunther Grass and Gabriel Garcia Marquez, in which fantasy sequences and dreams dominate the storytelling. Rushdie explains his style and what it means quite well in his previous novel, "Shame."

"I am only telling a sort of modern fairy tale, so that's all right; nobody need get upset, or take anything I say too seriously. No drastic action need be taken, either."

If one reads Rushdie literally, ignorant to the Western literary style being employed, one will naturally see blasphemy. But that blasphemy is more a result of the ignorance of the reader than the maliciousness of the writer.

But the greatest barrier to understanding the West was displayed in the March 10 column by Toquir Ahmad when he wrote, "When there is a weekend in the West, people go to clubs, drink and dance. In Moslem countries, there is only one day for the weekend, and that day is used for prayers and worship of God."

Have you not noticed the many different buildings around Manhattan known as churches? Would it surprise you that these buildings are often filled on weekends with people engaged in the worship of God? Would you think it possible that people who party and people who pray could peacefully coexist in the same small Kansas town?

This is called pluralism. It involves the coexistence of numerous ethnic, religious and cultural groups. In the West, it is a way of life. The West can't expect a Moslem country to accept pluralism. But in the Rushdie controversy, nobody is forcing "The Satanic Verses" down the throats of Moslems.

When one lives in a pluralistic society, one lives in constant danger of being offended. With so many differing beliefs and viewpoints, every individual is bound to feel, at one time or another, like an outsider. People who demand censorship are people who want all reminders of this danger removed from sight — people who want to believe that everyone believes as they do.

In a land where people really are different, this is a dangerous, totalitarian attitude. In the Moslem world, where the degree of cultural, religious and ethnic homogeneity is much higher, it is not.

Believe it or not, even I can be offended. Madonna's "Like a Prayer" video is one recent example. It's hard for me to accept as a Christ-like figure someone who once told Penthouse magazine that "crucifixes are sexy because there's a naked man on them." But I have to accept that in return for the freedom to write almost anything I want to in this column.

In the broadest sense, Webster's Dictionary defines blasphemy as "an irreverent act, attitude or utterance regarding something inviolable or sacrosanct."

While many in this country and around the world regard religion as sacrosanct, many others regard the freedom to speak, write, think and doubt as inviolable. When religious groups call for censorship with assassinations, they are answering blasphemy with blasphemy.

The presence of "The Satanic Verses" or "Like a Prayer" shouldn't threaten a strong faith, but the censorious reaction to them does threaten the precarious freedoms of thought and expression. Moreover, this reaction threatens the freedoms of those of us who are still looking for answers.

In the West, literature is a means by which we can continue the search. Czechoslovakian novelist Milan Kundera described the role of literature best when he said:

"The stupidity of people comes from having an answer for everything. The wisdom of the novel comes from having a question for everything. The novelist teaches the reader to comprehend the world as a question. There is wisdom and tolerance in that attitude. In a world built on sacrosanct certainties the novel is dead. The totalitarian world, whether founded on Marx, Islam, or anything else, is a world of answers rather than questions. There, the novel has no place."

But in a pluralistic society, the novel is of utmost importance, and cannot be removed. It would be like removing the Koran from the Islamic world. Both actions would be true blasphemies.

Letters

Column emotional

Editor,

Barbara Baker's editorial on the proposed selective admissions policy avoids analytical evaluation of the policy and instead chooses to rely on unsubstantiated emotional arguments.

She never adequately discusses whether there are minimum standards of education necessary for university studies or how the proposed policy would maintain those standards. She begins by implying K-State is in danger of becoming a prestigious and elitist university on the scale of Harvard and Yale if this policy is approved.

I can assure her that K-State's reputation outside Kansas suffers more from a poor academic reputation than charges of elitism.

She goes on to argue that service as a residence hall adviser or student senator is a better educational priority than hard study. But isn't the limited number of residence hall advisers and student senator positions decided based on selective admissions that one could well argue are elitist?

For that matter, participation in athletics or theater work could also be called elitist. Even Baker's alternative, the Student Talent Development Model, relies on the elitist prestige of UCLA to convince us this theory is correct and applicable to K-State.

Baker's faith in the Student Talent Development Model does not seem convincing to the reader unfamiliar with this theory. What exactly is meant by, "The students' learning process is more enhanced by the amount of energy they put into college both physically and psychologically"?

More enhanced than what?

What does it mean to say, "This model also supports the philosophy that students only develop when they are completely engulfed academically, socially and politically by the college culture"? Is the K-State student engulfed by a college culture?

Most live off campus in apartments or Greek houses, their social lives revolve around Aggieville and vicarious identification with sports, and they have little if any political understanding or involvement.

Is this a college culture that promotes "overall educational excellence"?

In the end, Baker's only concrete argument is that she could not have succeeded without open admissions. The quality of her journalism leads one to doubt even this argument is a valid reason to oppose selective admissions.

Her closing argument completely departs from those she has raised before. She argues that educational deficiencies should not be the concern of K-State, but should instead be left to secondary schools. She does not want to punish high school students for the failings of their high schools. But is it punishment?

It seems a greater injustice to attempt to ignore the inadequacies of a student's education than to insist on a minimum standard of skills and knowledge for university studies.

It is exactly this continual ignoring of educational deficiencies that leads to an editorial that has no basis in factual analytical argument and can only rely on emotional pleas either to ignore or deny educational deficiency.

This editorial only serves to further convince me that the Collegian chooses its editorial positions based merely on fashionability and not thoughtful conviction.

Religion attacked

Editor,

Re: Sheikh Faisal Razzaq's column, "World should respect beliefs," in the March 1 Collegian.

Perhaps what Razzaq is really saying is that Christians (and other non-Moslem religions) have more faith in their faith, so that they don't feel prompted to attack those who attack their religions.

EPA figures show asbestos violations

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — One in five public or private school agencies is violating a 1987 federal requirement to inspect buildings for asbestos and develop a cleanup plan, the Environmental Protection Agency said Monday.

Thousands of other school districts have been unable to meet the deadline for the inspection and cleanup requirements but are not in technical violation of the law because of extensions granted by state officials.

The figures released by the EPA provided the first indication as to how effectively public and private school leaders are handling the asbestos problem, which raised widespread concern several years ago and prompted Congress to order inspections and cleanup efforts nationwide.

According to the EPA, compliance with the inspection and cleanup requirements has been uneven among the states. Ten states show that better than 95 percent of their public school systems and private schools met last October's federal deadline for having inspection and cleanup plans. Six states had fewer than 60 percent of their school agencies in compliance.

The EPA figures reflect the response to the asbestos requirements by more than 50,000 school entities, many of them private.

Although the EPA has no complete figures breaking down compliance rates between public and private schools, a spokeswoman said that generally the public school districts have a much better compliance record.

Detective novel complicated

Character's humorous twists, turns tied together

By Mark Schreiner
Collegian Reviewer

Douglas Adams' new novel, "The Long Dark Tea-Time of the Soul," has an impossibly complicated plot whose threads shoot everywhere for no apparent reason before neatly crashing together again in the last few pages for a wonderfully tidy ending.

Adams wrote for "Monty Python's Flying Circus" and wrote the four-book "Hitchhiker's Guide to the Galaxy" series and "Tea-Time's" prologue, "Dirk Gently's Holistic Detective Agency."

In "Tea-Time," readers are again introduced to private detective Dirk Gently and his characteristic "zuegmas" — understatements and descriptions of effects rather than causes — to create "a profound sense of something or other."

Kate Schechter is an American in London who misses home-delivered pizza more then anything. She is waiting to fly to Oslo, Norway, when the check-in desk explodes in what authorities later deem "an Act of God."

While she's getting out of the hospital, Dirk is learning in a seemingly unrelated subplot that his new client has been decapitated by a green-eyed goblin with a scythe.

Review

Dirk works on holistic principles, believing in the "fundamental interconnectedness of all things." Because everything in the universe affects every other thing, Dirk sometimes finds it necessary to question table legs.

This case is tough on Dirk. He breaks his nose and an eagle claws his hand. His horoscope says, "Virtually everything you decide today will be wrong." The next day it says, "You are fat and stupid and persistently wear a ridiculous hat which you should be ashamed of."

Dirk is so confused that "being run over by a motorcycle courier was a relatively restful experience since it mostly involved lying down a lot and not being swooped on every two minutes."

While these two subplots writhe and produce enough offspring to make a high school English teacher dizzy, Adams introduces more characters and personified objects.

There are Dirk's refrigerator, that is full of guilt, and his I Ching calculator, which gives the answer "a suffusion of yellow" for problems whose answer is more then four.

There are the gods of Norse mythology, including the chief god, Odin, who sleeps for fun; the weasel-god, Toe Rag, who "you simply want to push away from you with a sharp stick"; and the thunder-god, Thor, who thinks thinking is dumb.

Kate has a possession which allegedly is a car. There's Odin's van, which had "absolutely nothing to say to anyone, and it said it loudly and distinctly."

In this book, Adams makes his first social statements as a writer, ripping advertising, advertisers, psychiatrists and psychologists.

He builds the reader's suspense by hiding how all the non sequitors will fit until the last 10 pages, when everything crashes together in one neat package. "Tea-Time" may need to be read twice to understand how everything works out.

Adams' wacky style carries the book until the zany ending.

While probably not as good as Adams' other novels, "The Long Dark Tea-Time of the Soul" is fun. Available only in hardback, it costs $17.95, has 320 pages, takes about six hours to read and has one picture.

Salvadorian voters elect new president

By The Associated Press

SAN SALVADOR, El Salvador — Alfredo Cristiani, who has tried to end memories of his right-wing party's links to death squads that killed thousands of his countrymen, was recognized as the victor Monday in the presidential election.

Fidel Chavez Mena, candidate of the incumbent Christian Democrats, conceded and told a news conference, "I have called him personally to congratulate him and express my desire that God illuminate him in governing the country."

Cristiani, of the Republican Nationalist Alliance, or Arena, will take over from President Jose Napoleon Duarte on June 1. Although Duarte was one of the United States' top allies, he was unable to end nine years of civil war with leftist rebels that left 70,000 dead.

In Washington, the State Department said it was prepared to support the new Salvadoran government, but only if it protects democracy and protects human rights.

"Our relationship with that new government will depend on its adherence to democracy and respect for human rights, the twin pillars of our approach to El Salvador," said department spokesman Charles Redman.

Redman praised the Salvadoran people for braving "violence and terror" by leftist guerrillas who, he said, tried harder to disrupt Sunday's balloting than any other in seven years.

White House Press Secretary Marlin Fitzwater said the elections "represent a strong desire by the people of El Salvador for the ability to participate in the election process." But he said the United States was "concerned about the level of guerrilla attacks and human rights abuses" during the balloting.

Asked whether the United States accepted the results, Fitzwater said: "I don't think we've reached a judgment about the validity" of the results.

U.S. Ambassador William Walker denied an Arena victory would be a defeat for U.S. policy.

XTC's latest creates unique atmosphere

By Doug Fall
Collegian Reviewer

With a fanfare and a song titled "Garden of Earthly Delights," XTC introduces its latest effort, "Oranges and Lemons." What follows is 15 masterfully written songs impossible to dislike.

"Oranges and Lemons" creates an atmosphere not unlike The Beatles' classic "Sgt. Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band." From the start, XTC welcomes all to its show to see the many marvels contained within. Each song creates a musical journey with topics ranging from President Bush to ecology to philosophy.

Review

XTC consists of Colin Moulding, Dave Gregory, and Andy Partridge playing a variety of instruments, all used to create a style of music best described as unique. Somewhere between The Talking Heads and Lawrence Welk lies the kind of music this band composes. The lyrics verge on poetry as they drift throughout the music.

The first single released from this album, "Mayor of Simpleton," has received a fair amount of airplay and is characteristic of XTC. The sappiness of this love song can be easily overlooked because of the high level of writing that went into the lyrics.

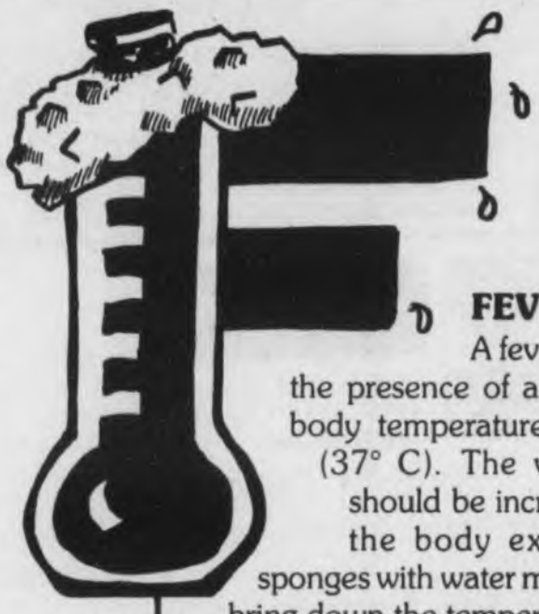
"King for a Day" is a scathing view of modern materialism as Moulding criticizes all of the greed and selfishness permeating today's business world. This view is a common theme throughout the album, as many songs question modern values and the grounds on which they are founded.

President George Bush is raked across the coals for his support of capital punishment in "Here Comes President Kill Again." With statements like "Hooray, Queen Caring is dead," Partridge effectively expresses his personal opinion about this issue.

On "Scarecrow People," Partridge uses clever analogy to comment on the self-centeredness that leads to environmental waste. Using the Wizard of Oz's scarecrow with no brain, he romps through the land with no heed for the results of his actions.

If "Oranges and Lemons" was only another album filled with jabs at the problems of society, it could be easily dismissed. However, there is a lot more to the album. Between these attacks are pieces filled with genuine emotion.

"Hold Me Daddy" is perhaps the most moving song about broken relationships that has been written in a long while. Partridge regrets his alienation from his father and in the end writes "In another time and another place where our history bends/ We could've been the best of friends and not merely related/ Hold me daddy, I forgot to say I love you."



Winding up this album is the mesmerizing "Chalkhills and Children." A sort of psychedelic landscape is painted as Partridge soars above a "soulless, sequined showbiz moon," anchored only by his feet. He vividly describes his lazy journey through his mind admidst lofty music until he finally fades into nothing.

NIT doesn't spoil Lady Cats' season

Turnaround came year early

Staff/Greg Vogel

Even though Matilda Mossman's Lady Cats finished the season tied for third place in the Big Eight, they were still shunned by two post-season tournament committees. The Lady Cats ended the season 18-11.

By Chris Hays
Sports Editor

Even after losing to Oklahoma State in the semifinals of the Big Eight tournament March 5, the Lady Cats still received good news when it was learned they were being considered as a possible National Invitational Tournament selection.

But when the selections were made March 12, the Lady Cats were not among the selections for the eight-team NIT, which will be played this weekend in Amarillo, Texas.

"We were more disappointed (at not being selected) because we were led to believe that our chances were very good," Lady Cat coach Matilda Mossman said. "Supposedly (the NIT) wanted a Big Eight team and with Oklahoma State getting in the NCAA, we thought it was just a matter of time.

"Then we learned that we didn't get a bid and it was very disappointing."

But overall the season was anything but a disappointment for Mossman and the Lady Cats. In one year, the K-State women went from having the first losing record for a Lady Cat or Mossman-coached team at 8-20 to a third-place tie in the Big Eight and an 18-11 record overall.

"(When) you take an 8-20 team and turn around to 18-11 with essentially the same people, you have to feel very good," Mossman said. "We set a goal of finishing fourth in the conference at the beginning of the season. We thought we had a legitimate shot at fourth, but then to finish in a third-place tie is just icing on the cake."

The turnaround could be considered surprising because it came a year earlier than anyone, including Mossman, expected. The sophomore- and junior-dominated team could have probably done what they did this year much more easily as juniors and seniors.

However, the Lady Cats were able to go from an 8-20 record with a freshmen- and sophomore-led squad during the 1987-88 season to an 18-11 finish with a starting lineup of a freshman, three sophomores and a junior this year.

Mossman attributes much of the turnaround to the experience that sophomore starters Kristie Bahner, Nadira Hazim and Diana Miller were able to gain as freshmen.

"I think next year was really the year we were pointing to when we signed Kristie, Nadira and Diana," Mossman said, "but the experience and added confidence that group gained as freshmen (made) a big difference."

As sophomores, the group combined to average 28.4 points and 18.1 rebounds a game. Hazim led the charge from her off guard position. The Topeka West product averaged 14.1 points and was tabbed as a second team all-conference selection in just her second season.

Diana was next in scoring at 13.2 points and was second in rebounding with 6.6 a game. The forward from Buhler was also named honorable mention all-Big Eight.

The leading rebounder, third leading scorer and probably the most improved Lady Cat was Bahner. Bahner, out of Topeka High, improved on a five points-per-game average from a year ago to 11.1 points this season, while leading the team with 7.7 rebounds a contest.

The other starter, Rita Matteucci, and reserves Arneetrice Cobb and Amy Davidson, all juniors, also were key ingredients for the Lady Cats. With last year's leading scorer Janet Madsen suffering a season-ending knee injury after just two games, Matteucci stepped in to average 8.1 points and 4.4 rebounds a game, while Davidson and Cobb combined for nearly nine points off the bench.

But the Lady Cat with possibly the biggest impact on the squad's 180-degree turnaround was freshman Mary Jo Miller. The former Miss Basketball of Minnesota, out of Tracy-Milroy High, brought to K-State a spark and unwillingness to lose that the Lady Cats needed following their disappointing season the year before.

Mary Jo's impact was immediately felt by the Lady Cats. In the second game of the season, K-State was down by 20 with just more than five minutes remaining against Montana in the championship game of the McCall Pattern Classic at Bramlage Coliseum. The 5-foot-5 point guard refused to give up, and took over from there.

With Mary Jo leading the way, the Lady Cats outscored Montana, 25-4, the rest of the way and Hazim's bucket at the buzzer gave K-State a 66-65 win. Mossman now points back to that game as one of the keys to the Lady Cats' success this season. She points to the way Mary Jo took charge of the Lady Cats from there.

"With about six minutes left and down by 20," Mossman said after the Montana game, "there was only one person on the floor who thought for sure we still had a chance to win and that was Mary Jo Miller."

And that desire to win seemed to rub off the rest of the Lady Cats. They went on to win 14 of their next 19 games and, at 16-5, seemed to be well on their way to a second-place finish in the conference with a 20-win season after losing 20 a year ago.

But reality set in as the Lady Cats had to play the majority of their six remaining regular-season games on the road. In that stretch, K-State went 1-5 and also lost at home to then 11-12 Kansas, to all but wash away any of its postseason hopes.

Finishing the regular season 17-10 and heading into the Big Eight tourney, the Lady Cats faced a must-win situation if they were to be invited to the NCAA party.

The Lady Cats kept their hopes alive with a first-round win over Nebraska, but then Oklahoma State stood in the way. And the Cowgirls would not be denied, downing the Lady Cats, 65-53, to end the season on a sour note for the Lady Cats.

Sooners playing well, but Mizzou might be best NCAA bet

Svoboda on Sports

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Columnist

The NCAA tournament is in full swing, and just a "sweet" 16 teams remain in the field that originally numbered 64. Two of those teams are from the Big Eight Conference, and both of those teams are coming off, arguably, their best outings of the year.

Oklahoma, which was seemingly asleep in Kansas City at the Big Eight postseason tournament and was routed by Missouri in the tourney finale, responded to a lackluster showing in its opening round NCAA game by winning its second-round contest by a whopping 43 points, and set a record in the process.

The Sooners that scored 124 points in that win over Louisiana Tech were the Sooners that put fear in the hearts of virtually every team in the country until mid-February.

When Mookie Blaylock is confidently running the Sooner attack from his guard position, there is no better team offensively in the country.

The key, though, is balance. Oklahoma has several weapons with which it can hurt a foe, and until recently had put several of them back in the gun cabinet. Forward William Davis was the only Sooner who had displayed any consistency from mid-February until now.

That's why the Big Eight's other entrant in the round of 16, Missouri, is the best bet for winning the conference a second straight national crown.

The Missouri team that beat Texas 108-89 Sunday in Dallas may have been the best Missouri team I've ever witnessed, and I was fortunate enough to see the Mizzou squads of the early '80s that featured John Sundvold and Steve Stipanovich.

Missouri's execution of its offensive scheme against the Longhorns was as close to flawless as I've seen. The Tigers' big men dominated inside, and the entire team passes the ball as well as any college team has in the past several years.

When you watch Missouri against Syracuse in the Midwest regional semifinals, count the number of backdoor buckets the Tigers get. If the number is high, look for Missouri to come away with the win. The number of times Missouri hit backdoor cutters against Texas was astounding, and several of those plays came with a great deal of congestion in the lane.

But don't give the Missouri players all the credit for the greatness the team has achieved as of late. The Tiger coaching staff has been a key to Missouri's recent resurgence as well.

Interim coach Rich Daly has his team under control after a difficult first eight games that saw his team go 4-4, including a loss to K-State in Bramlage Coliseum in the regular season's final week.

Since dancing through Kansas City with an unblemished 3-0 mark, the Tigers have reeled off two more wins at the big dance. A five-game winning streak is modest, but it indicates Missouri finally feels comfortable with its new coach, and that Daly finally has control of his — not Norm Stewart's — team.

One of Daly's first key coaching moves — though it may not have been a move he made entirely on his own — was the naming of former Tiger great Al Eberhart as an assistant coach. The new Tiger assistant's first project was working with forward Doug Smith to get him back down "on the block" inside, and Smith has responded during the last five games with performances only All-Americans Sean Elliott and Danny Ferry are likely to match.

In short, this is a very good Missouri team peaking at exactly the right time. And Oklahoma may just be over its doldrums as well. All in all, if the Tigers can get past Syracuse, and the Sooners can knock off Virginia, don't be surprised if you see these two Big Eight powers facing each other in the national semifinals in Seattle in two weeks.

That would be fine with me. The conference needs something to be proud of after a year filled with probations, arrests and other bad press — even if it does have to come from the two teams folks around here love to hate the most.

'Cats-OU contest moved to Nov. 18

By Chris Hays
Sports Editor

K-State is once again feeling the effects of Oklahoma's football team's probation, but this time those effects may not be so harsh.

The Wildcat football squad was slated to face the Sooners in the Coca-Cola Bowl on Dec. 3 in Tokyo. However, due to Oklahoma's not being able to play on television for two years, the game has been moved to Norman and set for Nov. 18.

"(The bowl officials) really could not market the game without TV," Athletic Director Steve Miller said.

Although K-State will lose a home date with the Sooners this year, the K-State Athletic Department will still gain financially from the schedule change.

"We will still end up gaining more, monetarily, than what we would have received from the Japan trip," Miller said. "We signed a contract with Oklahoma that will pay us double that of what Japan was going to be."

Japanese officials had guaranteed K-State $175,000 for the Coca-Cola Bowl, but now the athletic department will receive $350,000 from Oklahoma.

"We will be losing an excellent educational opportunity and also a good recruiting tool but, financially, we come out ahead," Miller said.

The Oklahoma game will fill the only open date left on the Wildcats' schedule. K-State will begin its spring workouts March 28 and has scheduled an intrasquad game to end spring drills April 29.

UCLA meet provides tough competition; Speer sets record

From Staff and Wire Reports

WESTWOOD, Calif. — It was a week to train in a favorable climate for the K-State outdoor track and field teams. Both the men's and women's teams took advantage of spring break to travel a week early to prepare for a meet at UCLA.

The home team won both divisions, as the UCLA women outdueled K-State, 63-48, while the UCLA men scored 111 points to Iowa's 38 and K-State's 27.

Senior high jumper Brad Speer highlighted the performances by the K-State men. He set a meet record, winning the event with a leap of 7-2.

Also opening the season with wins were Pat Allen and Pat Hessini. Allen had a throw of 201-9 in the javelin, while Hessini won the 1,500-meter run with a time of 3:51.2.

Distance runners also came up with second- and third-place finishes in the two mile. David Warders was second in 8:55.4, while Jan Jonsson was third in 9:00.6.

For the women, freshman Latricia Joyner came up with wins in the 100 meters and 200 meters, with times of 11.98 and 24.1 respectively. Kim Kilpatrick opened the season with a second-place finish in the 100-meter hurdles with a 13.68 clocking.

K-State also took first and second in the high jump with DeDe Henderson and Connie Teaberry each clearing 5-8. Freshman Greta Semsroth won the javelin with a mark of 150-5 and Carla Shannon won the triple jump with a 39-7¼ mark, while finishing second in the long jump at 18-6½.

K-State's veteran distance runner Becky Ives came away with second in the 800 meters at 2:18.06 and finished third in the 1,500 meters at 4:42.4.

The teams have this weekend off and come back to compete in the K-State Invitational on April 2.

Sports Briefly

Baseball double-dip canceled

Today's baseball games, which were slated for 1 p.m., have been canceled due to Monday's weather. K-State was scheduled to play host to perennial NAIA power Emporia State in a double header at Frank Myers Field.

Wildcat coach Mike Clark said attempts to reschedule the games have been made but they will first have to be approved by Emporia State's athletic director.

Clark also said the weather conditions are expected to improve by Thursday and that he was confident the game with Washburn Thursday at 2 p.m. will go on as scheduled.

KC purchases rookie's contract

HAINES CITY, Fla. — The Kansas City Royals have purchased the contract of first baseman-designated hitter Nick Castaneda from Yucatan of the Mexican League.

Castaneda, who played five years in the minor league system of the Pittsburgh Pirates, will be assigned to the Royals Triple-A club at Omaha, the Royals said Monday. Castaneda, 26, was batting .200 with a home run and three RBI this spring.

In his third year in the Mexican League last year, Castaneda hit .374 with 23 home runs and 78 RBI.

Kentucky assistant resigns

LEXINGTON, Ky. — Dwane Casey, the principal figure in the NCAA's investigation of the Kentucky basketball program, resigned Monday as assistant coach of the Wildcats.

Casey's resignation came one day after Eddie Sutton resigned as head coach of the beleaguered program.

Professor studies cause of genetic eye disease

By Bryan Ackley
Collegian Reporter

For 12 years, Dolores Takemoto, associate professor of biochemistry, has been trying to discover the cause of inherited retina degeneration.

There is no cure for this disease, which causes one in every 100,000 people to lose their sight by the time they reach middle age, Takemoto said.

Such genetic defects can only be passed to offspring if both parents have the defective gene, she said.

"Hopefully, the cause of the defect can be found by researching the biochemical mechanism of human vision," Takemoto said.

If the mechanism of human sight is compared to a camera, the retina's function is comparable to the film inside the camera, Takemoto said.

The retina is responsible for light, dark and color vision, and it is what grabs light and sends it to the brain for processing, she said.

"The retina does this through a series of enzymes," Takemoto said. "The major protein that sees the light and captures it is a ring-structured compound that's related to vitamin A."

The main component of the protein binds itself to another protein called rhodopsin, which causes a cascade of events resulting in the transformation of chemical energy to electrical energy, she said.

Many advances in vision research have occured within the past 10 years; however, researchers have a lot of work ahead of them before they will fully understand inherited retina degeneration, Takemoto said.

Scientists understand the process by which the eye transforms light into a signal that can be interpreted by the brain, but "there are a lot of fine-tuning points along the way," she said.

"What scientists typically do is take a skin cell, look at the genes in it and see if (the person has) a whole set of genes or if (the genes) have been altered in any way," Takemoto said.

"You have to know what happens in a normal cell before you can figure out what's wrong with a defective one," she said. "Everyone has a copy of all their chromosomes in their cells, so if you lack something or have an altered one, you can look at it in any one of your cells."

Researchers don't know specifically what they're looking for because there have only been one or two eye diseases that are genetically understood, she said.

"The biggest help to this (type of) research has been molecular biology, or the idea that you can clone a gene and look at its structure," Takemoto said.

Researchers don't expect to find a cure for the disease or prevent inherited retina degeneration; however, they attempt to develop ways to detect the disease carriers, she said.

Genetic screening may offer a realistic possibility for the near future, Takemoto said. Genetic screening can detect if an individual carries a gene which would cause the disease.

Hayden signs tax cut legislation

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Gov. Mike Hayden signed into law Monday a bill that cuts state sales tax revenues by at least $6 million annually and includes a $5 million tax break for farmers.

The legislation makes permanent a one-year exemption, set to expire June 30, from the 4 percent tax for new farm machinery. It also expands an exemption for certain drugs and creates one for some items sold at festivals sponsored by non-profit groups.

Making the farm machinery exemption permanent was one of a group of changes in the tax code proposed by Hayden before the 1989 Legislature convened. The new law takes effect July 1.

"This is a very, very important piece of legislation," Hayden said. "The enactment of this legislation provides for ongoing support to our state's struggling agricultural sector."

Hayden signed the bill at a lectern set up on the first floor of the Capitol rotunda, as part of ceremonies marking Agriculture Day.

Hayden's lectern stood in front of a table of food donated to the governor by Kansas producers. More than 50 groups and companies set up tables or booths on the first and second floors of the Statehouse, and many offered visitors free food samples.

"We've been feeding the legislators out at Cedar Crest," Hayden said, referring to the governor's mansion, "and the larder is a little low. I see some good flour down there. If I could just get the first lady to use it to bake some bread."

The farm machinery exemption will cost the state $3.4 million annually, according to state Department of Revenue estimates.

Another provision of the bill would extend the exemption to "custom cutters," who are not farmers themselves but contract with farmers to harvest crops. It would cost $1.6 million annually.

The bill also would exempt over-the-counter drugs, such as aspirin, sold through prescriptions. Supporters of the change say nursing homes sometimes buy such drugs in large quantities or that doctors prescribe such medication so that it is used properly.

Prescription drugs already are exempt.

Sleep like a baby

Patricia Lea Weisbender, Manhattan

The Birthplace

From the moment of birth, you can feel comfortable knowing that your baby is being cared for by one of the The Birthplace's highly skilled and experienced nursery nurses. In fact, The Birthplace at Memorial Hospital offers this area's only Level II Neonatal Intensive Care Unit (NICU). Equipped with the latest in newborn technology, this nursery is designed to care for babies with special medical problems. Sophisticated monitoring equipment provides our staff with the best possible information about your baby's condition.

If your baby is in the NICU, you are encouraged to spend time holding, feeding, and caring for the baby within the unit. A guest room is even available for those parents wishing to stay overnight.

Not all babies need the special care of our intensive care nursery, but you can sleep like a baby just knowing it's there.

We would welcome the opportunity to meet you and to show you The Birthplace. To schedule your personal tour, please call the Director of Education at 776-3300, ext. 113.

Experts: Gadget shows promise in measuring blood-alcohol level

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — A Vermont town showed a markedly reduced drunken driving rate after residents were taught to use an inexpensive gadget to estimate their blood-alcohol levels, according to a study that experts called promising.

The town's rate of driving with hazardous blood-alcohol levels was only about half that of a similar community that gave no training, the study found.

Although the small study could provide only preliminary evidence that the program works, the results look encouraging, said co-author John K. Worden of the University of Vermont College of Medicine.

He and colleagues from the university and state government present the work in this month's issue of the American Journal of Public Health.

Experts said the results were promising, but that some questions about effectiveness remain to be answered. They also said such a program should be considered only in combination with other strategies to reduce drunken driving.

The study involved three Vermont communities which Worden declined to identify, two with populations of about 5,000 and the third approaching 12,000. They were similar in terms of education level, household income and the proportion of males among residents aged 16 to 29.

In one community, an education program featured wallet-sized cards and small cardboard dials for estimating one's own blood-alcohol concentration according to body weight and the number of drinks consumed. About 3,000 dials were handed out in bars, stores, restaurants and filling stations.

Customers were trained to use the dials at those outlets and in television announcements broadcast about 20 times a week.

Judge intervenes to stop Dallas prisoner's release

By The Associated Press

DALLAS — A judge's last-minute intervention kept Randall Dale Adams in prison Monday as he was about to walk free after serving 12 years in prison on a controversial conviction for the killing of a police officer.

District Judge Ron Chapman reset Adams' bond at $100,000, superseding another judge's decision to release Adams simply on a promise to appear in court.

The action, which culminated an afternoon of confusion among prosecutors, judges and defense attorneys, came after the District Attorney's office filed a motion to have state District Judge Larry Baraka removed from the case.

In another late development, prosecutors said for the first time that they were prepared to retry Adams since his conviction was overturned after being questioned in the film "The Thin Blue Line."

"We are ready for a trial right now," said Assistant District Attorney Winfield Scott Scott. "We could call and crank up this trial right now if you wanted us to. We're fully prepared to proceed with the trial."

Prior to Scott's comments, it was unknown whether prosecutors felt they had enough evidence to seek a new trial.

Judge Chapman said 54th District Judge Carl Anderson would hear the motion to have Baraka removed from the case Tuesday afternoon. If the judge rules that Baraka should not be removed from the case, Adams could be released under the $50,000 personal recognizance bond that Baraka set for him earlier Monday.

But Chapman said, "Once the motion to recuse is filed, Judge Baraka has no other authority to do anything further on the case."

Chapman and Baraka are both state judges, however, Chapman presides as administrative judge for the region.

Defense attorney Randy Schaffer said Adams did not have the 10 percent necessary to post bail on the $100,000 bond. Adams remained held in the Lew Sterrett Justice Center Monday night.

"I guaranteee it's not tonight, and I don't know when, if ever," Schaffer said on whether Adams would be able to post bail.

Adams, 40, has steadfastly maintained his innocence in the 1976 shooting death of Dallas police officer Robert Wood. He originally was sentenced to death, but his sentence was changed to life in prison in 1980.

His conviction was unanimously overturned by the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals on March 1.

The appeals court reviewed the case on the recommendation of Baraka, and agreed with his ruling that Adams did not receive a fair trial.

Adams' case had been resurrected with the help of New York filmmaker Errol Morris, whose documentary "The Thin Blue Line" suggested the slaying was committed by the prosecution's chief witness, David Harris.

Harris, who is on death row for another slaying, was not charged in the Wood shooting. He testified at Adams' 1977 trial that Adams was driving a car that the police officer pulled over, and that Adams shot the officer.

However, in a hearing before Baraka last December, Harris testified that Adams did not kill Wood.

be a criterion."

Learning to respect every graduate program at a university is a mandatory characteristic for a vice provost, Peterson said.

"Because I learned to respect everyone's occupation while growing up on an Iowa farm, I have the capability of respecting all of the various kinds of research offered at K-State," she said.

Peterson said she has a specific interest in updating the computer system on campus.

"In order to be a major research institution, we need to acquire more computing capacity," she said. "We need to establish a research community; networking, resource sharing with other universities and update computer capacity."

Chander Bhalla, professor of physics, said Peterson has good experience which would benefit K-State.

"I would like to see somebody like her get a chance," he said.

Peterson said the people and atmosphere she has discovered at K-State are what she is looking for.

"I enjoy research and K-State is a university that is trying to move ahead," she said. "There is a real desire to move forward, and I enjoy working with people to help develop all that. I'm very impressed with the people at K-State."

Peterson is a professor of educational and counseling psychology at the University of Tennessee at Knoxville and has a history of educational background including a Ph.D. in education from Ohio State University. She was dean of research at Tennessee for five years.

Jaime Suriano, a U.S. representative of the Farabundo Marti Liberation Movement of El Salvador, speaks about the political struggles in El Salvador during a lecture in Union Forum Hall Tuesday night.

Future dark for foreign policy in Central America, speaker says

By Michael Nichols
Campus Editor

It is a scary situation for people in El Salvador and a dark future for American foreign policy in the region, said Jaime Suriano, U.S. representative of the Farabundo Marti Liberation Movement of El Salvador.

Suriano, who represents the Radio Faribundo Marti of the FMLN, spoke to about 170 people in the Union Tuesday.

El Salvador elected Alfredo Cristiani president Monday during a civil war and escalating conflicts between the government and left-wing FMLN forces, Suriano said. Cristiani is a member of the Republican Nationalist Alliance, or ARENA, which represents the interests of the wealthy property owners.

"I think it has been about 4½ years since (former Salvadoran president) Jose Napoleon Duarte spoke here, and the situation is very similar," he said. "He was elected shortly before speaking here ... and two days ago, ARENA won the election."

Suriano said although there have been five elections in El Salvador since the war broke out in 1980, the country is not enjoying democracy.

Democracy is not possible because the armed forces coerce people to vote, he said.

"If you are stopped by the armed forces, you are forced to produce identification, and if it is not stamped (for having voted), you are arrested," Suriano said. "Almost 60 percent of those registered to vote didn't show up.

"It was probably more courageous for those who didn't vote than for those who did, because the armed forces will be going into the streets checking IDs."

The FMLN made the government a proposal to postpone the elections for four months so the group could register its voters, he said. This proposal required that the military be held in its quarters, the Bush administration withold official support from any candidate and a cease-fire be negotiated. The FMLN, in turn, would cease its military offensive.

"The government told us to lay down our arms and said it would postpone the election for one month," Suriano said.

The FMLN boycotted the election, attacking 12 of the 14 Salvadoran military installations.

"We think the Bush administration has accepted the outcome as legitimate," he said. "... A peaceful solution or adequate change cannot occur without the FMLN as a political force.

"We are going to give Cristiani the benefit of the doubt, but no talks can be based on the FMLN laying down its weapons. Why are we going to all of a sudden believe Alfredo Cristiani and the ARENA will accept our position without condemning us to death?"

Suriano said the Bush administration must pursue an alternative policy to bring democracy to El Salvador.

Van Zile architects selected

By Karen Allen
Staff Writer

Housing officials have selected two architecture firms to design the renovation of Van Zile Hall, and construction should begin as scheduled Aug. 1, said Thomas Frith, director of housing.

Black and Veatch of Kansas City, Mo., and Ron Reid Associates of Manhattan will soon present preliminary drawings for consideration to housing officials, Frith said. However, an exact date for the presentation of the drawings has not been set.

Ron Reid, of Reid Associates, said he wasn't sure when the design drawings would be completed, but the firms are aware they are "under a time constraint."

Reid said the firms have gathered the program information and old drawings from University facilities officials and will now begin "starting the schematic design."

Larry Garvin, director of facilities planning, said he is confident the renovation plan will stay on schedule and that a contractor will be selected by July 1. Bids for the contract will be taken in early June.

"If anyone can beat (the deadline), this group (of architecture firms) can," Garvin said. The firms will subdivide the work.

"We're really excited ... we see it as one of the nicest buildings and complex of buildings on the campus," Reid said. "We're endeavoring to retain the character of the building."

One of the goals of the firms is to re-construct Van Zile in the same spirit in which it was created, but to also "provide for modern amenities such as air conditioning," Reid said.

Of $6.9 million budgeted for the renovation plan, about $333,000 was set aside for asbestos removal, Garvin said. Asbestos consultants have taken tests and will soon submit their recommendations for a removal plan.

He said the University's job is to "deliver (Van Zile) asbestos-free to the building contractor by July 1."

Van Zile should be ready for occupancy by the fall of 1990. Frith said the semester Van Zile opens, either Boyd or Putnam will close for renovations. And in January 1991, the residents will be shifted once again to allow for renovations to the hall that was left open the previous semester.

Changes to admissions bill debated

By Susan L'Ecuyer
Managing Editor

Proponents of an admissions bill that would implement qualified admissions policies at the state's three largest universities fielded questions from a skeptical House Education Committee Tuesday.

Denise Apt, education liaison for Gov. Mike Hayden, outlined the amendments made to the bill earlier rejected by the Senate Education Committee.

With the amendments, the bill before the House Education Committee would apply to all students seeking admission to the University of Kansas, K-State or Wichita State University.

Admission to those universities would be granted to all students who either complete a specified high school curriculum with a grade point average of 2.0, graduate in the top third of their high school class or receive a composite score of 23 on the American College Testing Assessment tests.

Those 21 years of age or older with a General Education Diploma score of 54 would also be granted admission, Apt said.

A foreign language requirement was dropped from the House Education Committee's version of the bill, which would be implemented July 1, 1993, if approved by the Legislature.

"Enhanced preparation is a better name for this legislation," Apt said. "It means readiness for our youth so no more doors will be closed to them."

Apt argued that education was a cumulative process that develops knowledge slowly from one level to another, and compared the current open admissions policy to enrolling a student with no knowledge of French into a fourth level French language course.

"Only a fool would argue that a student be allowed into a fourth level French class when he has no knowledge of French," she said. "Kansas universities are no place for remediation.

"Universities are an expensive proposition and we may well lose a student we have set up for failure."

Rep. Jim Louther, R-Emporia, told the committee that qualified admissions would help lower the rates of student attrition, which he said in some cases has reached as high as 41 percent in the past few years.

Louther said he believes the high

Director discusses proposed road near child play center

By Kevin Kramer
Staff Writer

Concerns regarding the construction of a new road north of the Stone House Child Care Center was the focus of discussion at the center's monthly meeting Tuesday night.

Larry Garvin, director of University Facilities Planning, met with about 30 concerned parents, Human Ecology faculty and students to address the concerns and questions regarding the road's construction. The proposal calls for the road to go through the northern portion of the center's playground area and within 150 feet of the center.

"The reason for the project is parking," Garvin said. "The road is an essential element to the new parking lots west of Stone House.

The proposed plans for the road call for it to intersect North Manhattan Avenue across from McCain Lane and continue past residence hall parking lots B-3 and B-16, ending at Mid-Campus Drive across from the Pittman Building.

"But the road will also serve other needs in the future — access to the areas of land north of the road," Garvin said.

The tentative, long-range plans for the area north of B-3 parking lot is the relocation of the physical plant, University facilities warehouses and motor-pool, then eventually the power plant, he said. The plans have been shown to the University administration and introduced to the colleges.

The meeting's discussion centered around the impact and alternatives to the proposed road. Garvin presented alternative plans which would move the Stone House playground to the south side of the center or would move the playground area south and the road 150 feet to the north of the original plan.

"I am pleased we had a meeting with the people directly concerned — the parents of the 18 children attending Stone House," said Barbara Stowe, dean of the College of Human Ecology. "Several good alternatives and questions were discussed.

"The concerns for parking and access to campus were layed out by Larry," Stowe said. "But, there is still a need for discussions on the effects on the academic prog-

Law interpretations addressed
Speaker says Supreme Court makeup vital

By Mindy Robert
Collegian Reporter

Those who care about constitutional law issues realize the composition of the U.S. Supreme Court makes a difference in how laws are interpreted, said Dorothy Thompson, assistant University attorney.

The ideology and philosophy of judges are crucial to being nominated to the Supreme Court, as evident by the nomination of Robert Bork, Thompson said.

Thompson spoke at a pre-convocation forum Monday night in the Union. Sarah Weddington, law professor at the University of Texas, will present a University Convocation Thursday at 7:30 p.m.in McCain Auditorium. Weddington will speak on "Shifting Balances on the Supreme Court."

Weddington represented "Jane Roe" in the historic 1973 Roe vs. Wade case that established a woman's choice to terminate or continue a pregnancy.

Other members of the panel were Orma Linford, associate professor of political science; Judy Davis, director of the Women's Resource Center; and Gabrielle Thompson, assistant Riley County Attorney. The panel was moderated by Sarah Merrill, assistant professor of philosophy.

"We don't realize how powerful the Supreme Court is," Dorothy said. The Supreme Court chooses the cases it will hear and chooses ones where it wants to make a statement or change some law.

Attorneys devise strategies because they believe the time is right for particular issues. A change in personnel on the Supreme Court could indicate a time for particular issues, she said.

"The power of review of the Court is very, very significant power in our lives," Dorothy said.

The composition of the Supreme Court has changed since the Roe vs. Wade decision, she said. Five justices who were on the Supreme Court in 1973 are still members. Three supported the majority opinion and two dissented.

A future Supreme Court decision on the issue of abortion will be up to the other four members of the Court, Dorothy said. The Supreme Court is scheduled to hear a Missouri case dealing with the issue of abortion.

Peace placed above politics

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir and Shimon Peres, his political rival and partner, said Tuesday that peace is above party politics despite a battle within their troubled coalition over talking with the PLO.

Shamir and Peres, who is finance minister and leads the center-left Labor Party, had a news conference after addressing 1,600 international Jewish leaders invited by the government to express solidarity with Israel.

Their appearance followed controversy over the Palestine Liberation Organization inspired by leaks of a secret intelligence report that said local Palestinians would not enter peace talks without the PLO's blessing.

More than 400 Palestinians and at least 17 Israelis have been killed since a Palestinian uprising began more than 15 months ago in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, which Israel captured in the 1967 war.

In Tel Aviv on Tuesday, a Palestinian who brandished a commando knife and shouted "Allah is great!" stabbed an elderly Jewish man and wounded two other people before police shot and captured him, authorities reported.

Children's cholesterol studied

ANAHEIM, Calif. — Doctors will resist testing every child for unhealthy cholesterol levels, despite a study that suggests two-thirds of youngsters at risk of heart disease go undetected, experts said Tuesday.

"The study is great" but further research will be needed to convince pediatricians that all youngsters should get a blood cholesterol test, said nutritionist Mary Winston, a senior science consultant for the American Heart Association.

"These (heart) diseases clearly begin in childhood and progress," said Dr. Gerald Berenson, cardiology chief at Louisiana State University Medical Center. "The problem is how to get the pediatricians interested in beginning preventive cardiology in childhood."

The study was presented Monday at the American College of Cardiology's annual scientific session by Dr. Dennis Davidson, chief of preventive cardiology at the University of California, Irvine.

Davidson said testing all school children would let doctors "detect all children in the upper ranges of high cholesterol and help families change their diet to lower the risk to the children."

The American Heart Association and American Academy of Pediatrics now recommend children's blood cholesterol levels tested only if they have a family history of early heart attack or excess blood cholesterol.

Court won't block execution

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court late Tuesday refused to halt the execution of Leon Rutherford King, who was scheduled to die early Wednesday in Texas for killing a man 11 years ago.

King made three separate emergency requests to the high court. Two were denied by votes of 7-2, and the third by a vote of 5-4.

Justices William J. Brennan and Thurgood Marshall, who oppose the death penalty in all circumstances, voted in all three instances to spare King. Justices John Paul Stevens and Harry A. Blackmun joined them in one of the votes.

King, 44, was scheduled for lethal injection just after midnight for the 1978 slaying of Michael Clayton Underwood. King was tried and convicted twice of capital murder.

A federal judge in Houston and the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans refused on Tuesday to halt the execution, sending the case to the nation's highest court.

According to court records, Underwood, 26, and his 19-year-old girlfriend were abducted at gunpoint from a Houston nightclub in 1978 and taken to a remote area where Underwood was beaten to death and the young woman was forced to watch.

Dr. Ethel Erickson, the medical examiner who performed the autopsy on Underwood, compared the damage to the victim's head to what one would suffer if run down by a tractor-trailer.

Authorities said King and an accomplice, Allen Ray Carter, became enraged because the abducted couple were carrying only $11.50. After Underwood was killed, the woman was repeatedly raped and sodomized.

NRA Gun proposal halted

TOPEKA — The Senate Federal and State Affairs Committee killed a bill Tuesday that would have pre-empted local gun control ordinances.

Sen. John Strick, D-Kansas City, Kan., made the motion to kill the bill, which was supported by the National Rifle Association and hunting groups.

Supporters said the present patchwork quilt of local ordinances across the state are confusing. Some said gun control could be handled more efficiently at the state level. They also said some hunters could inadvertantly violate local ordinances while driving through towns.

Opponents said the bill would encroach on local home rule powers. They also said larger, urban areas needed more stringent gun control measures than rural areas. Opponents of the bill included the League of Kansas Municipalites and police officers, who warned that people would be able to wear weapons into restaurants and bars if the bill were passed.

Committee Chairman Sen. Ed Reilly, R-Leavenworth, who supported the bill, said the proposal could be tacked onto another bill that would prohibit people convicted of violent crimes from owning weapons.

Muslims analyze 'The Satanic Verses'

By Brian Hummell
Campus Editor

Salman Rushdie, author of "The Satanic Verses," deserves to be punished, but should not be executed, said Hamed Ghazali, zonal representative of the Muslim Student Association.

The Ayatollah Khomeini, religious leader of Iran, has called for Rushdie's death because the novel is "blasphemous" to Islam. Rushdie has subsequently gone into hiding and apologized to anyone offended by the book.

Ghazali, a graduate student in chemical engineering at the University of Kansas, presented his views to about 80 people at a Muslim Community Association sponsored review of Rushdie's novel in the Union Tuesday.

"(Rushdie) mixed fiction with reality ... he quotes real things from history, from the Koran, then goes to fiction — which is lies," Ghazali said. "The problem is in the language.

"It's not only offensive — the book and language used in the book are dirty. The words used are only in Playboy magazine and Hustler magazine."

He said the MSA wants Rushdie to be brought to trial, "we do not agree with killing (Rushdie)."

Rushdie could be charged with apostasy, rejecting one's original faith, and cursing a prophet, Ghazali said. Both charges are punishable by death under Islamic law.

However, he said, Rushdie would probably not be sentenced to die if he were brought to trial because "a judge in Islam would always look for doubts to set the guy free."

Muslims allow anyone to question Islam and even to question the presence of God, but there are limits to this freedom, he said.

The MSA is not against an "attack on Islam, but when you attack, don't insult me and put lies against my house and my family," Ghazali said.

He cited several examples from the novel to show the "dirty words used against the prophets and their companions."

"The word bastard associated with Abraham would be enough for a Muslim to want to punish (Rushdie)," Ghazali said. "I cannot tolerate these lies to any prophet. I want to punish (Rushdie) myself."

Media reports saying Rushdie's novel has caused some Muslims to question their faith are wrong, he said.

"Believe me, our reaction is to laugh," Ghazali said. "There is nothing that shakes the faith of Islam. All of the points used in (Rushdie's) book have been raised, there is nothing new."

Hisham Hidmi, president of the MCA, said "the fight against Islam is nothing new. It is not surprising to see external enemies join internal enemies (against Islam). Salman Rushdie's 'Satanic Verses' is one of the most insulting (attacks) against Islam."

Pilot of plane escapes injury

A malfunctioning cylinder forced Bryce Luty, Hutchinson, to land in a field near Barnes Road north of Manhattan Tuesday morning.

Engine trouble forces emergency landing

By Karen Allen
Staff Writer

Engine trouble forced a Hutchinson pilot to make an emergency landing Tuesday morning in a field about one mile north of Manhattan near the Rocky Ford fishing area. The pilot was not injured in the landing.

Bryce Luty took off in his 1972 Piper Cherokee from the Wamego City Airport and was bound for Junction City when he experienced engine trouble, said Trooper Timothy McCool of the Kansas Highway Patrol.

"He began to lose power and picked a nice, big field to set it down," McCool said. The plane came to rest in a field about one-half mile east of U.S. Highway 24 and 250 yards south of Barnes Road.

The field is owned by Joe and Joyce Hale of Kansas City, Kan., said Lesda Vanier, a Salina resident and mother of Joyce.

Luty said he first thought the engine problem was a buildup of carburetor ice, but the mechanism to apply heat to eliminate the ice would not function properly.

"I can't figure it out," he said, adding that it must have been a cylinder in the engine that malfunctioned.

After informing the control tower at the Fort Riley Marshall Army Airfield that he was losing altitude, Luty said, he decided to land because he knew he couldn't make it to the Manhattan Municipal Airport.

"Then Fort Riley alerted all the emergency vehicles. It's kind of embarrassing because it's not that big of a deal," he said.

Luty waits for a repair truck to arrive. He planned to leave the field Tuesday and continue his flight to Junction City.

Luty said he thought it took about 660 feet to land the plane, and it usually takes about 800 feet for a takeoff.

"I wasn't frightened because I knew I could get it down. I've landed in fields before," he said.

"It was a perfect landing ... it sat down beautifully."

Luty said he was fortunate to be flying alone.

"Had I had passengers, they would have gotten me scared," he said.

will include installing air-conditioning systems and new heating systems, and constructing student rooms in the former dining room and kitchen space areas, Frith said.

All three halls will be connected and Van Zile will house all food services. Several of the rooms will have shared baths instead of the group lavatories that are present in other residence halls, he said.

"Because we are offering a type of room that we don't have in other halls, I am sure it will be coed," Frith said.

Room assignments will probably be based on class standing and the number of years the student has spent living in the residence halls, he said.

"You would graduate up to it," Frith said.

In 1984, Van Zile was closed for renovations and was scheduled to reopen upon completion. But because of declining enrollment, former President Duane Acker decided against raising funds to renovate the hall and closed the building indefinitely.

Collegian Sports is a hit.

U.S. should stop funding unjust war

As expected, the National Republican Alliance (ARENA) candidate, Alfredo Christiani, emerged the victor from Sunday's presidential election in El Salvador.

Jaime Suriano, a representative of the Farabundo Marti National Liberation Front, which is waging a political and military struggle against the government of Jose Napoleon Duarte, told a crowd Sunday in Kansas City, Mo., that the ARENA victory would mean more death squad murders.

Although the aerial bombings and napalm attacks on the population have already created at least 1.5 million refugees in this nine-year-old "low intensity conflict," important sectors of ARENA want a "total war" against the guerrillas.

As the FMLN has grown in numbers and strength, the impracticality, if not the inhumanity, of Duarte's low intensity strategy has become increasingly evident to U.S. officials.

Despite the more than three billion in U.S. tax dollars that have flowed into El Salvador since 1980, the end of the war is nowhere on the horizon. The guerrillas have expanded the conflict and now control more than one-fourth of the country.

According to an article in the February issue of Progressive magazine, they can carry out operations in all 14 of the country's provinces.

Further, U.S. aid has failed to benefit the civilian population. Consumer buying power has dropped by half since 1980, and as many as 65 percent of the economically active population is unemployed or underemployed. El Salvador has the highest infant mortality rate in Central America and the Catholic Church estimates that 100,000 infants have died of hunger-related causes since 1980.

American taxpayers now contribute more to the Salvadoran national budget than do Salvadorans. They have funded a brutal war that has left Duarte's Christian Democratic Party increasingly unpopular with Salvadorans.

Yet, there are those in El Salvador who have benefited from U.S. aid: the military and the death squads. According to an article in the Feb. 22 Los Angeles Times, the armed forces have increased from 12,000 personnel in 1978 to 52,000. Death squad murders have been a regular feature of Duarte's "democracy."

If the Bush administration persists with this strategy, it will be at best a short reprieve from a real solution. It will have to be scrapped eventually for probably one of two options.

One is a negotiated settlement, which is unrealistic as long as the U.S. is supplying more weapons and ammunition to one side.

Commentary

Scott Miller

Collegian Columnist

The other, the so-called "Guatemalan solution" advocated by ARENA, would consist of exterminating a large segment of the population and forcing the rest into what have been called "model villages," "strategic hamlets," reconcentrados, or prison camps, depending upon one's degree of cynicism or honesty.

With ARENA in control of the National Assembly and the executive branch, the second option will probably be pursued. No doubt this will also add significantly to the suffering of Salvadorans and, in turn, to greater support for the FMLN.

On the surface, Sunday's result looks like another victory for fascism in Latin America. Because El Salvador is Washington's number one client state in this hemisphere, however, the ARENA victory could be a double-edged sword for cold warriors and advocates of a "Guatemalan solution."

Under Duarte, the armed forces and the death squads have been immune to government pressure to halt political executions. They have been, in effect, their own government. Sunday's election simply makes ARENA, the armed forces' political representative, the official government of El Salvador.

After June 1, when Duarte steps down, there should be no question in the minds of U.S. officials whether the napalm dropped on civilians in the countryside is done so by "moderates" in an overzealous anti-Communist crusade or by the most brutal elements of the country in an effort to terrorize the population.

True, that distinction is probably not very significant to the rural population itself, but it means the Bush administration and Congress will have to embrace the death squads more openly if ARENA makes good on its promises of a "total war." That could make it politically more difficult to continue the current level of funding.

Of course, the official line that "moderates" are struggling to hold their own against extremes of the right and left is at least as outrageous as the now-discredited account of Iranian "moderates" willing to use TOW missiles "defensively."

It is the "moderates" who have supported the already brutal war against the FMLN. ARENA has only advocated a significant escalation of it.

Meanwhile, in the weeks leading up to the election, the alleged extremist faction on the left, the FMLN, was taking what must have been for the State Department an embarrassingly moderate position. In addition to offers to accept the outcome of a fair election, the FMLN also scrapped its former demand that the rebel and government armies be integrated.

In an article in the Feb. 21 issue of the Nation magazine, Ruben Zamora, a leader in the FMLN's umbrella organization, the Democratic Convergence, reiterated the rebels' desire for a negotiated solution.

Zamora and other rebel representatives were also reiterating their platform of political pluralism, a mixed economy and a non-aligned foreign policy. This hardly seems congruent with the nonsense from the State Department about "extremism."

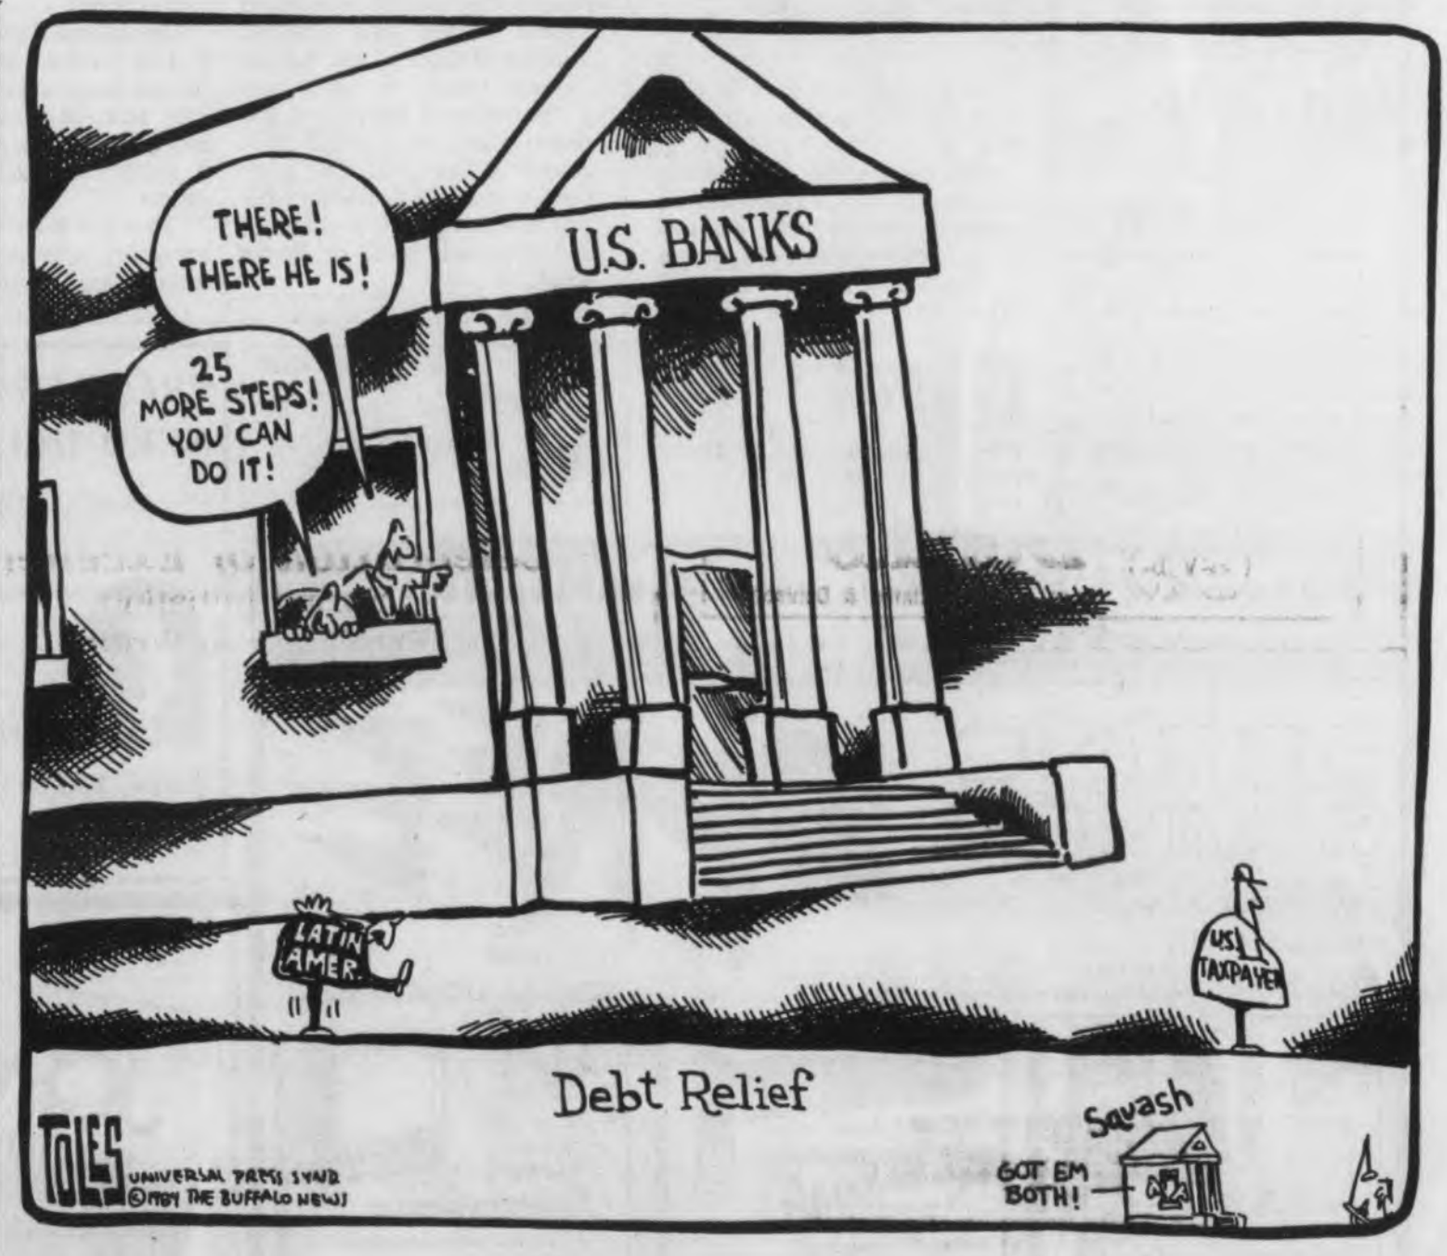
Clearly it's time the people in Washington who claim to represent our interests stop funding an unjust war and start working for a negotiated solution.

Sluggish ticket sales harmful for future acts

Two popular rock acts will visit K-State next week. Eddie Money will perform Wednesday at Bramlage Coliseum. The group Chicago will perform April 2 at Bramlage, coinciding with the All-University Open House. Both are well-known acts with current hit songs as well as older favorites.

Unfortunately, ticket sales have been sluggish for both performances. One concert may be in danger of cancellation if its sales don't improve. Sadly, this won't be the first time a Bramlage performance has been affected by poor ticket sales.

The eventual impact of poorly attended and canceled shows will likely be a return to the "old days," when K-State students were lucky to get one concert a year. Concert promoters will soon conclude that Manhattan is an unprofitable market area, and then Manhattan can kiss the big name acts goodbye.



Maybe everyone was spoiled by the Def Leppard concert: a No. 1 rock group with a diverse appeal appearing right off the bat.

Maybe everyone's waiting for the next "really big" concert to hit town. That caliber of concert appearing on campus is a rarity, though, and the chances of it occurring again can be increased only by supporting the other acts that appear in Bramlage.

The staff at Bramlage has provided K-State with a variety of performances since the building's opening in October. But the recent volume of concerts shouldn't be taken for granted. They will continue only with a steady show of support for the coliseum from the campus and the community.

So grab a buddy and check out the Eddie Money concert next Wednesday night. Or, after Open House next weekend, take your family out to Bramlage and see the Chicago concert.

By attending these and other performances in Bramlage Coliseum, you will help ensure that K-State will receive an ongoing supply of quality entertainment, and thus K-State students will continue to benefit from the multi-purpose facility they helped to build.

Collegian Editorial Policies

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR are always encouraged. Those which pertain to matters of campus and/or public interest are especially encouraged, and are given the highest priority.

Letters should be kept as brief as possible, preferably under 300 words. Those who cannot condense their opinions should consider submiting their letter in the form of a guest column. All letters are subject to editing for space, style and taste.

GUEST COLUMNS are also encouraged. The column should be no longer than two double-spaced, typed pages. If the submission is used as a column and not a letter to the editor, it will be accompanied by the author's photograph.

KU Senate reduces funding

Paper must face budget cut

The media is untouchable. Well — at least that's how we like to see it. But sadly enough, Thursday night the students and adviser of the University Daily Kansan at the University of Kansas may have to face the harsh reality of just who controls the media's purse strings.

KU's student government had more than $800,000 requested by student groups than it had available to allocate. So it was time to tighten some purse strings — and the UDK was selected.

The co-chairman of the Finance Committee said the UDK has a "unique ability" to raise revenue — mainly through advertisers. The paper's advertising rate hasn't been increased in three years, but it looks as though that will probably change before next year.

Each year, the campus' student newspaper, with a circulation of about 15,000, receives roughly 13 percent of its funding, or $109,000, from student fees. However, it's been decided that the newspaper will only need about half of that, $54,000, to operate properly in 1989-90.

The overall effect will be about a 6½ percent decrease in the paper's budget. That's a lot of newsprint.

The paper's adviser remains hopeful that the recommendation by the senate's Finance Committee won't be approved by the full Senate. If it is approved there, he hopes it won't pass university administrators.

Until then, the UDK's editors say they're just taking things one day at a time, while preparing a presentation for the Senate's meeting Thursday.

Commentary

Janet Swanson

Editor

In addition to raising the fees for ads, other options are available for the UDK. The paper, which runs about 52 percent advertising, could increase the ad percentage and decrease the amount of news coverage.

The Collegian has a tough time covering this campus with only 43 percent ads. I couldn't imagine trying to convince anyone that if we jumped up to 60 or 65 percent ads that we could even maintain the present level.

With a nest egg of about $235,000 built up as a reserve, the UDK shouldn't experience any immediately drastic effects from the change. However, a portion of the money it may be forced to use due to the allocation cut had been set aside to upgrade the paper's computer system — a move staff members say is long overdue.

But the effects of this recommendation shadow the real problem. College-level politicians have been given the power to control the campus' source of information.

The UDK, a national award-winning college publication, provided coverage of a particularly messy student body election last semester. And, as in most cases, not everyone was pleased with the newspaper's reporting.

Editors said they believe their coverage of that election, at least in part, played a role in the decision to chop the budget.

A member of the Finance Committee disagreed by saying, "They made that allegation because they are unhappy with the fiscal reality of the situation."

A major point in the conflict is that the UDK is the only group the committee recommends to receive a budget cut. It's proposed that every other group would receive as much or more in 1989-90 as they did in 1988-89.

Should the Senate approve the committee's recommendation, administrators should conduct an investigation of the allegations made by the UDK staff. Senate members have the right to make the decisions they're making, as long as they are unbiased and fair.

The result of this proposed cut could be a chilling effect on the coverage of campus government by the student newspaper and a rift between two units that should at least have a viable working relationship.

Senate committee debates high school journalism bill

By Susan L'Ecuyer
Managing Editor

TOPEKA—Testimony before the Senate Education Committee Tuesday stressed the importance of learning and responsible student journalism as promoted by the proposed Student Freedom of Expression Act.

House Bill 2234 requires that students assume the responsibility for articles in high school publications.

Ron Johnson, director of journalism and the student publications adviser at Fort Hays State University, said when the Supreme Court gave school administrators and advisers control of public school student publications, it denied students the important responsibility of decision-making.

"Too many times in education today, we don't let our students be mature," Johnson said. " ... We handle all the crises for them and along the way, something is lost.

"We push our children out of the nest without ever making them wrestle with the controversies, the issues that now threaten to engulf our society."

That belief was echoed by Eweleen Horbuckle Rhue, journalism teacher and adviser at Pittsburgh High School. She predicted that if she were to leave the field of teaching within the next five years, it would be because of her inability to handle the pressure of working with "teens troubled by issues of the real world."

In the past two years, Rhue said she has been approached by students dealing with problems of sexual abuse, alcoholism, divorce, pregnancy, abortion, running away, drug abuse, emotional abuse and suicide.

"I'm talking about beautiful, bright, talented young people ... teens facing issues of the real world — teens who should not be told they cannot write about those issues in a responsible manner," she said.

Jill Jess, senior in journalism at the University of Kansas and news editor of the University Daily Kansan, said students who are not allowed to make their own decisions and mistakes do not gain the full experience required for journalism.

"One of the best ways to learn is to make mistakes," Jess said. "But if censorship is exercised, high school students are not given the chance to realize the implications of their actions.

"Many people complain that journalists lack that basic understanding."

Sen. Lana Oleen, R.-Manhattan, testified before the committee in behalf of the bill. Oleen, who served as a high school publications adviser and taught English composition for 13 years, said she developed a "deep respect for student publications generated by our Kansas youth" as a result of her work.

"I respect the maturity of student writers and reporters as well as the working relationship they maintain with their sponsors, advisers and teachers," she said.

Earlier this month, the House of Representatives passed the bill.

Proposal to restrict ads tabled

By Robert Short
Staff Writer

Manhattan City Commissioners agreed to table a motion presented Tuesday disallowing all permanent advertising in Manhattan public parks and adult softball facilities.

Temporary advertising by sponsors of softball tournaments and other short-term events would be allowed with the approval of City Manager Mike Conduff, according to the motion presented by Commissioner Nancy Denning. The tabled motion must be presented for a second reading before it is approved as a city ordinance.

If the motion is passed, Manhattan merchants who entered into contracts with the city for permanent advertising in the Twin Oaks softball facility will have their contracts honored, Denning said. Some of the contracts extend for three to six years or more.

"I think we will let (the contracts) die when their expiration date is done," Denning said.

The Little Apple Task Force was formed as an organization opposing alcohol and tobacco advertising in Manhattan's public parks. Erma Riley, chairman of the task force, said children who attend the softball games receive a mixed message when they see beer and tobacco advertising at a sporting event.

Although the parks are intended for adult softball, the games are often attended by families, including young children, Riley said.

"We are in no way promoting our product be used by those under the drinking age," said Dean Campbell, president of Campbell Distributors. "'If you're a softball player, drink beer and you'll be better,' is not the message we're sending."

The beer distributors are being "segregated and set apart," said Dick Green, Manhattan. Beer distributors deserve the same advertising opportunities as other Manhattan merchants.

"They feel they are being too much a target by interest groups," Green said. "This seems to be a case of overkill from their standpoint."

Terry DeWeese, director of parks and recreation, said advertisers have provided the parks and recreation budget with about $32,000 during the last four or five years.

"(Advertisers) allow us to do more things in our parks," DeWeese said. "It has enabled us to stretch our budget dollars."

The commission also conducted the following business:

- Considered and approved a motion to authorize the mayor and city clerk to execute a contract to purchase property at 12th Street and Laramie Street including the Chameleon's building and its adjacent gravel parking lot. The property is to be converted into a parking lot as part of the Aggieville Improvement Project.
- Discussed a proposal to raise the transient guest tax for Manhattan from 3 cents to 5 cents. The tax is based on the use and number of motel and hotel beds in Manhattan.

Revenues gained from the increase in the transient guest tax would be directed toward building a new airport terminal, said Commissioner Eugene Klingler.

Position not accepted by Faculty Senate

By Todd Jenkins
Collegian Reporter

Faculty Senate failed to approve the creation of the proposed instructor "lecturer" position Tuesday. The issue was sent back to the Faculty Affairs Committee for further review.

The proposed position would be a temporary teaching position with no research requirements and could be appointed upon the fourth year of continuous full-time employment. The Senate proposal states the position would not be counted toward tenure.

David Vruwink, Faculty Affairs Committee chairman, said there were several issues that need to be addressed.

"We don't want the title to make a bigger problem than that which it is trying to solve," Vruwink said.

Nancy Twiss, adviser in the College of Arts and Sciences, spoke for the Faculty Women's Caucus, which met with the committee to discuss the proposed draft on the lecturer postion.

Twiss said she was opposed to a temporary lecturer position because of the length of time before appointment and continued reappointment.

"Faculty who continue for many years to be reappointed should not, in our (Women's Caucus) view, be labeled non-permanent. Continuing long-term, part-time faculty should also have rights," she said. Rather than helping the lecturer proposal, it "represents some steps backwards."

After the meeting, Vruwink said the original purpose of the committee was "to point out the rights and responsiblities that the lecturer postion would have.

"We are now going to try and address some of the issues that were raised and see if we can't come up with a compromise. We are not going to be able to solve all of them but we will try to compromise."

Drunk driving bills rejected

Committees refuse to lower sobriety level

From Staff and Wire Reports

TOPEKA — A proposal to strengthen the state's drunken driving laws by decreasing the amount of alcohol a person can drink and be considered legally sober appeared Tuesday to be virtually dead for the 1989 Legislature.

The House Federal and State Affairs Committee refused to endorse a bill containing the proposal, after an identical proposal failed to make it out of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Both bills would lower the amount of alcohol a person would need to have in his blood to be presumed intoxicated under the state's laws against driving under the influence of drugs and alcohol. If passed, the amount would be decreased from 0.10 percent to 0.05 percent and would place Kansas first in the nation for the toughest blood-alcohol limit.

The House committee voted to recommend to the full House that the bill not be passed. Such an action traditionally means a measure will not be debated.

Riley County Attorney Bill Kennedy called the legislation to lower the blood-alcohol limit a "silly bill."

"It would ultimately result in weakening rather than strengthening the statute," Kennedy said, adding that 0.1 percent is a low enough blood-alcohol limit.

"Juries just don't like to convict people that don't appear intoxicated," he said.

Persons with a blood-alcohol level of .05 would appear sober, Kennedy said.

"The legislature would be more appropriate by ordering blood tests rather than breathalizers to ascertain narcotics and find out what else (drivers) have in their system," Kennedy said.

Driving in an out-of-control fashion, he said, does not constitute a need for alcohol testing.

The Senate committee did not act on the proposal before March 8, the deadline for bills to be considered in the chamber in which they were introduced. Unless the committee votes to kill the bill, it will be carried over to the 1990 session.

"It's dead for this year in the House," said House Committee Chairwoman Ginger Barr, R-Auburn.

However, the leader of the state's temperance organization, Kansans for Life at Its Best, vowed to keep fighting for the measure's passage, saying it would discourage drunken driving.

The group's president, Rev. Richard Taylor, said 40 of the House's 125 members have signed a statement saying they support the change. Taylor said he hopes the proposal can be amended into another bill during a House or Senate debate.

"How sad it is that groups claiming to be concerned for highway safety want to permit drivers to drink more than 0.05 percent allows," Taylor said after the meeting. "The committee refused to send a message to persons to drink less before driving."

Rep. Michael Peterson, D-Kansas City, made the motion to report the bill adversely to the House.

Peterson said he and other committee members are concerned that changing the law could worsen a jail overcrowding problem for some counties.

He also said he's not sure it would take more than a drink or two for a person to reach the 0.05 blood-alcohol level.

In addition, Peterson said he's worried the proposal could hurt economic development.

"It'll knock out every restaurant, every hotel and every bar that I can see," he said. "I disagree with the reverend over how much it takes to get to 0.05 (percent). I'm not talking about the guy who goes out at lunch and doesn't stop until after dinner."

Ancestry behind egg

"Here comes Peter Cottontail, hoppin' down the bunny trail" Steve Nelson wrote to music. Easter's on its way with decorated eggs and the Christian celebration of the resurrection of Christ.

Eggs delivered by the Easter Bunny have a long ancestry. In their modern form of chocolate or plastic, they date back to the late 19th century, but the practice of giving real eggs, colored or gilded, is older.

According to the book "Easter and Its Customs," "Long before the Christian era, eggs were regarded as symbols of continuing life. The ancient Persians, Greeks and Chinese exchanged them at their Spring Festivals, when nature was revived after winter.

"In several pagan mythologies, we hear of the World Egg, from which the divine Sun-Bird was hatched or from which the two halves — Heaven and Earth — were formed."

To early Christians, eggs became associated with Easter as a symbol of resurrection for "they hold the seeds of life and represent the revival of fertility upon the earth," according to the book "All About American Holidays."

A belief in some districts of France held that if one did not eat eggs on Easter, he would be bitten by snakes in the ensuing year, the book noted.

Prior to the Reformation, eggs were forbidden food during Lent, but on Easter they were exchanged as presents among friends, servants and members of the family.

Many families exchange eggs today, most often by delivery by the Easter Bunny.

The bunny brings the decorated eggs, which symbolize a new beginning of life, said Julie Woods, senior in elementary education.

"Even until now, my sister and I hunt for eggs on Easter," Woods said.

"When we were little, we hunted for candy eggs, but since I was 18, we hunt for tokens which are each worth a certain amount of money," she said.

Matt Brooks, sophomore in psychology, said the Easter Bunny always delivered the eggs he and his family had colored.

"I don't know how that bunny did it," Brooks said.

An Easter Bunny at Manhattan Town Center, played by Angie Bastian, said, "I never gave it much thought why I was chosen to deliver eggs. I just know, after the eggs are dyed, it's my job to deliver them."

Brooks said he thought the reason the bunny delivered eggs was because "it is the only animal fast enough to get around to everyone."

"I think the bunny represents a fun, hoppy excitement and adds a bit of commercialism to the holiday," Woods said.

Whatever the guesses of why a bunny delivers eggs, according to "All About American Holidays," the hare has been sacred to Easter. The concept of the Easter Rabbit came from Germany. The bunny "laid the eggs for which children searched in the grass.

"This originated, it is said, from the fact that rabbits are prolific — hence a symbol of fertility. In France, children were told the hare had to run to Rome to bring back their Easter eggs."

The Easter Rabbit or Bunny was originally a hare, for it was once sacred to the European Spring-Goddess who had the Anglo-Saxon name Eostre.

Before the hare makes its delivery, the eggs are often dyed or decorated. The custom can be traced back to England during the Middle Ages.

"In Edward I's household accounts for 1290, there is an entry of eighteen pence spent on the purchase of 450 eggs which were to be colored or covered with leaf gold for distribution to the Royal Household," according to "Easter and Its Customs."

In Poland, colored eggs were a part of the courting custom which is no longer practiced. Women gave their favorite suitors from 30 to 100 eggs, which they either decorated themselves if they had the talent or had them done by a woman specialized in the art.

The decorated, hard-boiled eggs are called pisanki in Poland and various legends are told to account for their presence on the Easter table.

"Easter and Its Customs" stated, "One is that when Mary Magdalen and her companions went to the sepulcher with sweet spices to annoint (Jesus') body, they also took a few eggs in a basket to eat when their work was done.

"On their arrival to the tomb, they found that these had miraculously taken on all colors of the rainbow."

Another tale explains how the first pisanki were made by Mary, the mother of Jesus, during their life in Nazareth. To amuse her son, she boiled and painted the eggs red, green and yellow.

"(Eggs) can be of any color, but quite often it is red," "Easter and Its Customs" noted. "(English) tradition says this commemorates the blood of Christ."

Brooks said, "The way I interpret the meaning of the egg is as new life — from the religious point of view. Otherwise, they're just fun to color."

Vegetable or aniline dyes can be purchased in special packets or vinegar and water can be added to several drops of food coloring to color eggs.

The old method of tinting eggs involved more effort. The eggs were boiled with flowers or leaves, logwood chips or cochineal — a red dye prepared from dried bodies of a tropical insect.

Spinach leaves or anemone petals were used to create green colors, gorse blossom for yellow and logwood for purple.

Another tradition in some parts of the United States and in Europe is egg rolling.

According to "All About American Holidays," egg rolling was a popular pastime in England, especially in Yorkshire. The game was based on the idea of rolling away the stone from Jesus' tomb. The custom of rolling hard-boiled eggs down a hill was brought to the United States by British settlers and continues today.

Court

"We do have a much more polarized Court than we did in 1973," she said. "Split decisions, 5-to-4 decisions, are more and more common all the time. What people in the middle do is extremely important."

Two problems of the Roe vs. Wade case were discussed by Linford.

One problem is the Supreme Court today is "vastly different," she said. The second problem lies in the way the case was decided.

In deciding the case, the Supreme Court had to determine if the issue was a legitimate state interest, did the law bear a reasonable relationship to that interest, and because the case involved fundamental rights, was the state interest compelling, Linford said.

The Supreme Court said the state does have a compelling interest in protecting a woman against a dangerous abortion, but abortions during the first three months of pregnancy are safe, she said.

"(The Supreme Court said) states can't interfere with a woman's right to get an abortion during the first trimester," Linford said.

The Supreme Court never said a woman had an absolute right to control her own body, she said. The state can inhibit abortions after the first trimester.

With improved medical procedures, abortions are becoming safer later in the pregnancy. The question, Linford said, changes to: When is it the woman's decision to abort and when is it the state's?

What happens as a result of limiting people's controls of their body should be an issue, Gabrielle said.

"County prosecutors see the results of what happens to children that probably should have never been born to their parents," she said. "Any discussion of reproductive rights and women's rights to control their own bodies has to also come to who has responsibility — who is going to bear the ultimate responsibility?"

Most anti-choice advocates assume the fetus will be born a normal, healthy human being and that it has someone to support it, Gabrielle said. Abused and neglected children can be the result of unwanted pregnancies.

"We can't ever say what would happen if we hadn't been born."
—Gabrielle Thompson Assistant Riley County Attorney

"We can't ever say what would happen if we hadn't been born," she said.

Gabrielle said she has not had a child tell her it would have been better not to be born, although some have shown it through their actions.

"The media trend is to emphasize that all fertilized ova have a right to life, while ignoring that small human beings have a right to life," she said. There is a lot more activity to protect unborn children than children who are born.

"It is probably high time in the whole argument of states' rights to regulate what women do with their bodies ... to start looking at the responsibilities those same pressure groups and those state governments have for the results of those pregnancies," Gabrielle said.

Society is moving further away from women deciding to have children and giving less and less help to those children, she said.

Despite the Roe vs. Wade decision, Davis said, "states have not been out of the business of regulating abortion." Attempts have been made to limit the right to terminate a pregnancy.

There are many ways in which a state may attempt to limit the exercise of the right, Davis said. These include spousal, parental or informed consent.

Missouri was the first state to have the spousal consent challenged and the Supreme Court ruled a state cannot veto abortion or give that authority to someone else.

The Supreme Court said there would have to be some alternative route for minors to obtain an abortion if a state requires parental consent. The Supreme Court upheld a law requiring a woman to give consent to the procedure.

Other attempts made to limit a woman's right to choose include a 24-hour waiting period and required hospitalization for second trimester abortion procedures, Davis said.

Marching band's budget to grow regardless of fee

By Kendra Gensemer
Government Editor

With or without the approval of the athletic fee referendum, the K-State Marching Band will receive a budget increase, Athletic Department officials say.

The Athletic Department will meet with the band today to ask band members to support the proposed athletic fee, said Steve Miller, athletic department director.

Miller said the band would benefit from an athletic fee and money from the fee may be used to help fund the cost of new uniforms.

Chris Peterson, assistant athletic director in charge of marketing and sales, said the band is a "crucial part of the University and the athletic department."

The department is planning to increase its allocation to the band, Peterson said, and if the fee passes it will increase the allocation even more.

Athletic department officials have committed to become totally involved in support of the band, he said. The department has committed to help the band with its jog-a-thon fundraiser, Music Run, next fall.

Peterson said the purpose of the meeting is to answer any questions about the fee and ask for suggestions on how to get students to vote.

Paul Siegfried, junior in finance and drum major for the band, said he hopes the band will support the fee.

"From my standpoint, right now I'd support (the fee) because it would support the band," Siegfried said. "We are severely underfunded in comparison to our peers. We definitely need an increase."

He said the athletic department is the band's only source of revenue other than the fall Music Run.

Jennifer Dorsch, head drum major and senior in agricultural journalism, said the band's budget last year was $19,500, the lowest in the Big Eight. Other universities' bands receive money from student senates and endowments, as well as their athletic departments.

Siegfried said the band's uniforms were purchased in 1968 with insurance money from the Nichols Hall fire. Since then the uniforms have been updated three times: some pants were purchased in 1977, overlays in 1978 and hats in 1982.

Dorsch said the band has not discussed supporting the athletic fee as a whole.

"We haven't sent out a mandate to support (the fee) or to not support it," she said.

Dorsch said her main concern is what the athletic department is willing to contribute to the band if it supports the athletic fee.

If the band would receive a 5 percent increase, $800, it will buy two and a half new uniforms, she said.

Rose under scrutiny in gambling probe

By The Associated Press

ST. PETERSBURG, Fla. — Pete Rose hasn't been convicted of anything but he's already under armed guard.

The Cincinnati Reds' manager Tuesday ducked questions about's baseball investigation into "serious allegations," while a magazine reported Rose was rumored to have lost $13,000 in one day at a racetrack.

There was World Series-type security at Al Lang Stadium. Rose arrived about an hour before the Reds' exhibition game against the St. Louis Cardinals, walked briskly through two dozen reporters and photographers, and remained in his office, where an armed, uniformed guard stood watch.

Rose gave his usual pregame radio interview to Reds radio broadcaster Marty Brennaman, but shed no light on the investigation revealed Monday by Commissioner Peter Ueberroth and National League President A. Bartlett Giamatti. Although major league baseball has not said what it is investigating, published reports last month said Rose's gambling was the focus.

Genetlemen's Quarterly Tuesday released excerpts from its April issue, in which Rose's ex-wife and daughter describe him in unflattering words.

Karolyn Rose said her former husband once refused to acknowledge a gambling debt and later received a dead fish in the mail.

In the piece, written by Pat Jordan, Rose's daughter, Fawn, call's him "the world's worst father."

"I will never understand why he never had any time for us," Fawn Rose said.

Rose's son, Pete Jr., also described his father as distant.

"We're not alike," said Rose Jr., a third baseman in the Baltimore Orioles' minor-league system. "I never hugged or kissed my dad. If I did, he'd think I was a sissy. You know, queer. My relationship with him is more player-manager. Sometimes he gives me a high five."

Rose, who has declined comment on the commissioner's statement, told Brennaman, "Well, Marty, all I can tell you is we are cooperating with the commissioner's office, and we hope that it gets taken care of real fast, before opening day, so we can get down to business. And business is winning the National League West. That's all I'd like to say about that."

Georgetown coach hopes postseason play continues

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Georgetown coach John Thompson hopes there's no rest for the weary, at least not anytime soon.

Thompson spent last spring and summer organizing and coaching the U.S. Olympic basketball team. Then, upon his return from Seoul, he barely had time to recover from jet lag before focusing his attention toward guiding the Hoyas toward their 12th straight 20-win season.

Thompson said he has been so busy he hasn't had time to think about being tired. For that matter, he has no desire to take a vacation anytime soon — because he's counting on clutching that familiar towel on the sideline until the conclusion of the NCAA tournament.

It's been a whirlwind year for the veteran coach, what with the disappointing loss to the Soviet Union in the Olympics, his much-ballyhooed protest against Proposition 42, the Hoyas' rise to No. 2 in the national rankings and now, a berth in the tournament's "sweet 16." Undaunted by the hectic pace, Thompson credits his altruistic players for helping keep him fresh.

"I'm tired in one sense, but I'm OK," he said. "It would have been more of a problem if this team had to deal with a lot of on and off-the-court problems. But this has not been such a team."

Indeed, this year's edition of the Hoyas have turned out to be an ideal blend of youth and experience. First-year players Alonzo Mourning, Dikembe Mutombo and John Turner have meshed with seniors Charles Smith, Jaren Jackson, and Bobby Winston to form a squad that is eager to learn, anxious to win and, most of all, willing to heed their coach's every whim.

"These people have been sensible," Thompson said. "You get tired based upon your reaction to the team. If I was dealing with a bunch of pain in the necks, I'd have had problems.

"You get tired real quick when you have to worry about things other than basketball," Thompson added. "It's not just winning, either. I've had some teams that haven't won and still weren't a problem."

Thompson thought about taking a vacation early in the season.

Injuries frustrating to Speer

By Chris Hays
Sports Editor

As the frustration continues to mount for K-State high jumper Brad Speer, the senior just keeps jumping.

And, as he strives to reach the peak that had once made him one of the best high school high jumpers from Kansas, Speer has been able to keep everything in perspective.

Speer had once sat atop the high jump world. His personal best mark of 7-4½ , had recruiters nationwide courting the Wichita East product.

With a college training program and better facilities at the university level, it was not unrealistic for Speer to have aspirations of becoming a world-class high jumper. But that is when injuries began to take their toll on Speer.

"My whole college career has been kind of disappointing," Speer said. "Coming out of high school, everyone was thinking I could go 7-6 or 7-7 and that was the kind of expectations I had.

"But ever since then, I've been plagued with injuries. It seems that every year something has gone wrong. I have just had to learn to deal with it and keep my composure."

The injury that has bothered Speer the most was what doctors diagnosed as scoliosis in his lower back. The scoliosis was causing pain in his hips so Speer was forced to redshirt in 1987 after winning the Big Eight outdoor title in 1986.

Now Speer looks to be back in his '86 form. He had no indoor eligibilty remaining this season so he used the winter months to prepare for his final outdoor season — a season in which Speer says he wants to "go out with a bang."

"Everything has just been so frustrating," Speer said. "I lost a tie-breaker for first place at the Big Eight meet last year and it seems like every year it's been frustrations like that.

"Now it has all boiled down to my last year and nothing is stopping me — this is all she wrote."

Speer opened his final season with an impressive win at the UCLA Triangular Saturday. His 7-2 mark set a meet record, which was not all that surprising to his coach, Cliff Rovelto.

"I thought he jumped really well, but it wasn't the height that surprised me," Rovelto said. "The thing is, I know he can jump well, but to jump as well as he did after such a rigorous training schedule was kind of surprising."

Speer's final season has started off about the way he expected, and he hopes the season will end just as he expects also. He wants to win the Big Eight title, qualify for the NCAA Outdoor and become an all-American.

Rovelto said Speer definitely has a shot at the conference crown and that Speer, teammate Chris Samuelson and Colorado's Jason Dudley are probably the top three contenders. Dudley won the Big Eight Indoor last month with a leap of 7-1½ , while Samuelson took third at 6-11½ . Dudley is also the defending outdoor champ from a year ago, where Speer took third.

"This is a good jump conference and there are other good jumpers," Rovelto said, "but those three are the best jumpers in the conference and Brad is capable of jumping with them. He's capable of going over 7-3."

Speer, however, also knows that track is not all there is to life and has placed academics at the top of his priority list.

"I want to be an academic all-American. I want to make sure and balance athletics with academics," Speer said. "I want to be one of the top six (high jumpers) in the nation and also have a 3.2 grade point average.

"My ultimate goal is to get out of school, hang up my spikes and go out with a 7-5 or something."

Royals dump Houston, 9-1

HAINES CITY, Fla. — Veterans Pat Tabler and Bob Boone each drove in a pair of runs as the Kansas City Royals beat the Houston Astros 9-1 in an exhibition game Tuesday.

Two errors in the sixth inning by Astros third baseman Ken Caminiti opened the gate to four Kansas City runs off losing pitcher Danny Darwin.

Astros rookie Anthony Kelley faced six batters without retiring anyone in the Royals' five-run seventh inning. Kelley gave up three singles, a double to Willie Wilson and walked two before being removed.

Royals rookie right-hander Kevin Appier recorded the victory with three innings of scoreless relief.

KU schedules Cincinnati

CINCINNATI — The University of Cincinnati says it has agreed to play football games with the University of Kansas in 1995 and 1997.

The 1995 game will be played at Kansas and the 1997 game will be at Cincinnati, Cincinnati athletics director Rick Taylor announced Monday.

The Cincinnati Bearcats and the Kansas Jayhawks have not met previously.

Professor has steroid substitute

NEW ORLEANS — A new form of chromium could help athletes beef up their bodies without dangerous anabolic steroids, enable diabetics to use less insulin and cut cholesterol, a researcher said Tuesday.

Gary Evans, a chemistry professor at Bemidji State University in Minnesota discussed the possible benefits of "chromium picolinate" during a meeting of the Federation of the American Societies for Experimental Biology.

Two studies at Bemidji State found that the compound "bulked up" muscle and cut down body fat, he said.

Correction

In Tuesday's edition of the Collegian, the rescheduled football game between K-State and Oklahoma was mistakenly stated on the sports page as being Nov. 18. The correct date was listed in the scheduale at the bottom of the story and is Nov. 11 at Norman.

Alumnus returns for performance during professional opera career

By Lisa Pfannenstiel
Features Editor

At age 26, an individual may not want to be labeled a bouncing baby, but James Heffel said he's proud to be "a bouncing baby baritone."

After completing his bachelor's degree in music appreciation in 1985 from K-State and his master's degree in music performance at Arizona State University in Tempe, Ariz., Heffel has become a professional opera singer, performing for the Arizona Opera Co. in Tucson, Ariz. He returned to K-State for a solo performance Tuesday evening in All-Faiths Chapel.

Heffel sang selections from operas including "Faust" and "Carmen" and from musicals including "Oklahoma!" and "Fiddler on the Roof."

Heffel grew up in Manhattan and was influenced by his family's musical talents. The first glimpse of his future career was a small role in a third grade production, he said.

"Little did I know that it was just the beginning," he said.

His musical theater debut was in high school in his protrayal of Tevye in "Fiddler on the Roof." Heffel said the role accentuated his "fach — specialized to my singing range. I had the belly and the beard and was bound and determined to get the part. When I got the part, I knew I was bound for the stage."

Halfway through his college career, he began performing opera, with his first role in the campus production "Suzanne."

"As the overture (of the opera) begins with its big and glorious salute, I knew that's why I was driven to sing," Heffel said.

"That's when the bug hit me — opera is what I must do," he said.

Surviving as a professional opera singer is "rough, a back-biting, mean and unjust business," Heffel said. "You have to be in the right place at the right time.

"Many times you don't know where the next meal is coming from, but at other times you live very well."

The life of a performer requires him to travel, but Heffel said he does not miss the security of home. He spends his "down time" in Kansas City, Kan., but he usually only stays several days.

"It is nice to come back briefly, but I love living from a suitcase, traveling from one hotel to another," Heffel said.

For three weeks in Tucson, he had a three-bedroom house to himself, and when in Phoenix, Ariz., he stayed in an Embassy Suites Hotel.

During his travels, Heffel said he has the opportunity to "network" — develop contacts with professionals in the business.

"Although the industry is large, it is still small," he said, explaining that performers remember names and faces which can be beneficial when applying for a part.

For Heffel, success may be 10 years away.

"His success can be compared to an individual's chance of becoming an astronaut," said Jerry Langenkamp, chairman of the voice division at K-State and music director of the opera theater.

"It is so hard to predict because so many elements come into play," Langenkamp said. "He has a well-prepared voice and is one of the top graduates from the program."

Although most companies schedule performances one year in advance, Heffel could be asked to play a role with as little as two weeks' notice.

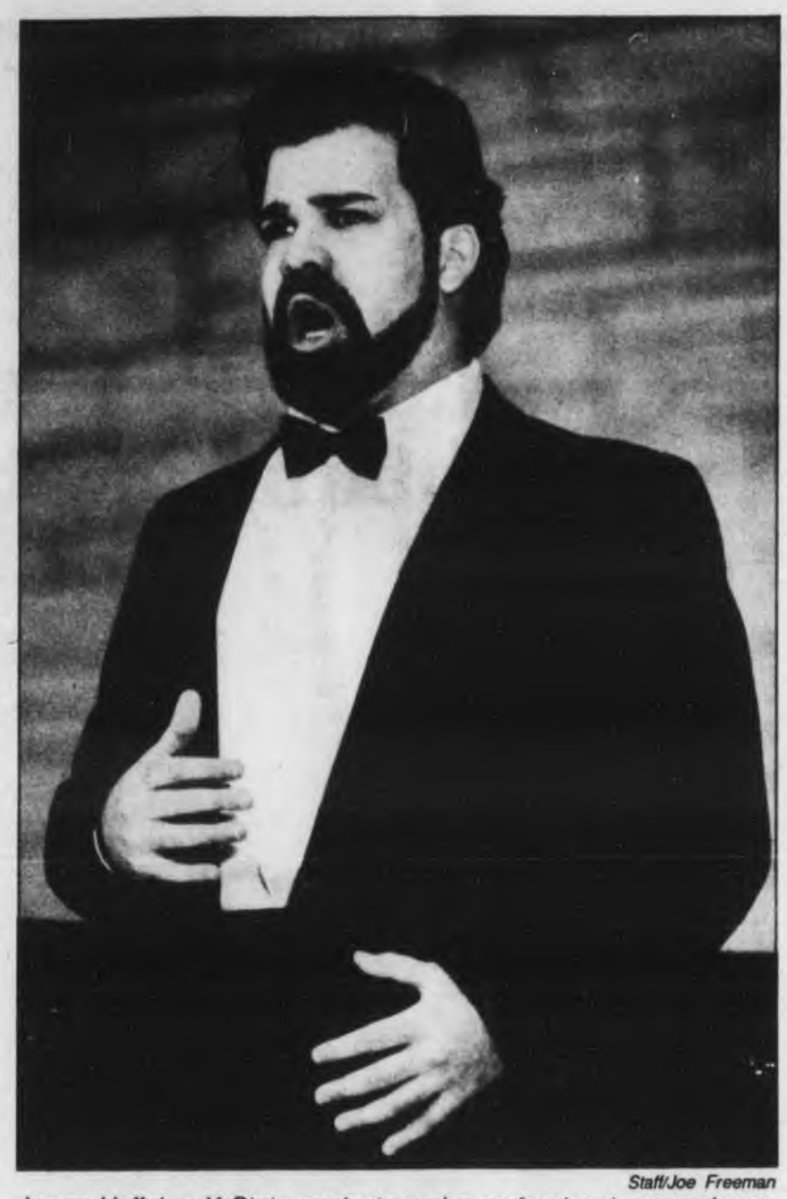
"As a young guy in the field, I do just about anything," he said. "By working, you get work."

The most bizarre part Heffel played lasted five minutes. He was a merman, "a mighty Triton." Underneath a cloth of manmade seafoam, he scrambled on hands and knees from one end of the dusty stage to the other and popped his Triton head through a difficult-to-find hole of the seafoam and sang his line. Then he returned to the dust and crawled to the hole on the opposite side of the stage to repeat his actions.

Although he will accept unusual parts, such as a fish, he said he is choosy and only accepts roles within his range because his voice will not mature — or, as he said, "have the meat and potatoes of projection and stamina" — until he is about 30.

In seasoning his voice, Heffel said he accepts accompanying parts as a spinto baritone, which allow him to sing parts of both the bass and baritone range.

As a performer, Heffel is known for "staying on the conductor's stick." During a performance, the design of the performance hall may prevent the singer from hearing the orchestra. He has trained himself to sing with the music even when he cannot hear.



For instance, when Heffel sang Jan. 14 in Bramlage Coliseum for the basketball game against the University of Kansas, he "sang totally on sensation" because he could not hear the band.

During February, he worked for Arizona Opera Co. which produced "Carmen," in Tucson and Phoenix.

In preparation for his performances, Heffel practices by "marking the voice" — not singing full out — for about two hours each day.

Rehearsal never lasts longer than four hours and the singers only "get dramatic about two hours," he said.

"We are paid to deliver on the stage for the performance," Heffel said. "The producers don't care what you must do ... they just expect 100 percent every time."

Staff/Joe Freeman
James Heffel, a K-State graduate and a professional opera singer, gives a solo performance Tuesday evening in All Faiths Chapel.

Fact Sheet on the Student Athletic Fee

I. The ATHLETIC DEPARTMENT pays the UNIVERSITY over $1 MILLION/YEAR in tuition, fees, room & board.

II. Kansas State University has one of the HIGHEST student seating allocations in Division IA basketball (48.1%).

III. The current prices of student season basketball and football tickets are among the LOWEST in Division IA Athletics nationwide.

IV. Both WICHITA STATE and KANSAS UNIVERSITY have athletic fees. Other Big Eight Schools with fees are Colorado, Iowa State and Oklahoma State.

V. KANSAS STATE is currently operating with the LOWEST athletic budget in the Big Eight, $1.5 million less than the seventh highest and less than half of the highest.

VI. The Student Athletic Fee is only ONE part of a FIVE part plan to increase the athletic budget.

VII. A portion of the monies collected from the fee will be given to NCAA sanctioned club sports, gymnastics and soccer, and crew will also be included in this allocation.

VIII. If the fee passes the students are GUARANTEED the following:

1. FREE ADMISSION to all non-revenue NCAA athletic events held on the KSU campus.

2. A PRICE CAP placed on student season basketball and football tickets at $3.50/game and $5.00/game respectively, for a three-year period.

3. A GUARANTEE that student season football and basketball tickets WILL NOT be combined for a period of three years.

4. A GUARANTEE that students will receive a minimum of 6,000 SEATS in Bramlage Coliseum.

IX. At the conclusion of 3 years, a select student committee will evaluate the fee, how it has been allocated, and how it has impacted the Department and the University.

rams, for the center is an early childhood lab.

"There are two different agendas to be reconciled."

The center is nationally recognized for its playground, she said. The construction will result in the loss of one of the unique elements of the playground area — the woods.

John Murray, head of the department of Human Development and Family Studies, said the meeting was a good airing of parents' views and concerns about the road and the future of the playground.

Murray said the next step to the issue will be a meeting with Provost James Coffman, Stowe, Garvin and other interested parties to see if accommodations can be made.

"It is important to get the issue resolved for the children at the center and for University Facilities and Planning," he said.

The proposed $2.7 million project to pave parking lots and construct the road is scheduled to start May 15 and be completed by Aug. 1.

The reason for the construction's tight timetable is the approval of the project's bond money, Garvin said.

"The bond issue has to be a specific act of the State legislature," he said. "We are hoping for approval during this session. If we do not get the approval, the project gets put on hold until next year and everything gets more expensive."

Murray said another issue regarding the road construction emerged during the meeting.

"The reason there is a reluctance to move the road to the top of the hill and intersect with Baker's Way — is that there are no funds to locate it there," he said. "The funds for building the road are connected to the parking lot project."

Garvin said, "If the funding for the project does not come from the bond issue and the use of parking fees, I do not know where it will come from."

rate of attrition is the reason for much of the overcrowding problems at the universities.

Opposition to the bill came from Sherman Jones, D-Kansas City.

"I don't particularly like this bill. Something about this bill scares me," Jones said. "It can eliminate or prepare, any way you look at it.

He said it is the responsibility of the state of Kansas to educate its people.

"Maybe we should legislate at the high school level," Jones said. "We're losing a large part of our children (out-of-state) because we don't prepare them to live in our state."

Rep. Gary Blumenthal, D-Merriam, asked Apt what the governor's position was on the quality of Kansas high schools.

"A Kansas high school diploma doesn't have any meaning?" Blumenthal asked. "Why isn't the governor sending you (Apt) in here asking for more funding or higher standards?"

"As long as the military and political elites receive economic and military aid," he said, "there will be sectors that will not want to end (the conflict)."

In an earlier interview Tuesday, Suriano said the main goal of the FMLN is to make El Salvador a truly democratic state.

"We aim to develop a true, pluralistic political system," he said. "The essence of democracy is having the political space open to all ideologies."

Although the dominant political ideology of the FMLN is Marxist-Leninist, the group works with people of different ideologies, Suriano said. The FMLN applies Marxism pragmatically to the reality of the political crisis in El Salvador.

The FMLN does not receive military aid from foreign governments, he said, dispelling accusations from the U.S. government that the group receives aid from Soviet-bloc countries.

"In terms of military assistance, we do not receive any amount of military aid or economic aid from any government or foreign political institution," Suriano said. "... We are not receiving aid from the Soviet Union, we are not receiving aid from the Nicaraguan government ... Our financing comes from resources that are in the country in areas we physically control.

"In terms of weapons, the majority of weapons we use are taken from combat with the Salvadoran military. In the last year and a half, the (Nicaraguan) contras have come into El Salvador to sell weapons. What's really ironic is that about 80 or 90 percent of our weapons are American ... that we get from the Salvadoran army or that we buy from corrupt military officials. Corruption in the military is endemic."

Suriano said the FMLN controls about one-third of the country.

"Politically the presence of the FMLN has expanded to about 70 percent of the national territory," he said. "Politically in the sense that the current regime is not capable anymore to maintain a permanent political presence in many parts of the country."

A majority of the people in rural areas support the FMLN because the war over the last nine years has been fought in the countryside, Suriano said. Only in the last two years has the war reached the urban areas, which have traditionally been in control of the government.

Suriano said he expects the FMLN to increase military action unless the new government is willing to negotiate. The FMLN will meet the government for talks, but not indefinitely unless negotiations take place.

Students for Educational Awareness, one of the sponsors of the lecture, promoted Suriano as a form of education on Central America during Central American Week, said Paige Nichols, Manhattan resident and SEA member. Central American Week is a nationwide effort by groups interested in the region's welfare.

"We have a definite concern for the human rights situation in El Salvador and particularly the likely possibility of increased death squad activity and state terrorism," said Dan Acheson-Brown, graduate teaching assistant in political science and SEA member.

Lyman Baker, professor of English, said he was pleased with the turnout as well as the content of Suriano's lecture.

"The right wing (in El Salvador) feels it has a free hand, mainly because the Bush administration doesn't want the FMLN," Baker said. "The right wing will be put up against the wall very quickly and may have to use force ... Alfredo Cristiani cannot possibly make good on his promises and there is going to be very strong pressure on him."

Kansas State
Collegian

Staff/Christopher T. Assaf

Many people may not recognize him on sight, but almost everyone at K-State has seen award-winning cartoonist Richard Broadfoot's cartoons in the Collegian for the past three years. Broadfoot said each of the characters in his strips springs from his personality.

Cartoonist wins top honors

Characters based on artist's personality

By The Collegian Staff

When Collegian Cartoonist Richard Broadfoot was a little kid, he had a "Peanuts" lunchbox.

"Now, the man whose lunchbox I carried to school has seen my cartoons," he said.

Earlier this week Broadfoot was notified that he had received two honors. He took first place for editorial cartoons in the Columbia Scholastic Press Association's Gold Circle Awards for 1988 and placed in the top 10 of the 1988 Scripps Howard Charles M. Schulz Collegiate Cartoonists Contest.

Schulz, the artist who draws the nationally syndicated strip "Peanuts," was one of the judges for the Scripps Howard competition.

Although his cartoons have appeared in the Collegian almost every day for three years, and twice in U., the National College Newspaper, which has a circulation of about 1.5 million, Richard Broadfoot's biggest fans might not recognize him if they saw him walking across campus.

Broadfoot has thinning, reddish-brown hair, a mustache and perpetual razor stubble. He wears dark-rimmed glasses, jeans and beat-up canvas basketball shoes, nothing like Jeff, the clean-cut, well-dressed main character of his comic strip, "Salad."

"Once in a while someone will hear my name or see it on a check and recognize me," Broadfoot said. "It's kind of like fame on a small scale, and I like it that way."

While the cartoonist may not physically resemble any of the characters in his strip, he said each of them springs from his personality.

"A lot of people ask if Jeff is me; Jeff isn't me," Broadfoot said. "He's based on me, sort of. But even the insights of the female character, Charmin, come from me. Troy, the goofball, is another side of me. 'Salad' is not autobiographical, but a lot of my life comes into it. Anything stupid that Jeff does, I've probably done."

Broadfoot, a 25-year-old senior in art, has spent 14 semesters at K-State. This is his third semester drawing "Salad." In 1987, he and his then-roommate Doug Folk, senior in electrical engineering, answered an ad in the Collegian seeking a cartoonist. They jointly worked on a comic strip, "Life and Times" which featured some of the same characters now in "Salad." In the first strip, Jeff was enrolling at K-State.

"Jeff used to look a lot like me when I first started," Broadfoot said. "He was balding; now he's not. He used to not shave often, like me, but now I've cleaned him up."

Jeff's adventures have continued in "Salad." He works as the assistant manager of a bait shop and pursues Charmin, the girl he met in "Life and Times."

"At first I saw Jeff as kind of Dennis the Menace grown up, and a job in a bait shop is where I see somebody like that ending up," Broadfoot said.

He said he thinks his work has improved since those first strips.

"The stuff I did three years ago is horrible," he said. "I don't like anything I've done more than a month ago, and that will be true a month from now, too. I'm inexperienced enough that I'm still learning and improving."

In addition to "Salad," Broadfoot usually has an editorial cartoon in the Collegian each week. He said he is on a tight schedule with class projects due besides his work for the Collegian.

"'Salad' is supposed to run every day, but the editors know not to expect it," he said. "The one for tomorrow I just got done at 11:30 this morning. It gives it a nice scatterbrained feeling."

Because of the hectic pace, Broadfoot sometimes misses his errors. He said his toughest critic is his mother, who was the state spelling bee champion when she was younger.

"She lets me know when I mess up," he said. "I misspelled embarrass twice last week. I guess I should be embarrassed."

Each strip takes about five hours to complete, from a pencil sketch to the inked final product. He works on a drafting table in the corner of his bedroom with an overflowing trash can nearby and loud music playing on his stereo. Examples of his cartoons hang on the wall alongside his Phi Gamma Delta fraternity composite picture.

Broadfoot said he is glad people appreciate his cartoons.

"It makes me feel good when people cut out my cartoons and hang them up," he said. "But, if I'd see one on a professor's door, then I would feel legitimate."

Besides his work as a cartoonist, Broadfoot works in the Natatorium as a lifeguard.

"I think I've got the two coolest jobs on campus," he said. "It's almost like free money. Whenever I get depressed, I don't have a lot to complain about."

After leaving K-State, Broadfoot hopes to accept a job as a graphic artist for a newspaper. Eventually, he said he wants to be a syndicated cartoonist, even though the job market is small.

"There are only 400 or 500 people in the United States who are cartoonists for a living," he said. "You don't only have to be good, you have to be lucky. I'll just have to try my hardest, and if I fail, I'll do something else."

Company agrees to strip, repaint center's furniture

By Karen Allen
Staff Writer

Kansas Correctional Industries has agreed to repaint furniture covered with lead-based paint at the K-State Child Development Center, said George Miller, vice president for administration and finance.

The procedure of stripping and repainting the more than $25,000 worth of furniture will begin sometime after May 1.

"We indicated we had a definite problem ... and that it would be helpful if we had the prison industry repaint the furniture," Miller said.

"They allowed it was a useful and justified gesture because of the inconvenience it caused," he said.

In November, Industrial Hygienist Steve Galitzer discovered the red and blue paints manufactured by state prisoners and used on the center's furniture surpassed the lead level of .06 percent set by the Consumer Product Safety Commission in 1979. Ingestion of lead-based paint chips on a regular basis can lead to mental retardation.

Nancy Bolsen, center director, said she was pleased about KCI's willingness to repaint the furniture.

"Needless to say, we're delighted ... (we're) feeling really comfortable about how this has transpired," Bolsen said.

"Knowing how state agencies work, KCI gave us a very quick reaction," she said.

Until the furniture is repainted, Bolsen said the center's staff will continue their "daily inspection for chipping and flaking."

The Department of Housing has provided the center with several pieces of furniture in the interim, she said. But now that "there is an end in sight ... we've kind of put things on hold."

FBI to conduct interviews today

No protest scheduled

By Chris Koger
Staff Writer

An agent with the Federal Bureau of Investigation will be on campus today conducting ten student interviews at Holtz Hall.

Special Agent Robert Meredith, regional recruiter for the Kansas City division of the FBI, said the interviews are for "informational purposes more than filling a job opening.

"The typical college student is not qualified yet to be an agent," Meredith said. "I'll be advising potential employees on how to prepare for a career in the agency."

Meredith said the hiring process takes from six months to a year, starting with the actual interview and Special Agent Entrance Exam, which includes a short-term memory test and psychological profile.

The next step is an interview with a panel of three agents. If the applicant is approved after the panel interview, the agency conducts a background search.

"Everyone in the FBI must have a college degree, and most of our new agents coming in are doing so because of a career change from a similar field," he said.

Bruce Laughlin, director of the Career Planning and Placement Center in Holtz Hall, said it not unusual for organizations such as the FBI and CIA to recruit on campus.

"I think there's quite a lot of interest in the investigative field; it's typical for these to fill up fast on the interview sheets," Laughlin said. "Some employers create more interest, and although investigative work doesn't fill up exceptionally fast, they still go quickly."

The FBI has been barred from recruiting at two major law schools since a court ruling last fall stated the agency discriminated against Latino agents, according to a story in the Feb. 22 issue of The Los Angeles Times. The article said officials at the University of Michigan and Ohio State University imposed the ban because their schools' policies prohibit discriminatory employers from using school facilities to

Miller promises funds to marching band

By Kendra Gensemer
Government Editor

The KSU Athletic Department has promised the K-State Marching Band a 39 percent budget increase if the proposed athletic fee passes in a student referendum.

Band Director Stan Finck said the budget increase figures proposed by the athletic department changed Tuesday morning during a meeting between himself and Athletic Director Steve Miller. When it first proposed the fee, the athletic department had discussed a 5 percent increase.

Miller said that originally a 5 percent incremental budget increase was planned for everything covered under the athletic department, including sports, cheerleading and band.

In an appeal for support of the fee, Chris Peterson, assistant athletic director in charge of marketing and sales, told about 65 band members Wednesday afternoon that Miller "will increase the budget (for the band) 13 percent."

"If the fee passes, he will put about $3,000 more into the budget — a 39 percent total increase," Peterson said. "We know what a part of our organization you are."

When asked by a band member if he thought the athletic department was trying to "buy off" the band, Finck said, "I think so."

He later said his comment was a joke.

Finck said the band is dependent on the athletic department for funding and he would do "almost anything" to help the band get funding from the department, but he would not raise the $10 fee members pay for uniform rental.

Miller acknowledged the proposed budget increase is "an incentive to get (the band members) to support the fee, no question."

"But anything can be construed as a bribe. That's the reality of income production," he said. "We're trying to get a broad base of support for something that's worthwhile. It's the right question to ask, but the wrong motive. We would hope that it does promote their efforts.

"The bottom line is that's like saying we're going to buy off the football team."

Miller's proposed increase would raise the band's total budget from $19,500 to about $24,000, but the budget would still be the lowest in the Big Eight.

Finck said the money would be used to purchase new uniforms, which cost about $50,000. The band has raised a total of about $30,000 for the uniforms; $10,000 through fundraising and $20,000 donated by President Jon Wefald from the President's Fund, which is collected through the KSU Foundation.

The band has been using its uniforms since 1968. The uniforms were purchased with insurance money from the Nichols Hall fire, and have since been updated three times.

Head Drum Major Jennifer Dorsch said after the meeting she believes the athletic department is trying to "buy off" the band members' votes, even though it is in the best interest of the band.

The athletic department's actions to increase the budget also indicate the department's awareness of how much the band does to support University athletics, said Dorsch, senior in agricultural journalism.

"We depend on them for money. They depend on us to provide entertainment, enthusiasm, crowd support, image," she said.

Dorsch said the relationship between the band and athletic department has been a good one.

"We have good funding from them," she said. Other than a fall fundraiser, the department is the band's only source of funding.

Because of that fact, Dorsch said it has been difficult to ask for money from the department.

"We feel that's like asking Santa Claus for seconds," she said.

The band has submitted a bill to Student Senate asking for a special allocation to help cover some of the cost of new uniforms, Dorsch said. The bill may go to vote next Tuesday.

She encouraged band members to vote for the fee.

"It looks like it is going to benefit us," Dorsch said.

Band Treasurer Tawn Potter agreed.

"We have nothing to lose, everything to gain. I think we should vote for it," said Potter, freshman in education.

One member disagreed, saying the fee would not benefit the University as a whole.

"None of this has anything to do with the fee," said Paul McDonald, junior in electrical engineering. "As a group we'd benefit, but the University would not."

Government warns travelers

LONDON — The U.S. government warned American military personnel, diplomats and their families that terrorists might try to hijack a U.S. airliner in Europe on Easter weekend, the tabloid Daily Express reported Wednesday.

Today's issue of the tabloid, early editions of which were available Wednesday night, said the possible threat was detailed in a secret memorandum dated last Friday from the U.S. Federal Aviation Administration. The paper said it was given a copy of the memo.

In Washington, FAA spokesman Fred Farrar, asked about the reported warning, said, "We do not discuss these things." At the State Department, spokeswoman Sondra McCarty said, "We never comment publicly."

Reporter Robert McGowan, in what the paper called an exclusive report, said the memorandum named three Lebanese terrorists believed to be traveling on forged passports.

"A worldwide security operation was under way to foil a hijacking," the report said. "American military personnel and diplomats and their families have been told of the threat, which centers on U.S. airlines. They were advised to alter routine plans to return home from Europe for Easter."

Anchorwoman sets priority

BOSTON — When Liz Walker, a popular, unmarried television anchorwoman, announced she was pregnant in June 1987, she feared the worst.

"I expected to lose my job," said Walker, 37, of WBZ-TV. "I expected to have to leave Boston. I didn't want to lose all the things that go with the job. But that paled next to the idea of being a parent."

Walker, who is black, fielded intense criticism for being a poor role model for black teen-agers.

"After the announcement that I was pregnant, for three months every day there was incredible publicity," Walker said Tuesday. "It passed. If it didn't pass, I would have left. I would have protected my child against coming into such an intense world."

Walker still refuses to identify the child's father but said they are close and that her 15-month-old son, Nicholas, has a good relationship with him.

Walker recently signed a contract reportedly worth $3 million over five years. But her priority is her son.

Church group rejects model

WILMINGTON, N.C. — The search is on for a new Queen Azalea after festival organizers here took heat from local church members because their first choice, actress Julie McCullough, has appeared in Playboy.

Bill Cameron, president of the 42-year-old festival, said Tuesday that organizers and McCullough had agreed "that it would not be in the best interests of the Azalea Festival" for her to be queen.

McCullough, who plays Julie Costello on ABC's "Growing Pains," was a 1985 Playboy cover girl and also a Playmate of the Month. In addition, the Dallas native appeared in a photo feature on "Girls of Texas."

The 55-church Wilmington Baptist Association opposed her selection.

Groom convicted of murder

LOS ANGELES — A newlywed was found guilty of second-degree murder Wednesday in the honeymoon cruise death of his bride, who was strangled and thrown overboard.

Scott Robin Roston, a 36-year-old writer, stood facing jurors as the verdict was announced in a crowded courtroom. He showed no reaction, but his mother, Sophia Roston, wept uncontrollably in a front row of the spectator section.

Jurors in U.S. District Court, who deliberated for three days, rejected Roston's defense that his wife was murdered by Israeli agents in retaliation for a book he wrote.

The jury convicted Roston on the only charge against him. The prosecution said there was no premeditation involved in the killing, thus precluding a first-degree murder charge.

The prosecution charged that Karen Waltz Roston, 26, was killed on Feb. 13, 1988, after a series of arguments that culminated when her husband strangled her on the jogging track of the cruise ship on which they were honeymooning.

The case came to light a year ago when the cruise ship Stardancer returned from a three-day Mexican cruise with reports that Roston had gone overboard. Her husband reportedly said she had been swept off the ship by a strong gust of wind.

Fire guts elementary school

IOLA — A building used for students with behavior disorders at Lincoln Elementary School in Iola was gutted by fire Tuesday evening.

One firefighter suffered minor injuries while fighting the blaze.

The fire apparently began in or near a radio sitting on a bookshelf in the classroom, said Iola Fire Chief Clarence Hydorn.

No estimate of the damage was available. The main damage was the loss of a computer and teaching material in the building, said Superintendent of Schools Don Bain.

No decision had been made Wednesday on where to teach the classes that used the building, or whether to rebuild the classroom, school officials said.

Referees seek immunity

TOPEKA — Referees inevitably will be sued for calls they make during an athletic contests unless lawmakers provide them immunity from such frivolous suits, the executive director of the Kansas State High School Activities Association warned a Senate panel today.

Nelson Hartman asked a Senate Judiciary subcommittee to endorse a bill that would provide immunity to athletic officials from lawsuits arising out of their actions during amateur athletic contests sponsored by high schools, colleges and non-profit groups.

The House passed the bill earlier this month, 73-52.

Hartman said without the immunity law, high schools might not have enough referees because few would agree to officiate if they knew they could be sued.

"It will provide a catalyst for protecting athletic officials from nuisance suits," Hartman said.

Five other states have adopted similar laws.

The bill's primary sponsor, Rep. Frank Buehler, R-Claflin, said no suits have been filed against officials in Kansas but that they are common in other parts of the country.

In one case, a soccer player who broke his leg when he tripped over a bottle thrown onto the playing field sued an official, Buehler said.

Senate rejects Hayden's Washburn proposal

From Staff and Wire Reports

TOPEKA — The Senate Wednesday rejected Gov. Mike Hayden's proposal to bring Washburn University of Topeka into the state system for higher education.

The Senate pulled the plan to make Washburn, the nation's last municipal university, a State Board of Regents school from a package of legislation known as the Margin of Excellence Partnership Act.

The partnership act included the Washburn issue, MOE funding, a program for community college funding and a program for private college funding to ease tuition costs, said Rep. Sheila Hochhauser, R-Manhattan.

The partnership act would increase state financing of two-year community colleges and fully finance the second year of the regents' Margin of Excellence plan to increase faculty salaries.

"We are very disappointed," Acting Washburn President Robert Burns said after the vote. "It is very short-sighted. It was based on emotion and fear."

"I am disappointed but not terribly surprised," Hayden said in a statement. "Our request on behalf of all of higher education will continue. We will continue to explore all options regarding higher education."

The bill was one of five appropriations measures regarding higher education the Senate passed, including one that funded the third year of the Margin of Excellence, a program that increases funding for state universities for higher salaries and to enhance programs.

Hayden tied Washburn's admission to the regents system to the Margin of Excellence and the community college financing in hopes of picking up more support in the Legislature. All previous proposals to bring Washburn into the system have failed to get even as far as the present proposal toward an up-or-down vote in a chamber.

Washburn's defeat in the Senate is not good news to supporters of the bill, even if the House were to support the move, Hochhauser said.

"The fact that the Senate defeated the bill makes it very unlikely that Washburn (will be added to the regents system)," she said.

It is unlikely the Washburn issue will be presented to the Senate again soon as a separate item, Hochhauser said. If the House votes on the Washburn issue, it will probably be as part of an appropriations bill and not as a separate item, she said.

Rep. Bill Bunton, R-Topeka, chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, supports Washburn's inclusion into the regents system.

An amendment to remove the plan for Washburn's admission was offered by Sen. Jerry Moran, R-Hays, whose district includes Fort Hays State University. Legislators whose districts include regents universities traditionally oppose Washburn's entrance into the system because they fear it will affect their schools' financing.

The Senate approved the amendment in an unrecorded vote in which 24 of the Senate's 40 members stood up to show their support for it.

"Washburn is a viable part of our university system," said Sen. Gus Bogina, R-Shawnee, who led the debate against the amendment. "It's a matter of how we treat it and what we call it."

"We're heading down the road of no return," warned Moran, who also asked why Kansas needs an additional state college.

Others said the role Washburn would play in the state system has not been defined. Washburn has one of the two law schools in Kansas. The other is at the University of Kansas in Lawrence.

"Maybe we do need two law schools," said Sen. Gerald Karr, D-Emporia. "But the mission (of Washburn) is one thing that has been left out of this debate."

Shawnee County delegates endorsed the proposal, arguing that Washburn draws students from all over the state, not just Topeka.

"The first issue is what we want education to look like in Kansas," said Sen. Alicia Salisbury, R-Topeka. "The Shawnee County delegation (members) in the Senate have been very strong and loyal advocates of education."

Sen. Richard Rock, D-Arkansas City, a Washburn graduate, also argued that the school is a statewide asset that provides opportunities for working students putting themselves through college.

"Most students are older; most are taking fewer hours, and most are supporting themselves," he said. He warned the college is at risk if the Legislature does not make it a state school.

"If Washburn is not included in the state regents system, it will die," Rock warned.

But others argued that making Washburn a state school would be a bad business deal because the state already has five state colleges.

"We've already got five factories," said Sen. Leroy Hayden, D-Santanta. "This is a matter of tax savings."

He discounted the notion that adding Washburn would be an economic development measure, saying it would only benefit those businesses frequented by students.

Sen. Richard Bond, R-Overland Park, said he supported bringing the school into the state system, but only after exisiting duplication of programs has been eliminated. He called the present system of higher education in the state "exacerbated duplication."

He said too many state colleges offer identical courses.

"How much are taxpayers willing to pay for all this duplication?" Bond asked. "We can no longer afford that duplication."

Senate to read, discuss bill on grievance policy

By Darren Keller
Collegian Reporter

Student Senate tonight will read and discuss a bill proposed by the Faculty Affairs Committee of Faculty Senate regarding revisions in the K-State Academic Grievance Policy.

The current grievance policy does not allow students to use legal counseling at a hearing of Student Tribunal or Student Review Board. One revision of the policy would allow students accused of an academic crime to use an attorney who may advise the student but not participate in the hearing.

Todd Johnson, Student Senate chairman, said the Faculty Affairs Committee wants the approval of Student Senate before it submits a final draft of the revised policy to Faculty Senate.

The Investment Ad Hoc Committee will give a report on the ethical investment of student money in companies doing business in South Africa.

The purpose of the committee is to investigate and make recommendations to Senate on the possibility of divestment of the students money invested.

Six groups will give allocation presentations.

Class displays artwork at Espresso

By Karla Redelsheimer
Arts and Entertainment Editor

Teresa Schmidt, assistant professor of art, and her advanced drawing students weren't satisfied with the area provided on campus to display their work, so they took their drawing exhibition to Espresso Royale.

"We like the lighting, the clientele and the space here," Schmidt said. "It's nice to be able to sit with your coffee and look at interesting art work."

This is the third semester members of Schmidt's class have exhibited their work at the cafe. Students in her class work independently on their series and choose the theme of their own series.

"The emphasis is on content instead of technique," she said.

"It's not how you draw it, but what the art expresses," said Patrick Duegaw, senior in interior architecture.

Duegaw has several lithograph prints in the exhibition from his series "Black Water." He said the series was meant to be a statement against water pollution.

Gallery 6 in the Art Building is the only place on campus for art students to display their work, Schmidt said.

"We really don't have an adequate display area," she said. "The gallery doesn't have good public access. This brings much more attention to the work than having it tucked away in a room somewhere."

Each student tries to put two pieces in the exhibition, Schmidt said. The final decision, however, is up to the students and what they can afford since they are responsible for picking up the framing and matting costs.

Kent Williams, senior in interior architecture, said having the exhibition was motivation for finishing his work.

"Having the work framed and matted is considered real completion," Williams said.

Lori McElgunn, senior in fine arts, who has one of the larger pieces in the exhibition, said her drawing was a non-representational drawing.

"Instead of drawing an actual object, it conveys an emotion or a strong image," McElgunn said.

The students went to Espresso Royale and chose where they wanted their pieces to be displayed as a class, and then hung their work in the selected places, said Dana Hamilton, sophmore in fine arts.

"This is one of the best prepared shows we've had," said Charles Lawrence, a partner of Espresso Royale.

Anyone is free to request a showing of their work, Lawrence said.

"We provide the space and it gives us something interesting for people to come in and look at," he said.

The exhibition will run through April 16.

Meaning of holidays overlooked by many

As was the case last year, there seems to be a disconcerted attitude emanating from some members of the student body concerning the administration's decision to take away the University holiday on the Monday after Easter.

But by following this line of logic and using the same religious ideals, we could grumble about not having University holidays following Yom Kippur, Rosh Hashana, Ramadan, or any of many other holidays from a myriad of religions.

What further clouds the issue is that many individuals are bothered by the fact that we are taking a day off to commemorate Martin Luther King Jr.'s birthday.

This mindset suggests that these holidays are mutually exclusive observations.

They are not.

Granted, many people argue that we really don't need a day off so early in the semester, and it would be more convenient to have a day off later in the semester.

Sure, it would be convenient to have a day off a little later on, but that argument seems to be flawed, since Easter follows spring break so closely.

The argument is flawed even further since it is the "day off" being stressed, not the intent and meaning of the holidays involved.

Easter, which occurs on Sunday, can be observed with family and friends with ample time for students to return to campus.

Martin Luther King Jr.'s observed birthday, in this mutuallv exclusive trade-off, is being threatened. It seems that its significance is being downplayed.

What would happen if the University decided to take a holiday after Rosh Hashana, Ramadan, National Hog Day, Arbor Day, and Ground Hog Day?

This is by no means meant to be sacrilegious. People have a right to their own religious, political and social beliefs. This is not merely a secular vs. Christian issue.

If we're going to take a day off after Easter, then we should do the same for other religions. The problem is, if we respected everyone's wishes to create University holidays from religious holidays, there would be too many days off to get anything accomplished.

Let's look at the significance of what these days off celebrate and examine our own consistency in granting these holidays.

Besides, as an adult there is always the freedom to take off any day for a holiday, as long as one is willing to deal with the consequences.

Bill's surprise success supports higher values

To the surprise of many observers, House Bill 2234, the Student Freedom of Expression Act, appears to be easing through the Kansas Legislature on its first try. Even for the lobbyists and supporters, who had predicted their efforts would take at least two years to pass the Legislature, the bill's successes are somewhat unexpected.

Realistically, part of the success can certainly be credited to the organizational efforts of the lobbyists. Legislators have reported receiving literally hundreds of letters and phone calls from high school and college students, teachers, and advisers supporting the bill.

Undoubtedly, supporters believe the bill is successful because the legislators recognize its inherent "rightness" in terms of providing the state's youth access to the highest ideals of democracy and freedom of speech expressed in the Constitution — particularly at a time when those youth are so impressionable.

But what might be subtly working to influence the legislators' decisions may be the actual participation of the students themselves. The sight of dozens of students packing the Senate and House Education Committee hearing rooms was heartening, and enough to quiet anyone cynical of student apathy.

"Adults" who pause to consider it for a moment might recognize the best ideals of education, a government by the people, and freedom of speech and expression manifested in the issue being debated.

Regardless of a win or loss in the final vote, for students, the effort will have been a practical lesson not only in the processes of government, but in civic action and responsibility. For legislators and citizens, it can't be anything but a reaffirmation of democratic beliefs.

Selective policy not solution

Commentary

Dwayne Lively
Collegian Columnist

Bart Bryce returned from a trip to Topeka with a satisfied, smug look on his face. I was immediately worried.

"Good news, D.L.," he said. "Good news indeed."

I stopped writing my column and leaned back in my chair. "Tell me all about it, Bart."

"Well, D.L., it looks like Kansas might be getting a selective admissions policy after all."

"This is good news?"

Bart looked puzzled. "Of course it is," he said.

"Please explain."

"Well, it means that now we're going to be up there with the big boys, like Harvard and Yale."

"By not letting people come to our schools?" I asked.

"No, by letting only qualified people come to our schools."

"And what exactly is a qualified person, Bart?"

"Well," Bart said, fumbling in his coat pocket and pulling out a news clipping, "a qualified person is a person who has completed a specified high school curriculum or ..."

"What kind of a specified curriculum?"

"Well, one that includes more history and mandatory foreign language classes."

I nodded. "Sounds good. Americans should study more history, and foreign languages can be fun."

"See," Bart said, "the Kansas Legislature and the Board of Regents aren't always the elitist tyrants you say they are."

"Right, Bart," I said. "But won't high schools have to hire more teachers to implement that curriculum?"

"Of course."

"What if the schools can't afford to hire more teachers? Some rural schools can barely afford to pay the teachers they have. And remember, at least one university in this state was founded to aid rural communities."

"Well, maybe they should pay the teachers less," Bart said. "Yes. That's it. Why pay a person $16,000 and have only one teacher when you can pay the same amount of money and have two teachers. If they pay teachers less, they can hire more of them."

"Point of information, Bart," I said. "Isn't $8,000 just a little bit below the poverty level?"

"Yes," Bart said. "But we don't want teachers who are only interested in making money. We want teachers who are dedicated to teaching."

"Right, Bart. What is the 'or' you mentioned earlier?"

"Well, if a person doesn't meet the specific curriculum, he can get in if he scores 23 or better on his ACT test."

"Let me get this straight, Bart," I said. "If high school students take the ACT and score 3 points higher than the Kansas average, which is about two points higher than the national average of 18, on this standardized test, which has repeatedly come under fire by educators as being culturally and racially biased, we will allow them to go to a Kansas university."

"Yeah," Bart said. "That's about right. After all, if we want above average students, we have to have above average standards. Or in this case, way above average."

"All right, Bart," I said. "Let's say that there are a few Kansas high school graduates who don't meet those two requirements, is there any other way for them to get in to a Kansas university?"

"Well, they can graduate in the top third of their class, grade point average-wise. Or, it says here that, out of 20,000 students, 15 percent of those will be admitted, even if they fail to meet the requirements, if, and this is important, they possess a special academic talent."

"Like what?"

"Well it doesn't say, but I guess they mean there might be someone out there who is a late bloomer, you know, someone who matures a bit more slowly than everyone else, but is actually pretty smart."

"How do you identify such people?"

"I guess by letting them into college and giving them a chance to prove themselves."

"But, Bart," I said, "isn't that what we have now with open admissions? If students find that college isn't for them, they can leave school, which they do. Selective admissions denies them the chance to even find out whether they like college or determine whether they have what it takes to succeed."

"No, it doesn't, because it allows for unqualified people like that to come to school, all 15 percent of them who demonstrate a special academic talent."

"Like maybe a student who can't read, but averaged 2,500 yards a year rushing during his high school football career?"

"No," Bart snapped. "No one like that. It says academic talent, not athletic talent. The university would never let anyone like that into school."

"Of course not, Bart."

"2,500 yards a year, huh?"

"2,500 yards a year."

"Hmmmm. I suppose we could always make an exception in an exceptional case."

"I suppose you're right, Bart. I suppose you're right."

Problems surround athletic fee

Commentary

Rattan Nath
Guest Columnist

Rattan Nath is a graduate student in physics.

There has been a flurry of activity by the KSU Athletic Department to induce the students to vote for an athletic fee in a referendum to be held March 27 and 28. The most noticeable element in this effort has been the athletic department's advertisements promoting "investment in excellence" by imposing a $30 annual fee on all students, and holding pep talks in the organized housing sector of the student population.

The proposal to hold this referendum passed the Student Senate with little debate, in spite of efforts by Student Body President Laurian Cuffy to get the Senate to look at the financial details. Cuffy went so far as to call a special session, but the results were marginal at best.

Since the proposal for a fee was to go to a referendum, the senators decided that the students will be responsible and they did not have to veto the idea or subject it to close scrutiny.

Many interesting pieces of information came up as many people and some senators exhorted the Senate to exercise more responsibility, and at least seek answers to the questions raised, but the efforts were to no avail.

Here we are outlining some of the reservations about this fee increase that may be of interest to those who plan to vote. Not much of this appeared in the Collegian coverage of the Senate proceedings, possibly due to its dubious status as interesting news.

This would be the largest single fee ever imposed if passed, possibly with the exception of Lafene. At $30 per year, the sum collected will exceed the request made by the athletic department by about $40,000 or more depending on the enrollment. The reason the Senate did not realize that the amount being passed was more than the requested amount was due to the haste with which they approved the proposal.

Supposedly, the fee is to help a program strapped for money, specifically the football team. However, the football account failed to spend about $800,000 of its allocation last year according to information presented to the Senate, but not followed up later.

The tentative increase in the combined ticket prices for football and basketball in the event the fee does not pass is about $11. To avoid an $11 increase, the students are being asked to shell out $30 each, irrespective of whether they can attend any games at all.

The fee does not eliminate tickets for the revenue sports, but rather opens 'non-revenue' sports to the non-fans. This also was not followed up in the Senate.

The only rationale in coming up with the projected budget increase for the athletic department was the mid-point of the total budgets in the Big Eight.

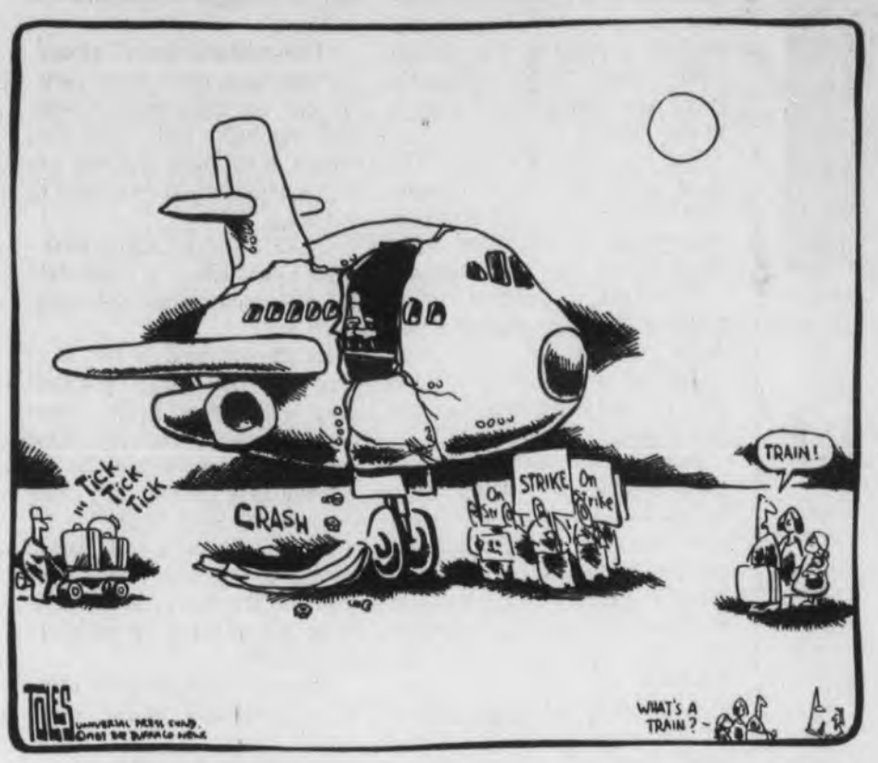
No specific areas were properly identified as being in need of money, nor was any trend analysis done to rationally predict the amount required for a goal set in advance.

The athletic department acknowledged that it had no planning at all when it first came up with the proposal for a fee last year and got its act together later. Getting its act together means trying to justify spending the money it sensed could be obtained.

Historically, the department has a bad record in money management and was unable to meet its commitment for the construction of the Bramlage Coliseum. It has a debt of about $2 million to the foundation on account of that.

The fee is quite likely a method to get the students to pay for the athletic department's share without getting the credit. It also indicates the quality of their projections, when made at all, since this debt was not anticipated. Although this was revealed in Senate after the athletic department denied any debt at all, thus perjuring itself, it had no impact in trying to scrutinize the proposal; if not to protect the students then at least to protect the athletic department from itself and to force it to do some hard thinking.

In the past, frivolous spending has been the form of $600,000 for lights for night football games, the catch being that there are no such games played here. Nice toy syndrome.



In the current campaign there was a proposal to limit the advertising by the department to balance the scales, but the Senate did not agree, possibly out of its desire to impose the fee.

The highlight of the debate on whether the fee was too exorbitant was a demonstration by a senator, who shall remain unnamed, that the poor students on loans have enough money to pay for about $400 in fee increases, and this was only $30. The increases for the next year are projected to be about $100.

Please keep this information in mind and vote no if you think that the fee is an ill-conceived idea, or that the Senate should have done a better job. You have a right to demand better performance and can send this proposal where it belongs.

Women deserve recognition

Commentary

Barbara Baker

Collegian Columnist

Since March is Women's History Month, it would not be justifiable to let the month end without acknowledging and honoring a few brave and politically active women in the world.

■ Rosa Parks: She gave birth to the civil rights movement by refusing to give up her seat on a segregated bus. She was also responsible for launching the career of a 26-year-old civil rights leader, Martin Luther King Jr.

■ Meryl Streep: A quality actress, she has stayed away from playing sweet little damsels in distress and instead has portrayed women who are human, with problems and flaws just like men.

■ Shirley Chisholm: She was the first black woman to run for president. She has established herself as a female force to be reckoned with because she wouldn't stand for the mundane.

■ Gloria Steinem: Creator of and writer for Ms. magazine, she is an advocate for women's liberation.

■ Andrea Lee: She's the author of "Sarah Phillips," a novel of a black woman's struggle to be a part of an integrated society, not just a limited, exclusively defined race world.

■ Alice Childress: She's the playwright of "Wedding Band," an honest play dealing with an interracial relationship focusing on how racism from both black and white societies can destroy the love and truth in an interracial relationship.

■ Lorraine Hansberry: She's the playwright of "Les Blanc," "To What Use Are Flowers" and "The Sign In Sidney Brustein's Window." She's a writer whose works cross both black and white boundaries. It doesn't matter from what racial background a reader comes. Hansberry's writing will sometimes touch you and sometimes make you angry because there is a truth in her writing that makes you take an honest look at yourself.

Hansberry died of cancer at the age of 34. Never again will the world have such a great writer who was able to write about both white and black societies in such an honest and brave context.

Lee, Childress and Hansberry are three women writers who should also be honored as women who didn't write according to the segregated status quo. All three women, in their own style of writing, tell us that despite what racists want us to believe, white and black societies are interrelated and sooner or later, they must learn to relate to each other. What the final racial destiny will be depends upon the individuals.

It is also important to pay tribute to women who are not written down in the history books.

Three women at K-State responded to an ad for a support group. Because of the topic, they knew the support group would not be popular. It would get ignored, face stares, and get verbal attacks, just like the relationships it represents. The support group was for Women in Interracial Relationships.

But these three women said they wanted to do more then just sit and gripe. They wanted to plan programs, do newsletters, and disprove racist assumptions about interracial relationships.

These three women should be proud during Women's History Month. They have faced humiliation and criticism from family and so-called friends, but they've remained strong and brave in their convictions. A lot more people could take lessons from them.

Because of space limitations, this column consists of only a few great women. But the spirit of these women, and others not mentioned here, must be remembered. The world would be much more stifled without the efforts of a few dedicated women against society's limited status quos.

Living hazardous

Editor,

New research has now shown that 50 percent of all fruits grown may cause cancer. The reason for this is the pesticides being sprayed on some crops react with certain chemicals in the body. A doctor interviewed on the Phil Donahue show mentioned this particular reaction produces a chemical more commonly referred to as rocket fuel.

Well, first it was proven that smoking and breathing smoke cause cancer. Then researchers proved that since aerosol sprays are depleting our ozone layer, sun rays may cause skin cancer. Later, we discovered that eating beef, drinking diet pop containing saccharin and being exposed to asbestos killed laboratory rats.

Now we have learned that fruits and vegetables — yes, the same foods your mother told you were good for you — may cause this incurable illness.

All this is great news, isn't it? No, I think it's scary because there is absolutely no way to avoid all these situations.

OK, maybe it's easy to never start smoking, but what if your parents smoke? You've been inhaling their exhaust for years.

You can't always escape sun rays, you won't ever know if there is asbestos in the walls where your classes are held, and you've been eating fruits and drinking fruit juices since birth.

Doctors and researchers have yet to find a cure for cancer so until that happens, I wish the media would stop telling me that living may be hazardous to my health.

Area high schools attend festival

By Laurie Cox
Collegian Reporter

Six high school groups participated Wednesday in the theater department's One Act Festival, bringing with them a wide range of entertainment.

"This is the fourth year for the festival," said John Uthoff, associate professor of theater and technical director for the K-State Players. "We had a good initial reponse with 10 to 12 schools replying, but due to scheduling, only six schools could attend."

Numerous K-State students helped with the festival. They ran lighting and sound equipment, helped with refreshments and stage managing and worked with the visiting students.

Lewis Shelton, head of the KSU Theater Program, gave the welcoming remarks to begin the day.

Campus High School gave the first performance, "The Wizard of Oz" by L. Frank Baum.

"Due to illness of one of their actors they were forced to do some last minute cutting and adjusting of their skit," said Carl Hinrichs, associate professor of theater.

The other two performances of the morning were Marysville High School presenting "Runaways" by Elizabeth Swados, and Riley County High School with "Opening of a Door" by Wall Spence.

In the morning the students attended a workshop on Sword Combat taught by guest artist J.R. Beardsley. After the workshop, Judith Zivanovic, associate dean of arts and sciences, and Harold J. Nichols, chairman of the Department of Speech, gave critiques of the morning's productions.

Three more presentations were given in the afternoon. Greensburg High School performed "Just Desserts" by Pat Cook, Rose Hill High School presented "After Midnight, Before Dawn" by David Campton, and Shawnee Heights High School performed "A Bench at the Edge" by Luigi Jannuzzi.

Scholars say Last Supper was informal meal

By The Associated Press

JERUSALEM — To Renaissance artist Leonardo da Vinci — and to many Christians since then — Jesus Christ's Last Supper was a formal, seated gathering at a rectangular table.

But scholars at a Bible research center say diners in Christ's era more likely reclined on floor cushions for festive meals, as the Romans did in that day.

They also speculate that Judas, contrary to popular belief, may have had a place of honor at the last gathering of Christ and his apostles.

"Religious art normally pictures the period of the artist, not the period of the Bible," said Jim Fleming of the Biblical Resources Study Center. "With apologies to da Vinci, things probably looked different."

During the Last Supper, commemorated Thursday by most of the world's Christians, Christ broke bread and blessed wine with his closest disciples hours before he was turned over by Judas to Roman soldiers and crucified.

Relying on Bible verses, ancient Jewish writings and Roman historical works, Fleming and his associates have concluded that the Last Supper probably was served at a low, U-shaped table that the Romans called a "triclinium."

"Straw mattresses generally were placed around the outside, and guests ate — and sometimes slept — at the same place," Fleming said.

The 45-year-old U.S.-educated Bible scholar who has done research in Israel for 15 years noted the early Greek versions of the New Testament describe Last Supper participants as reclining.

He said the Greek words "anekaito" and "anepesen," used in Matthew, Mark and Luke, were often translated as "sat" but actually mean "reclined."

Today, Christian pilgrims visit the Cenacle, a building on Mount Zion in Jerusalem where tradition has it the Last Supper was held.

Bush praises Amish for battling against increasing drug use

By The Associated Press

LANCASTER — President Bush flew from Washington to Lancaster to tell high school students that rising drug use in this pristine, pastoral area of Amish farms shows "how vulnerable every American city and town is to the menace."

But, he told his audience, "The good news is, you're fighting back" with homegrown efforts to stop young people from using drugs before they ever begin.

From here, he shuttled to Wilmington, Del., to proclaim that drugs are not an issue with "shades of gray. It involves good guys and bad guys, white hats and black hats, good and evil."

Preceded on stage at Lancaster's Conestoga Valley High School by a young man who told how drugs had wrecked his life, the president railed against casual drug use and reiterated his pledge to destroy foreign drug crops and the labs that process their harvests.

Addressing 3,000 students and parents packed into the school gym, Bush told the crowd:

"Together, let's you and me send a message on drug abuse to the so-called casual user. Face up to the fact that your so-called recreational drug use contributes to the drug culture, to the crime, the death and degradation associated with the drug trade."

He pointed to efforts being made to keep young people from experimenting with drugs and said Americans must "get the message across that drugs are not a form of entertainment. ... Drugs are a poison to users and to our communities."

He pointed to DARE, a program begun by Los Angeles police and schools to "drug-proof our children."

"I've been out there," he said. "DARE sends these police officers into the classroom, to work with the kids, build their self-esteem, teach them that they can refuse when they're pressured to try drugs."

DARE — Drug Abuse Resistance Education — is now active in 1,200 communities in 48 states, Bush said.

He also pointed to two local programs that target potential drug users from grade school through high school as part of the education effort and said they "do something to prevent drug problems before they begin."

He even sought out Amish parents to ask why among their children "the drug problem seems to be non-existent, or hopefully non-existent."

Meeting with a dozen members of the country's second-largest Amish community, Bush asked, "Why is it that you all have been able to withstand the pressures and others have not?"

As if answering his own question, he asked, "Faith?"

One Amish leader said he believed the answer lies in the fact that Amish youth, if true to the faith, have no access to television, radio "and sexual things."

Statistics for Lancaster County make Bush's point about the increase in drug activity, but also show it is far behind the District of Columbia.

Rugby club takes 2 from Wisconsin

By The Collegian Staff

Although Wednesday was the first time the collegiate rugby team took the field as a unit, both the A and B sides posted wins against the visiting University of Wisconsin teams.

The A side took a three-point lead early with a dropkick by fly half Steve Duncan. Hooker Tim Dugan added a try to make the score 7-0 before Wisconsin added a try of its own to conclude the half.

Two more tries were added in the second half by K-State to make the final score 15-4.

"The scrum played exceptionally well compared to the previous week. This week they did really exceptional work," said Coach Greg Barnes.

"They dominated line-outs and loose balls, everything. The back line did well also, but it was the scrum that made the difference," he said. "We have to be pleased with the performance we got from them."

Team captain and wing forward Darrel Loder agreed with Barnes.

"The pack played great. They won the game for us," he said.

Coach Dan Blea said the B side's win, 16-3, showed the determination the group of young players possesses.

"We haven't been really able to get them together a lot, but they're doing really well," Blea said. "We're getting a lot of great athletes."

Although about a third of the team is new, Barnes said inexperience hasn't really hurt the team.

"In the 16 years I've been playing, I've never seen new guys catch on as quickly as these guys have. They're exceptional," he said.

Although some of the new players have transferred from another college program, many had never played rugby before joining the club, Blea said.

"I'm just really impressed with their work," he said. "They are providing a lot of depth and excitement for our team."

Overall, Loder said, members of the B side showed a lot of promise and talent.

With about 45 members, the club is the strongest and deepest it has ever been, Blea said.

"Depth is going to be the key to our success down the road. We have people who are so competent at each position that competition is really tough. That competition is bringing out the best in everyone," he said.

Both sides lost Saturday in games against the Greater Omaha Area Touring Side.

The teams, Blea said, failed to prepare mentally before the games against the GOATS.

"We had a little talk about that this week, and then came out and played exceptionally well," he said.

The teams that played against the GOATS were totally different against Wisconsin, Loder said.

"The pack was very poor in those games and just didn't go together. It was a totally different level of play and they set the whole pace of the game for us," he said.

The two collegiate sides have been able to gain experience prior to the game against Wisconsin by playing in earlier games with a mixture of club members. Wednesday's wins move the A side to 3-1, and the B side to 4-2.

The squad will travel Saturday to Wichita to take on the Wichita Rugby Club, a contest Barnes said he expects to "win quite handily."

"We'll play as strong as we need to win. We may elect to get some players in to get some experience in different positions and see how they do."

Staff/Greg Vogel

University of Wisconsin player Dave Bryant attempts to gain control of a loose ball as K-State Rugby Club wing forward Darrel Loder tries to get to the ball during the A side game Wednesday afternoon. K-State won the contest 15-4 and also won the B side game, 16-3.

'Cats return home to play Washburn

By Mike Goens
Sports Writer

The K-State baseball squad returns home after a successful West Coast road trip and will play the Washburn Ichabods at 2 p.m. today at Frank Myers Field.

The Wildcats are 9-3 after winning five of eight on the road trip. The 'Cats started the swing with a 4-3 win over 12th-ranked San Jose State and then dropped a 2-0 decision to the Spartans before beginning play in the Pepsi/Me-N-Ed's Classic at Fresno State.

"I am very pleased; we got a lot accomplished," Coach Mike Clark said. "The kids showed they could really compete very well.

"As inexperienced as we are, we didn't know how we would react against top 20 teams, but we are really pleased with what we saw."

K-State lost to No. 25 Washington State, 5-3, in the opening round of the tournament, but responded by beating U.S. International, 7-4; North Carolina, 7-6; Liberty, 6-4; and Missouri, 6-5.

Sean Collins' two-out homer in the bottom of the ninth inning provided the margin of victory over North Carolina, and the Wildcats held off Missouri after the Tigers had put the potential tying and winning runs on base.

"I am very pleased; we got a lot accomplished. The kids showed they could really compete very well. As inexperienced as we are, we are really pleased with what we saw."

— Mike Clark baseball coach

K-State finished fourth in the tournament after losing to Virginia Tech, 6-3. The Wildcats' 4-2 record in the tourney was tied for second best in the eight-team field.

Russ Ringgenberg was the only Wildcat named to the all-tournament team after finishing fourth in hitting at .476 and driving in eight runs. He leads the 'Cats in hitting at .432 and in hits with 18.

"We were hoping he would come back like this," Clark said of Ringgenberg's return after a redshirt season. "He has matured; he's really done a nice job of handling his emotions."

Clark said the strong points of the trip were pitching and defense, with the team's earned run average down around four. The ability to stay away from the big inning was a big factor as well, as the infield turning the double plays when they counted.

Clark said starter David Hierholzer is throwing well right now, and all of the starters have had a lot of support from the relievers.

"We can go to the bullpen quite a bit with a lot of confidence right now," Clark said. "I don't see the staff going nine innings, just get the game to the relief pitchers."

Bill Schafer set a tournament record with three saves in three appearances for the 'Cats. He received help from Mike Hedrick in middle relief. Hedrick has yielded just one earned run in eleven innings and four appearances.

"It gave the kids an idea we can play with good competition," Clark said. "It showed them we always have a chance. We are very capable of playing with these people. We have to continue to improve and prove we can do it over the course of the season."

The Wildcats were without regular rightfielder Bill Barnard. Ron Bradshaw stepped in as the designated hitter and responded with a .333 average.

"The nice part is nobody played badly," Clark said. "I can't say I'm surprised, but we didn't know how they would react. This group is talented but there is not a lot of Division I experience, with only three guys back from last year. I'm real pleased, but we can't be satisfied, there is a lot of work to be done."

Clark said Jim McClellan would probably start for the Wildcats today. He is 0-1 on the year with a 3.29 ERA and one save.

LSU's Jackson leads All-Freshmen team

By The Associated Press

Chris Jackson, only the second member of his class to earn All-America honors, was named Wednesday to The Associated Press All-Freshmen team.

The Louisiana State guard set the class scoring record with his 30.2 average and last week he became the second freshman ever to be named to the All-America team, following Oklahoma's Wayman Tisdale who earned the honor as a freshman in 1983.

Joining Jackson on the All-Freshmen team are frontcourt players Alonzo Mourning of Georgetown, Billy Owens of Syracuse, LaPhonso Ellis of Notre Dame and Don MacLean of UCLA.

The voting was conducted among a selected national panel of sportswriters and broadcasters.

The 6-foot-1 Jackson, the only freshman among the top 50 scorers in Division I this season, bettered the freshman scoring mark of 29.4 set by Austin Peay's Fly Williams in 1973. The best scoring mark for each college class is now held by an LSU player as Pete Maravich set the mark for sophomore, junior and senior seasons, averaging 44.2 points over the three seasons.

Jackson's trademark has become his powerful crossover dribble that usually sets him for one of his smooth jump shots or allows him to find an open man. He complemented his scoring average with 130 assists in 32 games.

Mourning was chosen for third-team All-America honors and he was named Big East defensive player of the year after blocking 160 shots, shattering the school mark of 135 set by Patrick Ewing.

Rozelle steps down from NFL's top post

By The Associated Press

PALM DESERT, Calif. — NFL commissioner Pete Rozelle announced Wednesday he is retiring, effective immediately, after 30 years. He said he would remain on the job until a successor is found.

Rozelle, 63, said he made the decision last October, but told no one. Most owners were unaware of his decision until he made a private announcement to them, 10 minutes before his public statement.

Rozelle's contract runs through the 1991 season. But he said he wanted to step down now "to enjoy more free time — stress-free time" with his family. "It's been a great 30 years."

Rozelle, who lives in the New York City suburb of Rye, said he would move to the San Diego area.

Rozelle said he expected a successor would be named before the season begins, and would stay on to help the transition.

"I have no health problems except for the 20 pounds I gained since I stopped smoking a year ago," Rozelle said.

Rozelle was elected commissioner in 1959 as a dark-horse candidate following the death of Bert Bell. At the time, Rozelle was general manager of the Los Angeles Rams.

He guided the NFL through its most lucrative period, including a merger with the AFL in 1966. He was especially adept at obtaining large television contracts, increasing the NFL's television revenue from less than $1 million a year to the current $440 million.

It is believed that Tex Schramm, a member of the league's competition committee, could be named acting commissioner until a fulltime replacement is found. Schramm, general manager of the Dallas Cowboys, a team that joined the NFL in Rozelle's first year as commissioner, was recently left reeling by the firing of Dallas Coach Tom Landry, who also was hired in 1960.

Young talent thriving in AL West division

By The Associated Press

The argument in the American League: is the West better than the East?

"I don't know if I'm ready to say that yet," Oakland general manager Sandy Alderson says. "The East has more depth, but the West is improving."

Sure is, especially because of young talent. The last six rookies of the year have come from the AL West; before that, only two of 14 came from there.

Jose Canseco, Mark McGwire, Ruben Sierra, Wally Joyner and Kevin Seitzer are among the best while Ken Griffey Jr., Jim Abbott and Robin Ventura are among the brightest on the way.

Add to that some new faces this season — Nolan Ryan, Julio Franco, Rafael Palmeiro, Claudell Washington and Lance Parrish — and the West is no longer the Worst.

Oakland Athletics

Jose Canseco and the Bash Bunch moved into first place on April 20 and stayed there the rest of the season and won 104 times, a division record. Now, Oakland has added free agent Mike Moore to the league's best pitching staff.

Moore, 66-96 lifetime with Seattle, is interesting. His winning percentage was worse than the Mariners', but many feel he will be a big winner with a good team.

Dave Stewart, a two-time 20-game winner who has not gotten the attention he deserves, Bob Welch (17-9) and Storm Davis (16-7) are supplemented by Todd Burns (8-2) and Curt Young (11-8).

Kansas City Royals

The Royals made a one-game improvement to 84-77, not bad for a team that has traded away Danny Jackson, David Cone and Melido Perez in the past two years.

Kansas City continues to rely on pitching, led by Mark Gubicza (20-8), Bret Saberhagen (14-16), Charlie Leibrandt (13-12) and Floyd Bannister (12-13). Rookie Tom Gordon, who started in Class A and worked his way up to the majors — striking out 281 along the way — may join the rotation.

Steve Farr (20 saves) did well after Dan Quisenberry and Gene Garber were cut, although left-handers batted .280 against him.

Minnesota Twins

The Twins proved the previous season was no fluke. They won 91 games, two more than Boston got in winning the AL East.

Cy Young winner Frank Viola (24-7, 2.64 ERA) has been baseball's best left-hander for five years. Unheralded Allan Anderson (16-9, 2.45 ERA) held off Ted Higuera to win the ERA title after Manager Tom Kelly scratched him from his last scheduled start. Shane Rawley (8-16) was acquired from Philadelphia for Tom Herr and Fred Toliver and Les Straker will compete for the final spot.

Texas Rangers

Call them the Texas Strangers. After youth movements didn't work out as well as expected, the Rangers sped up the rebuilding process by trading five players for 10 new ones.

Julio Franco and Palmeiro each hit .300 last season and Texas hopes Buddy Bell (40 RBI with Cincinnati and Houston) can still be productive.

Everyone knows what Nolan Ryan can do. At age 42, some thought the team shouldn't have spent millions to get him. But he's a Texas folk hero who can still throw in the mid-90s and draw fans.

Seattle Mariners

Jim Lefebvre will try to do what no other Seattle manager has ever accomplished: lead the Mariners to a winning season.

Seattle went 68-93 and then lost Moore to free agency. Lefebvre, an Oakland coach last season, is trying to change things on and off the field; he began each day at spring training by giving a half-hour motivational talk to his players.

Pitching, instead of words, will determine whether Seattle improves. Mark Langston (15-11, 235 strikeouts) is apparently staying put after many trade rumors. Scott Bankhead (7-9, 3.07 ERA), Bill Swift (8-12) and Mike Campbell (6-10) are in the rotation and Tom Niedenfuer (18 saves with Baltimore) has been added to Mike Schooler (15 saves) in the bullpen.

Chicago White Sox

Jeff Torborg, like Jim Lefebvre, will be under a long-time baseball curse: many managers take over bad teams, finish with bad records and then get blamed for being no good.

Chicago went 71-90 and made no major changes in the off-season. The White Sox were 13th in average and runs and led the majors with 154 errors. Batting coach Walt Hriniak may help with powerless White Sox hitters.

California Angels

The Angels loaded up on veterans in the offseason; Bert Blyleven, Parrish and Washington to play and Doug Rader to manage.

Attendance in Anaheim fell 355,000 in a year when baseball set an all-time high.

Legislation proposed in House

Rural hospitals in danger of closing down

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Worried that rural hospitals are an endangered species, a bipartisan coalition of House members proposed legislation on Wednesday to improve health care in small towns and rural areas.

"We need to move quickly to keep these rural hospitals open," Rep. Jim Slattery, D-Kan., said at a news conference.

"If we don't act in the next few years, indeed in the next few months in some cases, these hospitals are going to be gone and the quality of life in these rural communities will be adversely affected for about as far as the eye can see."

One of the main efforts of an estimated $150 million package of legislation proposed by the Rural Health Care Coalition, a group of about 100 lawmakers from more than 40 states, is to shift more money to rural hospitals through the Medicare reimbursement system.

Since 1980, 163 rural hospitals have closed. Lawmakers contend that the government Medicare payment system discriminates against hospitals and physicians in rural areas, providing them with lower payments than their urban counterparts for the same health care treatment for elderly patients.

For hospitals, there is an overall 11 percent differential between payments to urban and rural hospitals. One proposal calls for eliminating that gap over three years by increasing annual payment adjustments to rural hospitals and slowing increases to urban institutions. Lawmakers also said they would work to equalize payments to physicians.

Rep. Tom Tauke, R-Iowa, said the hospital reimbursement change would not boost overall federal spending but represented a "redistribution of funds."

At issue is the so-called prospective payment system for Medicare, which was implemented in 1983 to control rising medical costs. It pays hospitals at specific rates for a range of services. Each year, recommendations are made to Congress for adjustments to reflect cost increases in a "market basket" of goods and services for hospitals.

Other proposals in the package would:

■ Provide additional Medicare payments to some rural hospitals to ensure that total reimbursements cover "reasonable costs" of providing care. Those eligible would be hospitals with fewer than 100 beds and in which Medicare patients account for at least 55 percent of their services.

"If we don't do that, we're going to have folks driving hundreds of miles for the kind of primary and essential care that they desparately need in our rural areas," said Rep. Pat Roberts, R-Kan.

■ Make it easier to establish rural health clinics through a program established in 1977. Legislation would give more flexibility in staffing and provide Medicare coverage for services of clinical social workers.

KPL customers may face increase

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Missouri customers of KPL Gas Service would pay about $188 million under a plan to replace bare-steel service lines with safer plastic pipes during the next 20 years, utility officials say.

The utility earlier had estimated it would cost $150 million to replace bare-steel lines in Missouri and Kansas, but KPL officials now say the final cost for both states will be much higher.

In documents filed with the Missouri Public Service Commission, KPL officials have estimated that it could cost $187.8 million to replace customer-owned bare-steel pipelines in the next 20 years, KPL spokesman Hal Hudson said. He said that is based on an average cost of $600 for each of the 313,000 lines.

The cost of replacing lines in Kansas could reach about $168 million, but that figure is more uncertain because of questions about proposed KCC regulations, he said.

The plan to address safety concerns about the steel lines will be presented by April 15 to the Missouri Public Service Commission. KPL officials said they were unsure how customers' gas rates would be affected by the program, the most comprehensive ever launched by the Topeka-based utility.

"It should not be a significant, immediate kind of jolt to the ratepayers," KPL Chairman David Black said Tuesday in a meeting with the editorial board of The Kansas City Star and The Kansas City Times.

Failures on the bare-steel lines in Missouri have killed five people and injured five since November. Four other people were injured in September when a steel customer-service line failed in Overland Park.

Three other explosions and a fire, all related to gas leaks, have occurred in KPL's system in that time.

The utility must tell the Kansas Corporation Commission by June 1 how it plans to deal with the problem in Kansas, which has 205,000 bare steel lines.

The service lines were installed before 1971, when federal safety rules first required utilities to maintain pipes between a main line and a customer's house.

Utilities such as KPL regarded those old lines as the responsibility of customers. Routine leak tests on those lines were not conducted until October.

The survey of more than 670,000 bare-steel lines in both states found about 27,500 leaks.

School finance plans shown to committee

From Staff and Wire Reports

TOPEKA — Members of the House Education Committee got their first look Wednesday at four proposed school finance plans using new property valuations from the just-completed statewide reappraisal.

Since school districts' valuations are a key part of the formula used to determine their wealth — and the amount of state school aid they receive — it is the first time the new valuation numbers could be used in computer runs showing the effects of reappraisal.

Although the valuations could be reduced somewhat as owners appeal the valuations placed on their property, the new numbers gave the committee something to start developing a school finance plan to take to the House floor for debate.

Hal Rowe, superintendant of schools for U.S.D. 383, said a significant change will probably occur in the distribution of responsibility for paying taxes, even though school districts have a limit on the number of dollars they can collect from the community.

"Small businesses are going to pick up a greater tax share than they have in the past," he said.

The plan the committee is starting with is one proposed by Gov. Mike Hayden in his legislative message in January. Using Hayden's school finance plan and new property valuations, Manhattan's state aid payments show an increase of $559,038 and a decrease in the mill levy of 14.1 mills.

Because of increased assessed valuations for the county, a mill will earn more, said Martha Miller, member of the Board of Education for U.S.D. 383. With assessed valuations up for the county, the mill levy must go down.

The other three computer runs distributed to the committee Wednesday contain variations of Hayden's plan that members want to study.

Hayden's plan would allow school districts to raise their budgets 2 percent or 4 percent next year, depending on whether they are above or below the state median in per-pupil expenditures. This would put $52.6 million in additional state aid into the formula and result in a statewide property tax increase of $10.9 million if all districts raised their budgets the maximum amount.

'Die Hard' top video rental for 5th consecutive week

By Stacy Sweazy
Collegian Reviewer

Based on a novel by Roderick Thorp, "Die Hard" has ranked in Billboard Magazine's top five rented videos during its past five weeks on the chart. The film is an action-packed cliffhanger and gives viewers a chance to ride an emotional roller coaster.

Bruce Willis did some dangerous "moonlighting" when he made "Die Hard," a video released by CBS-Fox Video. In the first half hour of the film, he definitely earns the $5 million Fox paid him.

Willis plays John McClane, a New York city cop married to Holly Gennaro, played by Bonnie Bedelia. Gennaro is a successful business executive who insists on using her maiden name and living in Los Angeles.

Review

To complete the Christmas scene for their two children, McClane catches a late flight to the West Coast. He arrives just in time to catch terrorist creatures stirring around the Nakatomi Towers and hopes the Los Angeles Police Department soon will be there.

With 30 people, including his wife, being held hostage, McClane sneaks around a 40-story building with a pistol. The odds begin uneven with 12 villainous foreigners against the vacationing cop, but even barefooted McClane outwits the cold, calculated clan of corporate hustlers.

Viewers get a chance to do the all-American thing — root for the underdog. However, unlike most underdogs, McClane knows when to listen, run, shut up and pray.

The bullets and sheets of glass start to fly when Hans Gruber puts a piece of lead in the chief executive's head. Gruber is played by Alan Rickman, an English actor who struggles with a German accent throughout the film.

After witnessing this killing, McClane gets as uptight and trigger-happy as the bad guys. He proceeds to waste a round of bullets on one of them, thus adding a machine gun, a hand radio and a load of ammunition to his arms collection.

One of McClane's only contacts outside the building is Sgt. Al Powell, a cop with a passion for Twinkies, played by Reginald Vel Johnson. McClane and Powell found a two-way bond through the radio that enhanced their characters with compassion.

In one of the last scenes, Powell is as much a hero as McClane when more than $600 million worth of company bonds floats from the roof of the building to the tune of "Let It Snow."

Willis was a tough guy, but not an over-developed hormonal mistake molded after Rambo. He used his character to join the ranks of movie warrior greats like Eastwood, De Niro and Bronson, who were born with silver bullets in their guns.

The final scenes seem like a recap of the famous fire and chopper clips from "Towering Inferno."

"Die Hard" is not slumber party stuff. It has the right mix of humor to lighten a tense audience yet leave viewers riveted to their seats and thirsty for more blood.

Inmate released from Texas prison claims innocence

By The Associated Press

HOUSTON — Former death row inmate Randall Dale Adams said Wednesday that he wants to go home to Ohio and never return to Texas, the state that imprisoned him for 12 years for a crime he says he didn't commit.

However, Adams, who was released from a Dallas prison on Tuesday, said he isn't bitter about the past and believes a new trial on charges of killing a police officer would further clear his name.

Shortly after his release, Adams flew to Houston to meet with his attorney and sipped his first beer since his arrest in 1976, a treat from the plane's captain. He drank only one beer.

"I'll be glad to get back to Ohio," he said. "No offense, but I hate Texas."

Later, speaking to about 60 reporters at a news conference, he softened that assessment and said he held no grudge.

"I do believe Texas is a good state. I do believe the people of Dallas are probably good people," Adams said. "I do not blame the people of Dallas or the people of Texas for the actions of a few."

Asked whether he would ever return to Texas, he said, "I am going home to Ohio. I will stay there."

Adams, who had no previous arrests, was convicted in 1977 of killing police officer Robert Wood and was sentenced to death. He once came within three days of his execution date before the sentence was commuted to life in prison in 1980.

The conviction was dismissed earlier this month, following revelations in a movie documentary about his case, "The Thin Blue Line."

Despite being imprisoned and facing the death penalty, Adams said the Texas judicial system "in my case worked. Texas did not execute me."

Adams welcomed news that officials were seeking to retry him for Wood's slaying, saying he believed his long-maintained innocence could at last be proved.

"I've been asking for (a new trial) for 12 years," Adams said. "I would like to have a jury in Dallas release me. I believe my name has been cleared now ... but I believe that if the retrial happens, we may be able to receive some answers as to why all of this happened, and I would like that."

Dallas County District Attorney John Vance said he will decide within two weeks whether to retry Adams. Crucial to the decision, he said, is investigators' ability to find two key witnesses.

Police are trying to locate a Louisiana man who had identified Adams. The man's initial testimony has not been impeached, but at a later federal hearing the man said he did not remember his testimony, Vance said.

The second witness is a woman authorities have not contacted in 13 years, he said. Vance said he did not recall the witnesses' names or other details.

Adams' case gained national attention when questions about his conviction were raised in "The Thin Blue Line." Director Erroll Morris said he was "proud, very proud" to have prompted renewed interest in the case.

Morris' documentary questioned the testimony of then-16-year-old David Harris of Vidor, Texas, who had picked up Adams the day of the shooting after Adams' car ran out of gas.

UFM offers martial arts classes

By Laurie Cox
Collegian Reporter

For the past year and a half, University for Man has been offering a Japanese martial arts class which teaches students to harmonize with their opponents and drop them without kicking or hitting.

Aikido is a method of self-defense in which the opponent's strength and weight are used against him.

"Aikido means a way to achieve spiritual harmony," said Joel Coopersmith, freshman in information systems.

The class is taught by Armando and Elina Flories. Armando Flories is employed by the Army and has taught aikido in Texas, Hawaii and Germany.

The class has a total enrollment of about 40 students. Offered from 7 to 9 p.m. on Monday and Wednesday nights and at 10 a.m. on Saturdays, Coopersmith said between 25 and 30 people attend a particular section.

Coopersmith said students practice in judo gis.

"They are made thicker, a double weave, so that it won't rip as easy, unlike karate gis," he said. "Once the pupil becomes a black belt he will wear a Hakamo, which is long and kind of like a dress.

"Unlike karate, which has many different colors to represent the different levels of accomplishments, aikido has only white and black belts."

Flories teaches his students grappling, the process of achieving a desired position, locks, throws and pins as the methods to defeat an opponent.

"It's not like wrestling, because you're standing more upright," Coopersmith said. "You have to redirect your opponents' energy to put them down and put them down with pain, but no breaking."

There are four women enrolled in the class, who oppose the male students.

"Women are usually better because they don't have a lot of body mass and can manuever more easily," Coopersmith said.

"I find it is easy for me, because it is easy to find my center," said Leigh Livingston, freshman in preprofessional secondary education. "Women generally have wider hips than men and their mass is lower, which makes it easier to find a central balance."

Coopersmith said the class is not as competitive as some of the other martial arts because students are forced to work with — instead of

Cartel drug leaders indicted on charges of cocaine sales

By The Associated Press

JACKSONVILLE, Fla. — Leaders of Colombia's Medellin Cartel were indicted Wednesday on charges of cocaine trafficking and masterminding the slayings of the Colombian justice minister and a U.S. drug informant.

The sweeping indictment alleges that both Nicaragua and the Bahamas were used as way stations for $1 billion in drug imports to the United States. Among those charged is a close associate of Bahamian Prime Minister Lynden Pindling.

The case "once again shows that the United States is not going to let up our efforts to catch these individuals who are supplying drugs to the United States," U.S. Attorney Robert W. Genzman said. "We feel that the pressure has got to be kept on regardless of how many indictments come out in the United States against members of the cartel."

In all, 30 people were charged in the "second wave" of indictments resulting from last May's conviction of Carlos Lehder Rivas, one of the leaders of the cartel, which officials say is responsible for up to 80 percent of the cocaine imported into the United States.

The indictment accuses cartel leader Pablo Escobar Gaviria of organizing the assassination of Colombian Justice Minister Rodrigo Lara Bonilla on April 29, 1984, and says Escobar and Fabio Ochoa Vasquez directed the Feb. 19, 1986, slaying of former Drug Enforcement Administration informant Barry Seal.

Other major figures indicted included cartel kingpins Jose Gonzalo Rodriguez Gacha, Jorge Ochoa Vasquez, Fabio Ochoa Vasquez and Gonzalo Mejia.

None of the cartel members has been taken into custody, although most have already been indicted in Miami. They are believed to be in Colombia, officials said.

Genzman noted that it took the government six years to get Lehder to the United States. "I am confident that at some point in time we will be able to obtain custody of the others," he said.

Also indicted was Jack Carlton Reed, who was Lehder's co-defendant at last year's trial.

Lehder and Reed were convicted here last May 19 of conspiring to import cocaine. Lehder — an unindicted co-conspirator in the new indictment — is serving a life sentence and Reed is serving a 15-year term.

Genzman said the indictment covers a 15-year period from 1974 to the present, and involves the importation of 44,000 pounds of cocaine worth $1 billion.

"The indictment contains 205 snapshots of a long-term drug conspiracy in action," Genzman said.

"The indictment traces Lehder's development into a primary overseas transporter of cocaine for other Medellin Cartel members, and his continued assocation with these members after they developed their own tranportation operations," Genzman said.

Fraud evident in some S&L failures

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — White-collar crimes, not poor economic conditions or deregulation, are the root cause of the savings and loan crisis, congressional auditors said Wednesday.

The General Accounting Office told the House Judiciary Committee's criminal justice subcommittee that it had examined 26 insolvent thrift insitutions in eight states and found evidence of fraud or abusive insider dealing in each.

While the survey was skewed to S&Ls with the worst problems — the 26 represented 60 percent of total losses sustained by the government's insurance fund from 1985 through 1987 — the pattern of fraud and abuse among all failed thrifts "clearly is pervasive," GAO officials said.

"The huge losses which will ultimately be passed to the nation's taxpayers," estimated at $100 billion to $150 billion, "did not come about primarily because of economic conditions or deregulation," Assistant GAO Comptroller General Frederick Wolf told the subcommittee.

"The bulk of the losses are directly attributable to the failure by management of a minority of the industry to follow basic, prudent business practices, including the establishment of effective systems of internal control," Wolf said.

Asked if that is a crime, Wolf said violation of fiduciary responsibilites to operate in a sound manner is clearly a criminal issue.

The GAO said it found inadequate records and controls at all 26 of the failed thrifts it examined in detail, excessive loans to one borrower at 23 of them, conflicts of interest among officers or directors at 20 and excessive salaries and benefits at 17.

The subcommittee's chairman, Rep. Charles E. Schumer, D-N.Y., complained that of the 11,000 S&L cases the Federal Home Loan Bank Board has referred to the Justice Department in the last two years for criminal prosecution, fewer than 200 have resulted in convictions.

"Ten billion dollars would go a long way to housing the homeless, feeding the poor, educating the public, caring for the sick," Schumer said. "Instead it has been wasted on lavish parties, jets, real estate, travel and meals at the expense of taxpayers."

Attorney General Dick Thornburgh last month blamed fraud and insider abuses for 25 percent to 30 percent of the S&L failures. Industry regulators said they have found the crimes a "factor" in at least 70 percent of insolvent institutions.

Of the 26 failed thrifts examined by the GAO, the bank board had referred 19 of them and allegations against 182 people to the Justice Department for suspected violations of criminal conspiracy, theft, fraud and embezzlement statutes.

As of this month, Wolf said, 23 of those people had been convicted — at least 11 after pleading guilty — and 19 more were under indictment. Two people were acquitted in trials.

Of those convicted, 15 were sentenced to prision, but the sentences "generally were suspended with probation," Wolfe said.

U.S. diplomats discuss terrorism with PLO

By The Associated Press

TUNIS, Tunisia — U.S. diplomats told the Palestine Liberation Organization in a 4½ -hour meeting Wednesday to take "practical steps" to ease tension in the Israeli-occupied territorites, the head of the U.S. delegation said.

In the first formal talks since President Bush took office, the two sides got down to weighty subjects in detail, according to the leaders of the U.S. and PLO delegations.

U.S. Ambassador Robert H. Pelletreau, who headed the three-man American team, said after the meeting that there was a "new dynamic" in the Middle East "of which this dialogue is a part."

Pelletreau said U.S. concerns about terrorism were discussed as well as "practical steps that can be taken in the occupied territories to reduce tensions."

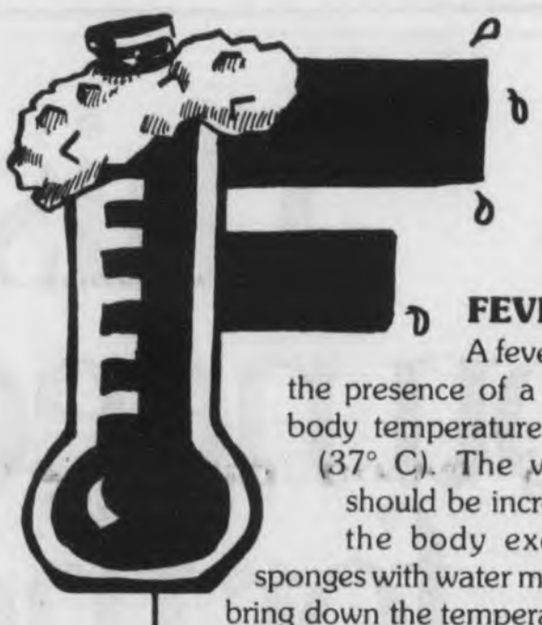
He did not detail those steps, nor did the leader of the three-man PLO side, Yasser Abed-Rabbo, indicate what the U.S. side has asked of the Palestinians.

Abed-Rabbo said progress was made, but he emphasized that the PLO believes the only road to peace is an international conference involving the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council and all parties to the conflict, including the PLO.

The talks in suburban Carthage followed a 90-minute get-acquainted session Dec. 16, the first announced formal meeting between the two sides in 13 years.

Police guarded surrounding streets and rooftops.

The meeting was held amid a swirl of confusing Middle East news. One report quoted PLO spokesman Bassam Abu Sharif as saying the PLO would accept deployment of U.S. troops in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. A U.S. Embassy official briefing reporters on condition of anonymity dismissed the report with a gesture of incredulity.



Another report spoke of a two-tiered U.S.-backed Israeli peace plan accepted by the PLO, including as a first step elections of representative Palestinians in the territories.

Neither issue was mentioned in the statements after Wednesday's talks, although Abed-Rabbo reiterated the PLO's rejection of elections in the territories while they are still occupied by Israeli troops.

The uprising in the West Bank and Gaza has claimed more than 400 Palestinian and 17 Israeli lives since it began in December 1987.

"The (uprising) will continue until the day the Israelis evacuate our homeland," said Abed-Rabbo, a leader of the Marxist Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine, one of the most radical factions in the PLO.

The future of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, home to 1.7 million Palestinians, "should be discussed in an international conference," he said.

ABCs OF FIRST AID

FEVER

A fever can be detected by the presence of a hot forehead and a body temperature in excess of 98.6° (37° C). The victim's fluid intake should be increased. Do not cover the body excessively. Cooling sponges with water may be applied to help bring down the temperature. Call your doctor if the fever persists for more than 24 hours.

The ABCs of First Aid is brought to you as a community service of the emergency room at Memorial Hospital. Be looking for the entire alphabet and always remember to clip and save this announcement for your own emergency care.

Ceremony honors 219 employees

By Dave Young
Collegian Reporter

The 12th annual Classified Employee Recognition Ceremony honored 219 employees who have put in 1,660 years of service Wednesday. Employees received awards for outstanding work, length of service and retirement.

Three staff members were named the 1989 Employees of the Year.

Patricia Keener, office assistant III at Derby Food Center, was named in the Office/Clerical category.

Laura Peterson, veterinary technician in anatomy and physiology, was the Technical/Professional category honoree.

Connie Jackson, custodial worker in facilities management, was named in the Service/Skilled Crafts category.

Employees of the Year and finalists received engraved desk pen sets. Winners also received cash and prizes worth $950, including a reserved campus parking space, sports and theater tickets, family recreational facility passes and gift certificates.

Seventy-four people were nominated for the honor but selection processes narrowed the field to nine candidates, said Joe Younger, coordinator of employee recognition.

"Of the 2,100 people eligible for these awards, these three people represent the top one-half of one percent," Younger said.

Lt. Gov. Jack Walker and President Jon Wefald addressed the recipients.

"I believe that one of the major reasons why K-State has continued to be a first-rate school is because of the work of the classified employees," Wefald said.

Others honored included five-, 15- and 25-year employees who received sterling silver K-State pins. The 35-year employees received pins of gold.

Walker said the almost 25,000 classified workers across Kansas have a beneficial economic impact on the state.

contact students.

Meredith, who visits major universities in Kansas, Nebraska, Missouri and Iowa, said he has only encountered a few demonstrations, some of which have been at the University of Kansas.

No demonstrations have been planned against today's FBI interviews, but Students for Educational Awareness plan to demonstrate Wednesday when representatives of the CIA will be on campus conducting interviews.

SEA, a political student organization, will protest and inform students about the agency's covert operations, said Kale Baldock, graduate student in English and SEA member.

"As much as they do necessary intelligence work, they are also involved in illegal and immoral actions around the world," Baldock said. "They have been responsible for overthrowing governments and assassinations, and training security forces in Central America in torture methods."

against — their opponents in order to get the results they want.

"It's a real family atmosphere," he said. "Everyone wants to learn and they care and pay attention to what you are doing."

Livingston said, "My roommate encouraged me to go to the class and once I was there I got a thrill out of watching Armando. After I enrolled in the class, my aggressive attitude changed and now I try to harmonize with my mind, body and soul."

Aikido was created in 1942 by Morihei Ueshiba in Tokyo. Many of his black belt pupils broke away and created different styles of aikido which are taught today.

Thursday, March 30, 8 p.m.

Acclaimed for its vitality, wild inventiveness, and gift for entertainment, the David Parsons Company zooms into McCain for an evening of dance that's playful and roiling with energy. From the tour de force solo "Caught" to "The Envelope" -- a zany spoof of everything from dance styles to elaborate lighting, set to the music of Rossini -- the Company's repertory shows off one of the most exciting and refreshing choreographic talents to come along in some time.

"It's very likeable, highly creative stuff beautifully danced by a company...all of whom seemed to be Parsons' virtuosic match."

This is all you need to apply for the Card.

With Automatic Approval, it's easier to qualify while you're still in school.

Now getting the Card is easier than ever. For the very first time, students can apply for the American Express® Card over the phone.

Simply call 1-800-942-AMEX. We'll take your application by phone and begin to process it right away. It couldn't be easier.

What's more, because you attend this school full time, you can also take advantage of the Automatic Approval Offer for students. With this offer, you can get the American Express Card right now—without a full-time job or a credit history. But if you have a credit history, it must be unblemished.

It's actually easier for you to qualify for the Card now, while you're still a student, than it ever will be again.

NORTHWEST AIRLINES LOOK TO US

Become a Cardmember. Fly Northwest $99 roundtrip.

As a student Cardmember you will be able to enjoy an extraordinary travel privilege: fly twice for only $99 roundtrip to many of the more than 180 Northwest Airlines cities in the 48 contiguous United States (only one ticket may be used per six-month period).*

And, of course, you'll also enjoy all the other exceptional benefits and personal service you would expect from American Express.

Apply now by calling 1-800-942-AMEX. And then you can really go places—for less.

Apply Now: 1-800-942-AMEX

*Fare is for roundtrip travel on Northwest Airlines. Tickets must be purchased within 24 hours after making reservations. Fares are non-refundable and no itinerary changes may be made after purchase. Seats at this fare are limited and may not be available when you call. Travel must be completed by certificate expiration date and may not be available between cities to which Northwest does not have direct connections or routings. City fuel tax surcharges not included in fare from Boston ($2.50), Chicago ($5.00) and Florida cities ($2.00). Certain blackout dates and other restrictions may apply. For complete offer details, call 1-800-942-AMEX. Current student Cardmembers automatically receive two $99 vouchers in the mail. © 1989 American Express Travel Related Services Company, Inc.

High toxic air pollution levels exceed federal standards

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — In a one-two punch on the state of America's air, government figures revealed Wednesday that 2.4 billion pounds of toxic chemicals are released annually while 100 million people live where other pollutants, chiefly from automobiles, exceed federal standards.

The report on toxic substances, poisonous materials released by chemical plants and other industries, is the first comprehensive look at them. Many have been linked to cancer, birth defects, reproductive dysfunctions, neurological disorders and genetic mutations.

Among the 328 individual chemicals and classes of chemicals surveyed were 60 government-identified cancer-causing agents; methyl isocyanate, the toxic gas that killed at least 3,400 people and injured some 20,000 in Bhopal, India, in December 1984; and phosgene, a nerve gas used in World War I.

"The magnitude of this problem far exceeds our worst fears," said Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., who released the preliminary Environmental Protection Agency figures for 1987 at a news conference with Reps. Mickey Leland, D-Texas; Jim Florio, D-N.J., and Gerry Sikorski, D-Minn.

Waxman said the EPA "has broken commitment after commitment to deal with this problem" during the 19-year life of the Clean Air Act, and all four lawmakers said they'll soon introduce legislation to force the EPA to control these emissions.

Only seven of the substances are now regulated by the EPA, although a separate agency, the Occupational Safety and Health Administration, has set standards for more than 400 toxics in the workplace.

Donald Clay, EPA's top official on air quality issues, acknowledged that more should be done to protect against toxic pollutants but said the agency has been hamstrung in dealing with 320 separate chemicals one at a time under current law.

"The idea of going down 320 (separate) rules ... is just too cumbersome" especially since in many cases industry can be expected to contest tighter restrictions in the courts, Clay told reporters, adding that "some other approach is needed."

He suggested, for example, dealing with the toxic emissions on a "source" basis instead of each chemical separately as required by the 1970 law that envisioned far fewer toxic chemicals than now being released.

As to the preliminary EPA figures released by Waxman, Clay acknowledged the volume of pollutants were greater than he had expected. "It's a big number. I think it's a health problem that needs to be addressed."

EPA, meanwhile, released its annual report on air quality.

Attorney gives overview of landmark abortion case

By Brian Hummell
Campus Editor

In the United States' system of government the Constitution must be honored, but the document must also have elasticity to change with the times, said Sarah Weddington, Texas attorney and lecturer at the University of Texas.

Weddington presented the University Convocation Series lecture Thursday night in McCain Auditorium. Ignoring the podium, she walked the stage during the speech and prompted laughs from the audience by injecting personal stories and humor while discussing the sensitive topic of abortion.

Weddington defended Jane Roe in the 1973 landmark Supreme Court Roe vs. Wade case that legalized abortion.

"The Constitution has lasted for 200 years because (the writers) foresaw putting the Supreme Court in the position to interpret the Constitution," Weddington said.

Because the Supreme Court will hear the Webster vs. Reproductive Health Services case April 26 — a case that may modify or overturn the Roe decision — Weddington changed the focus of her lecture from "Shifting Balances on the Supreme Court" to an overview on the Roe case and her opinions on what will be decided in the Webster case.

"The whole issue of abortion breaks down to the attitude about men and women and the attitude about who gets to make decisions — the government or the individual," she said.

Weddington reviewed the steps that brought the Roe case to national prominence.

After graduating from the University of Texas Law School in 1967, Weddington researched law cases. A group of women in Texas, where abortion was illegal, asked her advice on the legality of counciling women on a safe place for pregnant women to obtain abortions.

"I wasn't asked to work on the case because I was a young lawyer with a strong reputation. They thought I'd do it for free, and I did," Weddington said.

She told the group a genuine case or controversy was needed in order to determine the legality of the issue, and the group produced Jane Roe, a pregnant woman who did not have a "good background in most cases we would think of." A class action suit was filed in state court against Dallas District Attorney Henry Wade.

"I did not win the (Roe vs. Wade) case — it was part of a national effort."
—Sarah Weddington attorney

Weddington lost half the case and appealed to the Supreme Court.

"I did not win the case — it was part of a national effort," she said. "Anything that could have been said (about abortion), was."

The Supreme Court sided with Roe because the state did not show a compelling reason to protect the fetus, Weddington said.

The questions of public funding of abortion and whether life begins at conception are both issues the Supreme Court may consider in the pending Webster case.

Changes in the composition of the Supreme Court since the Roe decision will be key factors in the outcome of the Webster case, Weddington said.

If the Roe decision is overturned, the legality of in vitro fertilization, some types of birth control, father's rights and women's actions that are detrimental to the fetus must be determined, she said.

"There's a hard sense of how to balance it legally," Weddington said.

If Roe vs. Wade is overturned, states could legislate what they choose regarding abortion, she said. Kansas has a statute making abortion illegal that was not repealed after the Roe decision.

Because three of the justices are older than 80 and some have poor health, President George Bush will eventually make some appointments to the court, she said.

Bush's wage plan rejected; House approves increase

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The House voted Thursday to raise the hourly minimum wage from $3.35 to $4.55 by October 1991, rejecting a more modest increase proposed by President Bush and sending the partisan battle to the Senate.

The House adjourned for a week-long Easter recess after voting 248-171 for a bill that included compromises long resisted by its Democratic sponsors but still left the Democratic congressional leadership and the Republican president far apart on the issue.

Bush proposed raising the minimum wage to $4.25 an hour by 1992 provided newly hired employees could be paid a subminimum wage for six months. That plan was offered by Republicans as a substitute for the bill supported by the House leadership but was defeated 218-198, with more than 40 Democrats defecting to the GOP effort.

Bush has insisted his offer is his last and says he has the strength to sustain a veto of minimum wage legislation he considered unacceptable. But the House sponsors refused to accommodate the president and the showdown now shifts to the Senate, where floor debate is scheduled early next month on a proposal to raise the hourly minimum wage to $4.65.

The Senate sponsor, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., hailed the House action and urged Bush to refrain from further veto threats until he sees the final measure, which is likely to undergo further changes.

"This is an excellent opportunity for Congress and the administration to demonstrate that they can work together and in doing so achieve a fair increase in the minimum wage and an honest training wage," Kennedy said.

Before the House gave final passage to the bill, the chamber approved by a 240-179 vote a leadership-backed amendment cutting the bill's target from $4.65 an hour by to $4.55. The amendment added a provision allowing new entrants in the job market to be paid a subminimum wage for two months.

Debate centered on Republican assertions that too big an increase

Committee reports findings
South African investments unethical

By Nancy Prosser
Staff Writer

The Student Senate's Ad Hoc Committee on Ethical Investments in South Africa has determined that the investment of student funds in companies conducting business in South Africa is unethical, Committee Chairman Michel Cavigelli told the Senate Thursday night.

The purpose of the committee was to determine what is an ethical investment, what companies were investing monies in South Africa and how much money was being invested, he said.

"An ethical investment conforms to standards that protect fundamental human rights and freedoms," Cavigelli said. "There are few governments that violate human rights in an open legislative matter, such as South Africa with its policy of apartheid.

"Freedom of opportunity in South Africa is given out on the basis of color of skin."

According to the findings of the committee, about $10,000 in student monies is invested in companies that do business in South Africa. Student monies are handled by the KSU Foundation.

An additional purpose of the committee was to develop alternatives to investing student monies in companies that are in South Africa.

"What we need to look at are alternative investment options. There are other social investment funds that compare return rates very well," Cavigelli said.

First readings of the bill resulting from the committee's research and conclusions will be heard next Tuesday. If passed, the legislation will recommend to the Foundation divestment of all student monies.

In other business, Bramlage Coliseum Director Charlie Thomas appealed to Senate for support of coliseum concerts.

"Bramlage is also an entertainment facility and we are not getting support for shows we have," Thomas said. "Less than 1,000 tickets have been sold for the upcoming Eddie Money concert, and less than 3,000 for the Chicago concert," he said.

Thomas said that he would not cancel either show, but ticket sales are suffering.

Senate also voted to adopt revisions to the Academic Grievance Policy. The revised policy will allow students to be accompanied in a hearing by a representative who is not an attorney, as well as an attorney who may advise the student, but not participate in the meeting.

"In the old policy, the University could have an attorney, but students couldn't," said Todd Johnson, Senate chairman.

John McIntyre, campus director of Associated Students of Kansas, discussed KSU Lobby Day to be held next Monday in Topeka.

"The purpose of Lobby Day is to represent issues concerning K-State students to legislators," McIntyre said. "Our specific target is legislators who are also K-State alumni."

City, University officials study annexation

By Robert Short
Staff Writer

University and city officials are studying the possible annexation of the campus into the Manhattan city limits.

However, city officials say the proposal has not progressed beyond the discussion stage and probably won't be considered by the City Commission before this summer.

"The whole issue of annexing Kansas State University into the city of Manhattan comes up every year or two," said Jerry Petty, deputy director of Manhattan public works.

"The issue has never gone forward enough for discussions between city and University officials," he said. "The discussion has not gone past the point it has in the past."

City Commissioner Nancy Denning said the option of annexing K-State has not been formally discussed by the commission. The issue will probably be handled first at one of the commission's regular work sessions before being placed on the general agenda, she said.

The commission has traditionally annexed areas within the city limits that have water and sewer service provided by the city, as is the case with K-State, Petty said. The founding of K-State predates this practice and there is no city ordinance that requires the city to annex areas that use water and sewer.

Annexation is not a pressing issue for the commission, said Kent Glasscock, commissioner and mayor pro tem.

"This year we are going to have a tremendous amount of business before (the commission)," Glasscock said. "This (annexation) will not come before summer, our spring is

Soviets prepare for election

MOSCOW — "Spets! Spets! Spets! Spets!" Boris N. Yeltsin rasped at a gathering of 1,000 workers, using Russian slang to criticize the network supplying special food, consumer goods, cars and drivers to Communist Party officials.

His voice cracking from overuse, the former Communist Party boss of Moscow demanded the privileges be eliminated. "All of them have to go," Yeltsin said.

The workers applauded.

Days before Soviets vote in the first multicandidate elections, Yeltsin has become a lightning rod for people resentful of plenty for a privileged few and empty store shelve for the rest.

The election is Sunday, and Yeltsin is running against Yevgeny Brakov, director of the ZIL plant that manufactures the ultimate symbol of power and privilege: the shiny black ZIL limousine.

Yeltsin received a warm welcome when he criticized official privileges at Brakov's plant Tuesday in his drive to capture in a popular election a seat representing all of Moscow.

Adams not to be re-tried

DALLAS — Texas will not retry Randall Dale Adams for the 1976 slaying of a policeman, a prosecutor said Thursday, two days after Adams' court-ordered release from prison on grounds his first trial was unfair.

Dallas County District Attorney John Vance said the case has been dropped because there is not enough evidence to try Adams again.

Adams was convicted and sentenced to die in 1977 for the murder of Dallas police officer Robert Wood, a crime to which another man has virtually confessed. Adams once came within three days of his execution date.

Adams has maintained that he is innocent. His case drew national attention after it was portrayed in the movie documentary "Thin Blue Line."

The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals in March threw the conviction out, saying Adams hadn't gotten a fair trial because prosecutors suppressed evidence and witnesses lied on the stand.

Vance announced his decision as Adams was en route to Ohio to rejoin his family. He is free on a $50,000 personal recognizance bond.

Adams has repeatedly said he'd welcome a second trial.

"I believe we're going to win and I believe we can prove it," Adams said after his release.

Drought conditions ignored

WASHINGTON — Farm state lawmakers delivered a blistering attack Thursday on the Agriculture Department, accusing the agency of mishandling last year's emergency drought relief and ignoring current dust-bowl conditions on the High Plains.

An angry Rep. Pat Roberts, R-Kan., said the central part of the country is "blowing away ... and I can't get any damn answers," because of the Bush administration's slow pace in filling key policy jobs at USDA.

"People are crawling out of train wrecks faster ... than they're getting people on board. I'm almost to the point of thinking we have a new standard of service. We don't have to get a bunch of celibate monks down there," Roberts said during a hearing on USDA's handling of the $3.9 billion drought bill.

Rep. Ron Marlenee, R-Mont., said USDA was the "laughingstock" of the American producer. Its overly complicated approach to administering drought relief was an embarrassment to the House Agriculture Committee and the subcommittee on wheat, soybeans and feed grains, he said.

"I'd like to know how it'd look if you made it complicated," Marlenee said. "If I could find the suite of rooms where you generate those complexities, I'd go down there and devastate it."

Gunman goes on rampage

LITTLETON, Colo. — A man on a rampage with a submachine gun abducted a woman, killed her and her mother-in-law, then raped another woman, was cornered by police Thursday and shot two officers before fatally shooting himself, police said.

The gunman, identified as Eugene Thompson Jr., was taken into custody with a head wound around 3 p.m. from a duplex in this suburb south of Denver where he shot the officers who entered the building on a house-to-house search.

The suspect, armed with a MAC-11 submachine pistol, opened fire on the two officers, hitting one in the chest and neck and wounding the other with flying glass, as they entered a townhouse in the Arapahoe Ridge subdivision.

The gunman then shot a 18-year-old hostage in the back, and went upstairs and shot himself in the head, police said.

A police SWAT team rescued the wounded officers, lobbed flash grenades into the house and found the wounded hostage and the gunman with a self-inflicted wound, said Arapahoe County Sheriff Pat Sullivan.

The gunman was taken with the wounded officers to Swedish Medical Center, where he died at 5:56 p.m., said hospital spokeswoman Beverly Jacobsen.

The final hostage, Jake Carper, was in critical condition with multiple gunshot wounds; Deputy Arthur L. Hilton, 37, was in serious condition with a chest wound; and Deputy Daniel Thomas, 36, was in good condition with a leg wound and face cuts, hospital officials said.

Sullivan, a critic of assault rifle sales, said the gunman used the semiautomatic MAC-11, which is sold over-the-counter, and that said there was evidence the weapon had been modified to fire fully automatic.

When the weapon was recovered there were only five rounds left of its 32-round magazine, he said.

Authorities were at a loss to explain a motive for the one-man crime wave.

Hallmark changes Easter ad

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Yes Virginia, there is an Easter Bunny.

Hallmark Cards of Kansas City has changed a television ad that some viewers said implied there was no Easter Bunny.

"We received enough phone calls that it became a concern and asked our agency to change the ad," said Steve Doyal, a spokesman for the greeting card maker.

The original ad portrayed a father and son packing to move. The boy asks his father if the Easter Bunny will be able to find the family at their new home, and the next scene shows the child's mother hiding Easter goodies at the new house.

At least 50 viewers called Hallmark, saying they were worried that children who saw the ad would think there was no Easter Bunny. Now the redone ad, by Leo Burnett Co. of Chicago, has no reference to the Easter Bunny. Instead, the child asks the father if the family will still celebrate Easter at the new home.

"Obviously, we were a little surprised about the reaction and interpretation of the (original) ad," said Tom Dickson, a Leo Burnett vice president.

Student falls while rappeling

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — A University of Kansas student was in critical condition Wednesday at the University of Kansas Medical Center with injuries he suffered when he fell while rappeling down a stairwell inside a campus building.

A hospital spokesman said James W. Skinner, 21, Overland Park, was being treated for a closed head injury. He was transferred to the Kansas City facility early Wednesday from Lawrence Memorial Hospital by LifeFlight helicopter.

Jim Denney, director of the university police department, said Skinner was injured about 3 a.m. Wednesday when he fell while attempting to rappel from the fifth floor stair railing in the Art and Design Building.

UPC offers egg dyeing class

The Union Program Council's Issues and Ideas committee will provide a BYOE — a "bring your own eggs" dyeing class from 2 p.m. to 4 p.m. Saturday.

The event will be in the K and S rooms of the Union.

Individuals are invited to participate in egg dyeing with Crayons, dyes and markers provided. Refreshments including cookies, punch and lemonade will be served, said Eva Chatterjee, committee chairman.

"The Easter Bunny will also make an appearance," Chatterjee said.

The project is targeted to non-traditional students with children, students who aren't going home for the holiday and to residents of the Jardine Terrace Apartments and the community, she said.

"We are hoping for at least between 50 to 100 people for the first-year effort," Chatterjee said.

Children under 12 years old must be accompanied by a parent. Admission is free.

Corrections

Due to a photographer's error, the subjects in a martial art photo were incorrectly identified as performing aikido instead of tang soo do.

Due to a reporter's error, Armando and Elina Flores' last name was spelled incorrectly.

Due to an error in editing the story about the marching band meeting, Paul McDonald's comment was reported out of context. His comment should have been, "None of this (the benefits of the fee as stated by the athletic department) has anything to do with the fee. As a group we'd (the band) benefit, but the University would not."

Custodial workers return to original time schedule

By Deborah Dinges
Collegian Reporter

A study conducted to investigate problems arising from a shift change of custodial workers recommended that workers go back to the original 6 a.m. to 3 p.m. shift, said Ed Rice, director of facilities management.

As a result of the study, custodians affected by a Jan. 9. change, which had them start work at 4 a.m., will once again begin their work day at 6 a.m., Rice said.

Alvin Seely, supervisor for custodial operations, conducted the study reporting there were more disadvantages than advantages to the new shift.

Seely interviewed 25 workers, five supervisors and building representatives, Rice said. Of the workers interviewed, 30 percent preferred beginning their day at 4 a.m. and 70 percent either had no opinion or preferred the original shift.

The study found that the workers believed the buildings were just as easy to clean on the 6 a.m. schedule.

Bobby Pugh Jr., a custodial worker affected by the shift change, said there really was not a difference in how clean buildings were on the 4 a.m. schedule.

Pugh said getting up in the middle of the night was his greatest difficulty with the schedule.

"(The change back to 6 a.m.) is the greatest thing that's ever happened," he said. "We were eating dinner when everyone else was eating breakfast."

"My children said all I did was sleep, and mainly when they were home I did," said Jeannette Haile, a worker affected by the change.

Workers in one building were reported to have difficulty getting the work done before 8 a.m. when classes start, Rice said. To alleviate this problem, facilities management is planning to hire student workers or devise a different schedule for a few workers.

"Nobody will be put on a different shift unless they volunteer," he said.

"We're very happy the schedule will be changing back because it has worked a real hardship on most of the people," said Stanley Findley, chief steward of Chapter 11 of the Kansas Association of Public Employees.

FarmHouse sponsors egg hunt

By The Collegian Staff

Pink, yellow and blue hard-boiled eggs were hidden in the FarmHouse Fraternity's back yard Thursday morning as part of its ninth annual Easter Egg hunt for children from the Big Lakes Developmental Center.

About 60 children, 5 years old and younger, from Junction City, Manhattan and Wamego participated in the egg hunt, in addition to parents, siblings and members of the Big Lakes Children Services program.

Upon arrival, the children were served doughnuts and apple cider. While the children were eating, some of the fraternity members played the role of Easter Bunnies and quickly hid the eggs for the hunt.

"We were given 15 dozen eggs from the Key Milling Co. in Clay Center," said Ed Durst, vice president of FarmHouse and organizer of philanthropic activities. "They were sent to us already hard-boiled, so all we had to do was color them."

FarmHouse's little sister organization assisted with dyeing the 180 eggs.

Candie White, director of Children Services, said after Big Lakes set the date, the fraternity planned all the scheduled activities.

"We bring baskets for the kids, and once we get there, the guys take over," White said. "We pair them up with children, and then they take care of them."

Paul Knox, 4, of Fort Riley, did not need a basket in his hunt for eggs. As he pulled colored eggs from the bulging side pockets of his pants, he counted, "One, two ... seven, eight," with more still in his pockets.

With his feet in slippers and a felt face and ears over his head, Jeff Kough, freshman in agricultural economics, was FarmHouse's version of the Easter Bunny.

"I don't have to do anything but stand there, the kids just love it," Kough said.

"I think (the men) get as much out of this day as the kids do," White said.

"We like to work for these kids," Durst said.

"Seeing kids in these conditions makes one appreciate their own healthy condition and makes us thankful for what we have," said Durst, sophomore in animal sciences and industry. "It also allows us to intermingle with a group here in the community."

In preparation for the hunt, FarmHouse members solicited local businesses for donations.

Businesses including the Food Barn Stores Inc. and Wal-Mart Discount Cities donated candy which the children received after they finished the hunt and listened to the Easter story told by one of the fraternity members, Durst said.

"This really makes our day," said Mae Bauer, FarmHouse house mother. "This has been a tradition that has gone down through the years."

Members said they thought the turnout was great. More children attended than the 45 to 50 expected.

"It's nice to get involved with actual people," said Roy Loepp, senior in milling science and management. "I like to see the results of helping people instead of reading about the people that you just send money to."

Prior to the egg hunt, White was presented with a $188.80 check from Knights of Columbus chapter on campus. The money was raised from a tootsie roll drive for Big Lakes.

Service helps student volunteers

By Steve Logback
Collegian Reporter

Community Service Clearinghouse, one of four community service programs located on campus, is striving to gain better visibility among K-State students, said Michelle Dutton, Clearinghouse coordinator.

Clearinghouse provides a link between K-State students and community agencies needing volunteers, Dutton said. It is capable of providing opportunities for ongoing volunteer roles as well as one-time projects for individuals and groups.

Dutton said the service was first introduced during the 1987-88 school year, and she is currently serving her first semester as coordinator of the program.

"Last year they were still trying to decide what they wanted Clearinghouse to be," Dutton said. "I'm picking it up and trying to develop it more. It was really underdeveloped."

"I feel there is a need to inform students about Clearinghouse since the program is designed specifically for the students," she said. "Many students want to do community work and volunteer but they really don't where to go in order to do it.

"We try to bridge the gap between students and the organizations and let them know what is available — so students can just come in and say what they're interested in and then we can help them."

This semester, Dutton has begun a monthly publication of community service announcements. These announcements provide students with information about a variety of volunteer opportunities available on campus and in the Manhattan community.

Each month, three different organizations in need of volunteers are highlighted in the newsletter. These newsletters are then distributed to the Union, volunteer organizations and campus living groups.

Dutton said it has been difficult to measure the student reponse to the newsletters.

"It's hard to tell how effective they've (newsletters) been because students can go directly to the organization that needs volunteers," she said. "We're trying to develop a better evaluation to see if we're reaching the right people."

Teresa Pennington, freshman in political science and modern languages, has volunteered twice through the program.

"I volunteered because it sounded like something fun to do," Pennington said. "The biggest thing is the exposure to different people ... everyone who has a little time on the weekends should give it a try."

Clearinghouse primarily refers students to community organizations in need of volunteers.

"If I hear of something going on in nearby communities, I include those also," Dutton said. "We're not leaving them out, but now we serve primarily the Manhattan community."

Although there is a similar service organization in the community which provides volunteer services, Dutton said Clearinghouse is not associated with it.

"We receive advice from them but don't actually work together with them," she said. "Our program is more accessible to the students — it's a lot easier when it is right here on campus."

Dutton said Clearinghouse provides a unique opportunity for K-Staters.

"I think it is really important that students get involved in their community," she said.

Apathy common feature on college campus

Commentary

Doug Folk
Collegian Columnist

Everyone talks about apathy these days. You hear it at all levels. Our nation's apathy is evidenced by perennial low turnout at the voting booths. Today's college students are accused of abandoning the high ideals of their predecessors, lapsing into ignorance of the world around them.

Determined to acquire a better understanding of this problem, I decided to consult with a good friend of mine, Joseph Q. Schmoe. His views are usually fairly typical of the average college student, so I quizzed him at lunch in the Union Stateroom the other day.

"So, Joe, what do you think about this apathy thing?" I asked.

"Guess I haven't heard much about it," he answered without looking up from his Collegian.

"You know, the general lack of interest everyone seems to have about what's going on around them."

He looked up from his paper. "What're you talkin' about? I'm interested in what's going on around me." He pointed across the room. "Right now that blonde in the leather miniskirt has got me real interested."

I sensed we weren't exactly on the same track.

"I don't mean what's going on in this room. I'm talking about the big picture, you know, campus issues, and national and international events."

Joe stabbed a tomato with his fork. "Oh, I see what you're getting at. Yeah, I follow national issues. What's that rich guy's name, Donald Stump?"

"That's Trump."

"Right, Trump. Yeah, 'Bloom County' has really been reamin' him lately. They've got him in Bill the Cat's body. Great stuff," he proclaimed, tapping his finger on the comics section.

"You know, it's rumored that Trump is interested in buying the Eastern Shuttle," I pointed out.

"I believe it. He's rich enough," Joe mused. "But I wonder what he'll do with a spaceship?"

Clearly, Joe was limiting his information intake to pictures and captions.

"Don't you ever read that paper?" I asked. "There are a lot of important things going on out there."

Joe's head was again buried in his paper. "I never get any personals," he muttered, scooping up a spoonful of creamed peas. "Did you see the one when the girl told the guy she was pregnant? What a ..." he looked up, realizing he hadn't answered my question.

"Oh, why should I spend my life worrying about things I can't do anything about?" Joe asked. "When ol' Mr. Bush starts callin' me up every morning to ask my opinion on the issues, then I'll start paying closer attention. Until then, I'll worry about things a little closer to home, thank you very much."

I was beginning to show some frustration.

"But, Joe, if Americans had a better understanding of the issues, maybe we could know enough to elect some qualified people into office," I said.

"Yeah, kid yourself into thinking that your one vote out of millions makes a bit of difference," Joe returned. "Besides, the same rich slobs will keep getting into office, no matter who we think is qualified."

"OK. Let's forget about the national issues," I relented. "What about the campus? You said you wanted to worry about things closer to home. So you follow campus issues then, right?"

Joe stroked his chin thoughtfully. "Sure, I follow campus issues. The 'Cats made it to the NCAA for the third time in a row this year. That Kruger is a helluva dude."

"How about something besides basketball? Do you know anything the Student Senate is doing?" I queried.

Joe paused to watch the girl in the leather miniskirt walk out. "Student Senate, hmm ... yeah, didn't they pass a football fee or something? And something about child care."

"Well, you're warm. Last year, they allocated $32,000 to the KSU Child Development Center, which was in financial trouble. And they recently passed a bill enabling the question of an athletic fee to go to student referendum," I clarified. "You are planning to vote, aren't you?"

"Oh, I suppose if I'm in the Union I might, if I get around to it." He shoveled in his last bit of chocolate pie.

"You know, you really ought to show a little more interest in campus issues. These are things that directly affect you, and you have the opportunity to have a real impact on them."

Joe reached for his backpack. "Hey, listen. I've got plenty to worry about already. I'm trying to graduate next spring, so I can get out of here and into the real world. My time is just too valuable." He glanced at his watch.

"Gotta run," he announced. "We've got a function with the Gamma Phis this afternoon. Catch ya later. And hey, let me know how that fee thing comes out."

I sighed and reached for the comics.

Dolphin slaughtering justifies tuna boycott

Sorry Charlie, but the tuna fishing industry should be boycotted.

The industry has killed hundreds of thousands of dolphins in the course of hauling in their tuna catches. This is because schools of tuna fish generally swim below dolphins for protection.

Thus, when tuna fishermen see dolphins, they cast their large nets on them in hopes of snaring tuna. In the process, the air-breathing dolphins are often suffocated and cruelly torn apart by cables and nets.

Never mind that dolphins are beneficial to the oceanic ecosystem. Never mind that they are beautiful and graceful animals very capable of feeling pain. And never mind that they are the most intelligent animals on the high seas.

What is really repulsive about tuna fishing is its indiscriminate waste of innocent life.

Government regulations have helped to curb the problem, but it has yet to provide any real solutions. The National Marine Fishery Service still allows the tuna fishing industry to kill 20,500 dolphins a year.

Moreover, Greenpeace, an ecological watchdog group, reports many incidents of unreported dolphin killing by major tuna fishers.

Until the tuna fishing industry begins to exhibit a more responsible and humane approach to its trade, a boycott is entirely justified, and, if we care at all about animal life, neccessary.

Espresso Royale in Aggieville has recognized this, and no longer serves tuna sandwiches. Perhaps the K-State Union, as well as other area establishments which serve tuna should be encouraged to do the same.

Other Perspectives

The drug-abuse issue also has struck close to campus. Concern has been voiced about the planned location of Wichita State University's new preschool, which will be near an alleged "crack" house. And, according to Wichita police, demand for illegal drugs, especially "crack," is growing here.

Unfortunately, there is no easy answer to the drug enigma, but the $3 billion currently spent overseas should be used in this country to fight the war. Perhaps a three-prong attack of vigorous enforcement of current laws, along with education and employment programs for drug addicts, would make a dent in the problem.

But one thing is certain: the war against drug abuse must be fought within our borders to be successful.

Athletic fee benefits K-State

Commentary

Daran Neuschafer
Guest Columnist

When students get a chance to vote on the proposed student athletic fee Monday and Tuesday, they will be voting on more than whether or not to spend an extra $15 per semester at fee payment. It is also whether or not to invest in the future of K-State.

A lot of good things are happening on campus. Many changes, for the better, have taken place in the past few years. As the television advertisement that airs statewide so beautifully states: There is a revolution going on at our beloved University.

One of the places this revolution is mostly taking place is at the KSU Athletic Department.

Before Director Steve Miller took over, the athletic department was more or less just treading water. There were many problems throughout the department, but instead of solving them, the administration was just trying to keep the boat afloat.

However, when Steve Miller arrived to man the ship, bailing the water was not enough.

Behind the support of President Jon Wefald, Miller began to patch holes in the sinking ship. One by one, circumstances that were causing distress on the department were looked into and taken care of in the best way seen fit.

Recently, the results have been evident. With the exception of football, the individual sports teams have gotten increasingly more competitive and all signals point toward continued improvement.

With football, Miller has brought in Bill Snyder, a man with experience at rebuilding Division I football programs, to try his hand at patching another hole.

Only time will tell as to whether Snyder can do it, but if this decision turns out like those previously made by Miller, he could wager that brighter horizons are in store for the Wildcat football program.

Now that Miller has stopped most of the leaking, it is time to move on — time to build a better ship. However, to build a stronger ship, good materials are needed. The athletic department has a good start with new basketball and baseball facilities, along with the renovation of Ahearn Field House into an incredible all-purpose facility.

Also, a revamped administrative structure and a young, enthusiastic group of coaches points toward a bright future.

Miller has asked the student body to join in the building process. The student athletic fee is a great opportunity for students to take part in a revolution. The funds raised by the fee, along with higher goals for alumni donations and a push for more corporate sponsorship, would help secure a better working base from which all our sports programs operate.

Like it or not, athletics play a major role in our society. Just watch a television news broadcast or open a daily paper.

I'm not saying this is right or wrong, I'm just pointing out that it is a fact. Athletics is the most visible means of advertising for most universities, including K-State. Just ask the University of Oklahoma.

A positive and winning athletic program does more good than any billboard sign. As an example, take our friends down I-70 at the University of Kansas. Think of all the "Beak'em Hawks" shirts you saw back in your hometown.

Those shirts, however sickening they may be, were worn in direct relation to KU winning the NCAA National Championship in basketball, not because they have a great library.

The little kids wearing those shirts have no idea what college is all about; all they believe is that their beloved Jayhawks are No. 1.

In 10 years when these kids look into possible colleges to attend, one thing will stick in their minds — I have always been a KU fan and would love to go there.

Wouldn't you rather have them as K-State fans instead? Help invest in our University's future — both on and off the playing field. Vote yes for the athletic fee and bring a friend. We are all in this together.

Letters

Minors needed

Editor,

Every school in the Big Eight offers an academic minors program, except K-State. The benefits include being able to prove a more diversified education on a diploma. The cost is obviously not prohibitive. So why is K-State the only school in the Big Eight without such a program?

The answer is because Faculty Senate is not aware of the students' concern. Let's show the Senate that we are concerned.

If you want the benefits of an academic minors program, and you don't want to attend the only Big Eight school without one, I urge you to clip this article and send it to the Faculty Senate office Eisenhower 22.

Letter misses point

Editor,

This is in response to Carisa Braun's "Living hazardous" letter which appeared in the Collegian Wednesday.

At first I was glad to see the information Braun told us, but was chagrined to see she wanted the media to stop telling her that living is hazardous to her health.

I believe she has missed the point.

The media tell us these things to keep us informed so, hopefully, some of us will take action.

Today I have in my hand an orange that was produced organically. No pesticides, no fungicides, no herbicides and non-waxes have been sprayed on this fruit. It is available.

As consumers, it is our right to demand food that is free from contaminants. Here in Manhattan you can purchase organic produce at the People's Grocery Cooperative. I believe we need to go a step further and demand that our big grocery stores bring in organic produce. If we all voice our opinions to grocery store managers, perhaps the growers will eventually hear and listen to the people.

Instead of getting mad at the media for telling the truth, use your anger to act on the situation. Together, we can make a change.

Espresso responds to Greenpeace, joins nationwide ban of tuna fish

By Alan Wilds
Staff Writer

Customers wanting to order a tuna sandwich at Espresso Royale in Aggieville will have to choose something else.

Espresso has a ban on the sale of tuna as part of a nationwide campaign by Greenpeace against the fishing industry's methods of capturing the fish.

Greenpeace's national headquarters in Washington, D.C., is recommending a restriction on tuna consumption due to dolphin deaths that occur during the capture of yellowfin tuna in the east tropical Pacific Ocean.

Laura Ruben, Greenpeace assistant campaigner of oceanology, said tuna swim underneath dolphins for protection.

"Fishermen spot dolphins and then cast the nets to capture the tuna swimming underneath them," Ruben said. "Hundreds of thousands of dolphins are being killed by suffocation and dismemberment from the tuna nets.

"There have been a lot of boycotts in the industry against this."

Charles Lawrence, co-owner of Espresso Royale, said the company the store purchases tuna from is not participating in the boycott.

"This is more or less something we did on our own," Lawrence said. "We try to operate along a logical and economical line and this seemed like the right solution."

He said tuna sandwiches are a sideline item, so crossing it off the menu shouldn't hurt business.

"A lot of customers just think we are out," Lawrence said.

The National Marine Fishery Service has a quota allowing them to kill 20,500 dolphins each year by tuna fishing, Ruben said.

"We would like to see this number reduced to zero," she said.

The Marine Mammal Act of 1988 saved some dolphins' lives. Many fishermen use to participate in "Sundown catches," where great numbers of dolphins swimming near the water surface were killed at dusk. This practice has been prohibited.

"This is more or less something we did on our own."

—Charles Lawrence, Co-owner of Espresso Royale

The possibility of placing observers on the boats to monitor fishing procedures is also being considered, she said.

"There was a court case on the West Coast," Ruben said, "where it was decided there should be an observer on board every boat."

She said 100 percent observer coverage should be in place by late 1989.

Greenpeace is working with fishery services to impose reauthorization of industry regulations. In addition, Ruben said it is in a "comment period" during which they hear opinions from various publics on the issue.

"Our main goal is to find an alternative to the process that would not endanger dolphins," she said.

In addition to boycotts in the United States, Ruben said there is a proposal coming up in the European Economic Community to ban all yellowfin tuna purchases until the dolphin mortality rate is considerably lowered.

Terrorist bulletin similar

White House downplays hijacking threats

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The White House on Thursday played down a U.S. warning about the possible hijacking of an American airliner in Europe, saying the bulletin was similar to many other terrorist alerts and travelers "should be confident that all reasonable precautions are being taken."

Airports in England, West Germany, Italy and Belgium stepped up security after receiving the warning issued by the Federal Aviation Administration. No additional precautions were reported in the Netherlands, Greece or Spain.

The Bush administration was clearly unhappy the warning had leaked out in a front-page newspaper story in London. Transportation Secretary Samuel K. Skinner called it a potentially serious compromise of intelligence-gathering activities.

Three Lebanese Palestinians were mentioned by name in the warning, according to the Daily Express. The bulletin said the three may be traveling on passports from Bahrain, Pakistan or North Yemen.

The FAA confirmed that it had issued a security bulletin to airports and carriers March 16 about "the possibility of a hijacking of a U.S. airliner in Western Europe."

The warning did not mention any specific airline or airport that might be threatened, nor did it cite any time frame for the warning, the FAA said.

Disputing the Daily Express account, U.S. officials emphatically denied that the notice had been relayed to U.S. diplomats and military personnel abroad while being withheld from the public at large — as was the case with a warning prior to the bombing of Pan Am Flight 103, which killed 270 people on Dec. 21.

White House press secretary Marlin Fitzwater said last week's warning was intended to heighten "the already high security procedures now in effect" and was not designed for public distribution. He said the alert was directed to authorities "who can direct responses to the threat.

"Travelers on U.S. air carriers should be confident that all reasonable precautions are being taken to insure that the highest level of security exists," he said.

On Capitol Hill, Rep. James Oberstar, D-Minn., chairman of the House aviation subcommittee, said the warning had been distributed only among intelligence and law enforcement agents so that they could pursue further information.

"I'm persuaded there was not a double standard," he said, referring to accusations the government in the past has warned its employees about terrorist threats but not alerted the public.

"As for the question (of) is it safe for American people traveling, yes," Oberstar said, citing beefed up security resulting from the warning. He spoke with reporters after members of his panel received a previously scheduled, private three-hour briefing on aviation security from government and industry officials.

The FAA would not reveal what had prompted the alert, other than to say there had been "sensitive information" not designed for public distribution.

Skinner said, "Hopefully, no one will lose their life over this, but it is a very serious matter."

Special care services cater to ill children

By Linda Kleiner
Collegian Reporter

A sick child can mean more than the sniffles and chicken soup. For working parents or students, it may cost either a day's wages or participation in classes.

Schools, some child care centers and some babysitters will not care for sick children.

"(KSU Child Development Center) does not have the facilities or specialized staff to properly care for sick children," said Nancy Bolsen, center director.

If a child's temperature is 100 degrees or more, is vomiting or has a cold, or if the child has an undiagnosed rash, pinkeye or head lice, the parent must find other care accommodations until the child is well, Bolsen said.

Parents may spend money for more than just Kleenex, cough medicine and juice or soda. Many child care centers require payment even if the child isn't there on his scheduled day, she said.

If a child is sick for five consecutive days and has a written statement from a doctor, the center will reduce the cost 50 percent.

Charles A. Hall, sophomore in animal sciences and industry and his wife Mitchelle, sophomore in management, juggle their class schedules if their 2-year-old son, Kyptin, is sick, he said.

The Halls compare their class schedules to decide which "one of us sacrifices going to class" to stay home with Kyptin, Charles said.

Some parents depend on relatives that live in the area and do not work to care for their children when they are sick.

"My husband, Greg, and I are fortunate enough to have two retired (grandmothers) who live in Manhattan," said Denise Wells, senior in accounting.

But Greg, storekeeper for the division of biology, will take off work to care for the children when necessary, Denise said.

University faculty and staff receive eight hours a month for sick leave or personal leave, which can be used for family illnesses, said Jennifer Gehrt, acting assistant director of personnel services.

Parents with sick children may be forced to sacrifice vacation time or loss of wages, Gehrt said.

"There isn't a lot available in the area for working parents if their child is sick," said Kathy Dickey, nursing supervisor for Riley County Health Department.

Homecare Inc. will offer care to children if they have been released from the hospital and the doctor orders care in the home, said Kim Gill, administrative assistant. Homecare offers its services to homebound individuals of all ages, and the costs are supplemented by the individual's insurance, Medicaid or Medicare.

For parents who cannot miss work, one temporary alternative is available at Memorial Hospital, which established the Wee Care program to provide care for sick children aging from 6 weeks to 14 years, said Rochelle Masterson, registered nurse in pediatrics.

Two rooms on the pediatric floor have been available to accommodate as many as eight sick children from 6 a.m. to 6 p.m., Monday through Friday.

Only children with compatible illnesses or symptoms are cared for in the same room, Masterson said. Children may be refused care from the program if their symptoms differ from other Wee Care patients in either of the two rooms.

The program does not accept children with communicable diseases such as measles, mumps and chicken pox, Masterson said. The children can use the services as many days as needed, providing the parents inform the nurse when the child is picked up the day before.

A nurse is on duty at all times to check on the children and administer medicine with prior approval by the parents, she said. Meals are included in the cost of the care.

"Winter months are very busy and (Wee Care) had to turn people away twice," Masterson said.

Parents using the Wee Care service are charged $3 a hour, she said.

Bill would provide 40-year prison term for heinous murders

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Four decades in prison is the best way to deal with people who commit heinous murders, a legislative panel was told Thursday.

Sen. Richard Bond, R-Overland Park, urged the House Federal and State Affairs Committee to endorse a bill that would allow prosecutors to seek a 40-year prison term, with no possibility of parole, for certain first-degree murderers.

The bill is identical to one that would have imposed a death penalty, which the Senate rejected early in the session, except that it contains the 40-year sentence instead of capital punishment.

Presently, a person sentenced to life in prison for murder can be paroled in 15 years.

"It's clear to me that 15 years is too short a sentence for outragous criminal activity," Bond said. "The bill only presents an option for prosecutors to address the most heinous crimes in the state."

Bond said opposition to the measure comes from death penalty supporters, who see the measure as a way of eliminating all possibilities of passing a death penalty law in the future.

The senator warned representatives that attempting to amend a death penalty provision to the bill, which passed the Senate 39-1, would sink the measure.

A bill that would impose a death penalty was defeated in the Senate 22-18. Bond said support for any type of a death penalty as eroded in the Senate since that measure was defeated.

"If you want to kill this bill, put a death penalty on it," Bond said.

He also said it is impossible to determine how much the bill would cost taxpayers, or what impact it would have on the state's overcrowded prisons because no one knows how many heinous murders will be committed.

Under the bill, a prosecutor would file notice with a court that he planned to seek the 40-year term.

After a person was found guilty of first-degree murder, a separate sentencing trial would be held to determine if the maximum penalty should be imposed. During this second proceeding, the aggravated and mitigating circumstances would be presented to jurors.

Aggravating circumstances would include such factors as previous felony convictions, evidence that the murderer was a hired killer, or if the homicide was especially cruel.

"It's clear to me that 15 years is too short a sentence for outragous criminal activity."
—Sen. Richard Bond R-Overland Park

The jury must unanimously agree that one or more aggravating circumstance existed before the 40-year sentence could be imposed. The sentence would automatically be reviewed by the state Supreme Court.

Opposition to the bill came from the America Civil Liberties Union of Kansas.

Washburn University law student Chris Savage, representing the ACLU, told the committee that the bill is unconstitutional because it would impose "cruel and unusual punishment."

She said in imposing a 40-year sentence, a jury would be passing permanent judgment on an person, the same as if it were imposing a death sentence.

Professors offer cloth diapers

Disposables too wasteful, say customers

By Dave Young
Collegian Reporter

One million soiled diapers is the reason why two faculty members started BabyCat Diaper Service.

Sarah Shields, assistant professor of history, and Talat Rahman, associate professor of physics, started BabyCat after calculating that one million disposable diapers end up in Riley County landfill each year.

The National Association of Diaper Services reported that more than 12,300 tons of waste are created by soiled disposable diapers each day in the United States, Shields said.

"We were very concerned about all the negative effects disposable diapers had on the environment," Shields said. "Disposable diapers take years and years to decompose."

The partners are hopeful that BabyCat can help reduce the amount of disposable diaper waste.

When a friend brought to Shields' attention that Manhattan had been without a diaper service for about 10 years, Shields and Rahman formed BabyCat.

Rahman said about 20 people use BabyCat.

"The response from the customers has been great," she said. "We had to order some more diapers, because we weren't expecting such a response."

Each week BabyCat provides customers with 80 clean diapers. A hamper, liners and deodorizers are also provided. The cost is $10.50 per week. As the baby gets older and requires less diapers, the cost is reduced.

Tama Wagner, a BabyCat customer, said the service is "very simple and cost effective." Wagner said she uses BabyCat because of the huge amount of diaper waste being dumped into the environment.

"The amount of waste is just disgusting," she said.

Wagner said her children prefer the feeling of cotton diapers to that of disposables.

"One time I was low on cotton diapers, and I tried to put a disposable (diaper) on my daughter. She said, 'No, Mom. I want a real diaper,'" Wagner said.

"I think many people don't like having to use disposable diapers, but washing cloth diapers is very time consuming," Rahman said. "Until we formed BabyCat, people (in the Manhattan area) didn't have an alternative."

"I was real skeptical at first, but now I'm impressed," said Geralyn Cartenson, a BabyCat customer. "I like the convenience."

Cartenson said more people would use the service if they were better informed about the trash problem.

"I'd seen information about the trash problems stating that a high percentage of it (the trash) was disposable diapers," she said.

BabyCat was able to arrange a sub-contract with Domestic Textile Services in Wichita, which does the actual cleaning of the diapers, Shields said. Domestic Textile Services washes the cotton diapers at a high temperature and then antiseptically treats them.

Meinhardt asked to return funds

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Kansas Republican Party has asked Phil Meinhardt, an unsuccessful GOP congressional candidate last year, to refund a $5,000 contribution made to his campaign.

The request, which was made in a March 2 letter to Meinhardt, was prompted by inquiries of the Federal Election Commission into whether the candidate received excessive contributions last year from political committees of the state party and Kansas 2nd District GOP organization.

Meinhardt, who ran for the 2nd District seat held by Rep. Jim Slattery, a Topeka Democrat, said Wednesday that his campaign committee does not have any money to make the refund.

"We see no possible way to refund the money," he said from him home in Alexandria, Va. "It will probably drag on forever but I'm interested in doing whatever I can to straighten it out."

At issue is whether a federal political committee of the state GOP and a 2nd District political committee are affiliated for purposes of federal election law.

The state committee gave Meinhardt $10,000 last year and the 2nd District committee contributed $5,000. Under federal law, a political committee is limited to total contributions of $10,000.

If the Kansas committees are affiliated, they would be limited to giving no more than $10,000 to a candidate — $5,000 for the primary and $5,000 for the general election.

Meinhardt said the issue surfaced last year. At the time, he and GOP officials agreed that the committees were separate organizations in part because they maintained individual treasuries and there was no intermingling of their monies.

Entertainment Friday

Former K-State quarterback and NFL quarterback Lynn Dickey has opened Lynn Dickey's Sports Cafe in the Westport district of Kansas City, Mo.

Alumnus opens sports cafe

Former K-State and NFL quarterback Lynn Dickey may not be tossing a football anymore, but that doesn't mean his throwing arm is moot.

Just ask and he'll pass you the ketchup, mustard or even a bottle of beer at his restaurant in the Westport area of Kansas City, Mo.

Lynn Dickey's Sports Cafe opened last week during the first round of the NCAA basketball tournament, and Dickey said he thought the turnout was "excellent."

"We were a lot busier than I anticipated," he said. "We were really swamped during the tournament — especially on Friday."

When playing professionally for the Houston Oilers and later for the Green Bay Packers, where in 1983 he led the NFL in passing yards with 4,500 yards, Dickey said launching a sports cafe was the furthest thing from his mind.

"I had no idea I would get into this," he said.

For the past four or five years, Dickey said, he had been considering opening a restaurant, but hesitated because he had no experience in the business.

"We've all sat someplace and looked at the decor and thought, 'Hmm, I could change this or I could change that,'" he said. "But I needed a little push from someone with the experience and (Manhattan businessman) Terry Ray gave me that."

Ray, former owner of Kite's Bar and Grille, and his wife, Jan, are investors in the cafe. Jan said they decided to open a sports cafe because it is "the hottest new concept in the restaurant business."

She said they chose the Westport location because the couple already manages one restaurant in Kansas City — Longneckers across from Oak Park Mall in Overland Park.

"Once you have one business in an area, it's just as easy to have two or three," Jan said.

Dickey said the word cafe is used instead of bar because he believes it is more important to stress the food rather than the liquor part of the business.

Decorated with sports memorabilia from Dickey's career, Big Eight schools, and the Kansas City Royals, Kansas City Chiefs and Kansas City Comets professional sports teams, the menu offers many foods for game day dining. Salads, sandwiches and burgers all average between $5 to $7.

The menu includes Kite's Two-Alarm Chili and informs sports fans it was made "almost famous in Manhattan, Kan., (but try it anyway)."

Specialties run from $7 to $13, including Dickey's own recipe for Cajun Catfish.

Waitresses and waiters have the option of wearing T-shirts with emblems from K-State, the University of Kansas or the University of Missouri at Columbia, Mo. Dickey said the shirts are "pretty evenly distributed."

Shawn Bracken, a 1988 K-State graduate, manages the restaurant and a staff of 120. A former manager of Kite's, Bracken said he "couldn't pass up the deal" when Terry approached him about managing Lynn Dickey's.

Although Bracken's employees include students and alumni from KU and MU, he said his "loyalty is still at K-State."

"I'm a Wildcat true and true," Bracken said.

A K-State alumnae herself, Jan said it has been "fun to see alumni from KU, K-State and MU get together and have a good time."

Dickey praised Terry for keeping on top of the "hundreds of little details" that go into opening a restaurant.

"He's the glue that holds this thing together," Dickey said.

Bars and restaurants crowd the Westport area, but the competition doesn't bother Dickey.

"In this business, it's location, location, location," he said. "Westport is a hot spot. ... I can't ask for anything more than that."

"We definitely are not trying to duplicate what was (in Westport)," Jan said. "Our philosophy was always to try to find a niche in the marketplace."

Dickey said his goal is to provide customers with "an excellent meal and great service."

"I want (the food) to be consistent," he said. "If people have any doubt about where to eat, they can say, 'Hey, let's go to Lynn Dickey's.'"

Jan said the restaurant's objective is "to try to provide another place for the Westport crowd to go, and to get other customers into Westport who haven't been there before."

While at K-State, Dickey set both single season and career passing records. He received all-Big Eight quarterback honors in 1969 and 1970. And in 1970, he was the Big Eight offensive player of the year.

Lynn Dickey's Sports Cafe is open from 11 a.m to midnight Sunday through Wednesday, and from 11 a.m. to 3 a.m. Thursday through Saturday.

Waitresses wear shirts with the names of the three Big Eight Conference teams in the region: K-State, Missouri and Kansas.

Debate team hopes to improve ranking

By Chris Koger
Staff Writer

K-State's debate team will have the chance to improve its No. 5 national ranking next week during the Varsity National Debate Tournament at the University of South Carolina in Columbia, S.C.

Edward Schiappa, debate team adviser, said he is happy with the current ranking, but hopes to end the season with a fourth or third place ranking.

"It is super to be fifth out of over 350 other schools, but we still have our hopes to improve," Schiappa said. "Since it will be the last tournament of the year, we're going to give it everything."

The national tournament begins March 31 and ends April 3.

The team was ranked fifth nationally at the end of last year's debate season, Schiappa said. Next year will be a different story.

"We are going to lose only a couple of our members to graduation, so we have a crack at the number one spot," Schiappa said. "It also depends on how much funding we get next year."

Schiappa will meet today with a representative from the President's office to discuss funding for the debate team.

"We've made our requests, and if we continue to get the support we've had in the past, we'll be in good shape," he said. "We have our fingers crossed."

Debaters Rich McCollum, sophomore in philosophy, and Dave Filippi, sophomore in economics, placed first as a team at the Junior Varsity Debate Tournament at Johnson County Community College held Saturday through Monday.

"This was the second year in a row they've won the tournament, which has never happened before to any team," Schiappa said.

McCollum and Filippi placed first and second respectively in the individual speaking awards. Dan Molden, sophomore in speech, placed third and Marla Paul, freshman in elementary education placed fifth.

Navy man, contractor plead guilty

By The Associated Press

ALEXANDRIA, Va. — A Navy official and a major defense contractor pleaded guilty Thursday to charges in the "Ill Wind" Pentagon procurement case, with the Navy man admitting he took a bribe to provide inside information on a contract.

The contractor, Teledyne Industries Inc., agreed to pay more than $4.3 million in penalties and to satisfy other claims in the case, saying a former employee who pleaded guilty earlier "had entered into a corrupt and illegal arrangement" with two other men who still face charges.

The suspended Navy official, Stuart E. Berlin, agreed to cooperate with prosecutors in the continuing investigation which has resulted in a dozen guilty pleas so far. He is to be sentenced June 2 and could face up to 25 years in prison and fines of as much as $750,000.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Joseph J. Aronica declined to comment when asked whether there would be more guilty pleas or how extensively Berlin's testimony might be used against other defendants. He said only, "The total investigation is moving along very quickly."

Berlin, indicted in the investigation dubbed "Ill Wind," pled guilty to conspiracy to commit bribery, receiving a bribe, wire fraud and making false statements. Teledyne Industries pleaded guilty to conspiracy and two counts of making false statements in connection with a contract with one of its divisions — Teledyne Electronics of Newbury Park, Calif. — worth about $24 million.

The company agreed to pay $1.5 million in penalties, $2.08 million in civil claims and $786,000 to reimburse the government for the cost of the investigation.

"Their purpose was to subvert the lawful operation of the government's procurement process."
—Teledyne statement

As part of the plea agreements, prosecutors dismissed counts of bribery and wire fraud against Berlin and Teledyne. Racketeering charges had been dropped at an earlier court hearing.

Still facing charges in a trial scheduled to begin April 3 are defense consultants Fred H. Lackner and William L. Parkin, as well as three Teledyne officials: George H. Kaub, Eugene R. Sullivan and Dale Schnittjer. Parkin was hospitalized last Friday after reportedly taking an overdose of pills.

Teledyne's statement said: "The company's decision to enter a plea agreement and make a settlement with the government primarily came from the recognition that a former employer, Michael Savaides, had entered into a corrupt and illegal arrangement with William Parkin, a consultant to Teledyne Electronics, and Fred Lackner, with whom the company had no relationship.

"Their purpose was to subvert the lawful operation of the government's procurement process," the company said. Savaides, who the company contends was defrauding Teledyne by taking money from Parkin, has pleaded guilty and is awaiting sentencing.

Berlin, 51, admitted he had received a bribe for supplying inside information on contracts. He had been a supervisory electronics engineer and branch head of the ship systems engineering section at the Space and Naval Warfare Systems Command in Arlington, Va.

The Pentagon reassigned Berlin to a non-procurement job in June 1988, when the federal investigation became public. He was suspended without pay shortly after he was indicted in January.

A Navy spokesman, Lt. Bruce Cole, said Thursday that the information in the plea agreement will be referred to the Navy for a decision on Berlin's employment status.

The Pentagon said it was re-evaluating the suspension it had imposed in January on Teledyne Electronics regarding new contracts, but had no decision yet.

The Justice Department had said Berlin received about $1,000 every few months from Parkin and Lackner

Virginia upsets Sooners

By The Associated Press

LEXINGTON, Ky. — Richard Morgan scored 25 points, including two 3-pointers in a late Virginia spurt, as the Cavaliers beat top-seeded Oklahoma 86-80 in the NCAA Southeast Regional semifinal Thursday night.

Bryant Stith added 28 points as fifth-seeded Virginia, 22-10, dominated the backboards and the free throw line to advance to the regional finals.

Oklahoma, 30-6, became the first No. 1 seed to lose in the tournament. The Sooners were outrebounded 38-26, including 17-9 on the offensive end, and made only eight free throws to Virginia's 27.

Morgan, who entered the game with a tournament-leading 33-point average, made two 3-pointers in a 9-0 run that gave the Cavaliers a 78-72 lead with 3:11 remaining.

Oklahoma, behind Stacey King, had taken a 72-69 lead with 5:08 to play following an 8-0 run. King finished with 22 points, although he was frustrated much of the night by Virginia's sagging defense.

After the Cavaliers went ahead 78-72, Skeeter Henry brought the Sooners within four on a drive in the lane. But John Crotty scored on a backdoor layup and Stith made both ends of a one-and-one to give the Cavaliers an 82-74 lead with 1:02 left.

The Sooners got no closer than five after that as Virginia made all four of its free throws in the closing 30 seconds.

Crotty, a sophomore, won the battle of point guards with Oklahoma's Mookie Blaylock. Crotty scored 14 points, had eight assists and turned the ball over only three times while Blaylock went 2-for-12 from the field for five points.

McClellan, 'Cats down Ichabods

Washburn catcher Ryan Spencer tags out K-State's Sean Collins at home plate during the second inning Thursday afternoon at Frank Myers Field. The 'Cats defeated Washburn 10-2 and now have a 10-3 record.

Pitcher sharp in 7-inning stint

By Mike Goens
Sports Writer

K-State pitcher Jim McClellan breezed through the first four innings without yielding a hit on his way to a four-hitter and a 10-2 Wildcat win over Washburn Thursday at Frank Myers Field.

McClellan went seven innings and gave up both runs on his way to evening his record at 1-1.

"He threw real well. He had a control problem in one area, but he competed well, which he always does," Coach Mike Clark said.

"We needed to find an answer as to who would be our No. 4 starter in the Big Eight rotation, and Jim answered that for us today," he said.

K-State scored all of its runs in the first six frames, including five in the second, and two each in the third and fifth innings.

Mike Rosenboom led off the second with a walk, and Craig Wilson followed with a single. Dan Skala plated them both with a single, as Wilson was running with the pitch. After Skala moved up to second on an error by rightfielder Alan Corcoran, Brad Ripplemeyer singled him home to give the 'Cats a 3-0 lead.

Ron Bradshaw reached on an error by second baseman Dominic Florez, Sean Collins singled Ripplemeyer home, and Bradshaw scored on a passed ball to close the scoring for the inning at 5-0.

Rosenboom once again got the 'Cats rolling with a double in the third. Bill Barnard singled Rosenboom to third, and Ripplemeyer brought them both home with a triple to give the 'Cats a 7-0 lead through three innings.

Washburn threatened to get back into the game in the top half of the fifth. Todd Buttermore led off with a single, thwarting McClellan's no-hit bid. With one out, Florez doubled over Collins' head in center field to put runners on second and third with one out.

Ryan Spencer continued the rally with a single to score Buttermore, and Florez scored on a fielder's choice to make it 7-2.

With two outs and runners on first and third, Brian Soderberg hit a roller to first, which was dropped by Rosenboom to load the bases for the Ichabods. McClellan was able to escape further damage when Chris Bunting flied out deep to left to end the inning.

"Jim got behind on a couple of hitters and they did a good job of hitting the ball where it was pitched," Clark said. "But I think Jim did a nice job. We got the big lead and you have to watch out for a let down."

The Wildcats answered with two runs of their own in the bottom half of the fifth. Craig Wilson reached second on an error by the shortstop, Soderberg, and moved to third on a passed ball. Ripplemeyer walked and went to second on an error by the catcher, Spencer, scoring Ripplemeyer. Bradshaw followed with a single to score Wilson and give K-State a 9-2 lead.

The 'Cats added a single tally in the sixth inning when Jeff Troll singled, stole second, went to third on a double by Russ Rinngenberg, and scored on a sacrifice fly by Rosenboom to make it 10-2 K-State.

Ripplemeyer went 2-2 on the day with three RBI as the 'Cats collected 11 hits. Troll was 2-4 and Rosenboom, Wilson, and Ripplemeyer scored two runs each.

Bill Schafer came in to close out the last two innings, yielding only one walk, while striking out three.

"It was a typical K-State game, we didn't bang the walls down but we got the base hits and played aggressively," Clark said.

K-State, now 10-3, will move on to Creighton for a single game Saturday at 2 p.m. Jeff Peterson, 3-1, will get the start for the Wildcats against the Blue Jays.

Northern Iowa will be at Frank Myers Field Sunday for a doubleheader starting at 1 p.m. David Hierholzer, 2-0, and Jim Haller, 2-1, will be the scheduled starters for K-State.

Missouri set to face Syracuse in rematch

By The Associated Press

MINNEAPOLIS — It won't take long for the Minnesota Timberwolves' new Metrodome floor to get an NBA-style workout.

The run-and-gun fun begins late Friday, after Illinois and Louisville — fast-paced teams in their own right — battle in the first game of the NCAA Midwest Regional semifinals.

No. 6 Missouri and No. 7 Syracuse are scheduled to take the court about 9:30 p.m. CST and "I'd imagine there'll be a few points scored," said Rich Daly, Missouri's interim coach.

"We're not planning on holding the ball," said Daly, who took over at mid-season when Norm Stewart became ill with colon cancer. "We'll go up and down with them. When we get up in the 90s and 100s, I imagine that our record has been pretty good."

The Tigers, 29-7, are 15-1 when they have scored at least 90 points. The lone loss was 112-105 at Oklahoma, a defeat they avenged in winning the championship game of the Big Eight tournament.

"I think both teams are very capable of running up and down the court," Missouri's Greg Church said. "We like to run, they like to run. At halftime, I wouldn't be surprised if the score was in the 50s."

Syracuse, also 29-7, knows how to run up a score, too.

"I think it's going to be an up-tempo game," the Orangemen's Stevie Thompson said. "They like to run and we like to run. I think it's going to be an exciting game to watch."

Missouri and Syracuse already have met in one high-scoring affair, Syracuse winning 86-84 in overtime in the finals of the preseason Big Apple NIT. Both clubs downplayed the importance of that Nov. 25 meeting.

"The first game we played them was one of the best as far as competition, with both of us going back and forth," Syracuse coach Jim Boeheim said. "It helps both teams (in terms of preparation), but it doesn't help one team more than another."

Daly agreed but added that his players "do know that they don't have a watch that says 'First Place, NIT.' "

Friday's game will display an interesting contrast concerning the way personnel is used.

Syracuse goes almost all the way with its five starters: Thompson and Billy Owens at forward, Matt Roe and Sherman Douglas at guards and center Derrick Coleman.

Missouri, meanwhile, isn't afraid to go to the bench to spell starting forwards Doug Smith and Mike Sandbothe, guards Lee Coward and Byron Irvin and center Gary Leonard.

"When we put in Greg Church, our offense improves," Daly said. "Our depth has really helped us. I look down the bench. Anthony Peeler can play either guard. Greg Church can play forward or center. Nathan Buntin can play forward or center.

"It's hard to make a mistake when you put those three people in there."

Tennis squad gets rare weekend break

By Carolyn Holcroft
Sports Writer

For the first time this season, the K-State women's tennis team will be taking a weekend off from competition, a sort of "calm before the storm."

Next weekend, the Wildcats will be coming back to finish the toughest portion of the season, as the team opens conference play against Missouri on Saturday. From there, matches continue every weekend until the Big Eight tournament, April 29-30.

The team is 10-3 overall and also has some impressive individual records.

During the Florida tour, team captain Annika Emtell had key wins against Sara Clowe from Flagler College and Florida State's Jill Urban. Emtell now boasts an 8-2 overall record.

At No. 2 doubles, Marijke Nel and Valerie Rive are turning out to be one of the most consistent teams in Coach Steve Bietau's career. The duo went undefeated on the Florida tour and hold a 12-3 overall record. According to Bietau, a key factor to their success is their experience playing together. The Nel-Rive combination took fourth place in the Big Eight Conference last year and are now in their second year together.

The No. 1 doubles spot will be seeing some new faces, as Bietau will pair juniors Helen Schildknecht and Sara Hancock together for the first time this year. Although their first matches together at K-State were unsuccessful, the duo won the NJCAA championship at No. 2 doubles in 1987 while playing for Midland (Texas) Junior College.

Coming off the Florida tour with a 3-3 record, the team has been putting some extra effort into practice this week.

"We've been working out some of the things that you pick up when you compete for a week straight, and getting everyone's game back on solid ground," Bietau said. "We've gotten lots of things established, and I feel pretty good about what's happened this week."

He also stressed the importance of rest, and quality of practice has been stressed more than actual time spent this week. One of the main reasons for the break this weekend is to allow the players to get caught up in school and try to alleviate some academic pressures.

Bietau also said that the team is keeping the pressure in perspective, even though the remainder of the season will be against Big Eight teams.

"We've tried to establish a routine, that you give your best no matter who's out there," he said, "and we've done a very good job of that so far."

The squad's next home competition will be against Kansas, April 5.

Michigan, Seton Hall, UNLV all advance

By The Associated Press

LEXINGTON, Ky. — Glen Rice scored 34 points Thursday night and Michigan beat North Carolina 92-87 in the Southeast Regional semifinals, avenging losses to the Tar Heels in the NCAA tournament the last two seasons.

Michigan, 27-7, will meet Virginia, 22-10, on Saturday with the winner advancing to the Final Four next weekend at Seattle. Virginia upset fourth-ranked and top-seeded Oklahoma 86-80 earlier Thursday night.

Seton Hall 78, Indiana 65

DENVER — Andrew Gaze accounted for four of Seton Hall's eight 3-point baskets, and the Pirates upended Indiana 78-65 Thursday night in NCAA tournament West Regional play.

Seton Hall, 29-6, advances to the regional final Saturday against Nevada-Las Vegas.

The Pirates' superior rebounding and inside offense proved to be the difference against an Indiana team that had to be content with shooting from the perimeter most of the night.

Hoosier guard Jay Edwards had 16 of his 18 points in the second half, helping rally Indiana from a 12-point deficit early in the second half to within 54-51 with 8:16 left.

UNLV 68, Arizona 67

Freshman Anderson Hunt hit his fifth 3-pointer of the game with four seconds to play Thursday night to give 15th-ranked Nevada-Las Vegas a 68-67 victory over No. 1-ranked Arizona in the semifinals of the NCAA West Regional.

The Runnin' Rebels, 29-7, blew a seven-point lead in the final five minutes, but still were able to thwart Arizona's bid for a second straight Final Four appearance.

All-America forward Sean Elliott scored 17 of his 22 points in the second half for Arizona, but missed two 3-pointers in the final minutes.

Hunt scored 21 for UNLV.

McAdams park is located on 13th Street just off of Interstate-35 in Wichita.

Royals release catcher Owen

HAINES CITY, Fla. — The Kansas City Royals have told veteran catcher Larry Owen that he will not make the team.

Owen said General Manager John Schuerholz told him Wednesday that he had been unable to make a trade for him. Owen also will not be asked to go to the Royals' Class AAA club at Omaha.

Committee debates foster parent bill

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A Senate committee was urged Wednesday to endorse a bill that would require foster parents to report to the court every six month the adjustment, progress and condition of foster children under their care.

Rep. Debara Schauf, R-Mulvane, told the Senate Judiciary Committee that such reports are needed because judges often have no idea of how children are doing while in foster homes.

"The foster parents can give the best evaluation, because they are the ones that know the child the best," Schauf said.

But committee members and an official with the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services said the bill might scare some people away from being foster parents.

"We are concerned about the mandatory language that every foster parent must make a report," said Jan Waide, director of children in need of care services for SRS. "Not all foster parents have the communication skills of other foster parents, but that doesn't mean they are bad foster parents."

She said the intent of the bill was a good idea, the six month reports should be voluntary instead of mandatory. She worried about the additional work load for foster parents, which she said already make significant emotional and financial sacrifices.

Helen Stephens, who had been a foster parent for five years, said the reporting requirements would not be much of a burden.

She said that she lived in Missouri when she was a foster parent and reported to a social worker on a monthly basis on the progesss of her foster child.

"It was not imposition," she said.

The committee took no action on the bill.

The committee did endorse two bills that dealt with sexual exploitation of children after brief testimony.

One bill would make it a felony to possess any audio tape recording in which a child under 16 is heard engaging in sexually explicit conduct. It would also be a crime to employ or pursuade a child to make those tapes.

Jim Clark, a lobbyist for the Kansas County and District Attorneys Association, gave the committee a copy of a letter he received from a county attorney that reported an incident in which the mother of two young children sent sexually explicit tapes to a twice-convicted child molester at the Kansas State Penitentiary in Lansing.

Prison officials confiscated the tapes which had a nine year-year-old and a two-year-old talking about sex.

State laws prohibit sexual exploitation of children in other media, but does not include audio tapes.

The committee also endorsed a bill that eliminates the requirement that attorney's who are prosecuting people charged with taking indecent liberties with a child prove that the victim is not married to the accused.

Clark said under present state law, the prosecution has to ask children if they are married to the accused while they are on the witness stand.

The bill also includes a provision that people married to children can not be convicted of indecent liberties with their spouses.

Lecture

"Who they're going to be and what they're going to say worries me," Weddington said.

Women considering law as a career should pursue it, she said.

"There is a lot of need for lawyers to do people law," Weddington said. "Law is the most important building block of the political process. I would never have gotten to do so many things."

Weddington also served in the Texas legislature and in the Carter administration. She is currently working on a book, "Some Leaders are Born Women."

Prior to Weddington's lecture, about 20 members of the Manhattan chapter of the National Organization for Women marched outside of McCain to support Weddington and women's right of choice on abortion.

"(NOW) is here to let her know there are people in Manhattan who believe in what she has done," said Teresa Parsons, president of the Manhattan NOW chapter.

Parsons said the pro-choice movement is concerned about the recently passed Kansas Senate Bill 91, which calls for women under the age of 18 to obtain consent from a parent or judge before an abortion can be performed.

"The wording of the bill is vague," she said. "It is one way of restricting the right of choice. It gives provisions to the right of choice in the justice system which we don't think are realistic ... in terms of money, resources and courage."

Wages

in the minimum wage would fuel inflation and force employers with marginal profits to slash hundreds of thousands of jobs.

Democrats disputed those arguments and said that by failing to increase the minimum wage for eight years Congress had forced the working poor to get by on a wage that has lost nearly 40 percent of its buying power.

"It isn't enough but it certainly is better than nothing," House Speaker Jim Wright said of the Democratic bill. "I'm asking you for this vote today for one simple reason. Vote for this bill because it is right and you know it."

Hall praises North's work in Iran-Contra testimony

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A weeping Fawn Hall praised former boss Oliver North Thursday as an inspirational, tireless and selfless man and said their wholesale shredding of Iran-Contra documents "was no big deal."

Alternately crying and spitting back sharp responses, Hall twice appeared unable to go on with her testimony at North's trial, causing impromptu recesses. Her sympathies throughout were obviously with North though she hardly ever looked at him.

"It's tough when people portray you as a witness for the prosecution when you are a witness for the truth," she said outside the courthouse. "Hopefully, the good guy will win."

She called North's firing by then-President Reagan on Nov. 25, 1986, unfair.

"I was very upset," she recalled. "When I heard about it, I was very angry."

Hall, who was North's secretary at the National Security Council for nearly four years, admitted that when attorney general's investigators were closing in on Nov. 21, 1986, she altered documents to soften recorded versions of North's involvement with the Nicaraguan Contras. She also said she helped him in what has been called "a shredding party" of Iran-Contra documents.

The former Marine lieutenant colonel is on trial on 12 charges, including destroying documents and lying to Congress about his activities. Hall, like most of the 20 other prosecution witnesses to date, first obtained immunity from prosecution before agreeing to testify.

At one point Thursday, she became upset when prosecutor John Keker confronted her with a transcript of "your words" in previous testimony. She had testified then that North may have directed her to shred some documents, but she said on Wednesday that North had given no such instructions.

When North lawyer Brendan Sullivan objected to the questioning, she continued to talk and U.S. District Judge Gerhard A. Gesell snapped:

"Please keep your mouth shut while I'm talking." Then he ruled that what she had said earlier was "entirely consistent" with her current testimony.

"Can I have a break?" she asked Gesell.

"What's your problem?" asked the judge. After Sullivan spoke up for her, Gesell said "certainly she can take a break."

Tears streamed down her face and she was clutching her stomach as she walked out of the courtroom.

The witness began to cry again at another point as she told Sullivan that she had met "Colonel North, his wife, Betsy, and their four kids in Easter of 1983." A recess was called so she could compose herself.

Her testimony Thursday was less precise than it had been in previous questioning before a grand jury and congressional committees:

- She told a grand jury in March 1987 she had deleted altered documents from her word processor, but she told the North jury she wasn't certain she did that.
- She testified in 1987 that she told North the day he was fired that she was smuggling documents out of the NSC offices.

Annex

pretty well taken up."

Glasscock said the issue of annexation will probably come as part of land use plan revisions or growth policy revisions.

The commission and city staff do not hold a position for or against the issue, he said, although the issue could cause the commission "to form some type of annexation strategy."

President Jon Wefald said Robert Krause, vice president for institutional advancement, and his office staff are working with the issues related to annexation. The University is not actively pursuing the issue, he said.

Krause was unavailable for comment, but said in an earlier interview there were several questions to be discussed before any official action could be taken by the city.

These questions include adding to the city's sales tax revenue, enforcement of city codes on campus, the providing of water and sewer services and fire protection.

An "obvious" advantage for the city would be the increase in sales tax generated from activities on campus, Petty said. The primary source of tax revenue would be from sales in the K-State Union Bookstore.

According to an article published in the Manhattan Mercury, this is the only Big Eight school that is not a part of the city in which it is located, although K-State does subscribe to several city services.

Fire protection for the campus is provided through an annually renewed contract with the city.

Other services to consider would be facilities maintenance, including streets and sidewalks, Petty said. The University is responsibile for maintenance of its buildings and streets.

Petty said city building and fire codes would not apply to campus facilities if it is annexed. The state architect's office would retain control over setting and enforcing building and fire codes.

"It is my understanding that the state owned property would not have to comply with city codes," he said. "New construction is done according to the state architect's office (regulations)."

Referendum begins today; voter turnout determines passage ratio of proposal

By Alan Wilds
Staff Writer

Student vote on the proposed athletic fee begins today.

The referendum, which will occur today and Tuesday in the Union and Veterinary Medicine Complex, would require students to pay a $15 per semester full-time fee and a $7.50 per semester part-time fee, begining fall 1989.

The referendum could pass in two ways, according to the Student Governing Association Constitution. The Constitution states an issue on referendum may be passed by a simple majority affirmative vote if one-third of the student body — about 5,900 students — casts votes, or by a two-thirds affirmative vote if less less than one-third of student body votes.

Chris Kern, chairman of the Senate Student Affairs and Social Services Committee, said if students do not pass the referendum, it can still be passed if the KSU Athletic Department takes the issue to the Kansas Board of Regents for debate.

Chris Peterson, assistant athletic director in charge of marketing and sales, said he is not sure what the next step would be if it does not pass, but the decision to go to the Board of Regents would have to be made by the administration.

"We have not made a second game-plan because we are hoping we won't need to," Peterson said. "We will have to go back to the drawing board if it doesn't pass."

He said any alternative plan selected by the department would be chosen so as not to "upset the masses."

"The point is we have to have the money and we just want the students to voice their opinion," he said.

Marvin Burris, director for budget for the Board of Regents, said K-State has to receive approval from regents on any fee increase, regardless of a student referendum.

"If it did not pass, the process would be for the athletic department to come to the board at its April meeting for first readings," Burris said.

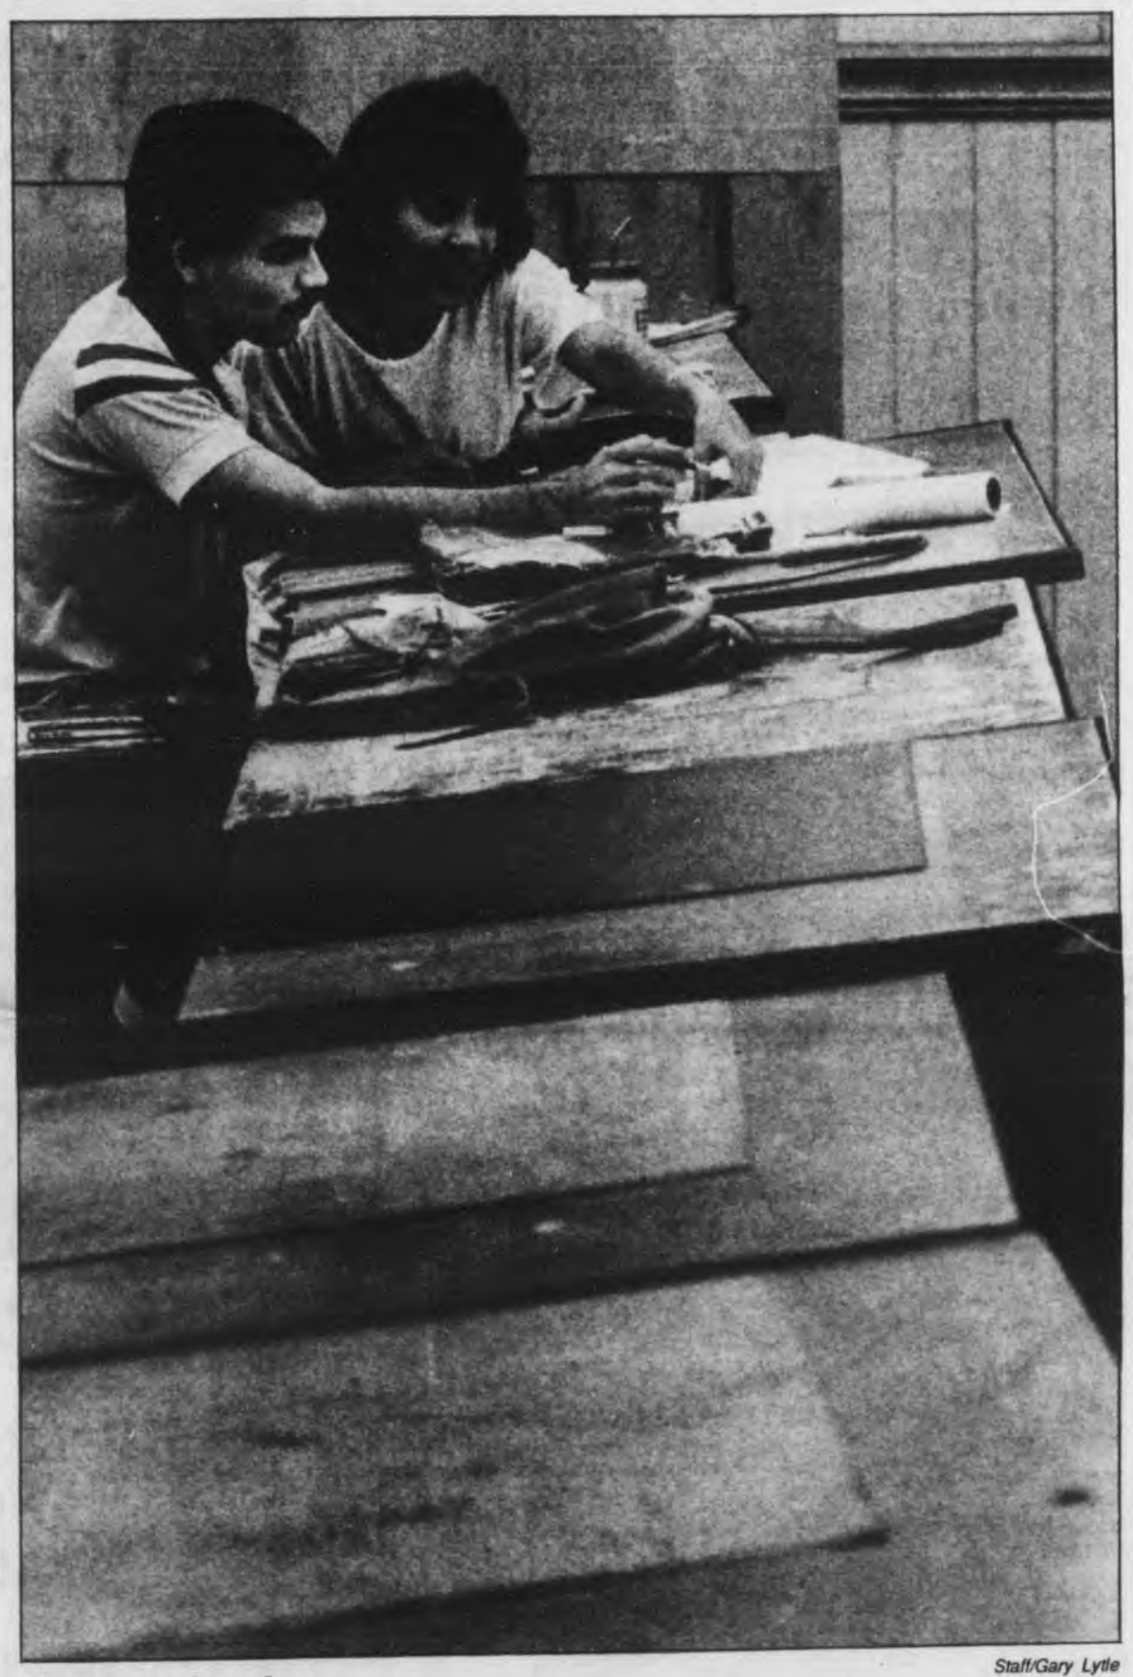
In any case, student opinion would be taken into consideration, he said.

Kern said it is possible the athletic fee bill might be reintroduced and voted on by Senate in its session Tuesday night.

"It depends on what the referendum votes are," he said. "If it is just a couple of points short, it could happen."

Preliminary discussion on the fee proposal began last semester in Student Senate Finance Committee, Kern said. Debate on the bill in Kern's committee, which prepared the present bill, began in late January.

The committee met six times over a one-month period to determine how to write the bill and what provisions should be included, he said.



The issue was then debated two times on the Senate floor, including a special session on March 7 in which amendments were made because of the unconstitutionality of the committee's bill.

After the first debate in Senate, Student Body President Laurian Cuffy called the special session to discuss certain merits of the bill he thought had not been discussed, such as the athletic department's budget.

Kern said the bill received final approval at the special session after amendments were made which would not allow graduate and undergraduate students to vote as two separate bodies as was originally proposed.

The 1989 referendum ballot will have a different look from previous ballots. Sally Routson, coordinator of student activities, said the ballots will be color-coded by college and some voter information questions will be included at the bottom for statistical information.

Polls will be open from 7:30 a.m. to 6:00 p.m. Picture identification is required.

Student remains in hospital for burn caused in gas fire

By The Collegian Staff

A member of the Pi Kappa Alpha fraternity is listed in stable condition at the burn center of the University of Kansas Medical Center in Kansas City, Kan., after being burned in a gasoline fire Friday near Kipp, Kan.

Darren Landis, sophomore in arts and sciences, received second- and third-degree burns on more than 40 percent of his body when he and another member of the fraternity attempted to start an antique fire engine owned by the Pikes.

Doug Exline, Salina, said Landis was pouring gasoline from a coffee can into the carburetor of the fire engine while Exline's son, Curt, a freshman in business administration, attempted to start the vehicle.

"(Landis) told Curt to start it and it backfired," Doug said. "In his excitement, (Landis) threw the (coffee) can over and it caught a 5 gallon can (of gasoline) on fire. The can exploded."

Doug said Curt told him of the events surrounding the explosion.

Landis was taken by ambulance to the Asbury-Salina Regional Medical Center. From Salina, Landis was flown by medical evacuation aircraft to the KU Medical Center.

A spokeswoman for nursing services at KU Medical Center said Landis is listed in stable condition. He is being treated for second-degree and some third-degree burns.

Views split on athletic fee

Faculty question relating athletics, academics

By Mindy Robert
Collegian Reporter

Although unable to vote in the athletic fee referendum, K-State faculty members have varied opinions about the proposal and provide a different perspective on the issue.

The proposed athletic fee, passed by Student Senate, would allocate about $450,000 from student fees to the KSU Athletic Department if students support the measure in the referendum today and Tuesday. If approved, full-time students would pay $15 per semester and part-time students would pay $7.50 per semester.

Faculty Senate has not discussed the athletic fee proposal, said Cornelia Flora, professor of sociology and president of Faculty Senate.

"(Faculty Senate) generally does not discuss student funding issues," she said. "This is a student matter."

Although she has not studied the issue enough to determine if she would support or oppose fee, Flora said she is positive about the leadership in the athletic program and its concern for the relationship between athletics and academics.

Robert Linder, professor of history, said the athletic fee is a University-wide concern, not just a student concern.

"Faculty feel frustrated they don't have the time or resources to get involved with the issue," he said.

Linder would not state whether he supported or opposed the fee proposal, but said that if the fee passes it will "certainly be a major object lesson as to where the priorities of this University are."

One faculty member said he is opposed to the fee because of lack of emphasis on academics.

"(The fee) is further indication of the warped priority and exaggerated influence athletics have on this campus," said John Daly, professor of history.

"What are employers going to look at on your transcript — how well the women's basketball team did or what classes you took?" he asked.

The poor showing of the football program indicates bad management instead of lack of resources, he said.

"(The) athletic department can't manage its affairs within budget and goes to the students to pick up the slack," Daly said. "I think that the athletic department should begin to live realistically on its budget, just like the history department has to."

The lowest paid assistant football coach earns as much as a full professor in the history department, he said.

According to the University budget for fiscal year 1989, the salaries of full professors in the history department range from about $30,000 to $44,000.

Athletic Director Steve Miller said the annual salaries of the assistant football coaches range from about $34,000 to $62,000.

At least two coaches' salaries are either full or partially paid by University funds, he said.

Miller said the money received from the proposed athletic fee would not go toward paying salaries of coaches. He said the solution is not to lower the salaries of coaches but to increase the salaries of professors, which is one reason for the Margin of Excellence.

Professors should be paid more than coaches, he said.

Some faculty support the fee.

"The money is necessary to support (the athletic program), particulary minor sports," said Mary McElroy, associate professor of physical education and leisure studies and member of the intercollegiate athletic council. "People tend to think there is lots of money available to all sports at Kansas State.

"It is important to know that many schools have gone to this method for supplementing (athletic) programs. Without this support we will not have a complete athletic program."

Whether students support the fee or not, she said K-State sports have an effect on them.

It is a student's own decision to become involved with a sport team as a fan or participant, she said. Students will benefit if they choose to be part of the "sport experience."

Although he supports the athletic fee, Phillip Anderson, instructor of speech, said an entertainment fee would be a "fairer fee." An enter-

Parachuting accident causes ATO's death

By Brian Hummell
Campus Editor

A K-Stater's first parachute jump resulted in his death Saturday in Wamego.

Larry Marvel, senior in engineering technology, died from multiple injuries as a result of a parachute accident, said Dr. Dan Tibbets, the physician who pronounced Marvel dead at Wamego City Hospital. Marvel suffered multiple broken bones, contusions and lacerations and severe blood loss.

Marvel was a member of Alpha Tau Omega fraternity and an officer in the Kansas Pilot's Association. Funeral arrangements have been set for 2 p.m. Tuesday in Wichita at Culbertson-Smith Funeral Home, said Tim Smith, ATO president. The ATO's will hold a memorial service Wednesday, but a location has not yet been established.

When Marvel exited a Cessna 182 at 3,100 feet, the jump appeared to be normal, said Bill Dawes, faculty advisor of the K-State parachute club. Dawes, an associate professor in engineering technology, piloted the plane.

"(Marvel) did have what was called line twist ... line twist is when the parachute spins one or two times when it is deploying," Dawes said.

Line twist is not uncommon and is defined as a "problem," he said.

"(Marvel) took action to clear it, he reached up with his hands and he pulled the lines apart to try to clear the line twists," Dawes said.

There was a malfunction with the parachute two or three seconds later when the parachute did not open completely, he said. Marvel spiralled to about 2,000 feet, then regained control.

"The parachute was only about two-thirds open," Dawes said. "He got control and stopped the spin ... he rode it down ... he got down to about 1,000 feet and he lost control again."

Observers on the ground said Marvel pulled his reserve rip-cord at about 50 feet. Dawes said 200 feet is needed for the reserve parachute to deploy.

When the reserve parachute rip-cord is pulled the main parachute is removed and the reserve is deployed, he said.

"First-jump students do not pack their own parachutes," said Ron Harris, president of the club. "Experienced jumpers within the club pack the parachutes for any student that has not had the experience."

Refugees' standoff ends

MIAMI — About 250 Haitian refugees threatened to throw babies overboard during a 30-hour standoff on the high seas with a U.S. Coast Guard vessel transporting nearly 100 Haitians back to their homeland, officials said Sunday.

A rope was used to demobilize the rudder of the 50-foot refugee vessel and four other Coast Guard cutters were sent to the scene before the Haitians agreed to leave the sailboat at 3 p.m. EST Sunday about 120 miles southeast of Miami, said Coast Guard Petty Officer Gary Starks.

"It was really an ordeal and there were some very tense moments," Starks said. "There was no idea what would happen and none of the Haitians had life jackets. There was a potential for a significant loss of life."

One refugee woman was rescued after leaping into the sea and others vowed to throw their infant children overboard unless they were allowed to continue toward the United States, he said.

Starks said none of the refugees had weapons and no one was injured, although three ill Haitians were transported to the Coast Guard base in Miami Beach.

Some of the Haitians aboard the Coast Guard cutter Escape refused to eat in an act of sympathy with the refugees, he said.

The Escape encountered the refugee boat about 9 a.m. Saturday while en route to Port-au-Prince, Haiti, with 99 Haitian refugees intercepted Friday slightly more than three miles off Fort Lauderdale. If the refugees had come within the three-mile limit, they would have been brought ashore to be interviewed by U.S. immigration officials.

Students protest nothing

SANTA CRUZ, Calif. — It was a protest to end all protests.

A group of college students staged a protest for no reason, holding blank signs and distributing fliers that said nothing. They insisted nothing was on their minds.

"The whole point is there are so many protests that people don't read the signs and don't care anymore," said Bryan Finch, 22, a Cabrillo College student who organized Friday's "non-protest" and served as the official "unspokesperson."

He said the group was protesting the trivialization of protests.

"People are making them worthless by doing them so much," said Finch.

Easter shooting injures 3

WICHITA — A fight broke out among a group of teenagers at an amusement park packed with people attending an Easter celebration, leaving one man critically injured with a gunshot wound to the head.

A semi-automatic weapon was used in the shooting at the Joyland Amusement Park in south Wichita Sunday night, said Mike Randolph, emergency communications director for Wichita and Sedgwick County.

The 18-year-old Wichita man was in critical condition at St. Joseph's Medical Center Sunday night, said Mike States, director of community relations for the hospital.

States said a second 18-year-old Wichita man was released into police custody from the hospital after he was treated for a minor wound he received when he was grazed by a bullet.

Capt. David Pate of the Wichita Police Department said he was being questioned by police Sunday night.

A 19-year-old woman injured in a related incident was treated for stab wounds to the forehead and was released, States said.

Authorities would not identify the victims.

More than a dozen officers were sent to St. Joseph's Medical Center when a large crowd of friends and family members gathered.

Wichita Police Lt. D.W. Moore said some of the people had pushed their way into the emergency room and that the police had been called to restore order.

Recording studio destroyed

WENTZVILLE, Mo. — An early-morning fire destroyed a recording studio on the farm of rock 'n' roll star Chuck Berry, including a tape with some Berry songs, officials said.

Authorities said the fire in the unoccupied building several miles south of Wentzville was reported early Saturday. The one-story concrete block structure is one of several buildings on Berry's 160-acre farm west of St. Louis.

The cause of the blaze was not immediately determined, but officials discounted arson.

Among the items destroyed in the fire was a master tape with 13 numbers Berry recorded over the last seven years. But Berry, 62, was philosophical about the loss.

"All things change, nothing remains the same," he said. "There's no way to put a value on it."

Berry, known for such '50s hits as "Maybelline" and "No Particular Place to Go," said he had not determined the extent of the loss and was undecided about rebuilding the studio.

Founders speak of misgivings on anniversary of peace treaty

By The Associated Press

JERUSALEM — Former Prime Minister Menachem Begin broke his silence on political affairs Sunday by using the 10th anniversary of the Israeli-Egyptian peace treaty to criticize the United States for opening talks with the PLO.

Begin and the other surviving architect of the historic treaty, former President Jimmy Carter, praised the pact but expressed regret that it did not lead to a comprehensive settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

Islamic fundamentalists opposed to the pact assassinated Egyptian President Anwar Sadat four years after he signed it.

There were no official ceremonies marking the occasion, reflecting the chilly relations between the two former Middle East adversaries, mainly over the lack of a solution to the Palestinian problem.

Israeli students did, however, sponsor a "peace party" at a convention center in Jerusalem to mark the occasion of the signing of Israel's only peace treaty with an Arab state.

No official ceremonies were held in Egypt either, and only one government-controlled newspaper mentioned the anniversary.

Columnist Anis Mansour wrote in the al-Ahram newspaper that although Arab countries accused Egypt of treason when the treaty was signed, they now agree on the need for negotiations to peacefully end the conflict.

The 75-year-old Begin took issue with Washington's latest peace move, the U.S. dialogue with the Palestinian Liberation Organization in Tunisia that broke a 13-year American boycott of Yasser Arafat's organization.

"This is in my opinion a negative, harmful phenomenon," he said in his characteristically hoarse voice. "The Americans, our friends, are in essence asked to reconsider this matter."

Begin said he opposed formation of a Palestinian state in the occupied West Bank and Gaza Strip as "a danger to Israel and the entire Middle East."

He complained that Palestinians persisted in clashing with Israeli soldiers in the occupied lands and sending guerrillas to raid northern Israel.

Arnold Air Society competes today at national competition

By Mary Ubel
Collegian Reporter

Members of K-State's chapter of the Arnold Air Society will attend a national conclave today in Colorado Springs, Colo.

The chapter was selected for National competition after receiving four awards Feb. 4 at the area conclave (ARCON) in Omaha, Neb., said George Lavezzi, operations officer. The chapter received the pledge program award, Civic Affairs award, Outstanding Sophomore award, and the best overall award in conducting service projects.

"We were surprised. This was our third year for winning all four awards," Lavezzi said.

The chapter submitted applications for the awards which were reviewed by cadet staff members at area headquarters in Lincoln, Neb., Lavezzi said.

At the annual ARCON, general business is discussed by Arnold Air Society chapters from six schools in Nebraska, Kansas and Oklahoma, he said.

"We had to work harder this year because of last year's cutbacks," said Tom DeVore, cadet captain. "The cutbacks hurt Arnold Air Society's membership and morale."

Lavezzi said the pledge program award was given to the service organization with the most effective training program for cadets.

This year's pledges completed two community service projects, one Arnold Air Society project and one ROTC cadet-corps project, he said. The projects were designed for cadets to become involved in the community, gain leadership experience, and learn to plan and organize events.

The Civic Affairs award was given for the best overall community projects completed by active members.

"The community projects served a two-fold purpose — to help the community and to be effective on the media to get the society's name in the public eye," Lavezzi said.

Cathy Barnes, sophomore in political science, was chosen as the area's Outstanding Sophomore. Lavezzi said Barnes earned the award by her attendance at service events, being second in her class academically and maintaining a 4.0 grade point average. Barnes is also the chairwoman for the Vietnam Memorial committee.

"I was honored," Barnes said. "It doesn't mean that I'm beyond my peers, but I have the support of the people in the squadron."

Lavezzi said the squadron was also given the area award for being best overall in all service projects completed during the past year due in part to a high percentage in participation by members.

Gorbachev hails election as triumph

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — For the first time in more than 70 years, Soviets had a choice of candidates when they voted Sunday for a new parliament in an election Mikhail S. Gorbachev hailed as a triumph for his vision of democracy.

However, maverick candidate Boris N. Yeltsin, running to represent Moscow in the new 2,250-seat Congress of People's Deputies, claimed many Soviets are worried about vote fraud and said the election wasn't completely democratic.

Polling stations in Moscow, festooned with red banners and Soviet flags, opened at 7 a.m. Eleven time zones to the east, in the Kamchatka and Chukotka regions of Siberia, polls closed as Muscovites were still voting.

The millions of voters elected 1,500 deputies to the congress, which later will choose the country's president and elect about 400 of its members to a new full-time legislature, the Supreme Soviet.

The Communist Party, labor unions and other officially sanctioned organizations have already directly elected 750 members of the congress, which will meet once a year.

Hundreds of races were contested for the first time in more than seven decades. The election marked a revolutionary change in Soviet politics, where the party has allowed only one approved candidate to run for each seat since the days of Vladimir I. Lenin.

The official Tass news agency reported brisk to heavy voter turnout nationwide. At one precinct in Moscow's Krasnopresnenskaya district, 84 percent of those eligible cast ballots, according to a Soviet television report.

Final results may not be known for several days.

An informal sample of voters in Moscow showed 80 percent of more than 2,000 people questioned as they left polling places said they voted for Yeltsin, but no scientific exit polls were taken by the official media.

Yeltsin campaigned against the privileges afforded high Soviet officials and called for speeding the pace of reform to improve living standards for all.

Gorbachev is already assured of a seat in the new congress, and the elections are unlikely to produce any major upheaval in the present power structure, which is dominated by the Communist Party.

The last elections in which most Russians had a choice occurred weeks after the November 1917 revolution that swept Lenin and the Bolsheviks to power.

In June 1987, two or more candidates competed in 4 percent of the races for municipal offices in what amounted to a test for greater democratization.

But Sunday marked the first such balloting on a nationwide scale. In 74 percent of the districts, there were two or more competing candidates, the Central Election Commission said.

However, according to the weekly Moscow News, 82 percent of those running in Sunday's races are Communist Party members, guaranteeing the country's ruling political party will dominate whatever assembly emerges from the voting.

Gorbachev, who with his wife Raisa voted at Moscow's Institute of Chemical Physics, told reporters the occasionally boisterous campaign caused by the multicandidate election was just what the Kremlin leadership wanted.

"The electoral law that we passed has justified our hopes," Gorbachev said, as Mrs. Gorbachev, holding a blue umbrella, stood beside him under a light rain. "It has advanced the political thought and social activity of the people, and this is what we wanted to achieve."

The president said his policies of pressing for more democracy and openness in Soviet society, while not permitting any legal opposition to the Communist Party, are "the key to opening the potential of our socialist society, with the purpose of taking into account the various interests of people and harmonizing them on the basis of consensus or a majority."

Washburn proposal shot down by Senate

You'd figure that after losing out on the death penalty and highway improvement votes in the Kansas Legislature, Gov. Hayden would think twice before announcing another proposal.

But by rejecting Hayden's proposal to make Washburn University a regents' university on Wednesday, the Kansas Senate placed concern for the welfare of higher education in Kansas higher than whatever promises Hayden might have made to supporters in eastern Kansas.

Supporters of Hayden's plan argue that although Washburn is a municipal university, it draws students from all over the state. Some senators also expressed concern for Washburn's future, saying the university would go under unless it received state support.

What they seem to ignore is that there six state universities in Kansas already exist, and the inclusion of Washburn would drain resources needed at the regents' schools.

The quality of education offered by Washburn is not in question. The problem is the limited budget the Legislature apportions for education. The inclusion of yet another university would place a burden on the regents' operations.

This is not to mention the problem of duplication of programs. The state needs to fund another law school about as badly as it needed to implement a multi-million dollar death penalty. There is no sense in the state funding identical programs at different universities.

Hayden said his request on behalf of all of higher education would continue. Let's just hope he encounters as much success as he has in the past.

Closed door policy harmful for football

Promote the football team. Support the football team. Where are the fans when they're needed?

All of these have been battle cries from the KSU Athletic Department on an irritatingly regular basis. Even the athletic fee is based on the premise that students want to show their support for an ailing program.

And all of that is just fine — but don't expect to hear much from anywhere about the actual team. And it's not that the team's spring practices aren't going well or that the players aren't worth the effort, it's because the practice field has been made as off limits to the members of the media as Fort Knox is to thieves.

To remove the practices' "country club" atmosphere and instill a sense of a serious work ethic, the practices are not only off limits, but the chainlink fence surrounding the field will have a tarp attached to it so passersby cannot see onto the field.

Talk about a turnaround.

The media will be allowed to question Coach Bill Snyder before Thursday practices. Any players with whom the media would like to chat with during that time have to be requested before Tuesdays at 5 p.m. Assuming classes permit, the media will be allowed to speak with the player during the press conference.

However, the only time photographers will be allowed near the team is for 15 minutes on Tuesday. Not any more and not any less — just 15 minutes.

Since these new rules are expected to still be in effect in the fall, those photos had better be good and no one had better change their hairstyle.

Concentration is important in any game — football especially. Perhaps things have been too relaxed, but these measures are ludicrous.

Restricting the media from the practices will force a reliance on the coach — a coach that has yet to be tested. It will take any spontaneity out of the coverage given to the team and cut it in half, if not more.

Other colleges may have policies similar to Snyder's, but it won't work here. K-State's program is not strong enough to stand the results of this closed-door "trust" that provides little coverage.

This policy doesn't meet or even address the needs of the students. It only presents a picture to fans that the program doen't have to answer to anyone — because no one outside the program will know what is going on.

Column misleading

Editor,

When presenting information, it is important that the material given is factual and not based on half-truths, innuendo or lack of investigation. There are a few statements that were made in the guest commentary section of the Collegian, "Problems surround athletic fee," and I would like to clear up a few of those.

First, K-State's football budget did reflect $800,000 of unspent money as of Jan. 1989. However, football's spending does not discontinue just because the season is over. By the conclusion of recruiting season, the budget will be depleted.

Second, the fact that students are going to pay $30 as opposed to an $11 increase is not based on reality, but on supposition. There has been no decision as to what the ticket prices will be.

Third, specific areas of spending have been designated, addressed and discussed.

Fourth, the student fee is not going to pay the $2 million debt to the KSU Foundation for Bramlage Coliseum. That allegation is simply untrue and irresponsible.

Fifth, although the past may have shown some mistaken spending, the fact that there has been a change in athletic administration indicates the responsiveness of this University's central administration to avoid such occurrences in the future.

Finally, I would like to say that the athletic department followed each and every guideline set by the Student Senate in terms of representing, addressing issues and providing financial documents. The athletic department never side-stepped an issue nor ducked direct questions. If there is fault in the process, then it is the process that must be investigated.

Fee one of many

Editor,

Today's the big day, folks! It's the first of two days to vote on the issue of the athletic fee.

As a responsive and responsible student senator, I have fought this thing tooth and nail. The original reference bill submitted by the Student Affairs and Social Service Committee contained countless deliberate and under-handed clauses geared toward easy passage, many of which resulted in blatant SGA constitutional violations.

Indeed, the antics of John Tower and Jim Wright look like the conduct of angels compared to that of the Student Senate at that point. It took a ruling of Student Tribunal, a special meeting called by the student body president, and the possibility of additional action by the Tribunal to finally force Senate to come up with a halfway decent referendum bill.

Yet, there exists a critical issue that Senate failed to contemplate, though some tried, and that is the issue of the students' financial ability to pay this athletic "tax." Therefore, I'm taking my arguments to you, the students.

I believe that all should be aware of the additional costs students will be facing in the future in order to make an intelligent vote.

Expect a minimum of a 6 percent increase in tuition, which is $33 per semester. Plus, Student Senate raised the health fee by $15 a semester and increased the general activity fee by 20 cents. This is already a whale of an increase in student taxes.

Here's the real clincher. If we add on the $15 athletic tax, the entire package will set a record as the largest student tax hike in history. That's a mighty scary thought.

Even more financial aspects come into play. Those of you in residence halls, roughly 40 percent of the student body, will be forking out another $80 per semester next fall. The planned $10 assessment on guaranteed student loans and the for-now dormant engineering fee should still be regarded as impending threats.

Realize that the recent enrollment increases have caused off-campus housing to be less plentiful and will probably result in higher rents.

The KSU Athletic Department informed Senate of its entire financial picture. In light of that, I feel it is proper to inform students of yet additional information. In all likelihood when you come back next fall, you'll be paying $1 per gallon of gasoline. On a larger scale, the looming threats of an economic recession through a resurgence of inflation should make everyone, especially students, skeptical of being too generous with their pocketbook.

In a nutshell, now is not the time for the athletic tax, because we can't afford it today, tomorrow, nor at any time in the future. We just can't do it, so vote no.

Finally, do not vote asking yourself if you personally want to pay this fee or not. Nothing stops you from plopping down $30 annually to Steve Miller right now if you want to.

The questions should be: Do I want to require all students to pay this fee or not? An issue should be: Can all students afford to? Remember that you're not only voting with your own pocketbook, but also with those of all K-State students. The decision must be: No, we cannot afford this unwarranted athletic tax.

Fee benefits all

Editor,

We wish to let the K-State student body know how much the proposed sports fee would benefit our University.

The best-known colleges are recognized because of their successful sports programs. While K-State is nationally known for its basketball program, the other sports programs, namely football, seem to be suffering.

K-State's athletic budget is currently the lowest in the Big Eight. It is $1.5 million below the second lowest, and 2.5 times lower than the highest budget.

Even though our budget is so low, look at how well we have been able to compete thus far. Our basketball team has gained a berth in the NCAA tournament the past two years, our track team sent seven individuals to the NCAA national indoor meet, and our tennis team has been quite competitive.

If we agree to pay a fee of $15 per semester, we could bring our school's athletic budget to the mid-range budgets of the Big Eight, and our athletic teams would have the opportunity to participate with better competition and become more competitive and successful as a result.

Athletes are constantly in the public eye when they compete and represent K-State. When they do well and look good, the student body and University as a whole look good. When this happens, enrollment increases, revenue increases and various other programs improve.

We urge the students of K-State to vote "yes" for the athletic referendum March 27 and 28.

Meters unfair

Editor,

I became aware of the plan to put in meters in the students' half of the K-State Union parking lot. The students already have a ratio of three to four permits per parking stall.

Why didn't they put them in the faculty half of the Union lot? The reason is because they knew the faculty would not stand for it. The students need to band together and stop the Council on Traffic, Parking and Police Operations from putting in the meters.

Boycott shallow

Editor,

Regarding your editorial on dolphin slaughtering in Friday's Collegian, I am sure the ugly, clumsy tuna, who feel no pain, stupidly feel just the same as you do concerning dolphins.

I would also hate to see an indiscriminate waste of innocent life as we seek to capture the guilty tuna. We live through the deaths of other living creatures; it's inescapable and it's a fact of nature, but to purposely downplay other living creatures because of their intelligence or beauty is the type of shallowness that leads to the senseless slaughter of the dolphins.

Vote against fraud

Editor,

With the hiring of Bill Snyder as football coach, I have become very concerned about the KSU Athletic Department's attitude toward academics.

In an article in the March 14 issue of USA Today, Harry Edwards, a professor of sociology at the University of California and consultant to major league baseball, said Iowa is a typical school that has established a "plantation" system of exploiting black football and basketball players.

Iowa uses black athletes for profit while accepting no responsibility in providing an education. A related article in the March 21 issue of the Kansas City Times provides more details.

It stated that Ronnie Harmon, an offensive back whom Snyder coached while at Iowa, had grade point averages of 1.62, 1.86 and 1.69 in his first three years, and played his senior year despite a Big Ten conference rule that says athletes must have a cumulative GPA of 2.0 to be eligible to play their senior year.

Although Harmon majored in communications, his transcript is full of courses such a billiards, bowling, coaching basketball, officiating and special conditioning football.

Another Iowa player, Devon Mitchell, went four years without declaring a major, and had a curriculum similar to Harmon's that also included the ever-popular recreational leisure class. I would like to know if Snyder plans to continue that practice at K-State.

Another measure of the athletic department's lack of concern about athletics is that up until a couple of weeks ago, there was one full-time academic counselor. In comparison, most Big Ten schools have 10 full-time counselors.

Now, however, K-State has no full-time counselors, as the counselor, Michael Fisher, was asked to resign, leaving only four part-time counselors, one of whom is the study hall proctor.

People who care about K-State are very concerned about the direction the athletic department is taking. Winning is important, but not important enough to risk having our University's good name soiled as Iowa's was.

Our football program is already on the ropes. The one thing it does not need is charges of academic fraud.

As students, we can send a message that we will not condone, much less support, such behavior by voting "no" on the athletic fee.

Dairy products proven top fat source in studies

Researcher skeptical about advertisements

By Angie Smith
Collegian Reporter

Dairy advertisements stating that "milk does your body good" should be judged with some skepticism according to one researcher who has determined that dairy products have surpassed meat as the top source of unhealthy saturated fat in teen-agers' diets.

Studies performed at two New England schools by Dr. Curtis Ellison have concluded that 35 percent of students' daily consumption of saturated fat comes from milk, cheese, ice cream and other dairy food.

"Kids love milk," Ellison said. "Some of them drink two liters a day, and they grow up thinking that it's a good thing to have. We are not trying to take their milk away — just take the fat out of it."

Many people shy away from red meat because of its fat content, but they sometimes substitute it with types of cheese, such as cheddar, that contain far higher levels of saturated fat, he said.

Harold Roberts, associate professor of dairy foods technology, agrees with the results.

"Yes, milk contains a lot of saturated fat," Roberts said. But unless a person has a problem with high blood pressure, "I would not say milk was dangerous or unhealthy."

Although more people are drinking 2 percent and skim milk, it is because people are worried more about calorie content than about the dangers of saturated fat, he said.

Eating too much saturated fat raises cholesterol levels in the bloodstream, clogging the arteries which feed the heart. Decades of bad eating can eventually result in high blood pressure or a heart attack.

"Children under the age of 2 need the extra fat whole milk contains, but I see no danger for older kids intaking 2 percent."
— Ora Cowan
public schools' food service coordinator

"K-State produces about 15 to 20 percent of skim milk, about 5 percent of the 2 percent milk and the rest is whole milk," Roberts said. "Our largest consumers are people in the dormitories. They want whole milk; so that's mostly what we produce."

The campus food centers offer whole, skim and chocolate milk. Barbara Brooks, an administrative dietitian at Derby Food Center, said the dietitians are aware of the high content of saturated fat in whole milk and try to influence students to drink skim milk.

The dietitians try to educate students about the nutritious benefits of low-fat milk through literature displayed on the centers' tables, but Brooks said many students still choose whole milk rather than skim.

"I think if we offered 2 percent milk, the students would choose that," she said.

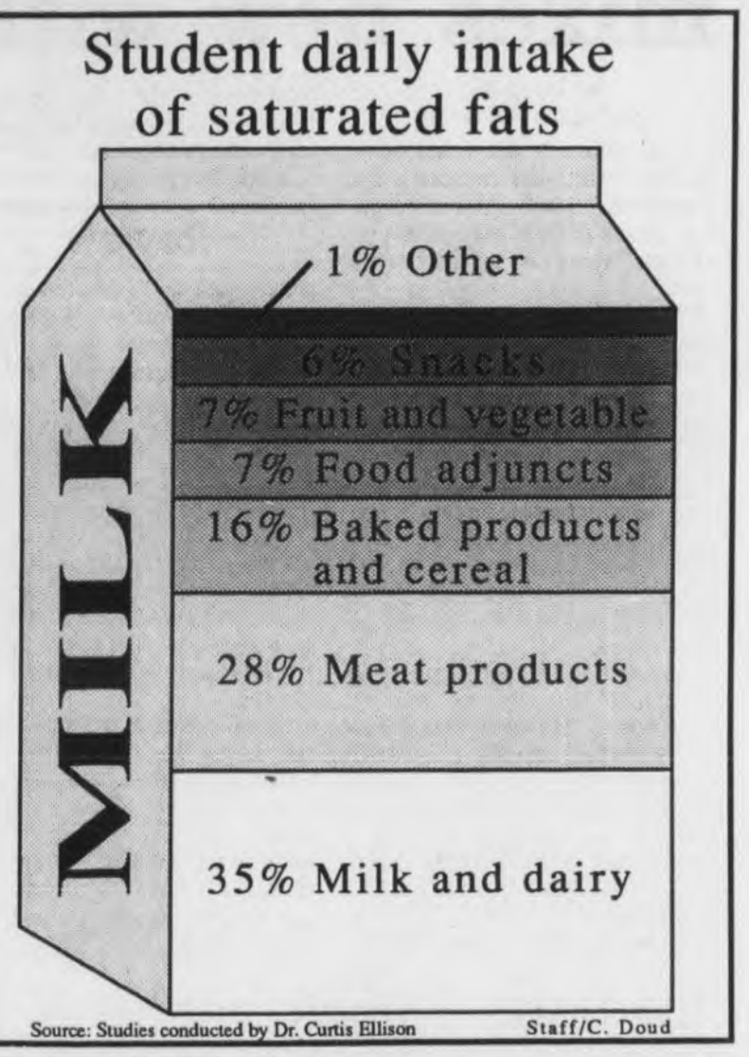
Denise Wiseman, an administrative dietitian for the residence halls, said offering another choice of milk is restricted because of lack of room, but a milk replacement may be possible.

The high content of fat in whole milk is definitely a dietary issue, Wiseman said.

"We are also trying to take out products that contain palm oil, coconut oil and deep fat frying foods that have saturated fats," she said.

The residence hall food service decides the menu changes while trying to accommodate the students' needs. Although there has not been a lot of response from students, Wiseman said 2 percent will probably be offered in the future.

Ora Cowan, Manhattan public schools' food service coordinator and registered dietitian, said the schools have whole milk available because it is a state law. Most of the students, however, drink 2 percent.



"Children under the age of 2 need the extra fat whole milk contains, but I see no danger for older kids intaking 2 percent," Cowan said.

The fat in whole milk is 44 percent of the total calories, she said. The fat in 2 percent milk is 30 percent of the total calories, 1 percent milk contains 21 percent of the total, and skim milk has only 5 percent of the total calories.

Jana Price, instructor at the Early Childhood Laboratory, said the personnel serve 2 percent milk to the children to reduce potential weight problems.

"We serve a lot of milk and children are drinking it all the time," Price said. "We serve 2 percent because of the calorie content."

Graham Parker release mixes new with classics

By Doug Fall
Collegian Reviewer

In an unusually self-reliant move, Graham Parker has released a live solo album, "Live! Alone in America," on the heels of his brilliant yet obscure "Mona Lisa's Sister" of last year.

"Live! Alone in America" was recorded in October during his concert at the Theater of Living Arts in Philadelphia. In the hopes of achieving both a back-to-the-basics sound and the feeling of intimacy with his audience, Parker performed with only his guitar and no back-up band.

Parker achieves both and more. The album is a stunning collection of his old classics mixed with several new songs that trace his long musical career.

Opening this album is a Parker classic, "White Honey," from his first album, "Howlin' Wind." New life is breathed into this gem when it is performed by only Parker and his guitar on stage. One can imagine the effect on an audience watching a single man produce such soulful music with simple strumming and a crooning, raspy voice.

Following "White Honey" are 13 more tunes in the same line as the first. Included are such Parker classics as "Hotel Chambermaid," "You Can't Be Too Strong" and three new pieces, such as "3 Martini Lunch" and "Durban Poison." The last is a hard-hitting blast from Parker against such varied topics as drugs, pollution and apartheid.

Also included in this batch is yet another Sam Cooke cover, "A Change is Gonna Come." Parker's last attempt at Cooke's work, "Cupid," was extremely successful, and this one is no different. Parker is the perfect man to reach back in the bag of soul classics and re-discover these songs. It is obvious to anyone listening that he is earnest in his love for soul.

By no means has Parker abandoned his recent efforts and regressed to living in the past. Besides the three new ones, Parker includes several of his more recent tunes. "Back in Time" is off the studio album "Mona Lisa's Sister." He also includes a terrific version of "Don't Let It Break You Down," which has recently received moderate airplay.

No futile attempt was made by the producer to smooth Parker's performance. Whatever was heard on stage is what the listener hears. Many bands will record over bits of their live performance to yield a better sound. Parker is in a stage of unusual self-reliance and re-touches nothing, the result being an authentic live album.

The between-song banter, while not interesting in itself, is just the kind of thing that sets this album apart as an unusually good live album. Not since U2's "Under a Blood Red Sky" has a band — or in this case, a person — summed up where they stood at a particular point in time with a musical account.

Some people may view Parker's live solo album as a last-ditch effort to win over new fans, an accomplishment which, in large part, has to date eluded him. On the contrary, "Live! Alone in America" is merely Parker with a new sense of direction. Expect bold new steps from this rhythm and blues master in the future.

Iranians hijack yacht of Kuwait royality

By The Associated Press

MANAMA, Bahrain — Iran's navy hijacked an Arab tycoon's yacht with five members of Kuwait's royal family and four Britons aboard and was holding them for ransom, news reports said Sunday.

Government information officers in Kuwait, Bahrain and other gulf states said that they had no information about the incident, which reportedly occurred Thursday.

Independent Television News in Britain quoted diplomatic sources in Kuwait as saying the four Britons are young women who were aboard the 82-foot yacht, owned by Kuwait's al-Sabah royal family.

The report said the yacht apparently was seized for ransom after it strayed into a sensitive area near Iran's northern Farsi island.

It said officials leaked information to the Kuwaiti newspaper Al-Anbaa because Iran's Revolutionary Guards are demanding a ransom and negotiations between Kuwait and Iran are going badly.

Al-Anbaa first reported the story, saying the yacht had come from France and docked briefly at Bahrain, before leaving Thursday. Six hours after it sailed for Kuwait, a distress signal was picked up, said the paper.

Officials at Bahrain's leading yacht club, the Marina Club, said their registers showed a distress signal issued Thursday.

A man speaking English with an Arabic accent said, "My yacht is burning. What can I do?" according to a club official. The caller did not respond to a request for his location.

Late rally secures sweep of Panthers

By Chris Wilhelm
Sports Writer

After defeating the University of Northern Iowa handily, 11-4, in the first game of a doubleheader Sunday afternoon at Frank Myers Field, the Wildcats rallied in the last inning of the second game to overcome a 6-3 deficit and sweep the twinbill from the Panthers.

The 'Cats got a two-run homerun from center fielder Sean Collins and key hits from Jeff Troll, Kevin Kaufman and David Amaro in the bottom of the seventh inning to pull off a 7-6 victory in the second game.

Amaro's hit, a suicide squeeze bunt, came with the score tied at 6-6, the bases loaded and no one out, and scored Russ Ringgenberg for the game-winning run.

The sweep raised the Wildcats to 13-3 on the season.

Steve Dreyer, who started the game for Northern Iowa, was pulled in the seventh inning after giving up a leadoff single. Rod Hulme entered the game and gave up a homerun to Collins on his second pitch to put the score at 6-5. Hulme then gave up a double, a walk and a single before being pulled.

Dennis Hanken finished the game for the Panthers as he struck out Dan Skala with runners at first and third for the first out of the inning. He then intentionally walked Craig Wilson and gave up the squeeze bunt to Amaro that scored the winning run.

In the first game the 'Cats were very aggressive on the base paths, as the players were successful on nine of 10 steal attempts. In the second game, K-State had five less base runners and was only able to steal two bases.

"When a team wins big they sometimes have a tendency to relax a little bit," K-State coach Mike Clark said. "Baseball is a game of percentages and there is a fine line between winning and losing and we can't afford to (relax).

"We might have let up a little too much in the second game but the major difference in the game was their pitcher (Dreyer). He threw very well and we had a hard time adjusting to him. I hope we do a better job of adjusting to the pitcher (in the future)."

Collins had the hot bat for the 'Cats, as he went 6 of 7 at the plate with two homeruns and 7 RBIs. He leads the team in homeruns on the season with five. Collins hit just one homer all of last season.

"Sean Collins is a great athlete and he has been a great addition to this ball club for the year-and-a-half that he has been with our club," Clark said. "I'm real proud of his development.

"I'm also very pleased with the way our kids responded in the second game. We asked some kids to come off the bench that had been sitting down the whole game. We needed them to step up and give us the big play and they came through."

David Hierholzer pitched the first game for K-State, giving up 6 hits, walking 4 and striking out 7 in five complete innings to run his record to 3-0. Bill Schafer notched his first win of the season in the second game, giving up only 1 hit and 1 run over three innings.

"Our offense was a little slow today and we got frustrated in the second game," Clark said. "Coach (Phil) Morgan did an excellent job of keeping us positive. I thought we hit the ball well, we just hit it right at people. The odds say that if you keep hitting the ball hard, sooner or later you'll get a base hit.

"We struggled early in the game; then we panicked; and then we did the things we needed to do late in the game to get the job done and win the game."

Saturday, K-State used a six-run seventh to eventually defeat Creighton, 10-4. Ringgenberg and Skala provided much of the offense on the day for thge Wildcats, punching out three hits apiece. Mike Hedrick relieved K-State starter Jeff Peterson in the sixth and went on to pitch 3⅓ scoreless innings to pick up the victory. Hedrick is now 2-0.

K-State has now won eight of its last nine games.

The Wildcats will be back in action Wednesday when Fort Hays State visits for a doubleheader scheduled for a 1 p.m. start.

Ruggers take 2 in Wichita

Both the A and B sides of the rugby team posted wins Saturday in Wichita.

With the help of Bob Crowe, scrum half, the A side beat the Wichita Rugby Club 26-4.

"Bob just played really well — better than we could have expected," said Tim Dougan, hooker.

The B side beat Garden City Club 12-4.

Duke, Illinois, Michigan, Seton Hall advance

Blue Devils upset Georgetown

From Staff and Wire Reports

The NCAA "Final Four" is set and only one No. 1 seed will make the trip to Seattle next weekend. Illinois, the top seed in the Midwest region, was the only No. 1 seeded team from the four regions to avoid the upset bug as it defeated Syracuse, 89-86, at the Metrodome in Minneapolis.

The Illini will now face fellow Big Ten Conference foe Michigan, which advanced to the national semifinals by defeating Virginia, 102-65, in the Southeast regional final at Rupp Arena in Lexington, Ky.

Seton Hall kept the Big East Conference's title hopes alive with an 84-61 victory over Nevada-Las Vegas in the West regional finals at Denver's McNichol's Arena. Duke filled the last spot in the national semifinals with an 85-77 victory over Georgetown at the Meadowlands in East Rutherford, N.J.

Here is a recap of Sunday's action:

Illinois 89, Syracuse 86

At Minneapolis, Nick Anderson scored 27 points and Kenny Battle 25 as No. 3 Illinois overcame a 13-point deficit and beat No. 7 Syracuse 89-86, advancing to the "Final Four" for the first time in 37 years.

Illinois, 31-4, shed its label as a postseason flop with its victory in the Midwest Regional title game and will play Big Ten Conference rival Michigan in the national semifinals at Seattle next Saturday. Michigan, 28-7, lost to Illinois twice during the regular season by 12 and 16 points.

Anderson scored five points in a 7-2 run that broke the final tie of the game and put Illinois ahead to stay in the final 6½ minutes.

Kendall Gill scored 18 points for Illinois, which denied Syracuse its second "Final Four" trip in three years. Freshman Billy Owens scored 22 points for Syracuse, 30-8. Derrick Coleman and Stephen Thompson scored 17 points each and Sherman Douglas 15.

Anderson, a 6-foot-6 junior, grabbed an offensive rebound and dropped in a shot, giving the Illini a 72-70 lead, and Gill nailed a pull-up jumper at the free throw line, making it 74-70 with 5:38 left.

After Coleman's layup brought Syracuse within two, Anderson sank a free throw, then scored on another offensive rebound for a 77-72 Illinois lead with 5:06 remaining.

Syracuse came within 79-78 on five striaght points by Owens, the last a spinning bank shot with 3:09 remaining. But Kenny Battle scored on an alley oop pass from reserve Larry Smith and Gill came down the lane to dunk the ball after an offense rebound, making it 83-78 with 2:30 to play and Illinois held on.

Duke 85, Georgetown 77

At East Rutherford, Christian Laettner won the battle of freshman centers, hitting nine of his first 10 shots on the way to scoring 24 points and leading Duke into its third NCAA "Final Four" in four years with an 85-77 victory over Georgetown in the East Regional final.

Georgetown's Alonzo Mourning, the 6-foot-10 freshman who almost made the U.S. Olympic team last summer, was limited to 11 points and spent the last five minutes of the game sitting on the bench.

The win by the Blue Devils, 28-7, prevented a "Final Four" made up of two teams each from the Big East and Big Ten conferences. Duke advances to Seattle for a national semifinal matchup against Seton Hall, which beat Nevada-Las Vegas 84-61 Saturday. Illinois and Michigan of the Big Ten meet in the other semifinal.

Georgetown, 29-5, failed in its attempt to get back to Seattle for a repeat of its 1984 national championship there.

Duke, 6-0 in NCAA East Regional games played at the Meadowlands, used three 8-0 spurts in the first 13 minutes of the second half to take a 68-56 lead, and a three-point play by the 6-foot-10 Laettner expanded the margin to 75-61 with 5:41 remaining.

The Hoyas refused to fold, however, scoring the next 12 points and grabbing three of their own missed free throws in the process.

Two free throws by Dwayne Bryant, his only points of the game after scoring 21 against North Carolina State on Friday, completed the run that brought Georgetown within 75-73 with 3:32 left.

The Hoyas couldn't make it all the way back, however, as Duke hit 10 of 12 free throws down the stretch.

NCAA FINAL FOUR

Games: Saturday and Monday.

Trip to Seattle awaits 4 greats

Svoboda on Sports

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Columnist

And then there were four.

With the regional championship games now over, the road to Seattle has been officially paved for a quartet of NCAA basketball powers.

The first to join the Final Four party was Michigan, a most improbable entry. Just 48 hours before the four-game journey to Seattle began for the Wolverines, coach Bill Frieder accepted the position as head basketball coach at Arizona State.

Frieder's timing was heralded as good by some, as incredibly poor by others. The man who counted, however, thought it was horrible. That man, Michigan athletic director Bo Schembechler, relieved Frieder of his duties at Michigan effective immediately, saying he wanted "a Michigan man coaching Michigan."

Frieder wanted to stay on and coach his team, but it simply wasn't to be. That job went to Steve Fisher, and the Wolverines, with Fisher in command on the bench and Glen Rice in charge on the court, knocked off North Carolina in the Southeast Regional semifinal and destroyed Virginia in the final to earn their trip to Seattle.

Fisher is now the first-ever interim coach to take a team to the Final Four.

The second team to make its travel plans was Seton Hall — the school in South Orange, N.J., not the building across from the K-State Union.

The Pirates are members of the Big East Conference, heralded by most as one of the three toughest in college basketball. I find it ironic that it's Seton Hall, and not Georgetown or Syracuse, that will be representing the bad boys from back east in Seattle.

The route through the West Regional was an interesting one for Seton Hall, and it included impressive wins over Indiana and UNLV. The Running Rebels from Las Vegas that were so awesome against No. 1 seed Arizona looked inept against Seton Hall. I've never seen UNLV look inept, so that's saying something.

The first team to enter the field in action Sunday was Illinois, like Michigan a member of the Big Ten, a second of the "Big Three" of basketball conferences.

Illinois won the toughest regional of them all — the Midwest. The Midwest Regional semifinals featured all four top seeds — Illinois, Syracuse, Missouri and Louisville — and the games were all down to the wire.

The clash between Illinois and Syracuse in the final was classic college basketball. When all was said and done, however, Illinois had just one too many weapons. Kendall Gill, Nick Anderson, Kenny Battle, Marcus Liberty and Co. were just too tough.

The trip to the Final Four will be the second for Illinois coach Lou Henson, and his first with Illinois. Illinois, in fact, hasn't been to the big dance in over 30 years, and Seton Hall is just making its second NCAA tourney appearance ever.

That brings us to the veterans of this Final Foursome, the Blue Devils of Duke. This will be the third trip in four years for Danny Ferry and Co., and this time, unlike in 1986 and 1988, they won't be facing the Kansas Jayhawks.

Duke, the No. 2 seed in the East Regional, won its semifinal game with relative ease against Minnesota, and knocked off Georgetown in the final in one of the best games of the year. Duke's Christian Laettner won his "battle of the freshmen centers" with Georgetown's Alonzo Mourning, and Duke was on its way back to another crack at the crown.

The Blue Devils, members of the third dominant conference — the Atlantic Coast — finished second at their conference tourney to North Carolina, only to be where it counts now that the party is down just to four invited guests.

In the semifinals Saturday, it will be Illinois against Michigan and Duke against Seton Hall. All four teams, obviously, are playing their best basketball of the season, or they wouldn't be bound for the Pacific Northwest.

Teams that win championships, however, most often have strong senior leadership. Here's a nod, then — regardless of the fact that it's less than emphatic — for Duke.

Player of the Year Danny Ferry should give the Blue Devils the edge over their competition, and experience under the bright lights and intense pressure that surrounds the event could be the key.

Regardless, the most exciting two-plus weeks in sports should be capped by a great final weekend in Seattle. If you bet on that, you won't lose.

Alaskan oil spill threatens fishermen's income

Declaration of disaster planned

By The Associated Press

VALDEZ, Alaska — Fishermen fearing lost income from the nation's biggest oil spill sought compensation Sunday as Alaska's governor prepared to declare once-pristine Prince William Sound a disaster area.

"We're not ready to absorb any loss," said Riki Ott, spokeswoman for United Fishermen of Alaska. "We expect full compensation."

Exxon Shipping Co. scheduled a meeting Sunday between fishermen and a company claims officer.

Meanwhile, the toll on the sound's abundant wildlife began to mount as efforts continued to clean up the crude oil. The Coast Guard said the slick and patches of oil separated from it were spread over 50 square miles.

Department of Interior spokeswoman Pamela Bergmann said a wildlife specialist sailed in the sound Saturday and observed 75 ducks and two otters coated with oil. They could not be captured for cleaning, she said.

Gov. Steve Cowper planned to declare the area a disaster, and pass on a disaster declaration request to President Bush, said Terence O'Malley, Cowper's deputy press secretary.

The 987-foot tanker Exxon Valdez, carrying 1.2 million barrels of North Slope crude oil loaded at Valdez, ran onto a reef 25 miles from the port early Friday after swinging out of a traffic lane to avoid ice. Valdez is at the southern end of the 800-mile Alaska oil pipeline.

Estimates put the spill at 240,000 barrels of oil, or about 10.1 million gallons, making it the biggest U.S. spill on record. The only larger oil-related accident in U.S. waters was the spilling and burning of up to 10.7 million gallons of oil when two ships collided in Galveston Bay in 1979.

More than four miles of floating boom had been placed in an effort to contain the oil, the Coast Guard said Sunday. An additional 3,000 feet was to be deployed at Galena Bay at the request of fishermen. Skimming boats worked to remove the oil.

The transfer of oil remaining aboard the Exxon Valdez to the Exxon Baton Rouge resumed late Saturday. The Coast guard said about 84,000 gallons of oil an hour was being transferred; at that rate, the unloading could take seven days.

About 11,000 barrels of oil was removed Saturday, but pumping was halted quickly because more oil was leaking.

Tests were under way to determine if dispersal chemicals should be used despite the potential for environmental damage. The agents need wave action to help break up the thick crude oil. Weather had been calm since the accident, but the National Weather Service said the wind was expected to increase to 25 mph and stir up a 5- to 6-foot chop on the sound.

However, the wind and waves may make it more difficult to skim oil off the water, said Coast Guard Lt. Ed Wieliczkiewicz.

An experiment to assess the possibility of burning off the oil was completed early Sunday and the Coast Guard said Exxon officials were "cautiously optimistic."

Environmentalists, the governor and other top state officials have accused Exxon and Alyeska Pipeline Service Co. of responding too slowly to the spill. Alyeska operates the terminal at Valdez that loads tankers with North Slope crude.

Both companies said they were satisfied with the handling of the problem.

"We're proceeding cautiously," said Exxon spokesman Tom Cirigliano. "We want to make sure we don't make any mistakes in cleaning up the spill."

Exxon Shipping Co. President Frank Iarossi said Exxon has reviewed information gathered by divers and determined there are five holes in the vessel's hull on the starboard side. The largest is 20-by-6 feet.

All six tanks along the port side remain intact. Four are oil tanks; two are ballast tanks.

Investigation of the accident was to be turned over to the National Transportation Safety Board on Sunday. The ship's captain, Joseph Hazelwood, and two crew members were relieved of duty Saturday and subpoenaed by the NTSB.

Iarossi said relieving the three was intended to allow them rest and was not a disciplinary measure. Hazelwood was in his cabin at the time of the accident, Iarossi said. One of the subpoenaed crewmen was on watch and the other was helmsman.

The spill came at a time when Prince William Sound fishermen were preparing for the herring season, which is followed by harvests of shellfish and salmon.

"Wings of Desire"
This movie is as much a re-examination of the divided city of Berlin and its almost spectral inhabitants, as it is a thoroughly romantic love story. Daniel, played by Bruno Ganz, is an angel who has grown tired and frustrated of his inability to affect the people over whom he watches in his weightless existence. Visiting a traveling circus, he encounters a beautiful trapeze artist with whom he immediately falls in love, and decides to leave the heavens and enter the mortal world of earthly delights. The reserve parachute is packed by a Federal Aviation Administration licensed rigger and is inspected and repacked every 120 days, regardless if it has been used, said Ed Goff, instructor for the club. Goff is certified by the United States Parachuting Administration.

"That reserve had just come back from a repack cycle earlier in the week," Goff said.

Participants in the club are required to take part in a two-part training course, he said. The first is classroom study covering all aspects of the jump. The second is practical training at the airport the day of the jump and includes emergency procedures. The courses take about four hours each.

The club has been using the canopy type of parachutes which Marvel used for about three-and-a-half years, and Marvel was the first first-jump student who has had to use the reserve parachute, he said.

Four loads of experienced jumpers had successfully completed jumps prior to Marvel's jump, Dawes said.

According to the Pottawatomie County Sheriff's Office report, Marvel landed in a field 200 yards southeast of the Wamego Airport Hangar at 2:40 p.m. He was transported by ambulance to Wamego City Hospital and died at 3:38 p.m.

had planned to drive the fire engine to a repair shop to have some work performed on the brakes prior to returning it to Manhattan.

Pike President Monty McClain said the fire engine has been used for "public relations purposes" in the past.

McClain, junior in finance, said he did not know about the condition of the fire engine.

"That's the least of our worries," he said.

tainment fee would be a "fairer fee." An entertainment fee would provide support for both athletics and the McCain Series.

"(An entertainment fee would have) benefits for virtually everybody," Anderson said.

Cultural events on campus are an important aspect of university life, and an entertainment fee would "support the athletic side and the cultural side," Anderson said.

An entertainment fee would help "buy down" the cost of McCain events for students, as the athletic fee would for the cost of sports events, he said.

The athletic fee alone will benefit students because, if the athletic program can be strengthened to the point of filling the football stadium, it would economically benefit the University, Manhattan and the state, Anderson said.

The fee would also benefit students by providing good publicity for the University, he said. Studies show that athletic programs are something people consider when selecting a school to attend.

A strong McCain Series would also attract more interest in the University and the area and have a positive economic impact, Anderson said.

Is Athletics one of the windows through which a University is judged?

During the 1987-88 & 1988-89 basketball seasons, the Kansas State Academic Image Tape was shown 37 times on National, Regional and State networks at no cost to Kansas State. If the University were to pay for airtime it would have cost $1.2 million.

(Prices obtained from CBS, Raycom, ESPN and WIBW television networks.)

Low attendance causes concern for future shows

By Nancy Prosser
Staff Writer

Poor attendance at concerts in Bramlage Coliseum has created concern over the possibility of scheduling future shows, said Charlie Thomas, coliseum director.

Thomas said the group Def Leppard was one of the few shows that has made money this year.

"The coliseum was filled to overflowing for that show," Thomas said. "But groups like that don't go through Manhattan very often."

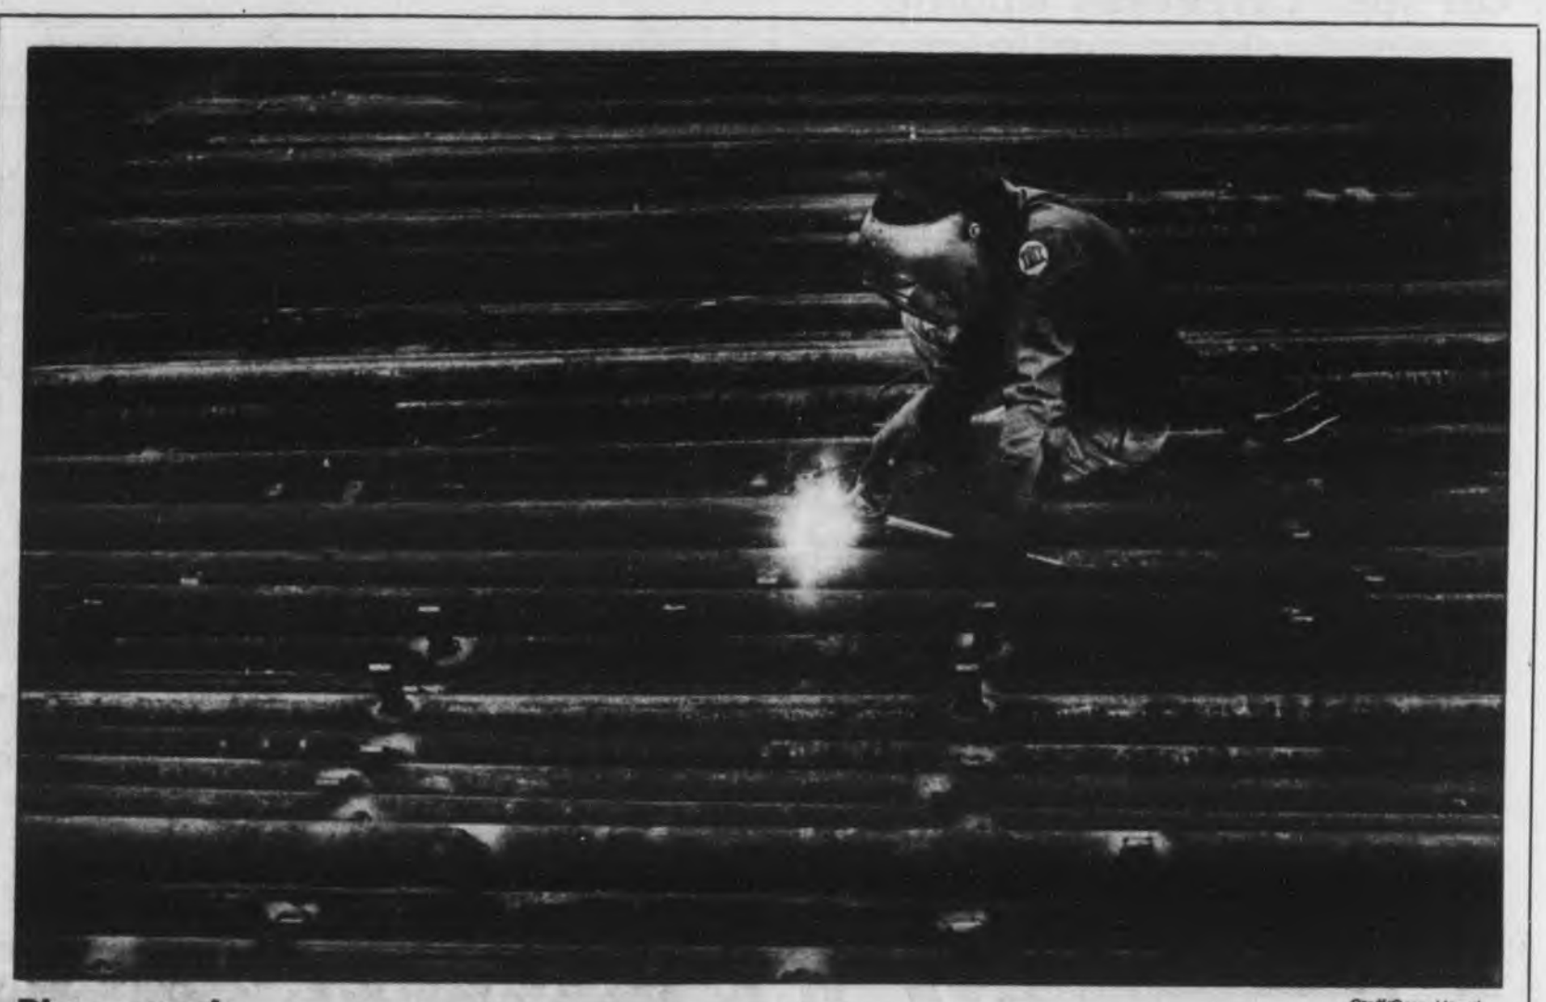
When Thomas learns a group is going to be in the area, he contacts an agent to see if the group will play in Manhattan. Bramlage pays the performer to come, then determines ticket prices.

"Determining ticket prices is a guessing game," Thomas said. "You have to make sure ticket prices are low enough that people will come, yet you can't price yourself out of the game.

"We are not meeting the break-even point with either Chicago or Eddie Money. Both of these are excellent shows."

Eighty percent to 90 percent of touring acts are controlled by 10 agencies, Thomas said.

Thomas books concerts through Contemporary International Production Corporation in St. Louis, Mo.



"There is a population for the concerts out there because Manhattan can pull people from Topeka, Salina and other surrounding areas," said Kevin Dochtermann, director of concerts and special projects for Contemporary.

"I have no doubt that the staff at Bramlage is doing its job, the student body is just not supporting its coliseum," he said. "I get very nervous bringing a show into Manhattan, because it has proven itself to be a big risk.

"What students don't understand is that if (the booking agents) perceive Manhattan as an undesirable market because of slow attendance or the cancelling of shows, they won't bring performers into Bramlage."

"So far we have dealt with more

Senate bill calls for divestment of monies

By Karen Allen
Staff Writer

KSU Foundation officials who have been "waiting for students to act" on the issue of divestment may not have to wait much longer.

A bill to be introduced in Student Senate tonight calls for Senate to adopt the ethical investment policy drafted by the Ad Hoc Committee on Investigation of Investments of Student Funds, and to act on that policy by divesting all student monies from companies doing business in South Africa.

"We're waiting for Student Senate to tell us what to do," said Art Loub, Foundation president. "If that's what they want, then that's fine. I'm sure there will be no problem (with divestment of student funds)."

Charles Reagan, assistant to the president, echoed Loub's comments Sunday at a Students for Educational Awareness meeting.

"If there is going to be a change in how student funds are used, then (the change) has to come from Student Senate," Reagan said. "... My guess is that the Foundation will be very receptive to immediately moving the student money."

He said he also believed the Foundation would be willing to look into other options for re-investment of non-student monies, but either way the issue is "not going to be dismissed out of hand."

While not an official member of the Foundation's executive committee, Reagan said he attends the executive meetings with President Jon Wefald, who is an ex-officio member.

The ad hoc committee is calling for the divestment of about $10,000 in student monies invested in companies doing business in South Africa because "blacks in South Africa are overwhelmingly (requesting) this," said Michel Cavigelli, committee chairman.

"It can lead to the breaking apart of apartheid," he said.

Apartheid means "separateness" in Afrikaan, and is the racially discriminatory form of government which was implemented by law in South Africa in 1948.

Cavigelli arrived at the monetary amount after cross-referencing information from the Investor Responsibility Research Center, a non-profit corporation that researches the activities of businesses, with information provided by the Common Fund, a non-profit investment management service for colleges and universities.

The Foundation invests the majority of its money through the Common Fund, which offers several different investment options, including a South African-free option.

Reagan said that option has never been considered because the Foundation has been "satisfied" with its investment decisions until now and because "until a month ago — (divestment) was not an issue on this campus."

But the issue has been brought up at the University at least twice before. In 1985, the Foundation executive committee announced it was against apartheid. But in August 1987, Les Longberg, controller at the Foundation, told a Collegian writer that apartheid could only influence the Foundation to divest "only insofar as it affects the safety and security of investments," or the maximum return on investments.

Cavigelli insisted that "money is not the issue." Rather, the issue is determining what is or isn't an ethical investment, he said, and that is why the committee's report to Senate includes the number of U.S. companies with investments in South Africa, but not how much is invested.

The total number of U.S. companies with direct investments or employees in South Africa is 138, with K-State funds invested in 60 companies, according to the committee's findings.

Further investigation revealed the total number of U.S. companies with non-equity links to South Africa is 151, and the number of those companies K-State invested in is 68.

A non-equity link is defined by the committee as "the licensing, management, technology and trademark-use agreements between U.S. corporations and South African companies."

Companies with non-equity links are important because although they have no employees or assets in South Africa and claim they have withdrawn from the country, the apartheid regime retains "the benefits of doing business" with those companies, according to the committee's reports.

"You have to understand how the companies support apartheid," Cavigelli said. Although some companies claim their investments are helping the divided nation, the "balance (of investments) is really bad," he said. "They are clearly doing more bad than good."

Only a small percentage of what companies have invested in South Africa goes toward community development projects, Cavigelli said. The majority of the investments adds to the government's tax money.

Reagan responded to students' concerns about the possibility of the Foundation taking its time on the issue and stalling until students leave for summer break.

"Things are going in the right direction," he said. "They're not

Cuffy says University must divest from South Africa

By Karen Allen
Staff Writer

Student Body President Laurian Cuffy said he plans to tell the KSU Foundation Executive Committee today at its monthly meeting that "to be on the cutting edge" the University must divest from companies doing business in South Africa.

"We need not be in the woodwork waiting to see what everyone else is doing," he said.

Michel Cavigelli, chairman of a Student Senate committee that is investigating the Foundation's current investment policies, said he knew of 112 other colleges and universities that have divested.

"As an institution we have an obligation to take a high moral posture on certain issues," Cuffy said. "The administration must take a look at this issue ... and do everything in its energy to make a statement against the oppressive government (of South Africa)."

Cuffy said he sees the University as an institution with the ability to "mold and groom" those who pursue a degree here, and that deciding to divest would be an opportunity to "influence those individuals."

"It's hypocritical to say one thing and do something else," he said.

Regardless of whether divestment will end the apartheid regime in South Africa, the University should divest anyway, Cuffy said.

"It's not about whether dollar signs will bring down the system," he said. " ... Regardless of whether it works, if you've searched within yourself (and decided it was wrong), you should do it."

Track team urged to encourage voting

By Alan Wilds
Staff Writer

About 350 students paraded from Ahearn Field House to the K-State Union at 3:30 p.m. Monday with the track team to cast their vote on the student athletic fee.

Track Coach John Capriotti said he told each member of the team to bring five friends with them as a means of encouraging students to voice their opinion in the student referendum.

"This is my way of trying to help the athletic department," Capriotti said. "It provides unity."

He said the request falls "halfway in-between" being voluntary and mandatory for the team.

"If they didn't do it, we would just go about our business," Capriotti said.

He said he wanted students to "vote their conscience."

"Hopefully, they will vote yes, but I just want them to vote," Capriotti said. "It needs to be decided one way or the other."

He said some team members had problems getting five of their friends to vote due to scheduling conflicts or already having voted.

All but two or three members of the track team turned out for the Senate bill may initiate athletic fee

By Darren Keller
Collegian Reporter

If students do not pass the proposed athletic fee, Student Senate might.

If the referendum fails but the student vote is close, a bill to be discussed at tonight's Senate meeting would place the athletic fee on the agenda for reconsideration by Student Senate.

If passed, the bill would allow Senate to implement the athletic fee regardless of the outcome of the student body vote, but that would not necessarily be the reason behind the bill, said Todd Johnson, Senate chairman.

"If it's close (the outcome of the student vote) then (the bill) would provide Student Senate an avenue for extending discussion on the fee," Johnson said. "This doesn't necessarily mean we will pass it or fail it, but we can discuss it more."

"This doesn't necessarily mean we will pass it or fail it, but we can discuss it more."

—Todd Johnson Student Senate chairman

If the vote fails by a landslide, the fee will stand as decided in the vote, said Johnson, who predicted that the ballots for the fee should be tabulated by 8:00 or 8:30 tonight.

A "controversial bill" regarding the ad hoc committee on the ethical investment of student funds will also be discussed, Johnson said.

The bill makes five recommendations:

■ Ethical divestment of all student monies from companies doing business in South Africa.

■ More responsibility on the part of Student Senate in the decision-making process of its investments.

■ A request be made for representation on the KSU Foundation Executive Committee.

■ Establishment of a standing committee on ethics to oversee student government matters concerning ethics.

■ Senate adoption of the ethical investment policy drafted by the ad hoc committee.

First readings will be heard of a bill requesting a special allocation to the K-State marching band for 225 new uniforms.

The total price of the uniforms is about $70,000. The marching band plans to raise around $50,000 from fund-raising activities — a telefund and its annual fall Music Run.

The bill requests that Senate allocate the difference between the band's earnings and the initial cost of the uniforms, providing that cost doesn't exceed $20,000.

The money would come from the SGA Foundation account, which is interest earned from the Endowment Association account.

The Endowment account holds any "extra" Senate money that is not money from student fees.

Student Senate meets at 7 tonight in the Union Big Eight Room.

Ueberroth may buy Eastern

NEW YORK — Peter V. Ueberroth, the financial wizard who made millions for the Olympics and baseball, is discussing a purchase of Eastern Airlines in a deal to be financed by Kirk Kerkorian, The Associated Press learned Monday.

An offer from Ueberroth and Kerkorian may be presented to the board of directors of Eastern parent Texas Air Corp. within the next few days, airline and baseball sources said on condition of anonymity. Ueberroth's term as baseball commissioner ends Saturday.

The Texas Air board is holding a regularly scheduled meeting today and Wednesday, said a source close to the company. Texas Air spokesman Art Kent in Houston refused to comment on whether a board meeting was scheduled.

Ueberroth was approached last fall by officials of Eastern's unions to consider taking over the troubled airline, which filed for bankruptcy protection March 9, five days after the start of a machinists' strike that was supported by airline pilots.

The unions have said they would make concessions if Ueberroth took over.

Oil spill threatens wildlife

WASHINGTON — The massive oil spill that threatens waterfowl and fish off the Alaska coast is expected to give ammunition to environmentalists fighting to keep oil developers out of a pristine arctic wildlife refuge.

Congress must approve oil exploration in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge in northeastern Alaska where the petroleum industry believes much oil is hidden.

President Bush endorsed oil drilling along a 1.5 million acre coastal strip of the refuge if it can be done within environmental guidelines, and legislation allowing exploration passed a Senate committee earlier this month.

But aides for senators on both sides of the issue suggested Monday that the momentum is likely to slow considerably in light of the accident involving the tanker Exxon Valdez and the oil spill in the environmentally sensitive Prince William Sound.

City may legalize gambling

LORAIN, Ohio — This city on Lake Erie is moving closer to becoming the third area in the country with legalized casino gambling, but residents still disagree whether a casino would be a blessing or a curse.

Lorain, an economically struggling and largely blue-collar city of 72,000 people, would have a referendum on the issue under the proposal the state House approved March 15.

"It would make more work and brighten this little town up," said Herman Ricks, 50, a 27-year employee at Ford Motor Co.'s Lorain Assembly Plant.

But Linda Hamilton, 32, a mother of two, said she may already start to fight against the proposal.

Activists mark accident

HARRISBURG, Pa. — Anti-nuclear activists marked the 10th anniversary of the Three Mile Island nuclear plant accident with renewed warnings Monday that the health effects were hidden and the lessons forgotten.

Scientists and nearby residents had a news conferences at the state Capitol and a vigil was planned outside the plant late Monday and for 4 a.m. today, the time the accident began.

"The so-called accident at TMI was an act of violence againt mankind, an act of violence against the unborn," said Jane Lee, an activist from nearby Etters, referring to the March 28, 1979, incident.

The nation's worst nuclear accident occurred when a series of human and mechnical errors allowed the plant's 150-ton radioactive core to lose cooling water. Half the core melted and 20 tons of molten material raced to the bottom of the reactor before it was held in check by a remaining pool of water. Radioactive gas was released to the atmosphere.

"This marks a decade of false denials and outright lies on the part of the utility that owns and operates Three Mile Island ... and on the part of the state of Pennsylvania, which has systemically obfuscated and hidden any real statistics about the deaths that have occurred in the wake of the accident at TMI," said Harvey Wasserman, who wrote a book, "Killing Our Own," about the health effects of nuclear power.

Bond set in Piper slaying

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — A judge ordered Tambi Lewis jailed under $50,000 bond Monday for her alleged role in aiding a man accused in the slaying of Piper High School student Syndi Bierman.

Assistant District Attorney Mike Grosko said Lewis did not make bond and was being held in the Wyandotte County Jail.

A lawyer will be appointed to represent Lewis, 18. During her first appearance Monday, she told the court she wanted to testify at Tuesday's preliminary hearing for Archie E. Owens Jr., 20, and Shari Bierman.

Both Owens and Bierman, 20, the victim's sister, already have been charged with first-degree murder in Syndi's Feb. 19 beating and stabbing death.

Soldiers to meet at Riley

FORT RILEY — About 100 soldiers from West Germany are spending two weeks at Fort Riley, learning how to fight "shoulder to shoulder" with their American counterparts.

Most of the Germans are fresh from boot camp, and they came to the big Army base in east-central Kansas as part of an exchange program. Fort Riley sent about 100 soldiers from the 2nd Battalion, 16th Infantry, to train in Germany.

Petition not to be reviewed

Senator believes referendum to be illegal

By Kendra Gensemer
Government Editor

Student Tribunal on Monday decided not to consider a petition submitted by Student Senator Travis Stumpff charging that the athletic fee referendum process is unconstitutional.

Stumpff, junior in political science, said he believes the referendum is illegal because Senate did not authorize the color-coded ballots, and because the Elections Committee, whose term expired last semester, is conducting the election.

Tribunal decided the petition signed by 54 students and submitted by Stumpff was invalid because the issue was not stated at the top of the petition.

"It can very easily be said that these people had signed a piece of paper not knowing what they were signing," said Rob Dieringer, chancellor of Student Tribunal.

The SGA Constitution states that Tribunal can be called for constitutional interpretations with a petition signed by 50 students.

Stumpff said he did not include specifics because the issues involved were subject to change and because he was not informed by any advisers of the requirement.

He said he plans to include the issues on a second-try petition asking Tribunal to rule on the issue.

The use of color-coded ballots is "a means of segregating votes by college," and Stumpff said a Tribunal ruling earlier this semester, which declared that separate graduate and undergraduate voting was unconstitutional, set a precedent disallowing separate votes and ballots.

The color coding infringes on the secret ballot and intimidates students because it reveals the colleges in which they are enrolled, he said.

Stumpff expressed concern that the statistics will be used "to support the fee in any further endeavors (to gain a student athletic fee)."

Sally Routson, coordinator of student activities, said color coding the ballots makes validating the results easier and provides useful statistics information.

Ballots are compared with a computer printout of the results and voter signature notebooks, and must be within 1 percent of either, Routson said.

The statistical information has been included on previous ballots for media use and Senate reports, she said.

Stumpff said the election should be voided because an Elections Committee that "does not exist" is conducting the election.

He said the Elections Committee's term expired three weeks after the Student Governing Association general elections last semester and is therefore not authorized to conduct the referendum.

Routson said no one is technically responsible for the referendum because SGA is caught between the old Constitution and the revised Constitution approved last semester by Student Senate which has yet to be approved by the college councils.

The old Constitution states that all elections and referendums are the responsibility of the Elections Committee, she said. The revised Constitution gives that power to Senate Operations Committee, which oversees the Elections Committee.

"In my opinion, it's Senate (Operations) that is in charge of the referendum," Routson said.

Dieringer said Tribunal would hear complaints at a later date if a more formal petition and presentation were submitted with specific issues stated.

Soviets elect anti-establishment candidates

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — Boris N. Yeltsin and other anti-establishment candidates rode a wave of popular discontent to victory in parliamentary elections that gave Soviet voters their first real choice, according to incomplete results Monday.

The candidates chosen in nationwide elections Sunday will join those picked earlier by the Communist Party and other organizations in a new 2,250-member Congress of People's Deputies. The parliament is still certain to be dominated by the ruling party and an entrenched Kremlin leadership that assured itself of seats without having to face opposition at the polls.

But Yeltsin's landslide victory and the triumph of other independent-minded candidates indicated widespread dissatisfaction with chronic shortages of food and consumer goods, rising prices and the bureaucracy's control of Soviet life.

Yeltsin, the tough-talking, 58-year-old former Moscow party boss, had campaigned to cheering crowds against the special privileges afforded the party elite at a time when most people can find practically nothing in their stores.

Igor N. Orlov, chairman of Moscow's election commission, said the burly, one-time Gorbachev protege amassed 89.4 percent of the vote against Yevgeny Brakov, a factory director, in a race for a seat to represent all of Moscow.

Brakov, 51, who also campaigned for improvements in the food supply but whose factory makes the ZIL limousines that symbolize privilege, received just 6.9 percent of the vote, Orlov said. Voters also had the option of voting against them by crossing their names off the ballot.

Yeltsin's win marked a stunning political comeback following his dramatic fall from grace in 1987, when he was ousted as Moscow party chief and later fired as a non-voting member of the ruling Politburo. He was accused of political mistakes and personal ambition after he criticized his fellow leaders.

Nunnery popularity increases in America

Last Friday, the Exxon Valdez oil tanker hit a reef near the Alaskan coast, spilling more than 10 million gallons of crude oil into Prince William Sound.

And what do you suppose was Exxon's first act in the emergency? Save the fish? Save the birds? Save the seals? Nope.

Exxon gave all crew members a drug and alcohol test.

Many have compared the 1950s to the present decade because of the similarly conservative political moods and social stagnation of both times. But perhaps the most interesting similarity between the two decades was pointed out by that poignant social critic Dan Quayle when he accused the Senate of employing "McCarthyism" in its attacks upon party-midget John Tower.

As always, Quayle is wrong. McCarthyism means impugning the patriotism and loyalty of political opponents by lies and innuendos.

For example, the insinuation that someone is a subversive because he carries an American Civil Liberties Union card or because he doesn't salute the flag at every opportunity would be McCarthyism.

But Quayle, as painful as it is to admit, is partially right. Drinkers, dope smokers and sex fiends are to the '80s what commie subversives were to the '50s: boogiemen hiding under every bed, ready to steal your wife, turn your kids against you, and infiltrate high levels of government.

The Senate Armed Services Committee and Chairman Sam Nunn's attacks upon John Tower were not truly McCarthyistic. But by creating such an unrealistic standard of moral purity, and attacking everything that falls short of it, the Senate has given a fitting name to the nationwide groundswell of puritan paranoia — Nunnery.

Nunnery occurs when certain morally corrupt individuals are singled out as responsible for any and all national problems and crises as a means of limiting discourse on the true nature of these problems.

Just as the attacks upon Tower masked the general carousing and debauchery of the Senate, the war on drugs, directed at drug pushers and "kingpins," ignores the obvious fact that someone out there is actually buying this stuff.

What makes Nunnery more dangerous than McCarthyism is that the problem that Nunnery addresses is a real and widespread

Commentary

Collegian Columnist

one, not an imagined one of pinkos emerging from pods. Barry Goldwater, another conservative with whom I am forced to agree, pointed out that if every member of the government had been subjected to the Tower test for moral purity, there wouldn't be a government left.

The same goes for the rest of America. If everyone who has ever done drugs, got stinking drunk, or engaged in indiscriminate bed-hopping stopped voting, there wouldn't be an electorate left. Under these situations, politicians find it best to employ Nunnery.

With Nunnery, the electorate isn't offended. The drug problem can be attributed entirely to a handful of oily south-of-the-border smugglers, regardless of the fact that George Bush, Dan Quayle and the NRA have done more than their share to arm them with AK-47s.

Drinking problem? Nunnery tells you that its not your fault. You were just brainwashed into thinking that drinking is fashionable by some sleazy Hollywood movie that dared make light of demon gin.

Moreover, the finger pointing of Nunnery has a way of bringing out the very worst in everyone. For example, back when William Bennett was Secretary of Education, he met strong opposition every time he tried to eliminate millions of dollars in financial aid. Now, thanks to his new role as "Drug Czar" and chief advocate of Nunnery, he can take away financial aid from left-wing college punks who pay their pushers with PELL Grants.

The war on drugs is also an excellent excuse to throw more minorities in jail and gentrify their crack houses for yuppies, who can afford real coke. The frequent portrayal of drug pushers as thuggish Latinos who pollute our shores with "unwanted" drugs highlights America's xenophobia with unyielding clarity.

Of course, the ugliest aspect of Nunnery is the zeal for drug testing. Granted, some jobs justify drug testing, as it would probably bring most folks greater peace of mind to know that airline pilots and air traffic controllers aren't hallucinating.

But when I see the sign on the door at Wal-Mart that informs me that all employees are tested for drugs, I'm not exactly overcome with relief. Oh sure, the shelves are probably more orderly. And, thank heavens, there's no freebasing going on in the automotive department.

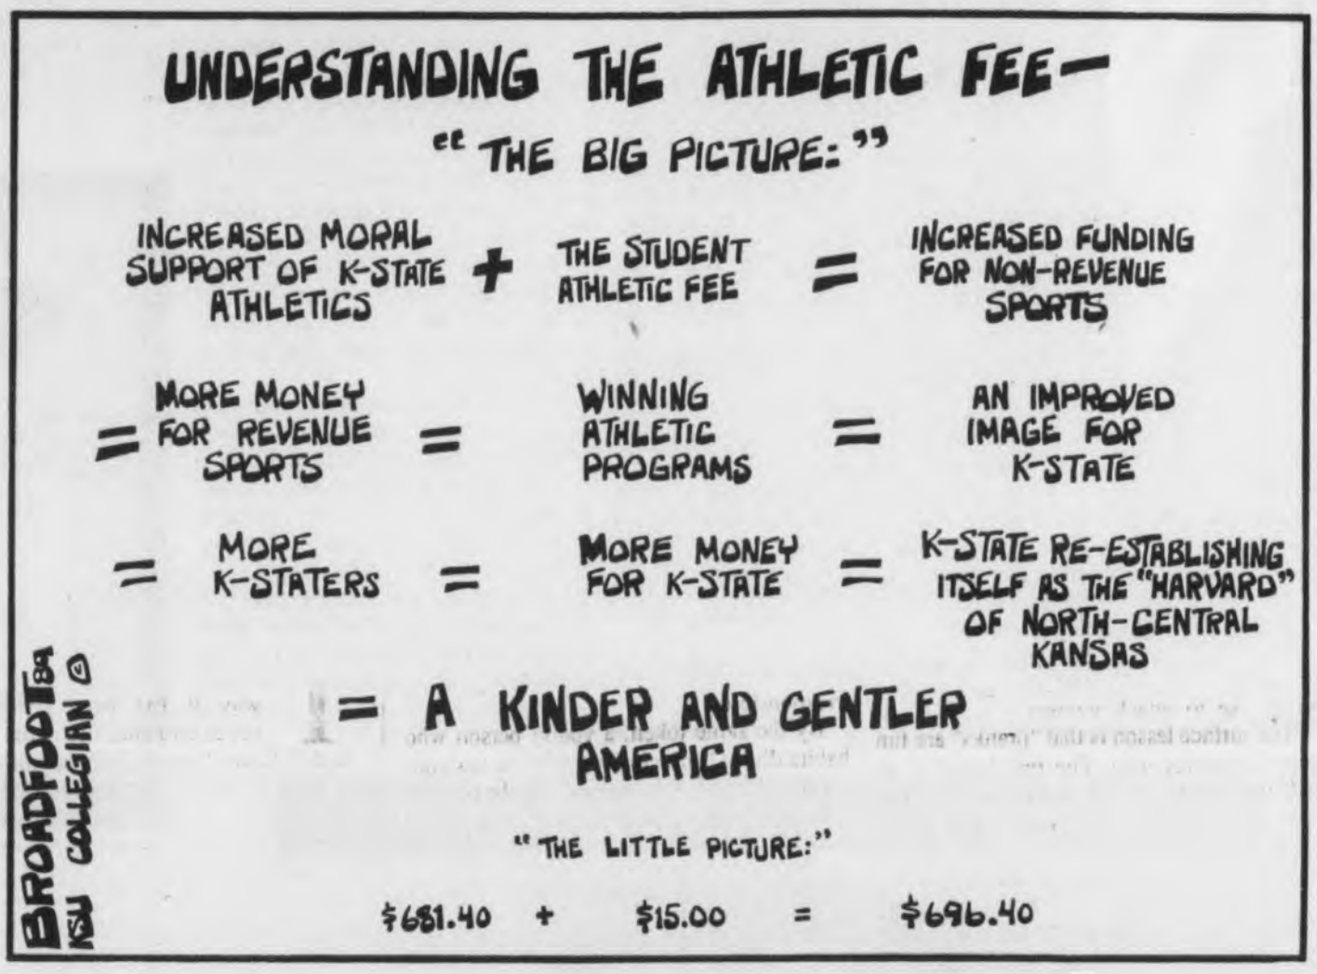
But the fact that employers are now allowed to enforce their sense of morality upon employees is, dare I say, Orwellian. And if you don't think that's scary, listen to what the White House had to say about drug testing a few years ago:

"We believe the American people, under voluntary testing, would certainly want to, in many cases, step forward. And those who don't, as in some cases, and are obviously on drugs, would certainly find a certain amount of peer pressure particularly as we make progress in the area of cleaning up the workplace."

Voting on fee today important for K-State

Today is the last day. The last day for K-Staters to take actual part in deciding how much their tuition will be the following year.

The athletic fee referendum has created a great deal of controversy. Throughout the last few weeks, rumors and allegations have flown, public debates have occurred, emergency Student Senate meetings have been called and advertising has been prolific throughout campus.



Yet the sad part of it all, despite the heated controversy and all the campaigning, the number of students who actually vote on the issue is likely to be small.

An issue brought to referendum that deals with this much student money is a large responsibility for all students. This is the chance to voice opinions on how student dollars are spent, and if they should be increased. Student Senate has turned the responsibility for investigating this fee and determining its worth over to the campus. It can only be hoped that this time the students won't be disappointed.

If you like the athletic fee, vote. If you hate it, vote. If you don't really give a damn either way, take the time to be informed, call the Student Senate hotline, read the newspaper, call your senator and develop an informed opinion, then vote.

Don't wait until fee payment next year to realize that fees have increased a substantial amount and then start to complain. If you don't like the idea, or even if you like it, now is the time to act.

Apathy is no excuse. The University must be supported by its students, all of its students, not just a small vocal minority.

Election exemplifies democratic progress

It took more than 70 years, but the Soviets were finally given a choice, and millions of voters turned out at the polling place to savor the change.

Millions of voters elected 1,500 members to the Congress of People's Deputies, which will choose the new president and elect almost 400 of its members to the Supreme Soviet, the Soviet Union's legislature.

In a country that has been dominated by the Communist Party, the election marked a revolutionary change in Soviet politics. Before, the party had allowed only one candidate to run for each seat. On Sunday, seats were contested by two or more candidates in 74 percent of the districts.

However, according to the Moscow News, 82 percent of those running were Communist Party members, which indicates that it is unlikely that the elections will produce any major social or political upheaval.

But the choices provided by the election obviously mean something to those Soviets, for example, who live in the country's second largest city, Leningrad, where the Communist Party chief lost to a shipbuilder who took 74 percent of the vote. It also meant something to the citizens in Kiev, the capital of the Ukraine and the Soviet Union's third largest city, where the regional party chief was defeated.

The Soviet Union isn't going to suddenly become capitalist with this one election. But it can be democratic.

Nicaragua gets bad reputation

Commentary

Kale Baldock

Contributing Columnist

Announcing that Nicaraguan President Daniel Ortega was to "change his ways," the "NBC Nightly News" played right along with government and media standards of representing Nicaragua as being the obstacle to peace in Central America when reporting the summit meeting between the presidents of four Central American countries on Feb. 13.

Although infuriating to those who are knowledgeable on the Central American situation, this is not in the least bit surprising. This is the same media, after all, which so evenhandedly talk of the "leftist Sandinista government" and the "Marxist-Leninist government of Nicaragua," without a breath reserved for a description resembling the "rightist, capitalist, puppet-for-a-front, military death squad governments of El Salvador, Honduras, and Guatemala." Nay, the only appelation the media accord these last three is "democracies."

Of course the media have had outstanding mentors from which to learn about the situation. There was Secretary of State George Schultz, who as a Landon Lecturer at K-State said, "The Sandinistas are a cancer that must be cut out or eliminated."

There was Schultz's sidekick and lap dog, Assistant Secretary of State Elliot Abrams, who cunningly appealed to the American public on behalf of the Nicaraguan people who were "betrayed by a small band of Marxist-Leninists" who were spreading "terrorism" and "subversion" throughout Latin America. It's funny how after seeing their health and education standards rise even during a time of war, the Nicaraguan people felt so "betrayed" that more than 60 percent of them voted the Sandinistas back into power.

And who can forget the godfather of disinformation himself, the all-exaulted cyclops of the Republican Party (or should that be Imperial Wizard?), Ronald Reagan? The idiocies and outright lies that spewed from his mouth were innumerable.

Although Nicaragua was awarded recognition by the World Health Organization in 1982 as having made the most progress of any Third World country, and although the Sandinistas did not kidnap, torture and murder political opponents as was (and is) done in U.S.-backed El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, and by the Contras, Reagan characterized the Sandinista regime as being "worse than its predecessor," the U.S.-backed dictator Somoza, whose rampant brutality led to the revolution in the first place.

Speaking as if U.S. military aid to the Contras, and to the Salvadoran and Guatemalan military forces, was simply a figment of our nation's imagination, Reagan vowed, "we can and will — with all the resources of diplomacy — protect each country of Central America from the danger of war."

You know those Contras based in Honduras all those years? They didn't exist either. "Nicaragua's dictatorial junta," claimed Reagan, "likes to pretend they are today being attacked by forces based in Honduras."

Now that the Central American presidents are again meeting to discuss how to bring peace to the region, it is useful to look back at how the last regional peace plan was implemented in order to make an educated speculation as to how things will go this time around.

In 1988 the Latin American Studies Association's report on compliance with the Central American Peace Accord, co-authored by K-State professor Jan Flora and KU professor Charles Stansifer along with 15 other Latin America scholars, gives a very detailed assessment of which of the Central American nations did what toward complying with the peace plan.

Of course, no one could have imagined it possible from listening to the Reagan administration and the media describe the same situation, but the commission found that in most cases Nicaragua took more genuine steps toward complying with the plan than any other country.

Although none of the countries performed very impressively on several of the plan's 11 major points, and despite Nicaragua receiving condemnation a few times, the infractions on the part of El Salvador and Guatemala were significantly more numerous and definitely more serious.

Cease-fire discussions between government and rebel parties bore fruit only in Nicaragua, where a general cease-fire has been observed without many violations for more than a year.

The Sandinistas allowed the opposition radio station, "Radio Catolica," and the opposition newspaper, "La Prensa," to reopen, despite evidence that the CIA had funded the latter in its spread of disinformation aimed at destabilizing the government.

The wartime state of emergency was lifted in Nicaragua, and the popular Anti-Somozista tribunals dealing with counterrevolutionary activity were abolished.

Meanwhile, in El Salvador and Guatemala, the situation remained too dangerous for refugees to safely return, and "Honduras and El Salvador appeared particularly hostile to verification (of compliance with the peace plan) by parties from outside the region."

At the Feb. 13 meeting in San Salvador, El Salvador, President Ortega announced that the Sandinistas would move the country's next election ahead from November to February of 1990.

Opposition parties, he said, would be given equal access to media sources. No restrictions are to be placed on political rallies. Imprisoned members of Somoza's National Guard, who terrorized the Nicaraguan population before and during the revolution, would be released if the Contras were totally and permanently disbanded.

Since the time of this pronouncement, nearly all of these prisoners have been released, even though the Contras have not been disbanded.

El Salvador deserves some credit for allowing the major political opposition figures to stay alive during the recent election campaign. However, the number of death squad attacks on civilians has increased, so it's a trade-off, or in Reagan-Bush jargon, "democracy."

If history is any indication of things to come, then we can expect a repeat performance from the Central American countries this time around, with Nicaragua's steps of good faith being condemned as "a trick" (Elliot Abrams), and the failures of the other countries going unnoticed.

English needed

Editor,

I believe we need an article on our lack of basic English courses. I struggled through Composition I and II because of being out of school for 30 years.

I tried to find a basic English course. There was none. This is not just my problem alone. The School of Journalism and Mass Communications conducted an English test and 60 percent of the students failed. I believe this would hold true throughout the student body.

I have talked to David Smit and Robert Grindell of the English department. The problem seems to be lack of money. I believe there must be a way to raise the money.

English is so important. I would have been willing to pay $40 a semester for it. Without good English, we will not be as effective after graduation.

Cartoon rape sign

Editor,

I am appalled by the cartoon, signed Broadfoot, that ran March 10. This cartoon depicted a male studying in three frames, and on the beach with a beer and a piece of a woman's swimsuit in the fourth. The woman has run part of the way out of the frame trailing the sound, "EEK!"

This cartoon is what is classified as a "rape sign," a lesson about rape in which neither the teacher (the cartoonist and yourselves as purveyors) nor the learner (your readers) acknowledges that this is the case.

The surface lesson attempts humor through the myth that "boys will be boys." The real lesson is that "boys will be rapists," and that this is acceptable and funny.

The surface lesson is the creation of an ideal, through mock criticism of the "party animal." The real lesson is the creation and perpetuation of the idea that alcohol gives a man an excuse to attack women.

The surface lesson is that "pranks" are fun experiences for men. The real lesson is to hide that pranks, such as this assault, express men's domination, humiliation and control of women.

The surface lesson is an instruction to identify with the experience of the "prankster." The real lesson is to identify with the experience of the rapist.

The surface lesson is to be amused at the "silly (female) reaction" — "EEK!" — of the woman being disrobed. The surface hides and instructs us to disidentify with what a woman really experiences in this and all assaults.

Even if we imagine her mortification at being disrobed publicly, "EEK!" hides from us the deeper fear for her mortality, of loss of control over her body to a man who may kill her, of humililation over having her person violated and the physical pain that a rape entails.

Put yourself in her position (men, you must add that the location is inside a prison and you are 80 pounds lighter than the average inmate) and see if this cartoon expresses your experience.

Identifying with the woman's experience is the key to understanding that what people often class as "attempted" sexual assault, such as is depicted in this cartoon, is no less horrendous a crime than what people often refer to as a "completed" sexual assault.

The most common element of a woman's experience of sexual assault is fear of death. A woman who is able to get away from her attacker in the early stages of an assault has nevertheless experienced the trauma of an assault.

Thus, when people say, "It was only an attempted rape," or, "It was only sexual harrassment (such as coercing sex with threats of a lowered grade)," they are really saying, "It was only rape."

So, you may agree that the lesson in this cartoon is more than the surface shows, but is it really the intent of the cartoonist and editors to perpetuate rape?

In 1985 Mary Koss surveyed 7,000 students on 35 college campuses. One in 12 of the men admitted to raping women. In a 1981 study by Neil Malamuth, one in three men indicated some likelihood that they would rape if they thought they could get away with it.

Furthermore, Giarusso, et al., reports more than half of the male high school students they interviewed thought that rape was acceptable behavior in certain circumstances.

To summarize, one in 12 men have raped, one in three men would rape and one in two men approve of rape.

In this context, the effect of a lesson such as that contained in this cartoon constitutes the fostering and support of rape among our peers. If this was not the intent of the editors, I suggest that you run an in-depth series of educational articles on women's experiences of male violence and the ways men can educate each other out of this behavior.

Quote not finished

Editor,

I feel compelled to respond to the news article of March 8 concerning the signs in our city parks. The reporter for the City Commission meeting chose to quote me as saying "there is no such thing as responsible drinking by young people under the age of 21."

I'm sorry that he didn't finish the sentence, because I added the point that under-age drinking is not legal.

The comment was not meant to be insulting nor was it a comment on young people's self-discipline. I was simply making a point of logic. Indeed, there are instances where otherwise responsible people break the law.

Speeding on our highways or runningstop signs are not uncommon, but if a citizen habitually speeds or runs stop signs, one might question his driving behavior as being totally irresponsible.

By the same token, a young person who habitually and knowingly breaks the law concerning the use of alcohol, even to the point of misrepresenting him or herself with a fake I.D., is developing habits of irresponsibility.

Thank you for the opportunity to clarify that point.

Fee borrows money

Editor,

I've been reading arguments supporting an athletic fee. They go something like: "Right or wrong, the future success of the University depends on the KSU Athletic Department having a lot of money."

The idea expressed here is that, in considering a course of action, questions of right and wrong are irrelevant, distracting and probably shouldn't even be mentioned. This school of philosophical thought is known as "Oklahoma University ethics" and is currently riding a wave of popularity in semi-intellectual circles, as well as in the real world (as seen on television).

My own suggestion is that if the athletic department, right or wrong, needs money, it should start by raising ticket prices. This would mean that those who benefit directly would pay.

I realize this is a radical notion and probably sets a dangerous precedent. I offer it only as a possible compromise.

In case no one buys this idea, there is one more point I'd like to make. I'm going to school on borrowed money. An athletic fee would be more borrowed money. In order to simplify things, maybe the athletic department should just borrow the money themselves and eliminate the middleman. I'd be glad to give the athletic department the name of my bank.

Athletic fee: Pro vs. con

Fee beneficial to most students

Commentary

Brian Hummell
Campus Editor

It's heeeere. Today students will have a say on an issue that has been lingering for more than three years — the student athletic fee. The topic has sparked discussions, debates, forums, meetings and even a special session of Student Senate.

Unfortunately, these events have been dominated by talk and more than a little emotion when a strong dose of levelheaded listening would have made for better understanding of the proposed fee.

The issue has been chopped into so many tiny pieces that the overall issue and its merits have rarely been mentioned. Senate's special session is the most glaring example of this phenomenon.

Senate debated a proposal to limit advertising by the KSU Athletic Department in the Collegian. The senators also listened to a misguided example asserting that Colorado's football team, which has been to bowl games in three of the past four seasons, is no better than K-State's, despite Colorado having a higher budget.

After wading through this nonsense, the senators changed the language of the bill in order to make it constitutional. The senators overlooked the fact that making the bill constitutional would generate about $70,000 more than was originally asked for by the athletic department.

For some reason, this has become a major point of contention for those opposed to the fee. Although it would be more than glad to accept this extra money, the athletic department did not ask for it. Student Senate did.

So now take a deep breath and relax as we look through these and other distortions and see how the athletic fee really does make sense.

■ Advertising. The athletic department's ads have been mainly of the educational variety. The most common ad is basically the original resolution passed by Student Senate to be used on the ballot.

No one has questioned the validity of the claims in the ads, so we'll assume they are true. This, plus a couple of guarantees in the Bill of Rights, favors the athletic department's right to advertise.

■ Incentives. The athletic department is offering certain incentives to students which those opposed to the fee have called coercive. Of course, these people are wrong.

Those who feel the guarantees are worth the $15 per semester price will vote for the fee; those who don't want the guarantees will vote against it. There is no threat or punishment for voting no. There is the reality that the guarantees would not be financially feasible if the fee does not pass.

■ Bribery. The athletic department has offered to begin or increase funding to certain groups if the fee passes, and opponents have charged that this is a way of buying votes. In the real world, this is known as building a constituency.

Those who have something to gain by an issue are more likely to vote for it. Cultivating these groups and enlisting their support is not only legal, but smart. The more money the athletic department has, the more money it can give to these groups.

■ The money will be wasted. Provisions in the bill dictate exactly how the money generated by the fee would be spent. The bill encourages, even demands, fiscal responsibility by the athletic department.

■ Students will be saddled with the fee for generations to come. The fee, if passed, would be reviewed after three years. This is an automatic provision of the bill. This fee, unlike others, will not be perpetual.

■ Another fee. In this, the year of the fee, the student athletic fee is the only one for which students will have a chance to vote. Even those opposed to the fee should commend the athletic department for asking for a referendum and for not trying to shove a proposal down the collective throats of students.

Add the number of athletes, band members and student season ticket holders for football and basketball, and the halfway point is easily reached. The fee is good for a majority of K-Staters.

The athletic department has done its job in presenting the fee and has done it well. After weighing the positives and negatives, the fee should pass.

Students should set priorities

Commentary

Catherine Doud
Editorial Editor

To question the athletic fee, and the way it has been presented for referendum, is not to be anti-K-State. Nor, is it to be anti-athletics.

Instead, questioning this fee, which is up for student vote, is a sign of loyalty to K-State. It is showing an interest in determining whether this fee is actually beneficial to K-State students as a whole.

Let's start with the fee itself. During a time when fees across the board are increasing, this fee would add another $30 per year to student fees. This is not just to students who support athletics or who attend the games, but to all students.

Regardless of whether students want to pay the fee, this assumes students are able to pay the fee. Many students are already borrowing money to go to school; they may have difficulty paying another fee, particularly one they don't support.

Requiring everyone to pay the fee, however, is certain to cause hard feelings. Wouldn't it be simpler to make the fee voluntary? Surely if so many students are in favor of the fee, then the KSU Athletic Department would receive more than enough money by just having a box available to check during fee payment for donations to the athletic department.

Or to go even further, they could have boxes to check for donations to other departments as well. Imagine a Farrell Library donation, a scholarship fund donation or a fine arts contribution. Thus, everyone would be able to donate money where they best see fit.

Why isn't it done? Simple, because it wouldn't generate the money the athletic department wants — because if given a choice, not many students would or could pay the amount.

Which brings us to the next point, it would make more sense to tax the students who benefit from athletics, instead of taxing everyone. Instead of tacking $30 to fees, why not raise ticket prices a little, or charge a small admission to non-revenue sports instead of having all students subsidize free admission?

It appears unlikely to happen, so let's examine the benefits of all of this tax money.

It has been argued that the money will benefit all students by helping sports to do better, which will thus increase publicity, which will thus bring in more students to K-State — providing these options work.

This sort of reasoning has several flaws. For example, our basketball team already does well representing us nationally on its budget. There is no guarantee that by throwing more money at football, the program could be salvaged.

Besides, there are other ways of getting publicity, such as having Rhodes and Marshall scholars and more successful academic achievements. Of course, don't count on these sorts of achievements happening for much longer due to our sub-standard library and low faculty pay.

Despite all this, enrollment at K-State has already increased dramatically in the past three years, while the success of the football team has steadily declined. Where is the correlation?

The athletic department wants students to throw money at a program with no guarantee it will actually accomplish anything it sets out to do. Instead, the money could be better spent to directly target recruitment and scholarship possibilities.

With today being the final day of voting, it is time for students to set their priorities. Athletics, regardless of the publicity they may provide, are not essential to an education. Facilities, libraries and staffing are essential.

The athletic department has gone out of its way to encourage student voting on this issue. So far out of its way as to have a coach "strongly suggest" that his athletes bring five people with them to vote, thus helping to ensure that the minimum amount of votes needed for a simple majority are reached. So far out of its way as to continue to toss in added incentives, such as band uniforms, just before the election to encourage increased turn out.

A strong advertising campaign has lauded the benefits of the fee to the entire campus: a huge campaign that private opposition groups could never hope to match dollar-wise.

The athletic department has done a fine job marketing this proposal. But, the final decision will be out of their hands. It's up to students to vote. It's up to students to take the time to see both sides of the issue. And it's up to students to refuse to force a dubiously beneficial tax on all students in the University, when there are other priorities that should come first.

Teachers serve university, professions, says speaker

By Brad Camp
Collegian Reporter

Educators must serve the professions that nurtured them and which they represent as well as the mission of a university, said Lane Marshall, professor of architecture at Texas A&M University.

As the fifth of six candidates being considered for the position of dean of the College of Architecture and Design, Marshall met with about 35 faculty and students from the college in the Union Monday morning.

The new dean will replace Mark Lapping, who has resigned the position.

"The issues faced by the design profession are categorically easy to list," Marshall said. "The notion of how do you, as a design college, fit with the university to get much needed resources, continues to serve us."

No matter what other issues are identified in relation to the profession, if the first one is solved, the rest seem to fall in line, Marshall said.

He said there are two distinct approaches in running design colleges. One extreme suggests concentrating on serving professionals.

"Hire a strong dean and hope that person will make the other half of the equation fall in line," Marshall said.

The other extreme, called mainstreaming, is one Marshall said he is facing in his own academic setting, as dean of landscape architecture at Texas A&M. Mainstreaming suggests the college is just like every other college.

Marshall said the college is being mainstreamed with the other colleges on campus.

"The design professions may be the most relevant professions on campus in terms of dealing with real-world, real-time problem solving," he said. "The University needs our relevance as an academic unit.

"The profession is different and needs to use its difference as a strength."

Marshall said he is committed to the idea of participatory management.

"Teaching is Job 1 as long as we serve our professions," he said.

Marshall, who has a bachelor of landscape architecture degree from the University of Florida and a master's degree from the University of Illinois, has earned 31 design awards for landscape architecture projects. His area of expertise is landscape architecture design and practice, urban design and recreational planning.

Campaigns promote, oppose fee

By Erwin Seba
News Editor

Supporters of the athletic fee have spent more than $1,700 for advertising to promote the fee's passage, while opponents have spent less than $100.

Since March 8, when the KSU Athletic Department began encouraging students to vote for the fee, the department has spent about $1,756 on advertising, said Denise Lambert, campus advertising representative for the Collegian.

Lambert said the advertising rate being paid is $3.80 per column inch. The department received a discount based on its volume purchased.

Prior to March 8, the athletic department did run "investment in excellence" ads, said Chris Peterson, assistant athletic director in charge of marketing and sales.

But, the ads which appeared before March 8 did not specifically call on students to vote for the fee. Peterson said these ads are part of a general promotional campaign being conducted by the department.

He said the "investment in excellence" theme is being used in promotional brochures and in programs for athletic events.

The ads were paid for from the department's budget, Peterson said.

Ads calling on students to vote against the fee were printed Monday and today in the Collegian. These ads were paid for by the Graduate Student Council, Lambert said.

The total cost for these ads was $61, she said. The council paid the student rate of $3.05 per column inch.

Sue Blodgett, chairwoman of the Graduate Student Council said the ads were paid for by funds from the council's budget.

She said the council is supported by funds allocated by Student Senate.

Eva Chatterjee, chairwoman of the Senate elections committee, said no spending limits are placed on referendum campaigns. However, there are spending limits for student body officer and Senate campaigns.

Peterson said his appointment in September was the first step in a campaign to raise awareness about the University through the athletic program.

"We've been driving around in a '72 Vega and we want to drive an '89 Capri," he said.

Since his appointment, Peterson said he has been working closely with the KSU Foundation to attract corporate underwriters for the revenue as well as non-revenue sports. Eventually, he said, those corporate underwriters will contribute to the University's academic programs.

"We want to market the whole University," he said.

Throughout the campaign the athletic department has followed the guidance of Student Senate, Peterson said. Work on the campaign for passage of the fee began in early January.

ASK members meet state legislators

By Nancy Prosser
Staff Writer

About 20 members of K-State's Student Goverment traveled to Topeka Monday to speak to Kansas legislators about specific University concerns.

Lobby Day, sponsored by Associated Students of Kansas, provides students with a chance to discuss issues with state legislators. Yesterday was the second Lobby Day of this semester.

"Our main focus was on capital improvement and social services," said John McIntyre, campus director of ASK.

Students discussed the Youth Educational Services program, McIntyre said.

"YES is a program that helps school-aged,'at- risk' children by giving them college-aged tutors," he said. "The House will vote on funding for the YES program this week."

McIntyre said the Kansas Senate had already approved full funding of the YES program, but the House rejected it.

"It's not that (the House members) didn't like the YES program; there was just a lack of funds and they had to find a place to cut the budget."

Honor student's death mourned

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A high school freshman kidnapped while she waited for the school bus and then sexually assaulted and killed was remembered Monday as a special joy to all who knew her.

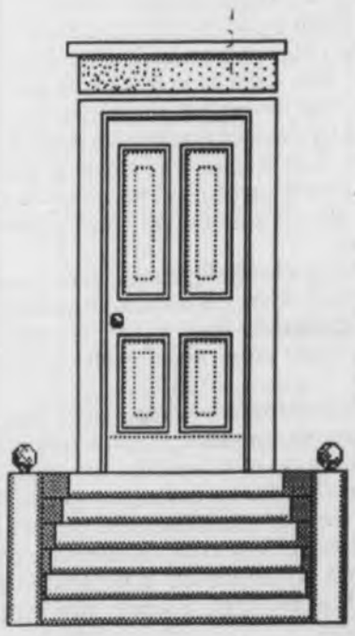
Ann Marie Harrison bled to death from several stab wounds. Her body was found in the trunk of a stolen car Thursday night.

"Ann was a special joy to the family and all of her many friends and classmates who knew and loved her," read her funeral program. "Her life was overflowing with music and sports. ... Whatever Ann did, she did with determination and discipline, with joy and celebration."

About 600 friends and family filled a church to overflowing.

"Her life with us was far too short," said the Rev. Thomas Blaney. "We were robbed. Ann showed us a little more about God as she lived, for she showed us so much of what was good in people."

Blaney said Ann would tirelessly practice her flute, going over and over a piece until she got it right.



"Ann was gentle, melodious, flowing, almost like the sounds of the flute," said the Rev. Gary Ferbet. "Wherever Ann went and regardless of what she was doing, she was accompanied by a gentleness."

Ann, survived by her parents and two sisters, was an honor student and a member of the high school volleyball team. She also worked at a grocery store in her neighborhood.

She was reported missing Wednesday shortly after 7 a.m. when she did not catch the school bus that stopped in front of her house. Her purse, books and flute case were found in a pile near the mailbox.

Her body was found late Thursday in the trunk of the stolen car.

Hancock key in recruiting Schildknecht

By Carolyn Holcroft
Sports Writer

Entering the homestretch of the 1989 tennis season, junior Helen Schildknecht appears to be at the top of her game.

Most often found at No. 2 singles and at No. 2 doubles paired with Miste Bitner, Schildknecht has also had a shot at the No. 1 singles position. She is pleased with her individual overall performance so far this season.

Recently, however, Schildknecht was reunited with longtime friend and teammate Sara Hancock. The duo won the NJCAA championship at No. 2 doubles while playing for Midland (Texas) Junior College in 1987, and are expected to be paired once again for the upcoming Big Eight portion of the K-State schedule.

It was because of Hancock that Schildknecht decided to play at K-State. After playing two seasons at Midland, she had returned to her hometown of Untersiggenthal, Switzerland, to lay out a year, but missed the United States. She was visited there by Hancock, who is from Essex, England, and the two decided to look for a school they both could attend.

"The last school she visited was here," Schildknecht said. "She was very impressed with the coach, and then he called me and also made a good impression."

Foremost among her favorite aspects of playing for the Wildcats, she lists the sense of support and cooperation, which she thinks are hard to find on a team these days.

"I'm really happy with the team situation right now. We all get along so well, and that's rare," she said. "It's more mature, and they respect each other a lot more here."

Schildknecht said she is addicted to competition and feels good that she finally reached her goal of playing at No. 1 singles this year.

Schildknecht also created quite a reputation for herself in her junior college days. She started playing for Midland at age 14, was voted all-American two times, and in 1986 won the singles championship at No. 4, while her team won the national championship.

She started playing tennis at age 7 when her mother introduced her to the game. She also liked ballet and ice skating, but was most interested in tennis and began playing in tournaments when she 11.

"I had a social life, but not as much as my friends," she said. "I had to sacrifice lots of weekends, but right now I appreciate it."

One of the main reasons for coming to the United States was her desire to both play tennis and get an education.

"(In Switzerland) either you study and go to class all day long — also on Saturdays — or you play sports," she explained. "I'm happy my parents gave me the opportunity to come here and do both at the same time."

Although she doesn't expect to make a career of tennis, Schildknecht will never quit playing and will be able to take advantage of her skills and experiences throughout life. She's working on a degree in therapeutic recreation and hopes to get a job helping handicapped people.

"Tennis will be something I can use later on, like if I wanted to work in a camp," she said. "It will always be a benefit."

She expects to continue living in the United States, but says she will go wherever her work takes her.

"I still think Switzerland is pretty and I miss my parents, but I also like it here in America," she said. "I'm thankful that they gave me the opportunity to come here."

Instilling winning attitude key to Wildcats', Snyder's success

It's Just Madness

CHRIS HAYS
Sports Editor

Today, Bill Snyder will take on probably the toughest assignment of his life. With the beginning of spring football practice, Snyder starts the unenviable task of turning around K-State's woeful football program. He probably could not have come at a worse time.

The Wildcats are in the midst of a 13-game losing streak and haven't posted a victory in 27 straight contests. Their last win was a 29-12 triumph against Kansas in 1986.

K-State has had two winning seasons in 35 years, dating back to when Bill Meek led the 'Cats to a 7-3 mark in 1954. Since then, Vince Gibson (6-5 in 1970) and Jim Dickey (6-5-1 in 1982) have been the only coaches who have been able to win more games than they lost at K-State.

This is what stares Snyder sternly in the face. The question is whether Snyder is disciplined enough to succeed where so many other coaches have failed.

Snyder was part of an Iowa coaching staff that led to the turnaround of a Hawkeye program similar to that which Snyder is assuming at K-State. Iowa went from having 17 straight losing seasons, to eight straight bowl appearances under Snyder and head coach Hayden Fry.

But now Snyder is in charge and his decisions will control the destiny of the football program. If one of Snyder's first decisions as Wildcat head coach is any indication of decisions to come, the St. Joseph, Mo., native should eventually be successful at K-State.

Snyder lists senior-to-be Erick Harper as the starting strong safety on the Wildcats' pre-spring depth chart. No one is quite sure why Harper, who was a freshman all-American and honorable mention all-American at safety in his first two seasons, was moved to linebacker last season.

Harper's talent in the defensive backfield shows when one considers that he played just two series at safety last year and was still an honorable mention all-American at that position.

It is more than possible there may have been a slight personality conflict between Harper and former coach Stan Parrish, although each would probably downplay its importance. A conflict of interests with Parrish, combined with the death of Harper's father toward the end of last season, led to his least productive year as a Wildcat.

But a new attitude and atmosphere should mean Harper's best season in a K-State uniform.

Also key to the 'Cats success next season will be whether one of the four returning quarterbacks will step up and fill the position. Carl Straw saw most of the duty last season and was backed by Chris Cobb, while Gary Swim and Paul Watson nursed injuries most of the season.

Swim, the 'Cats starter two years ago, saw just one snap last year and received a medical redshirt for an off-season foot injury. The third-year transfer could work heavily into Snyder's plans.

Watson, a highly touted recruit when he came from Kansas City's Park Hill High School, redshirted his first season. He then sat out most of last season while nursing a shoulder injury suffered in pre-season drills. Watson is expected to miss the brunt of spring drills while recovering from off-season surgery on the same shoulder.

The quarterbacks' success will lie heavily on an experienced offensive line. The "heavies" return all but one starter from a year ago and are led by honorable mention all-Big Eight center Paul Yniguez. Lost to graduation was a pro prospect, tackle Russ Stange, but back are guards Eric Zabelin and Chad Faulkner and tackle Will McCain. Stange's spot will probably be filled by Rick Mears, while Bob Pacchioli and Shawn Fleming should also see plenty of action at the guard spot.

Other returning starters on the 'Cats offensive side are wide receivers Greg Washington and Frank Hernandez. Washington was a second team all-Big Eight selection from a year ago, while setting K-State single season records for receptions with 69, receiving yards with 928 and touchdown catches with nine.

On defense, all the starting defensive backs return, but some flip-flopping could occur next season after a suspect year last season. Marcus Miller is one of the returnees. Miller was honorable mention all-Big Eight at free safety last year. Harper will help solidify the defensive back corps at strong safety and will be joined by cornerbacks Tyreese Herds and William Price.

Last year's starting linebacker Maurice Henry will move to left defensive end and thus will be able to use his speed even more to get around the corners and chase opposing quarterbacks.

Bobby Lawrence, right tackle, and Elijah Alexander, right end, also return up front, while Lorne Whittle returns as linebacker. He will be joined by James Enin-Okut, who started at left end last year.

One of K-State's main weaknesses will be an inexperienced defensive line. K-State has no returning nose tackles and the three listed on the depth chart are freshman redshirts.

Inexperience at the running back position will also be one of Snyder's concerns with the loss of starters Tom Dillon, tailback, and Lee Pickett, fullback. No returning starters are listed.

All in all, K-State returns the nucleus of last year's key position players, but that team also didn't win any ball games. A losing attitude could have had a lot to do with K-State's recent 27-game winless streak. Should Snyder instill a winning attitude in a program that has lacked one for some time now, the program could be on its way to success in the long run.

But, then again, it would be difficult to instill a winning attitude should the 'Cats come out winless against the likes of Northern Iowa, Northern Illinois and North Texas State in the first three home games next year. Those three games could be the key to Coach Snyder's success and ability to uphold a winning attitude in a program that has been so used to losing.

St. Johns, St. Louis advance to NIT finals

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Monroe Douglass scored 25 points, nearly double his average, as St. Louis moved within one victory of its first National Invitation Tournament championship in 41 years by beating Michigan State 74-64 Monday night.

The Billikens, who won the NIT in 1948 in one of their 13 previous appearances, opened a 34-15 lead with 3:52 left in the first half as Douglass scored 11 points and backcourt partner Charles Newberry added eight.

St. John's 76, Alabama-Birmingham 65

Jayson Williams and freshman Malik Sealy scored 17 points apiece as St. John's advanced to the final of the National Invitation Tournament with a 76-65 victory over Alabama-Birmingham Monday night.

St. John's, 19-13, seeking its fifth NIT title despite finishing eighth in the nine-team Big East Conference this season, will meet St. Louis in Wednesday night's championship game.

Royals, Boston talk possible Boggs trade

By The Associated Press

HAINES CITY, Fla. — The Kansas City Royals have talked with the Boston Red Sox about a trade for Wade Boggs, the five-time American League batting champion embroiled in controversy over a broken love affair, according to General Manager John Schuerholz.

Schuerholz, in an interview with The Kansas City Star on Sunday, confirmed that talks have taken place but would not identify the Royals' players involved and also said chances of a deal were slim.

The Royals executive, who described Boggs' personal problems as "somewhat disconcerting," said the Royals' main interest is improving their pitching depth.

"As good a hitter as he is, I don't think he can save 40 games," Schuerholz said of Boggs. "I guess what I'm saying is that it seems to me that the focus of our ballclub ought to be in the area of pitching depth, not conditional hitting.

"I think if we make a deal that's viewed by the world as a substantial deal, that it ought to include some element of relief pitching. That's why I think it's unlikely anything will happen."

Boggs has been the subject of scores of stories about his relationship with Margo Adams, who went public after their break-up last year, suing him for wages she says she lost because of time she spent with him. Penthouse magazine has published two installments of her account of the four-year affair.

Boggs has given a number of interviews about the case, including a tearful one aired last week on ABC-TV in which he and his wife, Debbie, discussed it with Barbara Walters. Red Sox officials, angered by that high-profile interview on the "20-20" program, have stepped up efforts to trade Boggs.

There have been reports that the Royals considered sending outfielder Danny Tartabull and pitcher Floyd Bannister to Boston for Boggs and pitcher Wes Gardner, who was 8-6 with two saves for the Red Sox last year.

Other reports indicate that the trade might involve three or four teams, including the New York Mets and Seattle Mariners as well as the Royals and Red Sox. But Schuerholz denied that teams other than the Royals and Red Sox had figured in the talks.

Boggs, 30, has a career batting average of .356, and he is in the last year of a three-year contract paying him $1.75 million this season. He will be eligible for free agency at the end of this year, and Schuerholz said the Royals would not make a trade for him unless his contract were extended.

Alan Nero, agent for Boggs, said that unless a no-trade clause is put into his contract, Boggs will want a three-year deal worth $9 million.

Candidates address top issues in races

Teachers' input on changes vital

By The Collegian Staff

Three incumbents and two challengers for the USD #383 Manhattan/Ogden school board addressed curriculum changes and other issues affecting the school system in a public forum Monday at Manhattan High School.

All five candidates agreed that teachers should be instrumental in the implementation of curriculum changes, but said the school board should monitor and make the final decisions about the changes.

"The teachers are important in the process and they should be allowed to initiate the curriculum changes," incumbent Beverly Eversmeyer said. "Since the board evaluates the teachers' suggestions, I also believe the teachers should give input on the board's curriculum decisions."

Graham Rose, a challenger running for the board, agreed with Eversmeyer.

"Of course, any changes should be approved by the board, but the teachers need to give input," Rose said. "They know what will be successful and what won't be successful in the classrooms."

Meryl Wilson, attorney and board candidate, said board members who have "pet" curriculum projects or classes should contact teachers and investigate the feasibility of the classes.

"Teachers will know how the changes will affect other classes and requirements. We don't need to keep adding to the graduation requirements," he said.

The candidates said an important issue concerning curriculum changes is the implementation of "prevention and awareness" classes at different grade levels, including drug and alcohol related courses.

"The school systems have been left to deal with a morass of problems, and many of them deal with ethics and value judgments," said incumbent Roger Reitz.

Martha Miller, who has served three terms on the board, said schools need to identify children who are having social problems at school and at home.

"We need to find who the at-risk children are at an early age so we can help them," Miller said.

Rose, a pediatrician, said he has dealt with students who have social problems in his profession.

"Teaching health education in high school is not adequate. We have to start in kindergarten through sixth grades with drug and alcohol awareness," he said. "It's going to take teachers, doctors and psychologists to come up with a curriculum suitable for the different grade levels, but we have to start early."

The candidates also fielded questions on the issue of school overcrowding.

The possibility of changing the system of grouping the ninth through twelfth grades in the high school to having only tenth through twelfth grades was discussed.

"I believe a 14- or 15-year-old freshman can be very intimidated by going to school with seniors, and taking the freshmen out of the school would ease the pressure that overcrowding has placed there," Wilson said.

City should back airport's expansion

By Robert Short
Staff Writer

City Commission candidates placed expanding the Manhattan Airport high on their list of priorities for the city, although some disagreed on how to pay for the improvements during a forum Tuesday in the Union.

Five of the six commission candidates — Stanley Crowder, Dennis Marten, Roger Maughmer, Richard Seidler and encumbent Eugene Klingler — attended the forum sponsored by the K-State Flying Club and the Kansas Pilots Association. Encumbent Nancy Denning was unable to attend and Mayor Dave Fiser is not refiling.

Sam Knipp, vice president of the club, said the purpose of the forum was to discuss the future of the airport and to acquaint the public with the candidates.

Manhattan's airport is the busiest uncontrolled airport in Kansas, Knipp said. Questions concerning the safety of the airport were raised when its flight service was removed in July.

The commission voted in March to install a portable control tower at the airport under terms of a five-year lease.

Klingler, who supports diverting monies from an increase in the transient guest tax for airport improvements, said the city's cash reserves are substantially below acceptable levels for a city of its size. He did not support the city's move to lease a portable tower.

"In my proposal for a new terminal, (it) includes a tower," Klingler said. "We (the commission) voted ourselves into a half-million-dollar debt in about five minutes."

Maughmer said the city should be willing to pursue federal or military funds to pay for airport improvements. He supported the city's move to provide the airport with a control tower because of the perception people had that the airport was unsafe.

"The way I see our airport developing is our ability to sell ourselves," he said. "I agree with the city's decision to put the portable tower out there."

Marten agreed with Maughmer concerning federal funding for the airport, saying he "would support any federal funding as long as it is in the best interest of the community."

Although the airport is locally owned, it is influenced by the federal government because of its proximity to Fort Riley, Marten said.

Residents of Manhattan should be eager to apply for federal funds because it was federal funds which helped build the Manhattan Town Center and were used in planning for a Job Corp site, Seidler said.

"There is money to be had for airport improvements," he said.

However, Crowder opposed spending general tax revenues on airport improvements because of the many people who do not use the airport. If the military wants a control tower at the airport, then it should provide one, he said.

> "The way I see our airport developing is our ability to sell ourselves. I agree with the city's decision to put the portable tower out there."
> —Roger Maughmer City commission candidate

Seeking federal funds violates the same principle as asking Manhattan taxpayers to pay for a service they do not use, Crowder said. Funding of airport improvements should come from those entities directly involved with the use of the airport.

Several candidates said Manhattan residents are either uninformed of the situation with the airport or apathetic toward it.

"People who fly are aware, but people who do not, don't realize how vital (the airport) is," Marten said.

The perception that the airport was unsafe became a reality for many people, Seidler said. Now that there is a control tower to go in place, that perception has changed.

"People are aware of the image our airport projects," Maughmer said. "Unfortunately, it is not a very good one. The carriers have the responsibility to promote boardings."

Candidates also discussed updating the city's land-use plan, growth plan and the Bluemont Consortium. The candidates generally agreed steps must be taken toward deciding where the city plans to expand in the future.

A research and industrial park, formerly known as the Miller Tract, proposed by the Bluemont Consortium was "poorly conceived," Klingler said. However, other interlocal agreements between private industry and the local governmental bodies have worked well.

The general election for city commission will be April 4. Polls will remain open from 7 a.m. until 7 p.m. Registered voters living within the city limits or voting precincts are eligible to vote. Voter registration ends today.

Rioters keep 626 hostages; at least 7 killed in takeover

By The Associated Press

GUATEMALA CITY — Inmates who hold 626 hostages, most of them women and children who were visiting jailed relatives at a prison farm on Easter, demanded an airplane Monday to take them to Cuba, a prison official said.

At least seven people were killed — four guards and three inmates — and 20 were injured when 75 to 100 inmates seized much of the overcrowded prison farm Sunday. It is Guatemala's largest penal institution.

Police, national guardsmen and soldiers surrounded the Pavon prison farm Monday. Guatemala's human rights director negotiated with the rebel prisoners.

"All the hostages are fine," the Rev. Jose Maria Varella, the Pavon chaplain, said after visiting the prison. "The good will to resolve this situation exists."

Journalists outside heard rifle and machine-gun fire Monday morning. There was no official comment on the shooting.

Carlos Ramos Mocada, inspector-general of prisons, said the mutineers had about 65 rifles and ammunition taken in a raid on the Pavon armory. He gave reporters the figures on how many prisoners were involved, and said they controlled about 65 percent of the prison facilities.

He said they were holding 154 children, 365 women and 107 men hostage. Prison spokesman Conrado Monroy said the hostages included five firefighters, a fire commander, a Red Cross worker and an undetermined number of guards.

Gonzalo Menendez de la Riva, the government human rights director, spent more than five hours in the prison negotiating with the inmates. He had no comment when he entered or when he left at midafternoon to confer with the interior minister, Roberto Valle Valdizan.

Monroy told reporters the inmates on Monday demanded an airplane to take them to Cuba. He gave no details.

Human Rights Director Gonzalo Menendez de la Riva refused to speak to reporters when he entered Pavon Monday to take over.

Reincarnation theme makes 'Chances Are' plot confusing

By Nancy Chartrand
Collegian Reviewer

You see, this guy dies. But then he is reincarnated, falls in love with his daughter, remembers he was married to her mother, then falls in love with her mother again.

Chances are, you're confused about the plot of "Chances Are," the new romantic comedy directed by Emile Ardolino.

"Chances Are" stars Cybill Shepherd, Robert Downey Jr. (no, not the "big mouth" Morton Downey Jr.), Ryan O'Neil and Mary Stuart Masterson.

As the movie opens, Corrine, played by Shepherd, has just married the man of her dreams, Louie. Everything is going swell. They are even expecting a baby.

Then tragedy strikes; Louie is hit by a car and dies.

The movie then jumps forward 23 years.

Corrine is now a successful businesswoman. Her daughter, Miranda, portrayed by Masterson, is a student at Yale. O'Neil's Phillip, who is an old friend of Louie and Corrine's, has adopted the family as his own, basically because he has been secretly in love with Corrine for years.

Review

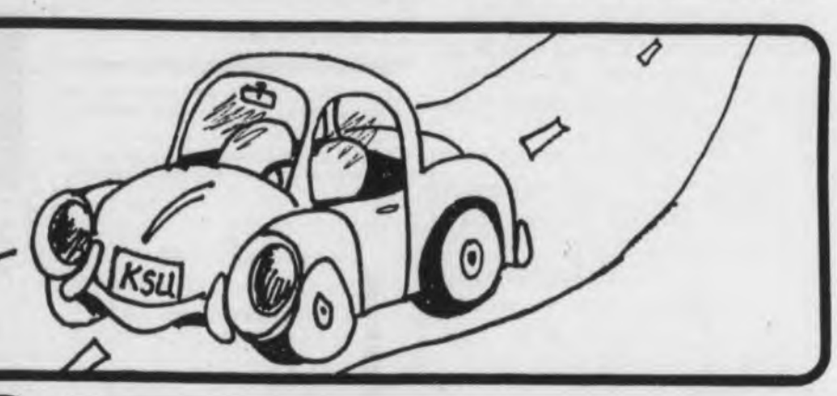
Life seems to be peachy for the family until Alex, played by Downey, appears. A schoolmate of Miranda's, Alex is actually Louie reincarnated.

Confused?

When Louie was recycled in heaven, an angel forgot to give him the shot that would make him forget his former life. So when Alex is invited to a dinner party at Corrine's home, he slowly begins to remember his former life. He is totally disgusted with himself for ever "thinking" of Miranda and sets out to convince Corrine that he is actually Louie.

The process in which he remembers his previous life makes for some funny scenes.

O'Neil gives his first decent performance in years.



Shepherd gives a good performance and one that is much more enjoyable to watch than recent episodes of "Moonlighting."

It was also a pleasure to see Masterson ("Some Kind of Wonderful") on the screen again.

Despite the confusing plot, "Chances Are" is a fun-loving, romantic comedy that offers the average moviegoer some escapism.

Bramlage

than one agency, so the cancellation of Metallica may have been more of an embarrassment than a problem," Thomas said. "It is an aggravation to agencies when they have to tell performers that buildings have cancelled."

Tickets are still available for Wednesday's Eddie Money concert and the Chicago concert April 2.

"I won't cancel these shows despite the poor ticket sales, because I think the coliseum has an obligation to the University to bring in entertainment," Thomas said. "Bramlage is a multi-purpose facility. It's more than a sports facility."

Thomas is attempting a market study with the marketing department to try to find the market to which the concerts should be targeted.

"We are hoping to find new market areas," he said. "I think we have been doing a good job with advertising the concerts that we have brought in.

"I don't want to stop having shows, but the Coliseum has to be able to support those shows," Thomas said. "Slow attendance hurts everyone."

going as fast as you may hope, but they are going as fast as they can."

Although an investment subcommittee handles the majority of investment decisions for the Foundation, Reagan said the 15-member executive committee would have the final say in divesting any funds.

While he is confident the Foundation would divest student monies if Senate so decides, Reagan said he couldn't speculate about the future of non-student monies that are invested through the Foundation.

"There is not a single person (at this University) that is for apartheid," he said. "The question is what should or can we do to stop it. It get's a lot more confusing then.

"Some of the donors may not necessarily agree that divestment is the best way to end apartheid."

Other sections of the bill direct Senate to assume more responsibility in the decision-making process of its investments by requesting representation on the executive committee. The bill also calls for Senate to establish a standing ethics committee for student government.

parade, Capriotti said at the Union.

Sally Routson, coordinator of student activities, said a similar mass vote occurred in the last athletic fee referendum two years ago and it is not uncommon for such action to take place in a campus election.

"A lot of people are rounded up near the end as a last-ditch effort," Routson said.

Nothing in the referendum requirements prevent mass voting, she said. Preventing people from campaigning within 50 feet of the poles is the only restriction.

Routson said this was "more than likely an attempt by the athletic department to encourage students to vote, regardless of the way they vote."

"In general, the more people that vote, the more valid the results will be," she said.

Capriotti said he was pleased with the turnout because he was only expecting about 200 students.

The vote occurred during practice time because Capriotti said he didn't want the team to have to use its own time.

Machete armed mob attacks, wounds 7 U.S. missionaries

By The Associated Press

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti — A mob with machetes attacked and seriously wounded seven U.S. missionaries after a pickup truck carrying the Americans accidentally ran over two Haitians, a report said Monday.

The Free Methodist Church missionaries were hospitalized in serious condition with multiple machete wounds after the attack Sunday, independent Radio Haiti-Inter said. The two Haitians suffered broken legs.

The missionaries and the Haitians were not immediately identified.

The attack occurred after the pickup truck went out of control and plowed into the Haitians, who were celebrating the Lenten season on a highway near Leogane, about 18 miles southwest of Port-au-Prince, the radio station said.

Bystanders stoned the truck and set upon the missionaries with machetes, the report said. It did not say what caused the driver of the truck to lose control.

Bands of revelers known as "ra-ras" are a Lenten season tradition in Haiti. They wander about, chanting and playing drums and bamboo trumpets.

Students reject proposed athletic fee

Referendum fails to gain support

By Kendra Gensemer
Government Editor

The third attempt this year to pass a student athletic fee failed, according to the official results of the referendum released by the Student Governing Association Tuesday night.

Although the majority of students voting in the referendum supported the proposed athletic fee, the measure failed to obtain the needed two-thirds majority to pass.

Of 4,527 students voting, 2,506 or 55 percent voted yes while 2,021 or 45 percent voted no.

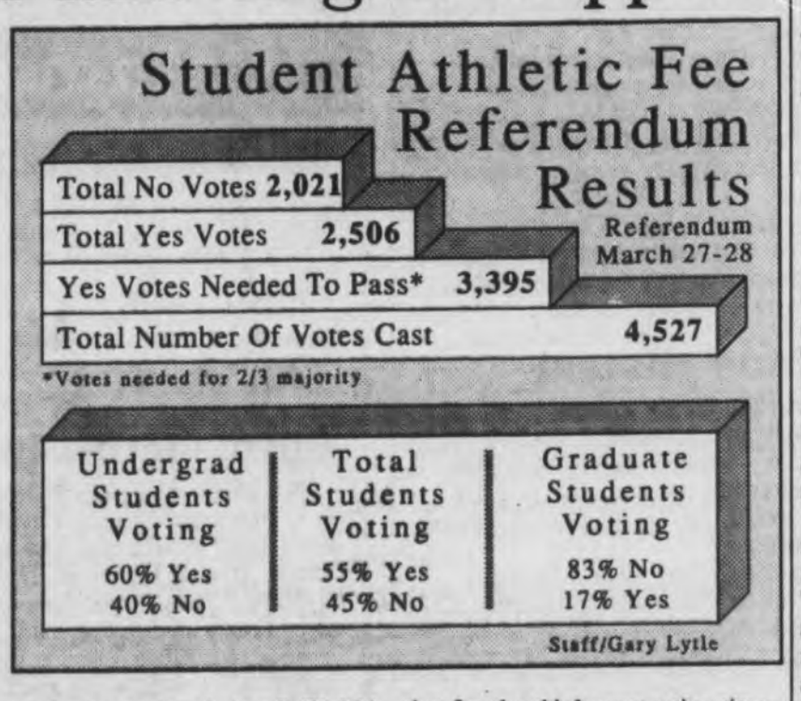
If one-third of the student body — 5,523 students — had voted, only a simple majority would have been required to pass the referendum. Because less than one-third of the student body voted, a two-thirds majority — 3,395 students or 67 percent — was required for passage of the referendum.

About 990 more students needed to vote in order for a simple majority to be required.

Although Athletic Director Steve Miller said he was disappointed with the results, he added that he will not "personally" take the issue to the Board of Regents for approval.

President Jon Wefald said he "really didn't know" if he would ask the Board of Regents to approve the fee.

"We'll give it some real thought in the next couple of days," Wefald said.



The athletic department will announce specifics at the beginning of the week as to what measures it will take to make up the $420,000 income it requested from the fee, but one of those measures will include a "ticket hike of some kind," Miller said.

Although he said he is more disappointed with students who didn't vote — an indication of "a tremendous amount of apathy" in the student body — Miller is also encouraged that for the third consecutive time, the majority of those voting supported an athletic fee.

Consequences on the final day of voting, such as the Haymaker Hall incident, had a negative impact on the results, Miller said.

Voter statistics indicate that the fee was approved by simple majority in the colleges of Agriculture, Arts and Sciences, Education and Engineering. The fee was approved by two-thirds majority in the colleges of

Senate reinforces outcome; Regents may hear proposal

By Darren Keller
Collegian Reporter

The proposed student athletic fee failed twice in one day.

Student Senate spent five and a half hours Tuesday night in what some described as a "wishy-washy" debate on an amended student athletic fee bill that would have allowed Senate to implement it upon approval by the Board of Regents, even though a different version failed the student referendum.

The fee failed to receive the required two-thirds affirmative vote in the referendum and Senate trials. Twenty-nine senators voted to approve the bill and 22 voted against it. The margin of vote of the Senate and the student referendum was similar: 55-to-45 percent in the referendum and 57-to-43 percent in Senate.

After discussion of the ethics of the bill, Senate voted to move the bill to special orders, which allowed Senate to vote on the bill during Tuesday's meeting instead of waiting until Thursday's meeting.

Bob Krause, vice president for institutional advancement, told Senate its decision regarding the fee must go to the Kansas Board of Regents today in order to be on the agenda for the regents' April meeting.

"We need to keep the issue alive," Krause said.

He said K-State has a funding problem within its athletic department.

"Look at the University of Kansas. They have $900,000 of state funds pouring into their athletic fee. We have $480,000. There are too many other areas on this campus where money goes," Krause said.

After the bill reached the special order, Senate debated further regarding the ethical value of the bill, until a motion for postponement was made.

But Anne Krauss, junior in agricultural education, said postponement to a later date would kill the bill.

The debate then shifted to whether the bill should be postponed or voted on in Tuesday's meeting. Senate voted to keep the bill on the table and vote on it during the meeting.

Debate turned back to the ethics of Senate's decision on the bill.

Some senators said the referendum had already decided the fate of the bill. Others said the bill still needed to be voted on by Senate because the outcome of referendum was so close the regents would need student and Senate input.

Barry Beck, junior in business administration, said the future of the University depends on prospective students' perception of the athletic program.

"It may not be the right way to decide on what school to attend, but that's what's happening," Beck said.

Student Body President Laurian Cuffy said although the regents have the right to pass the bill over the student body vote, Senate does not.

"The student body voted and decided it," Cuffy said. "It is (the regents) privilege and right to go over the student body's decision. Not ours."

Other senators said Senate's responsibility is to make decisions; if it voted to postpone the bill to an indefinite date, it would be "taking the easy way out."

"I'm not in Senate to be a perfect senator," Beck said. "If we wanted to be a perfect Senate we wouldn't make any difficult decisions."

Lee Slaten, junior in dietetics, said senators should take a stand and vote on the bill, regardless of the outcome.

Graduate Sens. Rattan Nath and Scott Kelly engaged in a two-hour filibuster in which eight amendments to the bill were submitted.

One amended amendment passed that changed the amount of the full-time undergraduate fee from $15 per semester to $10 and the part-time

Student group plans protest of CIA recruiters' presence

By Chris Koger
Staff Writer

Members of a student political group plan to protest the presence of CIA recruiters on campus today.

The protest will take place at noon west of Holtz Hall, where the CIA will be conducting 14 student interviews throughout the day.

Kale Baldock, graduate student in English and member of Students for Educational Awareness, said the protest is to inform students about the "covert operations the CIA has been involved in, ranging from assassinations to overthrowing governments in Central America and other parts of the world."

Baldock said the group will distribute literature and conduct a "guerrilla theater" skit. James Hamilton, associate professor of philosophy, was asked by SEA to portray a CIA member in the skit.

"We're attempting to remind the audience of what they already have heard about the CIA by using a humorous situation," Hamilton said. "This will invite them to think about the contrast between what they already know and what the CIA has said about its involvements in places like Vietnam, Chile and Guatemala.

"We hope people will walk away laughing and thinking. We're not trying to convert or preach to anyone, but present the facts to them."

A personnel assistant in the recruiting office of the Dallas CIA bureau who asked not to be identified said the public's idea of the CIA is incorrect.

"We don't carry weapons and we are not 'agents,'" he said. "We will be interviewing for positions ranging from engineers to political analysts and security officers. The CIA has employees from more than 125 different disciplines, and the myth of the CIA agent seen in movies is wrong."

The personnel assistant said the Dallas CIA bureau receives 1,200 to 1,500 job applications each month.

"We conduct interviews just like any corporation; we can be very selective, so there is only a small percentage of students hired from campus interviews," he said.

Bruce Laughlin, director of the career planning and placement center, said similar protests have occurred in the past.

"We had one last year and it went well. We had no problem with it," Laughlin said.

Students in Solidarity with Central America sponsored a protest when the CIA recruited on campus in October 1987.

Bush to decide cleanup's future

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Bush dispatched three high-ranking officials to Alaska Tuesday to "take a hard look" at the nation's worst oil spill and judge whether the government should take over the massive cleanup job from Exxon.

With an oil slick spread across 100 square miles of Prince William Sound, Bush said the first priority is to protect the environment and "clean up this disaster." Then, he said, the government will decide on any penalties for the spill.

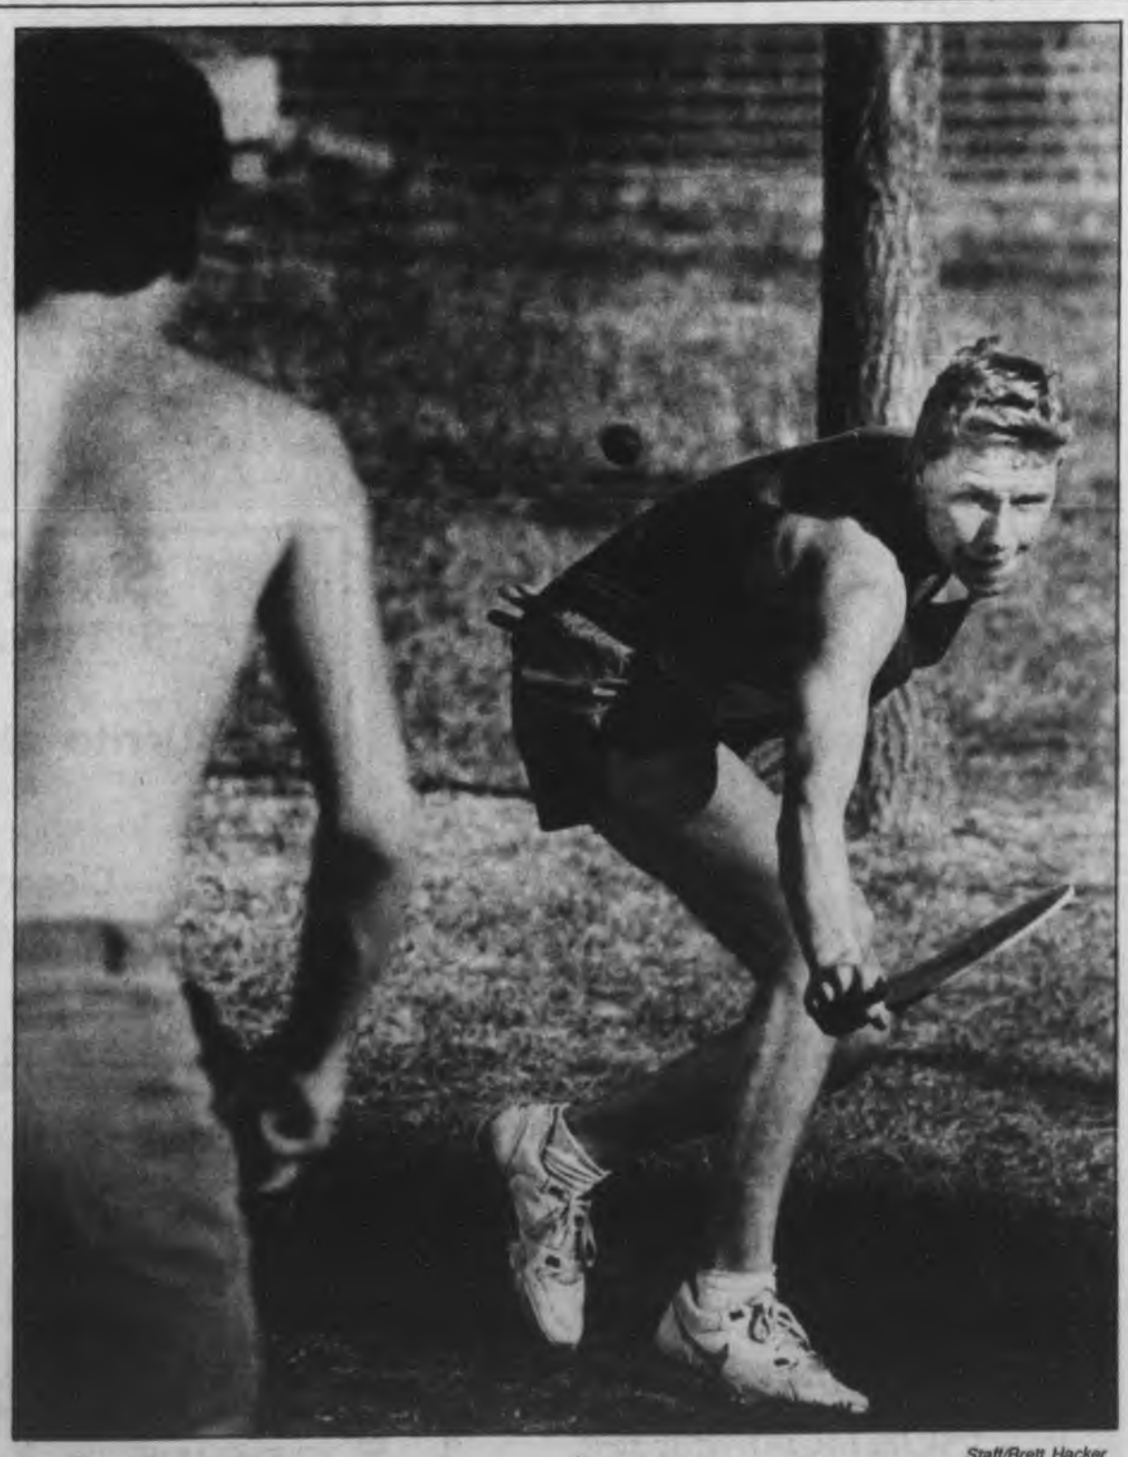
"This is a matter of tremendous concern to Alaskans and, indeed, to all of us," Bush said. "The conservation side is important. The energy side is important."

Bush was briefed on the disaster by Transportation Secretary Samuel Skinner, Environmental Protection Agency chief William Reilly and Coast Guard Commandant Paul Yost. Immediately after the meeting in the Oval Office, they left for Alaska.

The oil spilled into the water after the 987-foot tanker Exxon Valdez, trying to avoid ice, rammed a reef and ran aground Friday. Fewer than 135,000 gallons of oil have been recovered from the 10.1 million-gallon spill.

The ship's captain, Joseph Hazelwood, was not on bridge when the accident occurred. Instead, the third mate, who did not have proper certification, was in charge, according to Exxon Shipping Co., which owns the tanker.

The harbor reopened Tuesday, tankers anchored offshore churned in to pick up oil, and winds which had been moving the oil died down. The port had been closed since the accident, reducing the flow of oil through the Alaska pipeline. Coast Guard Lt. Ed Wieliczkiewicz said the oil slick spreading across the sound was clear of shipping lanes.



Commenting on reports that Hazelwood had a drinking problem, National Transportation Safety Board spokesman Bill Woody said, "We look at all areas in an investigation and that's an area of concern."

Bush and Skinner hinted Exxon could face big civil penalties.

"There are a variety of legal options that are available. But right now the primary consideration is to make sure everything possible is being done," Skinner said.

"And the president has directed us to assess that, the oil is being contained and that the oil that remains on the tanker is being offloaded as quick as possible," he said. "That is our primary objective as mandated by the

'Singin'' in the Soviet Union

MANCHESTER, England — "Singin' in the Rain" will become the first musical to tour the Soviet Union, and the show also will hit the stage in China, actor Tommy Steele said Tuesday.

Steele told a news conference the 1993 tour may also include South Korea and Hong Kong.

Harold Fielding, the show's producer, said he was looking at theaters in Moscow big enough to take the musical, which is based on the hit movie starring Gene Kelly.

Steele, 52, starred in "Singin' in the Rain" in London from 1983-85. Since last appearing in the musical in Tokyo 18 months ago, Steele has been performing in concerts in Scandinavia and the United States.

America's Cup disqualified

NEW YORK — A judge on Tuesday disqualified the San Diego Yacht Club as the winner of an America's Cup challenge last September against a New Zealand group.

State Supreme Court Justice Carmen Ciparick said the match "violated the spirit" of the 101-year-old Deed of the Gift, which sets out the rules for the America's Cup race.

The San Diego crew, skippered by Dennis Conner, sailed a catamaran to victory against the Mercury Bay Yacht Club's 90-foot monohull in a race off San Diego in September, successfully defending the America's Cup.

Tuesday's decision only invalidates the September race and does not award the Cup to New Zealand.

The judge said whatever the deed does or does not say about the race, "it is clear that a catamaran may not defend an America's Cup competition against a monohull."

Garner to be reimbursed

LOS ANGELES — James Garner has reached a multimillion-dollar settlement of his lawsuit against Universal Studios over delayed profit payments from the "Rockford Files" television series, Garner's lawyer said.

Attorney Marvin Burns declined to reveal terms of the settlement, which he called "satisfactory." Garner previously had rejected a $6 million offer by Universal to settle the lawsuit, in which he demanded $16.5 million in damages and unpaid profits for the popular 1970s show.

Garner and other actors claimed that studio accountants charged excessive expenses, using these calculations to cut into payments to actors.

Garner in 1983 sued Universal, a unit of MCA, Inc., for fraud, deceit and breach of contract.

Jesuits win eviction battle

NEW YORK — A Jesuit community whose members include former anti-war activist Daniel Berrigan has defeated a landlord's efforts to evict it from its home, lawyers said Tuesday.

Landlord Johny Melohn had claimed the 23 Jesuits occupying 16 apartments in his building on Manhattan's Upper West Side were in effect operating a monastery, which he said were grounds for him to deny them a new lease.

But Civil Court Judge Joan Lobis ruled that the apartments — on several floors in a 135-apartment building — did not constitute a monastery, and the lease was renewable, said Carol Anne Herlihy, lawyer for the Jesuits.

Song honors labor organizer

OLYMPIA, Wash. — Seventy-five years after Joe Hill died, the man who brought him to life in a song has been honored in a ceremony at the state Capitol.

A proclamation signed by Democratic Gov. Booth Gardner was presented Monday to Earl Robinson. Then the shy, soft-spoken writer sat down to the piano and belted out his favorites to a small but enthusiastic audience in the Capitol rotunda.

Robinson's best-known song was about Joe Hill, the Swedish-American labor organizer who was executed by a Utah firing squad in 1914.

Robinson's tune, which begins with the line, "I dreamed I saw Joe Hill last night, alive as you and me," is one of the most popular labor songs of the century.

Robinson's other songs include "Ballad for Americans" made famous by black baritone Paul Robeson; "The House I Live In," sung by Frank Sinatra at the 100th anniversary of the Statue of Liberty; and the 1954 desegregation song "Black and White," which became a hit for Three Dog Night in 1972.

Superintendent cries 'fowl'

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Want to stick your neck out on this one?

The issue is this — whether a state-employed cook should lose her job for fixing up and eating some chicken necks she'd been told to discard.

Off with her head, decreed Morty Lebedun, then the superintendent of the Western Missouri Mental Health Center at Kansas City, after the incident on March 22, 1987, involving Geraldine Robinson.

Employees are not allowed to eat the center's food without permission, and Robinson got in trouble for using chicken necks to make some dressing for herself and two co-workers.

Lebedun sought to fire her for it, but the state Personnel Advisory Board ruled later that year that the violation was not serious enough to merit dismissal.

Lebedun appealed that ruling, taking it first to the Cole County Circuit Court in Jefferson City, which also ruled against him. Then he went to the Missouri Court of Appeals, which upheld the personnel board in a ruling issued Tuesday.

Wheat conditions dismal

TOPEKA — Condition of the Kansas wheat crop continued to worsen last week, Kansas Agricultural Statistics reported.

The weekly summary, based on conditions before Monday's rains in Kansas, said only 6 percent of the crop was in good to excellent condition, with 46 percent in fair to poor condition and 48 percent in very poor condition.

As of last weekend, topsoil moisture was rated only 4 percent surplus and 17 percent adequate. The other 79 percent of Kansas acreage was short of moisture.

Subsurface moisture was rated 12 percent adequate and 88 percent short.

"Freeze damage and winter kill are becoming more evident as warm weather pushes stands out of dormancy," KAS said. "Stands continue to green up, but there is little or no moisture to sustain growth and most fields are one to three weeks behind schedule."

On the positive side, KAS said insect infestations and disease problems are far below normal, and wind erosion damage so far has been light. But, KAS warned, moisture is so lacking that "virtually all of the state is extremely susceptible to wind erosion."

KAS will make its first forecast of size of the 1989 wheat crop on May 10.

Memorial planned for Marvel

A memorial service for Larry Marvel, the senior in engineering technology who died in a parachute accident Saturday, will be at 6:30 p.m. today at the Alpha Tau Omega fraternity, 1632 McCain Lane.

Dr. John Bambara of Peterson Clinical Laboratories, Manhattan, said Marvel died of a basilar skull fracture and a ruptured aorta.

Burn victim in fair condition

The condition of a Pi Kappa Alpha fraternity member burned in a Friday gasoline fire near Kipp, Kan., has been upgraded from stable to fair, said a spokesperson for the University of Kansas Medical Center in Kansas City, Kan.

Darren Landis, sophomore in arts and sciences, received second- and third-degree burns over 40 percent of his body when a five gallon gasoline can exploded after a fire in the engine of an antique fire truck, owned by the fraternity, spread to the five gallon can.

Carol White, spokesperson for KU Medical Center, said she did not know when Landis might be released from the hospital's burn center.

Landis was admitted to the medical center late Friday. At that time his condition was listed as critical.

Guest performer set for dance company's McCain performance

By Mindy Robert
Collegian Reporter

Instead of choreographing sad and serious pieces, David Parsons uses his mind to develop works that challenge a person's intelligence while making them enjoyable to watch, said Richard Martin, director of McCain Auditorium.

The David Parsons Company will perform at 8 p.m. Thursday in McCain Auditorium; however, because of an injury, Parsons will not dance in the performance. Gary Chryst, who is appearing on Broadway in "A Chorus Line," will dance as a guest performer with the company. Chryst danced with the Joffrey Ballet for 10 years.

The performance will begin with "The Envelope," Martin said. The dancers are dressed in black baggy pants, black shirts, dark glasses and black headdresses. A large envelope is thrown on stage and the eight dancers are continually trying to get rid of the envelope.

Parsons' choreography of "The Envelope" takes steps and ideas used in other works and parodies them, Martin said. He uses the steps out of context to make them humorous.

"The more one knows about dance in general, the funnier it is," he said.

The performance is unlike "anything (students) have seen before," Martin said.

The company is unique in that the dancers are not much older than traditional students.

Parsons formed his company three years ago, Martin said.

Other pieces that will be performed are "Caught," "Sleep Study," "Elysian Fields," and "Scrutiny," Martin said.

"Caught" depicts a metaphor, he said. A lone dancer is "imprisoned" within the area of the stage that is lit and is trying to escape.

The dance progresses to the point where all the lights in the house are turned off, Martin said. As the dancer moves around the dark stage, strobe lights are used to make it look as if motion is stopped.

Every time the strobe light is flashed, the dancer is in the air.

"(It is) phenomenal choreography because the timing is incredible," Martin said. "(The dance) is exciting because motion is stopped."

The audience knows the dancer has to come down on the stage and move from point A to point B, he said.

"We know we are being fooled," Martin said, "but we enjoy being fooled."

Clad in pajamas, dancers examine what happens when people sleep in "Sleep Study," he said. In this piece, dancers "spend a lot of time on the floor."

Haymaker residents protest

Miller addresses athletic housing concerns

By Alan Wilds
Staff Writer

About 100 Haymaker Hall residents gathered in the main lobby at 3:45 p.m. Tuesday as Athletic Director Steve Miller made an effort to neutralize hostile opinions and rumors concerning the possible housing of the K-State football team in the residence halls next year.

Mike Joyce, Haymaker's second-floor president, said the group was gathering to vote "no" on the student athletic fee due to indications that the football team would be housed on two floors of Haymaker next year.

"We are getting together to vote 'no' to show we can pull together and do things as a group," said Joyce, sophomore in pre-veterinary medicine.

Thomas Frith, director of housing, said he has not received a formal request from Head Football Coach Bill Snyder, but Frith has written a letter to the athletic department discouraging it from requesting housing for the football team due to past "unsuccessful" experiences.

Although Frith said he did not want to "go into detail", he said athletic clustering has not been successful for many reasons.

One year, Frith said, the freshman football players lived on a floor of Moore Hall and caused more dollars worth of damage to that floor than the damage to all the residence halls combined.

There have been problems each time the football team has lived as a group. He said, incidents have occurred with different coaches and different teams, and every group may behave differently.

All the athletes were housed in an athletic dormitory, now Edwards Hall, for one year in 1967, Frith said.

The football team will not be housed in any hall "without approval from Thomas Frith, Pat Bosco (associate vice president for insitutional advancement and dean of student life) and the students of the hall involved," Miller said.

Snyder asked for the renovation of Edwards Hall into an athletic dormitory at the beginning of the semester, he said, but was told it would be "too cost prohibitive."

"As the semester unfolded, I became very opposed to the idea," Miller said.

The athletic department then went to Frith, who in turn met with the staff and government of all residence halls to discuss the football team residing in the halls.

Some of the students said they believed Miller was trying to "go over their heads," as well as Frith's, by dicussing the issue further with Bosco. Questions were raised as to why Miller didn't take Frith's advice in the beginning.

"I recommend you do what you feel is right and vote your conscience, but please remember this has nothing to do with the housing issue."
—Steve Miller, Athletic Director

"No one is going to go to the first line of closure," Miller said. "We are simply following the administrative procedures."

He said he was somewhat insulted that people would think he would make a decision upsetting this many people, especially while the student body is voting on the athletic fee.

"No one is going to force anything on you that you don't want," Miller said. "President Jon Wefald and myself have decided an athletic dorm is the wrong solution."

Before the group left for the K-State Union to vote on the referendum, Miller stressed that the housing controversy is unrelated to the athletic fee.

"I recommend you do what you feel is right and vote your conscience, but please remember this has nothing to do with the housing issue," he said.

Jeff Bates, sophomore in agricultural economics and a Haymaker resident, said he was against the football team living in the hall.

"If something like that were to go through, it would break up the community (atmosphere of the hall)," Bates said.

Miller said he was stunned at the aggressive stance taken by the residents. However, a number of students stayed after his speech who were almost apologetic.

"There has not been any request and there is not going to be," he said.

Tuition raffle to aid Farrell Library

By Robert Short
Staff Writer

For one lucky K-Stater, next fall's tuition is only going to cost five bucks.

Spurs sophomore honorary is sponsoring a drawing for one semester in-state tuition. Students are being asked to donate $5 to help raise money for new furniture and computers in Farrell Library.

Students can register in the Union Courtyard or in the front lobby of Farrell.

Monies gained from the raffle will go toward purchasing tables and chairs for Farrell, said Denise Rice, a member of Spurs and freshman in business administration. Some of the money will be used to purchase a computer that would be accessible to students.

The library is seeking to replace several of the large wooden tables in the study rooms to make space for more books, said Angie Martin, a Spurs member and freshman in business administration.

By 2 p.m. Tuesday, Rice estimated that more than 25 students had signed up for the raffle.

Registration will continue through Saturday. A drawing will be at 5 p.m. Saturday in the K-State Union, in conjunction with University Open House.

Although this is the first year Spurs members have conducted this type of event, "they talked about making it an annual event," said Niki Cossaart, a member of Spurs and freshman in chemistry science and pre-med.

The event's success this spring will dictate its possible continuation, but the intent is for the raffle to take place every year, Martin said.

Officials from Farrell have been receptive to the project, said Sara Jaax, a member of Spurs and freshman in journalism and mass communications.

Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries, said he supports the idea, although it is purely a Spurs project.

"They discussed with us the possibility of various things," Hobrock said. "We appreciate it very much, assuming they reach the minimum to cover (the award)."

Soviet election causes defeat for 37 key leaders

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — At least 37 key Communist Party and government leaders went down to embarrassing defeats in the Soviet Union's first multicandidate election, according to results trickling in Tuesday from across the nation.

The losers in balloting for a new national parliament included a candidate member of the ruling Politburo, the premiers of Latvia and Lithuania, and 27 Communist Party leaders from major cities, regions and republics, according to results obtained from interviews and various press reports.

The humiliation was greatest for officials who ran unopposed on the ballot and still lost because more than 50 percent of the voters crossed out their names.

Activists in cities from Leningrad to Kiev waged "cross-out" campaigns urging citizens to vote against certain officials by blacking out their names.

North and cohorts deserve punishment

Commentary

Scott Miller

Collegian Columnist

Years from now when historians and cultural anthropologists scratch their heads and mull over the contradictions of American society, one of the things that might occupy much of their time will be the trial of former National Security Council aide and one-time "national hero" Oliver North.

North was instrumental in supplying aid to the Nicaraguan Contras, a group of murderers, drug dealers, rapists, fascists and sadists with a moderate or two thrown in for good measure and public relations. With North's help, the Contras have waged an eight-year war against the people of Nicaragua.

But North's trial is not about any of this. North is charged with 12 counts of felony — the most serious of which have nothing to do with abetting Contra war crimes, but with pocketing some of their money and lying to Congress.

The prosecution has already provided evidence that North not only lied to government officials, but did so intentionally. According to his former associate, fundraiser Carl "Spitz" Channell, North once told financier Nelson Bunker Hunt, "I don't care if I have to go to jail for this; I don't care if I have to lie to Congress about this."

During cross examination of Channell, North's lawyer, Brendan Sullivan, asked, "Did Colonel North ever ask you to do anything you regarded as improper?"

"No," Channell answered.

Imagine. By 1986, the Contras had mined roads and burned fields, they had attacked schools, farms and hospitals, they had left thousands of children without parents and homes, and upwards of 17,000 people had lost their lives as a result of the war. At this point, after Congress had cut off U.S. government aid to the Contras, North approached Channell about raising money to continue the war, and no, Channell didn't think North had ever asked him to do anything "improper."

An important follow-up question would have been, just what would Channell, or for that matter North, consider "improper?"

That was the contradiction that never quite surfaced in the Congressional hearings in the summer of 1987. North could not seem to tell the committee members enough about how much he believed in traditional family values, or about how his wife Betsy, who sat symbolically behind him during the hearings, was not only his wife, but his best friend, or about how his concern for his children's safety led him to accept (possibly illegally) a $13,800 security system from Richard Secord to protect against an alleged terrorist attack by Abu Nidal.

But for all his ostentatious proclamations about his devotion to the ideals of the family, North never once stopped during the hearings to remark on what effect "Project Democracy" was having on peasant families in Nicaragua. Nor did it seem to occur to him that his assistance to the Contras was somehow irreconcilable with his passionate denouncements of "terrorism."

Unfortunately, this never seemed to occur to the committee members, the television commentators or the respective Congressional counsels who were asking the questions, either. Or, at least if it did, they never said so.

This is why it never quite made it to the surface, because, for the most part, members of the Congressional committees were falling all over themselves to prove that they, too, supported "democracy in Central America" — whatever that meant.

North's defense is equally puzzling. It entails convincing the jury that highly-placed officials in the Reagan administration approved his activities. In fact, several witnesses — from sleazy, used-car salesman types, such as Channell, to tragic figures such as former National Security Adviser Robert McFarlane — have already testified to that effect.

During McFarlane's testimony, a top-secret NSC memo appeared which indicated that Ronald Reagan himself had approved a plan to airdrop information and weapons to the Contras when Congress had prohibited such aid.

And, according to another document presented at the trial, then-Vice President George Bush was not only present at a meeting where top administration officials decided to solicit support for the Contras from Third World countries, but even spoke up in favor of the plan.

No doubt, if North wants to, and if Attorney General Dick Thornburgh will allow the incriminating documents to be made public, it can be shown that Reagan, Bush, then-CIA Director William Casey, then-Attorney General Edwin Meese and other high Reagan administration officials knew and approved of the outline, if not the specific details, of North's activities. But nowhere, to my knowledge, has anyone questioned whether this really constitutes a "defense."

So what if Reagan ordered North to lie to Congress to protect "the enterprise," to solicit support from private donors and quasi-governmental cold warriors, to use the money from the Iran weapons sales for the Contras, or to carry out other outrageous stunts in the name of "national security" and "neat" ideas.

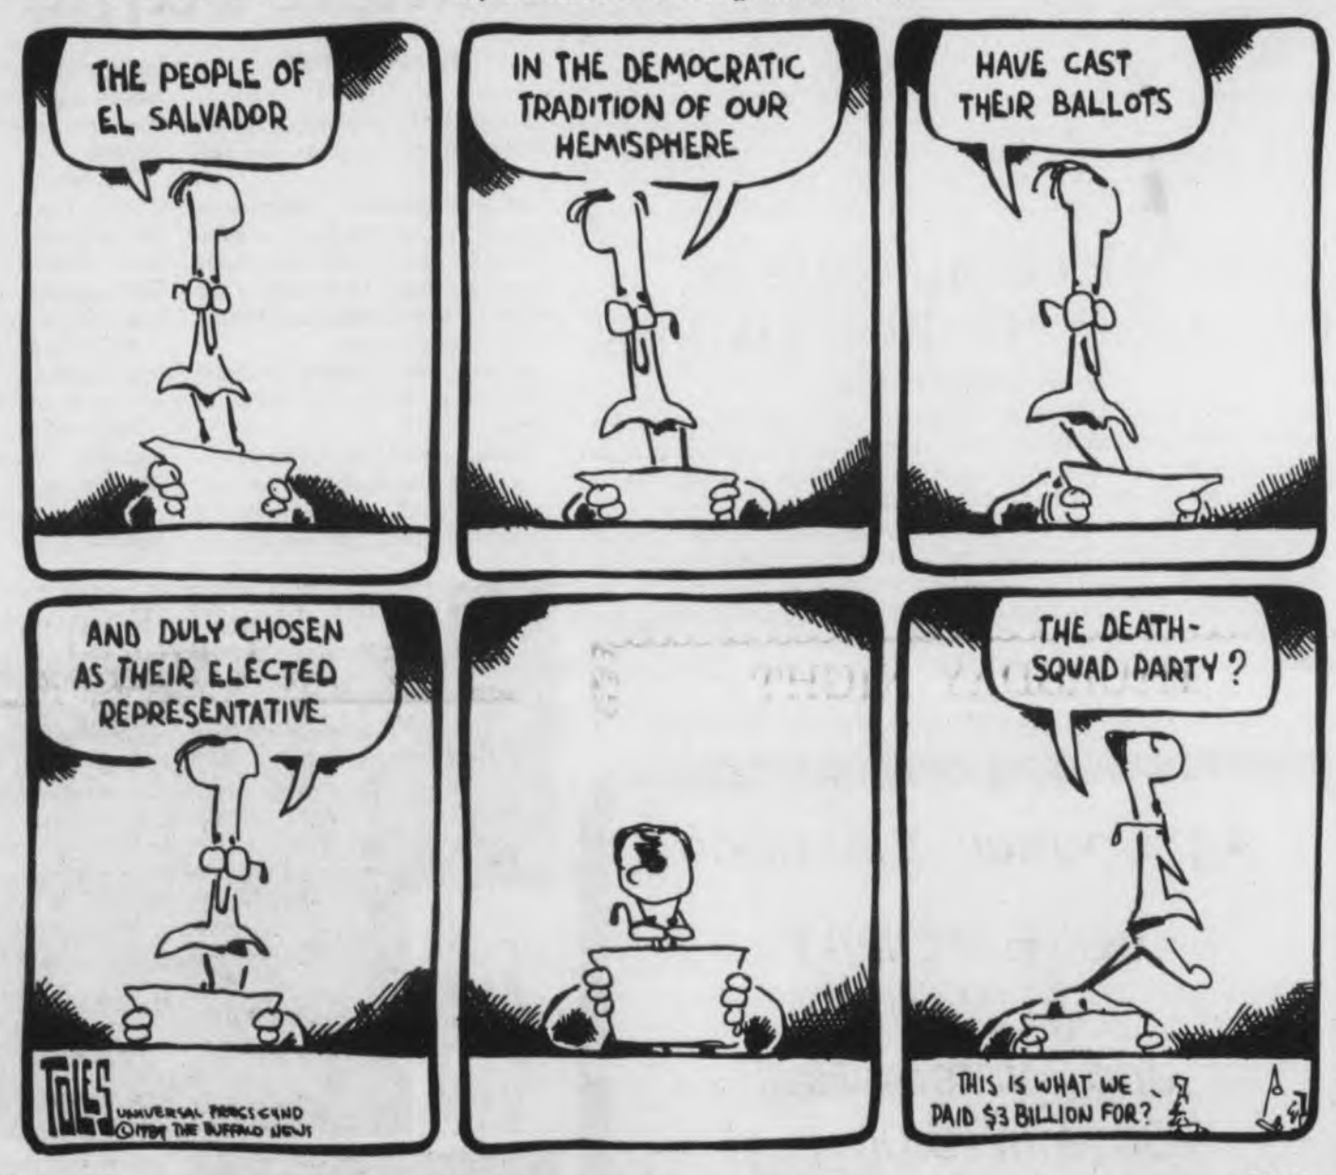
If North broke the law, he should be punished. And if Reagan or other officials ordered North to break the law, they should be punished, too.

But that is perhaps the contradiction that will strike future students of American society the most: How one group of people can behave in certain ways deemed socially acceptable, and how the rest of us would be called criminally insane for similar behavior.

Fee's debate should have ended long ago

The student athletic fee, which should have been laid to rest after the last referendum ballot was counted, instead was forced to lay comatose for more than five hours of debate in Student Senate before a tombstone could be etched.

Surprisingly, some of the points brought out in the debate actually made sense. Unfortunately, sensible debate on the fee only occurred in Senate two months after it was needed — and could have proved beneficial to students.



Regardless of the turnout in either vote, the stance is merely of an advisory nature. Final approval or disapproval on the matter ultimately falls upon the Kansas Board of Regents.

Students and Senate both have failed to send a clear cut message to the regents. The referendum vote was subject to apathy. A simple majority of the students who voted were in favor of the athletic fee, but the constitutional requirements of the bill required at least one-third of the student body to vote in the referendum in order for a simple majority to rule.

The Senate vote failed due to Senate's penchant for making a mockery of a mockery already in progress. A call for a compromise on the bill was extended after the supply of nonsensical amendments to the bill had finally run out. At this point, of course, the compromise carried no weight. The original bill contained backing and guarantees by the KSU Athletic Department; the compromise carried no such assurances.

After all is said and done the regents will have the final say on what, if any, fee students will pay to the athletic department and what, if any, guarantees will be given to students in return.

Students and Senate respectively lost the one chance each had to send a message to the regents. Instead, the bill that deserved burial may be brought back to life without many of the trappings which may have once made it appealing.

Columnist avoids interest conflict

Commentary

Chad L. Sanborn

Collegian Columnist

Conflict of interest. We journalists — and I use the term loosely, as loose as the elastic on a K-State policeman's Fruit of the Looms — fear that nasty phrase. Get caught in a conflict of interest and your credibility, the respect of your peers and your job all get hit by the delete key in this here word processor we call life.

I'm proud and lucky to state here and now that I've never had my butt caught in that hideous sling. Nope, I go to bed at night with a freshly Noxemaed face, a Teen-Age Ninja Mutant Turtles nightshirt and a clear conscience.

Not that I haven't had the chance, mind you. Why, there have been ample opportunities for me to metamorphose into the Geraldo Rivera of Kedzie's hallowed halls. But it hasn't ever happened, and it ain't gonna. I got ethics the size of bowling balls, so to speak.

There was the time I had a little dirt on a K-State vice president, involving his own self and a couple of pre-pubescent Korean gals. Course, I didn't know what he was gonna use 'em for when I sold them to him, and I really didn't have enough of what we in the news media like to call facts, so I kept it under my hat.

Sometimes being a reporter is more about what you keep stuffed under your soft, black porkpie hat than what you let see the light of day. In fact, just as I sat down to write this here column, I was dealing with a little inner turmoil about what I wanted to write about and what was right.

I was gonna tell all you folks out there in Collegian-readership land about this extremely marvelous play titled "As Is," which opens at 8 p.m. this Thursday in the Purple Masque Theatre (I like the word "theatre" better than the word "theater" cause it looks more classy. I hate the word "jamboree.").

But, ya see, if I was to write a column about this play, "As Is," — which opens at 8 in the p.m. this coming Thursday evening in the Purple Masque Theatre (classy, eh?) — I might be jumping head first into a heaping vat of conflict o'interest.

See, I been expanding my horizons lately, this is to say, exploring my innermost emotions and feelings about sex, friendship, death and other innermost stuff. I been acting.

Yes, I know what you're thinking: "My gosh, he'll be wearing lotsa artsy black clothes, and throwing temper tantrums when people don't stroke his ego."

But that's how I got into acting, because I already had all that stuff going for me. Just ask anybody who knows me, that is to say, if you can find somebody to own up to knowing me.

Now, here comes the conflict of interest part. Yep, I'm in this play titled "As Is," which opens at around 8 p.m. Thursday evening at the Purple Masque Theatre in East Stadium, just west of the Union.

Put on your pretend porkpie hats with me, will ya? Now just suppose I was to lash together a damn fine column about this play "As Is," (which starts its three-day run tomorrow night in the Purple Masque Theatre) of which I'm a cast member. There might be a slight problem if I was to do this.

Sure, sure, this space is my space for me to ramble on about anything I so desire. (Although I usually ramble on Mondays, I was bumped for a bunch of athletic fee crap.) But because I'm a cast member of this play — titled "As Is," which opens at, I think, 8 p.m. this Thursday through Saturday in the Purple Masque Theatre — I might be setting myself up for a swat on the keester from the High Priestess of Journalism, namely my editor. (And I would like to take this opportunity to mention that she is doing a fabulous job, just fabulous!)

See, we here in the fourth estate like to think of ourselves as removed from graft, corruption and interests which conflict, that is to say, we're a pious bunch of geeks. But we have to be in order to bring you the news as clearly and as objectively as is possible in a free market society, which is the best damn society in the world, thank you very much.

But if I was to write a column about this play I'm in — called "As Is," and which you can see for only $1 at 8 p.m. Thursday through Saturday in the Purple Masque Theatre — I might be compromising my journalistic integrity.

Go ahead, guffaw all you want, but this stuff means something to me. Why, if I was to have actually written a column about this play I'm in called "As Is" (which opens at 8 p.m. Thursday in the Purple Masque Theatre) my brethren and sisteren in the journalism field would tar and feather me after peeling my scalp back like Velcro from a wet Stainmaster carpet.

So I'm not gonna do it. I'm not gonna write about the play I'm in, called "As Is," and which you can see for only one bone, just one clam, just one mere dollar beginning at 8 p.m. Thursday, Friday and Saturday in the Purple Masque Theatre. (Better hurry, tickets are on sale at the Nichols Hall box office and they are moving like hotcakes.)

I have my integrity. I refuse to cave into the temptation to abuse my First Amendment right of free speech, to abuse my power of the press, to sacrilegiously shame my name and goofy face just to fill the seats of the Purple Masque Theatre at 8 p.m. Thursday through Saturday for the performances of "As Is." Nope, I won't do it. Nope.

Heir-apparent resigns because of Khomeini's fundamentalist drive

By The Associated Press

NICOSIA, Cyprus — Ayatollah Ali Montazeri resigned Tuesday as the heir-apparent to Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini and said he did so at the bidding of the 88-year-old revolutionary patriarch himself.

Montazeri was the most prominent casualty so far in a fierce drive by Khomeini to return Iran to the roots of its fundamentalist revolution.

Iran's U.N. ambassador, Mohammad Jaafar Mahallati, also resigned Tuesday, two days after the deputy foreign minister, Mohammad Javad Larijani, handed in his resignation. Both were U.S.-educated.

Last month, Khomeini harshly attacked those who would rebuild links with the West and denounced lagging revolutionary fervor.

Montazeri's resignation came after Khomeini sent him a letter on March 26 asking him to step down, reported Iran's official Tehran radio, monitored in Nicosia.

"I see myself compelled to obey your orders, because the survival and stability of the Islamic Republic rests on obeying your command," the radio quoted the 64-year-old Montazeri as saying.

The immediate cause of Montazeri's ouster appears to be his critical assessment of the revolution's accomplishments.

Montazeri declared last month that Iranian leaders made many mistakes in the first 10 years of the revolution which isolated the fledgling republic from much of the world.

After the speech, Khomeini blasted the man he personally had selected as his successor, without mentioning Montazeri's name. "How short-sighted are those who think that because we did not reach final victory at the front, that martyrdom and self-sacrifice are worthless," he said.

Immediately after the cease-fire in the eight-year Iran-Iraq war last August, Khomeini apparently gave free rein to the pragmatists. Parliament Speaker Hashemi Rafsanjani and Foreign Minister Ali Akbar Velayati, seeking loans and technology to rebuild Iran, spearheaded a drive to soften Iran's radical image.

Mahallati and Larijani were instrumental in rebuilding diplomatic ties with the West.

Media stereotyping adds to misconception

By Robert Short
Staff Writer

The frequent portrayal of Arabs as bloodthirsty terrorists by the American media only contributes to an unfortunate stereotype that many Americans accept as real, said Jack Shaheen, professor of mass communications at Southern Illinois University.

Shaheen spoke to about 60 students and faculty Tuesday in Union Forum Hall.

"Today's contemporary villain is intent on destroying civilization, as we know it, in these movies and television shows," Shaheen said. "This type of open license on Arabs continues to fester."

The entertainment industry and American politics have contributed to furthering this stereotype, he said. Media news reports often do not show a complete picture of activities in the Middle East; Israeli violence receives less coverage than it has in the past.

"There is an induced or blanket silence," Shaheen said. "The pain and suffering is not being communicated to us as it once was. It is unfortunate because it could probably expedite the peace process."

Shaheen also cited at least 12 major movie productions stereotyping Arabs as savages or ruthless terrorists. The image of the Arab "has become much more sinister than it has in the past," he said.

The Arab is often portrayed as either the billionaire, bomber or belly dancer, Shaheen said.

"Why can't a Hollywood star portray a good Arab?" he said. "What is it about our culture that denies humanistic (Arab) portraits?"

Responding to a question about the possible consequences of stereotypes, Shaheen said the "negative images" will have the most detrimental effect on children.

"(Our children) will have no one to look up to — no heroes," he said. "Stereotypes affect us all. I am outraged when anyone is dehumanized — this dehumanization has political consequences."

However, Shaheen said, the situation can be improved for Arabs the same way it has been changed for other groups who became victims of stereotypes.

While attending a Washington, D.C. conference, he said he discussed changes in the public images of those involved in the civil rights movements of the '60s, and those opposing America's involvement in the Vietnam War and racist policies in South Africa.

Negative images can be changed, but it takes an effort from all groups involved, Shaheen said.

"Terrorism is something we should all be concerned about," he said. "No one party is to blame. It is not fair to say 'other groups have gone through this (stereotyping), the Arabs can go through this.'"

Shaheen's address was sponsored by the Arab Student Organization, International Coordinating Council, the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications and the Coalition for Human Rights.

He has written several articles on minority stereotyping and is author of the book "The TV Arab."

Oscar ceremony receives no award for best of shows

By Nancy B. Chartrand
Collegian Reviewer

Drum roll please ... and the winner is ... "I'd like to thank the Academy, my manager, my father, my seventh-grade teacher, my first cousin twice-removed on my mother's side, ..."

These are the sounds of Oscar night — sounds viewers will hear repeatedly for about three and a half hours.

Those who choose to watch tonight's 61st Annual Academy Awards' ceremony will see awards given for best cinematography, best documentary, best performance by an actor in a foreign musical/drama/documentary, best performance by an actress under the age of 35 playing a male in a drama, best ... you get the idea.

Lets face it, the awards can get a little tedious, especially when most people usually care about only five categories: best actor and actress, best supporting actor and actress, and best picture.

Even worse than the show itself are all the television personalities, who have spent precious air time during the past week, giving their predictions.

Gene Siskel and Roger Ebert weren't too bad, but last weekend a Kansas City weatherman gave his predictions for the Oscars — ugh!

What's the big deal? Just about everyone has come to a consensus on who will walk away with those golden statues.

Here it goes:

Best picture — "Rain Man"

Best actor — Dustin Hoffman ("Rain Man")

Best actress — Sigourney Weaver ("Gorilla's in the Mist")

Best supporting actor — Kevin Kline ("A Fish Called Wanda")

Best supporting actress — Geena Davis ("The Accidental Tourist")

Now this rundown is by no means infallable, but chances are that it will be darn close. Although these picks may be the winners, it doesn't mean they deserve to win.

There is a definite chance the Academy might opt to choose Weaver for supporting actress and Glenn Close ("Dangerous Liasions") for best actress.

"The best actress category is the toughest to predict this year," said Tom McLaughlin, graduate student in speech and Collegian reviewer. "If Sigourney Weaver wins the best supporting actress, it will be a pity Oscar because she didn't win best actress."

If this happens, "The Accidental Tourist" could get completely shut out. This would be a shame, considering it is one of the few recent movies that makes an audience think for itself.

So who doesn't deserve to go home empty-handed but probably will?

Tom Hanks for one. His performance as a boy in a man's body truly deserves the recognition. After a series of role-reversal movies, Hanks was the only actor who could get it right. Unfortunately, almost anytime a comedian competes with a dramatic actor, especially one the caliber of Hoffman, the latter will win out.

New singer fronts .38 Special

Album, tour first product of regrouping

By Doug Fall
Collegian Reviewer

Now that .38 Special has regrouped, the one thing that Max Carl, the new lead singer, wants to do is pick up where the old band left off and continue to play good music.

After losing long-time front man Donnie Van Zant, .38 Special found Max Carl in August, 1987, recorded "Rock and Roll Strategy" and went on tour. From the start, Carl said, he sensed he was the right man for the job.

"I had the same time of roots-music influence and a good sense of pop that the other members have," he said.

The Beatles, as well as blues greats Little Richard and Otis Redding from Georgia, were all part of Carl's background and enabled him to fill the position with ease.

Such a transition could be traumatic to the survival of a band. However, a good sense of the work ethic existed among the members, like a "good sports team," and so far the switch has gone as smooth as could be expected, Carl said.

After the release of its new album, .38 Special embarked on a tour in October that began in Greensville, N.C. Carl admits he had been nervous, but not enough to stop the show.

"We kind of laughed our way through it," he said.

Carl said the crowds have been extremely supportive and have made his job a lot easier.

As far as the old .38 Special, the band tries to include as many classics as possible. About two-thirds of the show is old material, while about five out of six songs are off the group's latest album.

In order to include songs from old .38 Special albums, Carl had to memorize the lyrics and try to give them the best performance he could.

"It was a lot like being in a play," Carl said.

Audiences have been receptive, the lead singer said, which appears to show that he has been successful with the old material.

"The old fans are realizing that we are still .38 Special, and we are getting a lot of new fans with our recent hits," Carl said, which is another reason the transition and tour have been so successful.

After the tour concludes, which won't be for a while, .38 Special could be back in the studio as soon as early 1990 to record another album. Any other efforts will definitely include Carl.

The songwriting is a collective effort, he said, with each member working on material and then combining and finishing it in the studio. While no work on the album has been done to date, Carl already has a few ideas that could develop into songs.

"We are working on a new era of .38 Special," Carl said.

The new influences on .38 Special, including Carl's Nebraskan roots, will lead them to expand the band's direction. But, he said, they will remain basically a southern-rock band.

While no plans for Manhattan have been made, it is possible .38 Special will come back sometime during the summer.

The group will perform Thursday in Topeka at the Kansas Expocentre. House of Lords will be the opening band. General admission tickets for the show are $15.

Iraq to pay families of sailors killed

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — U.S. officials said Tuesday that Iraq's agreement to pay $27.35 million to the families of the 37 sailors killed in the attack on the USS Stark is a satisfactory and fair settlement, but it is unclear when the payments will be made.

The agreement, formally announced by the State Department, represents about 92 percent of the $29.6 million the United States had requested for the families of those who died in Iraq's unprovoked missile attack on the Stark in 1987.

Bush administration officials privately described the agreement as "satisfactory" and a "fair settlement." The sources, speaking on condition they not be identified, also said it remained unclear when Iraq would hand over the money. They said Iraqi officials had offered the settlement in a take-it-or-leave-it manner.

The officials said Americans who were in Baghdad to settle the matter were called in to see Iraqi Foreign Minister Tariq Aziz on Monday "and told that this was what (Iraqi) President (Saddam) Hussein had decided."

"There were no negotiations," one source continued. "They just announced this was what they were prepared to pay."

"It was apparent to our delegation that this was going to be the best they could do. They didn't dicker," said another official.

The sources said they could not explain how Iraq settled on the figure.

"The government of Iraq has agreed to pay more than $27 million as full compensation for (the) deaths," State Department spokeswoman Margaret Tutwiler announced Tuesday.

"The agreement was reached in Baghdad (Monday) following discussions between the foreign ministry of Iraq and a United States delegation," Tutwiler said.

A victim compensation payment by Iraq has been described by U.S. government officials as the most important step the Mideast country can take to maintain good relations and follow through after its public apology.

Iraq has acknowledged that one of its warplanes fired on the Stark on May 17, 1987, in what it said was a case of mistaken identity. The Iraqis said the fighter thought it was attacking an oil tanker bound for Iran.

The United States has accepted that explanation by Iraq, while pressing for financial compensation.

Administration sources said the United States still plans to press Iraq on two other claims.

Form follows passion

Home tailored with elements of Roman and Italian design

The Watts' new house stands out among the other homes in the Belvedere subdivision in Western Manhattan.

The few windows the Watts' house has are deliberately placed and designed. Rich Uhlrich, of Lynn Blecha Construction, works in front of a large plate glass window on the second floor.

Don Watts, associate professor of architecture, and Carol Watts, associated professor of environmental design, designed their home in Roman and Italian styles.

The only house constructed in Manhattan's newest subdivision was created with the meaning of the division's name in mind: Belvedere or "beautiful view" in Italian.

Set on a hill, the unique design towers above the other houses and the green roof extends above the trees facing the Konza Prairie.

For the past eight years, Italian and Roman architecture has been a passion for Don Watts, associate professor of architecture, and Carol Watts, associate professor of environmental design. In the design of their house at 1900 Crescent Drive, the Wattses incorporated the architectural elements of the designs they have studied.

"One of the things we were continuously trying to do was use patterns from certain Roman houses," Carol said. "We use deep views (designed to see a series of spaces through the house), thick walls, changes in ceiling heights and suites of rooms tied together by a unifying feature.

"We wanted to incorporate the Roman deep views into the house," she said. "In a Roman house there is a deep view through a series of spaces into a garden in the middle of the house."

The Wattses incorporated this element with windows creating a view which extends though the length of the house. From the glass front doors, an individual can see the trees in the back yard of the house through a window.

The rooms will be unified though an off-white color with terra cotta and peach tones used for accents.

"We don't experience rooms as completely separate spaces; they are always part of something larger," Don said.

Although the Wattses wanted to create a theme of open spaces, they designed their first-floor family room as an enclosed space with two columns, representing closeness and family, if viewed from the bi-level landing, Don said.

In contrast to the family room, in the view of the second floor from the landing, "you can see the connection to the outer world upstairs" from a window.

From the landing, "the stairs are expressed as a tower," Carol said. "We kept it as open as possible and used light paint and steel railing."

On the second floor, the placement of windows creates the sense of axis, he said.

"As you arrive on the second floor, you get views from all directions," Carol said. "You're at the center of the house. But being at the center doesn't mean being enclosed."

Carol said the windows are deliberately placed, such as the third-floor window at eye level which looks north toward the prairie.

"The window is representative of eyes looking out to the unknown," Don said.

"From the most distant view in the home we can see Wamego and the power plant by Wamego," Carol said. "I really like the view over to the west, but it will probably be filled with houses soon."

"You can see the horizons on the east and west, and north to the trees. It means you are really tied into the larger world."

Opposite the window is the slide collection room with memories of the past, Don said.

The Wattses designed their study to accomodate their extensive collection of slides of architectural sites from around the world. A closet was built for the slides with a light table for slide viewing.

A one-square-foot window which is placed at eye level on the landing leading to the third floor is incorporated into the stair tower.

"The small window gives us a Zen view as you come up the stairs," Carol said.

In addition to incorporating architectural elements they studied abroad, the Wattses observed the exterior design of the typical old four-square homes located in the middle school area in Manhattan and designed their exterior with similar elements.

"The similarities to the typical four-square house are just on the outside of the house," Don said. "The inside is radically different. Where there are normally walls, we have open spaces."

The Wattses designed their house with practical concepts. The study and the childrens' floor were intentionally placed at opposite ends of the house.

"I think the ground level is the natural place for the children's level so that they have easy access in and out of the house," Don said. "And by having our study on the top floor there really won't be a reason to have kids running around by the study."

The initial design process began in August of 1987 with the selection of a site.

"We wanted a site which allowed us views of the large areas," Carol said.

To get an idea of the scenery at the different levels of their house designs, they took photos at the location from a stepladder on the back of a truck.

"We wanted to see the views from different levels because we knew we were going to build upward," Don said. "We put the ladder on the back of the truck and climbed up with a camera on a tripod ... and took some panoramic shots.

"It was a really exciting time for us when they framed the house. We could climb up to each floor and look at the views. We discovered that the view on the second floor was much nicer than we thought it would be."

The view was the reason they built the three-story house, Carol said. The roof is about 34 feet from the first floor, "which is about the height limit for a house."

"It's the only three-story house I've ever built, said Lynn Blecha, owner of Blecha Construction. "It stretched our longest ladder just to reach the roof, and the views are spectacular."

The previous owner of the lot was going to remove the trees on the lot to make building easier, but the day before the Wattses photographed the site, a rain delayed the removal and the Wattses convinced him to leave the trees intact.

In addition to site planning, the sequential progression of spaces were priorities of the design, Don said.

"As you drive up Hudson Avenue, the house first presents itself from the roof," he said. "As you get closer, the form of the house is presented.

"One thing that makes this house different from the typical ranch-style house is that the garage and large driveway are not the prominent part of the elevation," he said. "You notice the house.

"We're not celebrating the double garage."

A sidewalk from the driveway will circle a large tree and will end on the axis with the front porch.

"This house uses the same materials as the neighbors' houses, but they are arranged in a different way," Don said.

The siding was cut in uniform pieces and attached to create definition of the floors of the house on the exterior.

"This house was built for us," Don said.

A terra cotta Roman archway distinguishes the entryway and staircase from the kitchen area where Geff Dawson, of Lynn Blecha Construction, finishes work on a cabinet.

Marketing major begins limousine service

Owner, drivers say business is growing

By Lisa Pfannenstiel
Features Editor

The Phi Delta Theta fraternity is not only the home of about 60 men but is the home of a limousine service as well.

Dave Dreiling, senior in marketing, started the Little Apple Limousine Service in mid-February.

During his first night of work, Dreiling said he drove two K-State alumni and their dates from Manhattan to Wichita and chauffeured them to the bars in Wichita.

Since then, Dreiling and his principal driver, Stephen Brummer, senior in industrial education, have been busy scheduling jobs for April and May, including proms in Waterville and Concordia, Kans.

For a change of pace, Dreiling, Chris Brzon, a driver and senior in mechanical engineering, and four women took a trip to Padre Island during spring break because Dreiling's ticket to the Bahamas was cancelled by Eastern Airlines.

Not every trip is so exotic. Many of the jobs involve chauffeuring couples and groups in Manhattan.

"Last Friday night a guy had a suprise party for his date, who turned 21," Brummer said. "They had pizza and drinks while watching a movie in the limo.

"Having something to drink is pretty much a given for all our trips," he said, adding that customers enjoy drinking without worrying about driving.

Business is growing, Brummer said. For April 8, the service has scheduled a wedding, a prom and a formal.

The service has a contract with KSKT-FM radio to escort the two ticket winners to the Eddie Money concert in Bramlage Coliseum and a night out on the town afterward.

Dreiling has targeted markets in the area and hopes to work with K-State and Manhattan businesses.

"I want to set up a package deal with a local restaurant which would include limousine service to and from the establishment, dinner for the couple, as well as roses and champagne during the drive to the restaurant," Dreiling said.

Both Dreiling and Brummer are familar with scheduling such events because they previously worked as chauffeurs.

"I got my feet wet while working for LaRide (Limousine Service) last spring," Dreiling said. "When the owner of the limousine service packed up and left Manhattan, I felt the opportunity was there to go into business for myself.

"With my experience as a chauffeur and as a current marketing major, I believe I can make this business work.

"Manhattan residents have shown in the past their desire for a limousine service, and I want to provide the service once again."

Dreiling operates his business from his room in the fraternity house.

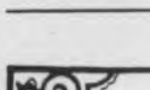
"There's no reason to rent a building," he said. "All I need to worry about is a place to park the limousine."

To get the business rolling, Dreiling estimated an initial operating cost of $10,000. Customers can expect to pay $40 a hour.

"The prices I charge are very competitive with the national average," he said. "Currently, the national average is $52 per hour."

In addition to Brummer, five individuals are assisting with the driving, promotion and mechanics of the business.

With his prior training, Dreiling plans to train his drivers in proper chauffeur's etiquette.



"Not all of the drivers have had a chance to drive yet, but we are trying to rotate the schedule and have each of them get experience," Brummer said.

Theresa Luling contributed to this article.

Snyder opens season with spring practice

Coaches to stress focusing team's work

By Chris Wilhelm
Sports Writer

During spring football practices, one main thought will be going through the minds of members of the coaching staff — geting team members focused on playing to the best of their ability.

Practices, which began Tuesday, will work on the players' past problems, such as the team's 27-game non-winning streak, some players' questionable level of skill and the relatively small number out for the squad, said K-State's new football coach, Bill Snyder.

"We are trying to instill in our players that they can and need to work harder," Snyder said. "We do not want our players putting limits on themselves.

"We have to put them in situations where they will realize that we won't accept anything but their best effort."

Snyder said one of the biggest challenges the staff faces is trying to get the team to forget about the lack of past success and focus on concentrating and improving the level of play.

"It takes a tremendously strong person to overcome (not winning in 27 tries)," Snyder said. "If each player decides that enough is enough and asks himself, 'What can I do to lend myself to a winning team?', then that is when they will begin learning to win.

"We are trying to reduce the distractions as much as possible. We are closing practices to everyone so that we can keep the distraction level as low as it can be. We need to give our players the opportunity to concentrate on the task at hand."

What this year's squad may lack in size, Snyder said he hopes will be made up with speed and intangibles.

"Our kids have worked very hard during their out of season programming," Snyder said. "In general, we have decent speed at our skill and perimeter positions, but overall we are somewhat undersized.

"I have a tremendous concern with the intangibles. The overall team attitude, work ethic and responsibility level of this team has improved greatly since January. With concentration and hard work, there is no reason that our players can't play as hard as any team in the United States."

The Wildcat spring squad will consist of at least 81 players, but could increase to as many as 90 with walk-ons. Five players will be unavailable for spring ball due to ineligibility or injury, but are expected to return in the fall.

While Snyder is working on improving the quality of play of his team, the overall aspect of the numbers have him concerned.

"Our main concern with this group is not in quality — it is in depth. We'll put 22 men on the field, but the chances are that all of those 22 won't be playing the same position all season. We need some real improvement in (the depth) area."

Staff/Steve Wolgast

New 'Cats Head Coach Bill Snyder, right, discusses the practice with an assistant Tuesday. Earlier, Snyder listed some problems the 'Cats need to overcome: their 27-game losing streak, some players' questionable skill and the relatively small number out for the squad.

The changes brought about with the new coaching staff has only benefited, not hurt the team, said offensive tackle Chad Faulkner.

"I'm ready to get going," Faulkner said. "It's kind of fun learning a new system. It gives us a new hope and hopefully a new beginning. The new program is a lot more disciplined but people are complaining less than in the past.

"The coaching staff has put a lot of faith in us. They have given us help, knowledge and the chance to be successful."

Linebacker Jeff Lowe echoed those sentiments.

"The coaching staff is teaching us how to win through our best effort," Lowe said. "I'm looking forward to getting spring drills started. After our spring game (April 29) one K-State team will be 1-0 and put that losing streak behind them. I hope I'm on that team."

Henry ready for season, changes

By Mike Goens
Sports Writer

Senior Maurice Henry will be making his third position switch in as many seasons with the K-State football team.

Henry will move to defensive end under new Coach Bill Snyder. Last season Henry received second-team all-conference honors at the inside linebacker post under former Coach Stan Parrish. While in that position, he had the team's second highest number of tackles with 100 — 44 of which were unassisted.

Henry played on the other side of the ball at the tailback position his freshman and sophomore seasons and gained 195 yards on 62 carries.

"They are trying to find a place to put me that will be best for the team," Henry said. "I feel comfortable there (at defensive end).

"I played defensive end the latter part of last year," he said. "A bunch of defensive linemen got hurt and I moved to end. I kind of liked it. I want to help the team out in the best possible way I can.

"Everywhere I have played I've adjusted pretty well," he said. "I'm pretty excited. I'm impressed with the new coach."

Henry has played for three coaches during his five years at K-State. He was granted an injury hardship his first year.

The Wildcat coach who recruited Henry and was here for the first two games of the 1985 season was Jim Dickey. Lee Moon stepped in as interim coach to finish the season. Moon was then followed by Parrish and now Snyder.

"I'd say I'm one of the few players in the nation that has been through three coaches," Henry said. "I've seen a lot of players come and go, and been through a lot of changes. But I don't regret for a moment coming here.

"Everybody's got a positive attitude," he said. "The outlook is so positive, the only way to look is up."

Henry is optimistic about how the Wildcats will line up defensively next year, because several other players have also made position changes. Among those is Henry's partner at inside linebacker from last year, Erick Harper, who will move back to strong safety — a position he played during his sophomore year.

"Coach (Bob) Cope (defensive coordinator) told us we didn't get beat (defensively) because of lack of effort, but because of busted coverages," Henry said.

"He came from a winning program. He knows we're going to win," he said. "I've read his credentials, I think he is outstanding, he really means business.

"It's been a long, four, frustrating years," he said. "I know Coach Snyder will get things done.

Ringgenberg enjoys season's quick start

By Chris Wilhelm
Sports Writer

After being redshirted for a season due to a back injury, Russ Ringgenberg is glad to be back in the lineup for the K-State baseball team.

Following 16 games, Ringgenberg is leading the 'Cats at the plate, batting .431 with 18 RBIs and eight extra base hits. His success has spilled over to his hitting with men on base as he leads the team with a .672 mark. He has walked 10 times and struck out four times in 58 plate appearances.

"I was hurting last year," Ringgenberg said. "I actually think the operation (for a ruptured disk) has improved my batting. It keeps me under control and I think I have a better swing because of it.

"It has allowed me to get a rhythm to my swing and I think my mechanics are better."

As a graduate of Manhattan High School, Ringgenberg isn't a stranger to Manhattan or Frank Myers Field.

"I love this field," he said. "This is my ninth year playing on this field and it gets nicer every week. I played American Legion ball here during high school. I've gotten pretty used to playing here."

Ringgenberg is a typical player in coach Mike Clark's program. He is consistent at the plate and in the field. He has committed only two errors in 28 chances.

In the Wildcat's recent trip to California and a West coast tournament, K-State was able to knock off two teams ranked in the top 20; Ringgenberg was selected to the all tournament team.

"We played real well in California," he said. "We have been pretty consistent the whole season. We haven't blown anyone out and we haven't been blown out. We've been in every ball game we've played."

The 'Cats plan to continue that trend when they take on the Tigers of Fort Hays State University in a doubleheader beginning at 1 p.m. today at Frank Myers Field.

The Tigers own a 6-10 record, but eight of their 10 losses have been against NCAA Division I teams. In their first game of the season, the Tigers gave nationally ranked Wichita State a scare before eventually losing 11-10.

Fort Hays has won six of their last eight games. The Tigers dropped two one-run games to the University of Kansas Thursday, before winning four in a row during the weekend from Regis College of Colorado.

Veteran relinquishes medal

Medal of Honor renounced as protest

By Nancy Hill
City Editor

"We obtain real freedom when we're willin' to die rather than commit evil ourselves," said Charles Liteky, a Vietnam veteran who gave back his Medal of Honor in 1986.

Liteky, a former U.S. Army Catholic chaplain who served three tours in Vietnam, spoke to about 60 people at a Manhattan Alliance on Central America meeting Tuesday night.

In 1968, Liteky received a Medal of Honor from President Lyndon Johnson for carrying 20 wounded soldiers to safety through enemy machine gunfire. On July 29, 1986, he renounced his medal in protest of the U.S. policy in Central America and later placed it at the foot of the Vietnam Veterans War Memorial.

"Giving up something symbolic of patriotism has been interesting," Liteky said. "I think it was more patriotic to give it up than to keep it — once I became fully aware of the war I participated in and the war in Central America."

In relinquishing his medal, Liteky also gave up financial and military benefits, including a lifetime job with the Veterans Administration and travel to military bases worldwide.

In addition to returning his medal in 1986, Liteky joined three other U.S. veterans in a 47-day fast on the steps of U.S. Capitol.

"If it was going to take the vision of someone dying to wake people up, then I was fasting until death," he said.

"I love this country, but not at the exclusion of the rest of the world."

Liteky said he is aware of the human rights' abuses of the Sandinista government, but believes the atrocities committed by the U.S.-backed Contras are much worse.

"We are supporting the repression of poor people," he said. "There has been so much killing and so much death, it's going to take generations for the wounds to heal."

Liteky said he does not advocate humanitarian aid to the Contras "that would help them survive as a military unit."

"I'd like to see this aid go for relocation (of the Contras) instead of preservation," he said.

The unequal distribution of wealth and materialism spawned by capitolism is a detriment to the poor people of the world, Liteky said.

"This profit motif has gone beyond reason, we have capitalism almost without limits," he said. "We really don't want to talk about the distribution of wealth. The fruits of capitalism are going sour for many people."

Nicaragua may, in fact, be better off with a communist government that strives for equality for its people, Liteky said.

"Capitalism has no way of dealing with inequitable distribution of wealth," he said.

"I don't want to embrace communism either," Liteky said. "I would hope for a happy marriage of the best of both systems.

"I think we have enjoyed the wealth and the comfort we've had at the expense of the poor people of the world."

Americans are brought up in a capitalistic society, Liteky said, so they have little perception of the true affect our economy has on the world.

"We're 6 percent of the world's population using 40 to 50 percent of the world's goods," he said.

"I'm also struggling with what I'm learning about capitalism now and what I was brought up to believe," said Brenda Allen, sophomore in English.

John Exdell, associate professor of philosopy said, "He really communicated a lot of integrity, strength and commitment that is good for (members of the Manhattan Alliance on Central America) to see."

Liteky's presentation is part of series of local events in conjunction with Central America Week.

undergraduate fee from $7.50 to $5.

Senate also amended the bill to exclude students enrolled in graduate school and the College of Veterinary Medicine from paying the athletic fee.

Another amendment called for all senators and Senate interns to be given free admission and front-row seats at all home and away athletic events. The amendment failed.

Kelly, graduate student in speech, said so many amendments were added to the bill to exhaust those senators who approved the bill, hoping to table the issue to a later date and thus kill it.

In other business, Senate heard the first reading on a bill sponsored by the Investment Ad Hoc Committee that included five enactments regarding divestment in South Africa:

■ Student Senate adopt the Ethical Investment Policy drafted by the Investment Ad Hoc Committee.

■ As an initial statement in support of the Ethical Investment Policy, Senate divest all student monies from companies doing business in South Africa.

■ Senate attempt to assume more responsibility in the decision-making process of its investments.

■ Senate request representation on the KSU Foundation Executive Committee as one means of assuming responsibility for student investments.

■ Senate establish a standing committee on ethics to oversee student government matters concerning ethics.

Senate also discussed a special allocation to the K-State marching band to assist the band in purchasing 225 new uniforms, providing the allocation does not exceed $20,000.

Senate will vote on both bills Thursday.

president. ... We'll then later on worry about who is going to pay for the damage.

"But there are significant penalties and provisions for reimbursement."

Bush said, "the thing is to get it cleaned up, to protect the very precious environment out there, to make sure everything is being done to clean up this disaster. And then we'll have all these penalties and all that later on."

At this point, Exxon is in charge of the cleanup in one of the world's most environmentally sensitive and biologically rich marine waters. Bush said that 14 federal agencies also were involved, and that much of the equipment has been furnished by the Coast Guard.

Asked whether Exxon was doing enough, Bush said, "I've just had a report that they're certainly making a good beginning here, but there's been some conflicting reports on that and I don't want to prejudge that. I think one of the things we're interested in hearing is exactly how our top officials feel the cleanup is going.

"There is an option for federalization (of the cleanup) and then the question is, is that the most prudent way to go?"

By some estimates, the cleanup will require several months. Exxon Shipping Co. President Frank Iarossi said Monday the cleanup "is not proceeding well — believe me, that is an understatement. We've got a mess on our hands."

Takeover discussed for Eastern Airlines

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Texas Air Corp. directors met Tuesday and were expected to consider offers to buy strike-crippled Eastern Airlines, sources said.

Peter V. Ueberroth, whose term as baseball commissioner ends Saturday, may offer $300 million to $500 million during the meeting that ends today, said baseball and airline industry sources. Takeover specialist Carl C. Icahn hoped union concessions would persuade Eastern creditors to let him take control.

Ueberroth's offer will be for $512 milllion, would be financed by Drexel Burnham Lambert Inc. and would give Eastern's unions a 30 percent stake in the airline in exchange for wage concessions, The New York Times were expected to report today.

Sources said substantive discussions in the regularly scheduled meetings probably wouldn't get under way until Wednesday. Texas Air spokesman Art Kent in Houston said the company wouldn't comment on whether a meeting was being held.

Indications of Ueberroth's interest came as Icahn, owner and chairman of Trans World Airlines Inc., resumed talks with Eastern's unions about a possible takeover.

Business and Human Ecology. The fee was not approved in the colleges of Architecture and Veterinary Medicine.

Statistics also show that undergraduates approved the fee 60 percent to 40 percent, while graduate students opposed the fee 83 percent to 17 percent.

The election results show little change from those reported in a Collegian survey published March 1.

According to the survey, 54.8 percent of students responding said they would vote yes, and 45.2 percent said they would vote no, with a standard error of 2.1 percent.

The survey indicated that 57.4 percent of undergraduates responding would support the fee and 42.6 percent of those responding would oppose the fee, with a standard error of 2.3 percent.

Of graduate students responding, 71.4 percent said they would oppose the fee and 28.6 percent said they would support the fee, with a standard error of 6.5 percent.

Although 1,984 more students voted than in the general election last November, the number of students voting in a referendum is the fourth highest since 1973.

The largest voter turnout was about 5,600 in 1979 for the Coliseum referendum.

David Parsons Company
Thursday, March 30, 8 p.m.

Acclaimed for its vitality, wild inventiveness, and gift for entertainment, the David Parsons Company zooms into McCain for an evening of dance that's playful and roiling with energy. From the tour de force solo "Caught" to "The Envelope" -- a zany spoof of everything from dance styles to elaborate lighting, set to the music of Rossini -- the Company's repertory shows off one of the most exciting and refreshing choreographic talents to come along in some time.

"It's very likeable, highly creative stuff beautifully danced by a company...all of whom seemed to be Parsons' virtuosic match."

WINGS OF DESIRE

"Wings of Desire" is as much a re-examination of the divided city of Berlin and its almost spectral inhabitants, as it is a thoroughly romantic love story. Damiel, played by Bruno Ganz, is an angel who has grown tired and frustrated at his inability to affect the people over whom he watches in his weightless existance. Visiting a travelling circus, he encounters a beautiful trapeze artist with whom he immediately falls in love, and decides to leave the heavens and enter the mortal world of earthly delights.(In German and French with English subtitles) Unrated (130 min.)
